“Ah. So you’re not flirting, but insulting me? Geez, you could’ve just said it in a way that’s easier to understand.”

Just as Seo-rin was about to start a game of whack-a-mole on my head with a broom, I hurriedly added, “Wait. Hear me out. Seo-rin, you captured monsters and provided citizens with limb-severing shows every month’s end. It shows you have demonstrated talent for event planning.”

“That was just a means to seize power,” she replied shamelessly with a nonchalant expression.

From my perspective, knowing the monster lurking behind that calm face, it was truly terrifying.

“You know as well as I do, Undertaker,” she added. “To become a ruler, you must provide bread and circuses. I provided circuses to claim the throne of Busan.”

“That’s not all. You even created unique uniforms and items that other guilds couldn’t dare to imitate and forced them on your subordinates. Thanks to that, the Samcheon World guild members are recognized wherever they go.”

“Yeah, that’s part of my hobby. Even the leader of a large guild has a private life, you know. Can’t you respect that?”

“Fine. Then take a look at this post.”

I pulled up image files I had previously captured from SG Net on my smartphone and showed them to her one by one.

- [Samcheon] WitchTrial: Sleepless dawn. In the past, I would have visited a night café. Now, only the tunnel of the deep sea remains as a walking path.

- [Samcheon] WitchTrial: The quiet café hideout where everyone is asleep. With every 100 meters walked, every 200 meters crossed, the weight of sorrow adds to the footsteps, echoing.

- [Samcheon] WitchTrial: Before I knew it, I arrived at the 1,200-meter depth. The end of the walking path.

- [Samcheon] WitchTrial: But there's always someone waiting at the end of the path. Did they hear my footsteps? The barista came out to greet me. Well, even though I said it's fine, they insisted on making me an affogato.

- [Samcheon] WitchTrial: A bite of sweet vanilla ice cream. Like the morning sorrow melting under the starlight, the sweetness flows down my tongue...

Seo-rin tilted her head.

"What's wrong with this? It's a bit of dawn sentimentality, but it's just a very ordinary diary."

"No, this isn't a diary. It's a demonic grimoire."

I put on a grave expression and scrolled down the smartphone screen.

"This post contains truly sinister energy. First, you subtly revealed that you're a powerhouse who can come and go to the café at any time, even at dawn. Moreover, by pointing out that most Awakeners loiter around the 100-meter and 200-meter depths, you implied that you easily surpassed that level."

No response.

"You tried to disguise it with romanticism, but that's nonsense. In the end, you just wanted to boast that even at dawn, your exclusive barista can bring out rare ice cream to provide you with a midnight snack."

"Hmm."

"Not to mention, you didn't post this immediately. You uploaded it at 6 AM yesterday, when people were starting to wake up. Why?"

I pointed at Seo-rin.

"If you had posted it at dawn when fewer people were on SG Net, it would have been buried as a pointless post! You posted it at the optimal time to attract attention!"

“Indeed... That’s an interesting interpretation.”

Although her lips remained relaxed, Seo-rin’s eyes revealed the smile she could not hide.

“But in the end, it’s just your subjective interpretation and conjecture, right? There’s no decisive, objective evidence that I’m an attention-seeker.”

Tsk. Even after being so bluntly pointed out, not a single crack in her expression!

She was a formidable opponent. Every time she logged into SG Net, she would get at least 120 comments (60% of which were written by Samcheon World guild members), absorbing all kinds of attention like a black hole. Truly a name worth her reputation.

I changed my approach.

“Seo-rin. Haven’t you felt that Do-hwa, the Management Commander, has been acting too arrogantly lately?” I dropped my volume to a whisper and said, “Whether it’s SG Net or reality, all I hear is Noh Do-hwa this, Noh Do-hwa that—nothing but praise for the Management Commander.”

“Hmm...”

Finally, Seo-rin’s expression changed.

“I did feel like too much power was concentrated in one person,” she mused. “Absolute power without proper checks absolutely corrupts. I can’t help but worry about the future of the Korean Peninsula.”

“Exactly. Ah-ryeon from the Eastern Divine Nation was supposed to keep her in check, but lately, she hasn’t been able to do that.”

“Well, she was never really capable in the first place, that one.”

“In such a critical situation, the only person who can save the people is none other than the Great Witch of Samcheon World— Or at least, that's what I've heard from the hearts of the people on the lookout."

"Hmm..."

Seo-rin drew her face a little closer.

Even among attention-seekers, personalities aren't all the same. If the OldManGoryoe is a reckless soldier who indiscriminately sprays attention-seeking machine gun fire in all directions, then the Witch Trial Judge of Samcheon World is a heavyweight who only moves when there's a just cause.

That's right. Seo-rin would never tolerate anyone belittling her. Her actions always had to be "just."

"This is something that hasn't been revealed to the public yet, but... The evening broadcasts that have been airing lately are actually not by Noh Do-hwa, the Commander, but the work of an Anomaly."

"Oh my, really?"

Seo-rin's eyes sparkled. She seemed almost convinced.

"Of course. Do you take me for a liar? The Korean Peninsula is currently facing an unprecedented crisis. The people are being deceived by an Anomaly impersonating the National Road Commander. I can confidently say that the only person who can break through this crisis is you, Seo-rin."

Seo-rin sighed. Her gaze drifted out the train window.

"Really... I just want to live quietly, performing the role given to me, but the world won't leave me alone."

"It can't be helped. Great talent comes with great responsibility."

Swiftly, I pulled out a bundle of papers from my pocket. It was sheet music with lyrics and notes written on it.

Seo-rin blinked as she looked down at the sheets. "What's this? Undertaker?"

“Ah, it’s nothing. Just some verses of a spell song I composed while staying up all night.”

“Huh?”

“This is a spell song that always perfectly regenerates your skin. And this one is a spell song that always keeps your hair in perfect condition.”

“Oh my? Huh. Hmm.”

“Of course, compared to your composing skills, it’s utterly lacking, but artists naturally consider it the greatest honor to present their work to their muse. Seo-rin, won’t you accept this humble sheet music?”

“Well,” she mused, her expression growing serious. “Such a heartfelt gift. Something that can’t possibly be dismissed as a bribe. Your creation, Undertaker. As a human being, it is simply impossible for me to coldly reject.”

“Then... aren’t we soul mates?”

“Of course.”

Thump.

Seo-rin and I shook hands firmly.

“Although I have no interest in the superficial aspects of being an idol or anything like that, for the sake of the Korean Peninsula, for the people, and most importantly, to respond to your heart, Undertaker, I will do my best—”

“Of course. I will also support you with all my might, my soul mate —”

Thus, the only hope to counter the propaganda of Big Sister.

The debut of the idol was confirmed.

Rejoice, rejoice.

[...Mr. Undertaker.]

On the way back after the meeting, the Saintess sent me a telepathic message.

[Sometimes I think it would have been better if I didn't have the Clairvoyance ability.]

[If that were the case, I wouldn't have to constantly witness the depths of human nature right before my eyes.]

[I might have held some expectations I kept to myself, some sweet illusions about the people around me, and wouldn't have ended up holed up at home like this.]

"Ah. Seo-rin can be a bit of a letdown once you get to know her. But don't be too disappointed. You always have the steadfast Undertaker by your side, Saintess."

For some reason, the Saintess fell silent.

For the life of me, I have no idea why.

There is an epilogue.

- Hello! Another wonderful evening. Nymph Calypse here.

- The first song we'll play today is by an incredibly talented individual, truly the diva of the peninsula! Seo-rin's new song, Raise the Flag of Resistance!

- Today is also the day of the Magical☆Ravenclaw's descent!

- The great sorcerer has a song she wants to introduce to you. Oh my! The acoustic guitar version of the Great Witch's new song, never before released anywhere!

- Last time, she overwhelmingly took first place in SG Net's official popularity poll, right? Let's listen together, even you kids who eat dirt!

Seo-rin's debut made headway as a barrage of attacks through various media outlets. All of the radio channels people enjoyed were already operating under my sponsorship. Manipulating public opinion was easier than doing push-ups for me.

And that's not all.

- Won't you come see the sea with me?

- The scenery at 1,200 meters depth. The majestic secrets of humanity await you.

- "Like the aroma of coffee" by Seo-rin.

An advertisement appeared at the top of SG Net. Now, every time Awakeners logged on, they were exposed to a café advertisement featuring Seo-rin's photo.

But it didn't stop there.

"Heh heh, Comrade Secretary! I've completed the task you demanded of me!"

I mobilized hundreds of Tutorial Fairies to pilgrimage throughout the northern part of the Korean Peninsula.

The mission was simple: sneak into people's dreams and plant a positive image of Seo-rin! For example, if someone was having a nightmare of being chased by a grotesque, Seo-rin would appear and save the dreamer.

Truly, we infiltrated both consciousness and subconsciousness to instill the image of "Seo-rin☆The Best" into people.

The result?

"We received a regular report from the National Road Management caravans. All the albums of the Samcheon World guild leader we sent as the first batch are sold out..." Do-hwa said with a gleam in her cold eyes. "Not just the albums, but T-shirts with magic school designs, utterly useless magic brooms, pointed hats, and witch robes, all sorts of goods are selling like hotcakes..."

Indeed. The Korean Peninsula was experiencing an unprecedented Seo-rin boom.

“It’s a natural outcome,” I said nonchalantly. “Those goods have been proven popular across numerous cycles. Once you see them, you can’t help but buy them.”

“Don’t waste cycles figuring out things like that, you lunatic...”

Especially popular were Seo-rin’s ASMR mini-albums, such as Lullabies that Make You Sleep Soundly or Awakening Songs that Make You Alert in Just Three Minutes in the Morning. Even though they didn’t actually have any magical effects, given that Seo-rin’s specialty was spell songs, a strong placebo effect occurred among buyers.

Even now, rave reviews were pouring in on SG Net.

Well, negative reviews were secretly handled as private posts, so they didn’t get any attention. That’s just how it is.

This is the greatness of knowledge is power. If you’re jealous, be born as a regressor, human.

“Anyway, thanks to that, the Big Sister’s evening broadcasts have been completely buried. All the Seo-rin related radio channels are broadcasting at the same time.”

“Well, they are buried, but... is this really the right way to exterminate Anomalies...?”

“There are surprisingly few methods to completely eradicate the existence of Anomalies. It’s more standard to dilute their significance.”

In the end, trends come and go.

At first, Do-hwa’s faith swept through like a storm, but as people’s attention shifted elsewhere, it rapidly lost momentum. People from the North began to forget the memories of enshrining her portrait, as if it never happened.

The owner of the grilled eel shop at Jagalchi Market was surprised, saying, “Huh? Why is this picture in my stall?”

“With this, the case is resolved. I apologize for the inconvenience, Commander Noh.”

“Hmm... Well. It seems like people won’t remember it anyway, so it doesn’t matter to me...”

“But?”

Instead of answering, Do-hwa turned the radio dial with a click. There came the noise of the frequency tuning, and soon, advertisements started playing one after another.

- Freshly, lightly! This summer’s fashion item is the sailor uniform! The student council president of Baekhwa Girls’ High School guarantees the quality.

- Is life tough? Are you lonely? Is the world frustrating? For those of you feeling this way, Pyongyang is always open. Let’s praise Mokwangseo Christ. Our Saintess, Sim Ah-ryeon.

- In Daejeon, we always provide free meals for the hungry. Come on over. Alle Alle, Daejeon. The city united by hope, Daejeon.

Do-hwa sent me a sidelong glance.

“Because of the fireworks you set off, it’s become a trend for all sorts of neighborhoods to advertise on the radio, and there’s a good chance these guys might develop into Anomalies. What do you, the self-proclaimed grotesque expert, think about this phenomenon...?”

“Hmm.”

I quietly sipped my mug while listening to the radio.

The coffee was delicious as always.

Chapter 305

The Distributor I

Sinnoa

Before civilization collapsed, back when the name "Republic of Korea" felt much more natural than the term "Korean Peninsula," people would make remarks like this:

“Hey, no matter what, Korea is still a pretty livable country, right? Go to Africa and you'll realize how good Korea is.”

There were several valid reasons for this.

The level of public safety that allowed people to walk the streets at night without worry, infrastructure reliable enough that power outages weren't a concern, convenience stores so close that you could go out in slippers even in the middle of winter (though not in every city), and so on...

And among these, there was one undeniably overwhelming advantage.

“Delivery for PO Box 1.”

“Please leave the new package outside. We will pick it up soon.”

It was the delivery and logistics service.

At some point, Koreans began to believe that if you ordered something before midnight, your goods should obviously arrive by the next morning, right? This belief even included the expectation of balking at 3,000 won fees for delivery. Because really, who did they think could afford such exorbitant fees?

As a result, delivery in this land was miraculously "fast" and "free." It was like alchemy in its own right.

Unfortunately, after the apocalypse arrived, this large-scale magic circle collapsed. However, since public safety, infrastructure, and convenience stores all went down together, its end wasn't too lonely.

"Hyung."

Or at least, that's what I thought.

"Huh? What is it?"

"You know those ads that pop up at exactly 4:44:44 in the morning? The ones from those ridiculous curse sites," Seo Gyu said.

The curse site ads referred to a series of posts that would pop up out of the blue on SG Net. As Seo Gyu mentioned, they were usually uploaded at 4:44:44 AM.

If you visited SG Net at that time, you'd see something like this:

- Anonymous: ♠♠Amazing Shopping Mall♠♠ Sign up now for 1-on-1 consultation with the owner $$ 100% refund guaranteed @@@

- Drowning: ☆Global☆Royal☆Renaissance☆ Bitcoin▶▶Stock Info 1-time reading experience☜☜ Free

LeydteuqhTog7IKs656MIOyLnOyytCDtjJTslYTsmpQg7L2UIOyeiOyWtOyalC

- Anonymous: Promotion: I tried this free online lecture, and it was really helpful lol

These sorts of posts would maddeningly flood the board, appearing all at once in less than a second, totaling about 200 posts in all.

Needless to say, it was best practice to never click on them carelessly. They weren't posted by humans, and if a non-expert tried it at home and accessed them, they could easily fall under a curse without even realizing it.

"Hey," I called, getting Seo Gyu's attention again. "Why are you bringing this up?"

"The Saintess has been sensing something strange lately."

Our response to these mindless ad bombardments was very simple: we just temporarily blocked SG Net and left everything to the Saintess. Even if the posts ambushed the site in less than a second, the Saintess had the Time Stop ability. It took her even less time to stop time and delete the posts with her admin privileges.

We could have assigned Seo Gyu to handle it, but...

Sorry, I just can't trust him when it comes to anything related to mental manipulation. I haven't forgotten how he sold out the guild to Go Yuri in the past.

"Something strange?" I repeated.

"Yeah. There've been these comments that keep showing up on the ad posts, and for this past month, one of them keeps coming up and won't disappear."

"Hmm."

"Here, look." He reached over and handed me a note he'd handwritten, and on it, was the comment transcribed in his scrawling penmanship.

- Toad House: Used discount: For sale. Delivery next morning. http://...

While the note ended in an unfamiliar website address, nothing about it or the rest of the comment was particularly suspicious.

I tilted my head. "Why is this a problem?"

"Well. I'm not entirely sure myself. You should hear the rest directly from the Saintess..."

Right.

I excused myself and headed to the Inunaki Tunnel. As soon as I did, a telepathic message came through, as if someone had been eavesdropping on our conversation.

[Several things about the comment from the user Toad House stand out as suspicious.]

I didn't find the sudden conversation strange and continued walking, slipping easily in the rhythm of our talk as I asked, "Suspicious things like what?"

[First, it's too ordinary to be a comment from an Anomaly. Most of the ad posts that appear at 4 AM are either written by AI with that disconnected, meandering sort of writing style, or they actively try to lure people in. But this comment doesn't even specify what's being sold.]

True. "Couldn't they be trying to make people curious?"

[Yes. However, the comment was posted too consistently and has never once changed,] the Saintess said evenly. [Ad posts that don't get any views on SG Net usually struggle to be more provocative and eye-catching. Despite that, the comment from Toad House remained unchanged. Even though it was first observed six months ago.]

"Hmm."

[In other words, an Anomaly that can maintain itself without devouring or enchanting humans. It may be on the more dangerous side than most.]

As I walked along, the exit to the Inunaki Tunnel soon came into view. On the stone wall blocking the end of the tunnel, graffiti was scrawled in Japanese.

The paint is too rough.

Supply human blood or replace the paint.

I bit my fingertip and wrote "OK" in blood, and the graffiti in Inunaki slowly faded away on its own.

Jumping over the stone wall put me at the tunnel entrance where the Saintess was waiting, leaning against the wall. She was wearing her usual, well-worn hoodie, with the hood pulled down low.

"Good morning, Saintess."

"Yes, good morning, Mr. Undertaker." She brushed the edges of her bangs away with the tip of her finger. "The day before yesterday, I found the Toad House ad suspicious, so I asked Yu Ji-won to check it out. I told her to go to the website address in the comment."

"Ah, I see."

Yu Ji-won had faced Go Yuri and remained completely sane. When it came to Anomalies related to mental manipulation, she was almost invincible in terms of immunity. In situations like this, where the level of danger was unclear, she was my most reliable ally.

"I heard Ji-won took a day off yesterday, so I wondered what was going on," I added. "Turns out she stayed up until 4 AM, so she wasn't in any state to be working."

"Yes. According to her testimony, when she clicked the link in the comment, she was taken to a website."

The Saintess pulled out a notepad from her hoodie pocket.

"This is the website screen I recreated based on her description. I tried to recreate it as closely as possible."

I glanced it over. The Saintess's drawing skills, while not on the level of OldManGoryeo's, were still nothing to scoff at.

"This design..."

Thanks to that, I could easily recognize it.

"Isn't this an online shopping mall?" I asked.

It was a website logo that poorly imitated the platform known for its crack-of-dawn delivery service, something most Koreans would have encountered. At the top of the screen was a title.

Toad House: Specialized in Used Goods

Give us something new, and we'll give you something old.

I furrowed my brow.

"The username comes from a children's nursery rhyme. But the phrase written here is the opposite of the lyrics."

"Yes. That's right."

This was also a game that any Korean would know, a song sung while playing in the dirt at playgrounds.

- Toad, Toad.

- Give me a new house, and I'll give you an old one.[1]

The key was to create a mound of dirt on the back of your hand and then see how skillfully you could pull your hand out. Sometimes, the great masters in their craft could pull their hands out even after tunneling through the mound. The geographical environment also played a key role, as success depended on how much moisture was in the soil.

One might call it the first exposure to civil engineering for children on the Korean Peninsula.

"So, hmm..." I hummed in thought. “Let me guess. Is this an Anomaly where you buy some used product, place an order, and it gets delivered?"

"Both Yu Ji-won and I thought the same."

The Saintess took the notepad back and burned it with a lighter, a mark of her true professionalism. Even though we had several layers of security measures in place for safety, when dealing with items related to Anomalies, we always had to be extra cautious.

"Early this morning, I contacted Team Leader Noh Do-hwa and conducted an experiment with an Awakened death row inmate,” she said. “I lent her a smartphone and ordered her to access Toad House."

"Hmm."

"I told her to pick any item and place an order, but... in the end, all that appeared was a message saying that payment had failed and nothing happened."

"So that's why you came to me."

"Yes."

This was the advantage of having capable colleagues like the Saintess, Yu Ji-won, Noh Do-hwa, Seo Gyu, and others. Instead of having to give them step-by-step instructions, they handled tasks within their areas of expertise on their own. Only when they couldn't resolve something would they report it to me.

"I understand the situation. Were there any signs of mental contamination in the death row inmate?" I asked.

"I tested 16 other death row inmates, but none of them complained of headaches or hallucinations."

"Hmm. Then it's safe to assume it's harmless for now. Moreover, even after going through the trouble of placing an order, instead of luring people in, it rejected the payment..."

There was something more.

My intuition as an old regressor was whispering warnings to me.

The Saintess noticed and said, "I think there might be a special condition required to trade products on the Toad House shopping mall. Do you have any ideas, Mr. Undertaker?"

"Wait a moment."

I pulled up a mental image of the comment Seo Gyu showed me and accessed Toad House directly on my smartphone.

Whoosh.

Numerous products were on display. Although the website's text was occasionally broken, the product names and photos were easy to recognize.

[Park Sang-hyun's Left Hand]

[Origin: Pocheon]

The product image showed a severed human hand. The fingers looked awkward, as if drawn by AI.

'Park Sang-hyun from Pocheon... Is that the Park Sang-hyun I know? He died not long ago in this cycle.'

We weren't particularly close, but I had briefly met him while exterminating the National Tax Service Comprehensive Income Tax Anomaly.

I hesitated, lost in thought, then said, "Anomalies always have rules... In this case, the name Toad House itself is probably the clue."

First, I tried singing.

I sang the short nursery rhyme, "Toad, Toad. Give me a new house, and I'll give you an old one," and then pressed the payment button.

My smartphone vibrated.

[Payment failed.]

That method didn't work.

I paused to think, then crouched down and started gathering dirt.

"Mr. Undertaker?"

"If singing alone isn't enough, I have no choice but to try playing in the dirt."

I made a mound of dirt large enough to cover my entire left hand and sang the nursery rhyme.

"Toad, Toad. Give me a new house, and I'll give you an old one."

My smartphone, placed on top of the mound, vibrated with a beep.

[Payment failed.]

Still no luck.

So then.

"Toad, Toad. Give me an old house, and I'll give you a new one—"

Suddenly, I felt a severing pain in my left hand under the mound.

It was a familiar pain.

I frowned and pulled my hand away—and found myself grimly surprised to find there was no hand left to pull away.

My entire left hand was gone from the wrist down.

Blood dripped from the mound. The Saintess, who had been crouching beside me, raised her eyebrows.

"Ah."

"It seems I've discovered how to use the shopping mall."

I used my Aura to stop the bleeding.

The next morning, after spending the night writing a Three Kingdoms parody novel, I received a message.

[Delivery completed.]

[1 box of fresh delivery items has been delivered.]

"Hmm."

I stepped out of my room in the Inunaki Tunnel. A delivery box was sitting in the hallway of the hideout.

As I had guessed, opening the box revealed someone's left hand, carefully packaged and delivered.

I turned to the Saintess, who was sharing my vision.

"The 'used products' sold at Toad House are the bodies or belongings of dead people. In other words, relics."

[...]

"And if you provide the same body part or item, it seems to exchange them in a one-to-one barter."

The Toad House shopping mall was a communal graveyard where the corpses and relics of the dead were stored.

Footnotes:

1 - This is the nursery rhyme Go Yuri sings at the end of the Diver arc in chapter 178.

Chapter 306

The Distributor II

Sinnoa

Question: Who would react as follows when informed about the true nature of the second-hand shopping mall "Toad House"? (Hint: It’s a member of the Regression Alliance.)

"Ah, I see. You've found another damn Anomaly somewhere. Truly impressive. Let's seal it immediately..."

The correct answer was Noh Do-hwa.

"The existence of this site must never be revealed to the public. Let's keep it a secret and remain silent..."

"Uh, can I ask why?" Seo Gyu timidly inquired.

Back when he debuted at Busan Station, Seo Gyu would curse at anyone who pissed him off, but in front of Do-hwa, he kept his mouth shut.

To be fair to him, anyone with common sense would flinch when facing her. Her gaze had a certain power that forced you into deep self-reflection, making you wonder, Did I have some grudge against this person in a past life?

"It's a natural question. The risk is too great—it could easily become a tool for the perfect crime..."

In one, smooth motion, Do-hwa lowered her smartphone and showed the screen to us. Displayed there was a product listed on the shopping mall.

[Yoo Jung-don's Heart]

[Place of Origin: Sinuiju]

"As you can see, Toad House sells all sorts of organs, from hearts to duodenums. Now, let's say—and I won't name names—someone buries a person they dislike in the ground..."

Why are you looking at me while saying it?

"Then, I proceed to add eyes, left arm, right arm, brain, heart, and so on, all body parts, to the cart and hit the 'Pay Now' button. What do you think will happen...?"

"Uh."

"Making a person disappear without a trace is a piece of cake. Moreover, the body parts sold on this site are all from people who were once alive..."

That's right.

The left hand of Park Sang-hyun that I ordered as a test, or the heart of Yoo Jung-don that Do-hwa just showed us—they all belonged to real people.

In other words...

"Wouldn't the families go mad...?"

In this desolate and brutal world, many have lost family members or loved ones. Most of them couldn't even retrieve the remains or belongings of the missing. With nothing left to bury, they had no choice but to bury their memories deep in their hearts.

"Using this site is simple. You just enter the name of the family member you lost in the search bar. Then a part of that family member's corpse will appear..."

"Ah."

"A good citizen might willingly offer their own left hand to buy back their lost family member's left hand. But, hmm. Isn't there a smarter way...?"

Realization dawned on Seo Gyu's face.

I spoke up in his stead.

"That's right. There will inevitably be cases where people kidnap others to sacrifice them in order to retrieve their family members."

Professional brokers might even appear, advertising, "We'll find your family's remains for you," while secretly abducting ordinary people with no connections to sell their organs.

"After all, the world will only fall further into the apocalypse, and the number of missing persons will only increase, never decrease. Human sacrifice is always a blue ocean market."

"Ugh."

Seo Gyu's expression then twisted in disgust.

Similar incidents had already been discovered several times, namely with Village Bus No. 44 and the organ transfer bus.

"Well then, let's keep the existence of Toad House a secret forever and handle it through SG Net as we have been doing—"

If the story had ended there, it would have been a natural conclusion, but if that were the case, I wouldn't have introduced it in the first place.

"Um, Guild Leader."

"Hmm?"

Just as the meeting was about to adjourn, Ah-ryeon tugged at my sleeve.

"What is it, Ah-ryeon?" I asked.

"Well, um... Over there."

She glanced around. Still in the meeting room were Ji-won, Yo-hwa, Dok-seo, and Seo Gyu, who had paused to wait for me.

"Can you lend me your for a moment?"

I sent her a confused look.

"Uh, come on."

I lowered my head, and Ah-ryeon tiptoed to whisper in my ear, "Um, Toad House. It's a shame to completely seal it off, so can't we just use it ourselves?"

"Hmm?"

"Well, you know. When people die, if they don't get a proper funeral, they turn into the Hollow, like the Ten Legs...? There are a lot of the dead in the Monster Waves too. I think that's been a long-standing concern for you, Guild Leader."

She was right.

As mentioned before, the reason I came to be known by the alias of Undertaker was that I initially went around recommending to people, "Do you know about Time Seal? It's a great way to log out of the reality game." But now, it's because I'm recognized as a funeral expert.

Those who received a funeral from me never turned into the dead. Despite appearances, I'm a high-value talent, you see.

"So?"

"Well, couldn't we use me?"

"?"

"Things like hearts or brains are beyond me, but arms or legs... Even if they're gone for a while, they'll recover quickly... Even if it hurts when they're cut off, if we know in advance, we can numb the pain with anesthesia or something..."

"??"

"Hehe. Actually, I was a bit disappointed with Village Bus No. 44. If you go in there, you die immediately, right? So only those who are truly determined to die can use it. But with this Toad House site, I think my healing abilities could cover it!"

"Stop," I commanded, bewildered. "Ah-ryeon. You're saying you'll accept requests from families, sacrifice your own limbs, and help them find the remains of their missing loved ones? Even though you know full well that having your limbs cut off on Toad House will hurt?"

"Yes!"

"Oh."

Several options presented themselves here. I could easily imagine what routes would unfold depending on which option I chose.

1. Wow, that's a really great idea. Let's do it right away.

First, all the families who have lost loved ones and carry the weight of their grief would flock to Ah-ryeon.

“Saintess! Please find my father!”

“Yes. I will heal your wounds, even if scars remain.”

Ah-ryeon smiles brightly.

Already revered as the Saintess of the North for periodically participating in the final defense line where humanity's fate hangs in the balance and casting AOE heals, Ah-ryeon would now become the Saintess of All.

The problem is that we also need to consider the perspective of the Anomalies. Every time Ah-ryeon retrieves the remains of a hundred, a thousand, or ten thousand missing persons, Toad House would accumulate hundreds or thousands of "Ah-ryeon's Left Arm" and "Ah-ryeon's Right Leg."

There's no worse inventory than this.

“G-Guild Leader! It's a disaster!”

“Hmm?”

“An Anomaly made from my arms and legs has appeared! Like the Hecatoncheires from Greek mythology![1] It even copied my healing ability, so even if you cut off its arms, they grow back. It's disgusting... What do we do?”

Outcome of Option 1: The birth of Ah-ryeon's shadow Anomaly. The emergence of the Thousand Legs, a superior version of the Ten Legs. The end of the world.

Thus, Option 1 was clearly out. Next.

2. Oh, our Ah-ryeon, always picking fights on internet communities, has now grown to care for others? Truly impressive.

Common sense would dictate that this was the right path, but the villain OldManGoryeo should never be judged by common sense. I can confidently say that her psyche is even more twisted than Do-hwa's.

As an Ah-ryeon psychology expert, I immediately saw through her intentions.

"You brat. You want me to suffer while watching you sacrifice yourself, don't you?"

"Ah..."

"You're hoping I'll say, 'That's enough, you've done enough, your pain hurts me more than anyone else's sorrow,' aren't you?"

"Ah, ah, ah..."

"You! Truly a flower that blooms by devouring people's malice! Now you plan to suck in even my goodwill and feel satiated, don't you? Did you think I wouldn't notice?"

"Nyeh heh heh..." Ah-ryeon fidgeted with her fingers while looking up at me. "G-Guild Leader, you seem to like me too much. It's a bit creepy..."

"What's really creepy is your mindset."

"Hahaha, Ah, it hurts, Guild Leader—"

I performed the "Terror Fist Spin," a specialty of Shin-chan's mom, and Ah-ryeon went spinning, flailing her arms around.

I sighed inwardly. It was a mystery how a sensible person like me got tangled up with such a strange kid.

"...Hmm? Guild Leader?"

Suddenly, an idea flashed through my mind.

The plan to sacrifice Ah-ryeon to help families retrieve their loved ones was absurd. But maybe we could create a substitute?

"Wait. Saintess, could you call Commander Noh and Ha-yul? Tell them to come back to the meeting room."

[Yes, understood.]

Although the two had already left the meeting room, they hadn't gone far. Hearing the Saintess's Telepathic message, they quickly returned.

Do-hwa frowned deeply. "What now? I have outpatient appointments scheduled after lunch, so I'm quite busy today..."

"We have something to test. This Toad House shop. Do we really need to offer 'real human body parts' as a sacrifice?"

Do-hwa's glasses tilted, gleaming, as she asked, "What are you talking about...?"

"Ha-yul will make doll parts, and you, Commander Noh, will create prosthetics from them. We'll equip these prosthetics and offer them as 'sacrifices.'"

It wasn’t just Do-hwa who responded this time. All my other comrades’ eyes widened. The Saintess, who was participating remotely, must have been surprised too.

"Uh, hyung. Will that work? Even if it's an Anomaly, wouldn't it be able to tell the difference between real and fake?"

"No," I said, shaking my head. "Precisely because it's an Anomaly, it can't distinguish between real and fake. Those things fundamentally see imagination and reality as the same. Even if it's a prosthetic leg made from a prosthetic, if the wearer feels the same pain and sensation as a real leg, the Anomaly is likely to judge it as real. And one more thing."

My voice grew stronger.

"Think of the Southern Campaign, Seo Gyu."

"Huh?"

Seo Gyu made a confounded face, but I continued.

"Back in the day, Prime Minister Zhuge Liang, who carried the fate of Shu on his shoulders, had to halt his army before the fierce rivers of the Southern Barbarians. The Southern Barbarian guides said, 'If you cut off a person's head and offer it, the river's wrath will subside.'"

"Ah," Seo Gyu hummed in understanding. "So it wasn't nonsense but a reference to The Three Kingdoms."

"Is there a difference between the two? Right now, you're saying, 'It's not A, but A,' you know..." Do-hwa snarked.

"What did the Prime Minister do then? Did he cut off the heads of innocent soldiers and offer them to some pseudo-deity of the river?" I asked, knowing this was too important to stop now. "No. The Prime Minister respected the customs of the Southern Barbarians while cleverly avoiding the evil practice of human sacrifice, and even gave birth to the menu item known as dumplings."[2]

"G-Guild Leader, you're having another crazy episode..."

The atmosphere of great admiration for my brilliant idea had somehow completely dissipated.

"Well, Commander Noh? Do you understand what I'm trying to say?"

"I wish I didn't..." Do-hwa muttered a curse. "Anyway, it makes sense. There happens to be a death row inmate missing an arm. Let's test it on him..."

We all rushed down to the underground prison of the National Road Management Corps. There was an elevator, but since it had appeared on its own without our installation, we absolutely couldn't use it.

Seeing Ji-won among our group, the prisoners behind the bars screamed.

"Hyaaaak! Silver hair! The executioner with silver hair!"

"Save me! I was wrong! Wrong, I swear! I lived a deplorable life!"

"Just kill me!"

Everyone looked at Ji-won, who merely tilted her head, seemingly unaware of what was going on. We also turned our gaze away without drawing attention to it.

"Hey, you. Come out for a moment..."

"Hyaaaak!"

"Shut the hell up. If you keep making noise, I'll arrange a cozy private cell date with Team Leader Yu..."

The death row inmate became very quiet.

Ha-yul assisted in creating the prosthetic arm, which Do-hwa then refined with precision.

An ordinary prosthetist would have taken days to make a plaster cast, wait for it to harden, and so on, but the collaboration between the two Awakeners got the job done in less than 30 minutes.

"Try it on..."

"O-okay."

Snap. The prosthetic was fastened with a leather belt.

Ji-won had brought along some soil without needing to be told and created a Toad House mound, into which we placed the inmate's prosthetic.

The prisoner, trembling and not understanding the situation, followed our instructions.

"T-Toad, Toad, I'll give you an old house, give me a new one..."

"Damn it. You got the lyrics wrong. Do you really want to die...?"

"A-ahhh! Sorry! I'm Sorry! Toad, toad! Give me a new house, and I'll give you an old one!"

The death row inmate frantically shouted and pressed the "Pay Now" button on the Toad House second-hand shopping mall displayed on his smartphone.

Then, the prisoner screamed.

"Hyaaak! M-my arm! My arm! Aaaack!"

Perhaps forgetting that we were watching, the prisoner rolled on the floor.

But none of us, members of the Regression Alliance, paid attention to the inmate's pitiful flailing.

It was gone.

"Wow... G-Guild Leader. It really disappeared."

The prosthetic arm that had just been attached moments ago had vanished as if it were merely a phantom limb all along.

We dug through the Toad House mound of soil, but no trace remained.

A pop-up window appeared on the smartphone's shopping mall screen.

[Payment completed.]

As the death row inmate's screams echoed through the underground prison, all my comrades silently looked at me.

I nodded.

"Ji-won."

"Yes, Your Excellency."

"Compile a list of all the missing persons reported by families so far. Also, send out notices to those who haven't reported, asking them to write down the names of the missing at the nearest National Road Management Corps office."

"Understood. I'll get right on it."

The Monster Wave. An infinite Anomaly that always brings about the end of the world.

Half of the Monster Wave's strength comes from the dead—the endless waves of corpses.

A strategy to counter it may have just been discovered.

Footnotes:

1 - The Hecatoncheires from Greek mythology are three giants whose enormous bodies were made up of fifty heads and one hundred arms.

2 - Legend has it that when trying to cross the rivers to the Southern Barbarians, Zhuge Liang was forced to choose between failure, death, and sacrificing the heads of 50 fifty to appease the ravenous river gods. Instead, he cooked dumplings in the shape of human heads and tossed them into the river, which the gods accepted, allowing him to successfully cross the raging tides.

Chapter 307

The Distributor III

Sinnoa

Allow me a moment to digress.

In my story, I've adopted the "Omniscient Regressor's Viewpoint."

Thanks to this, you, the readers, are exposed to fairly objective and relatively truthful information. I want to emphasize that I always strive to be honest with you, and I hope you appreciate my efforts. On the other hand, most people living in this world aren't as fortunate as you.

To give you the most straightforward example, Awakeners almost always hide or distort their abilities when dealing with others.

For instance, Ji-won's Mini-Map.

- Anonymous: Hey, sorry to bother you, but what were the conditions for the Operations Team Leader's ability to activate again?

 [NationalRoad] ForbiddenBooksManagementDivision17: Either physical contact, like brushing against their clothes, or maintaining eye contact for more than 3 seconds. One of the two must be met.

 Anonymous: Thanks!!

 [National Road] Officer: May I ask why you're suddenly curious about such specific details?

 Anonymous: Oops.

The above comment contained incorrect information. In reality, for Mini-Map to activate, all Ji-won needed was to have met the person at least once and to know their name—and "meeting" could take place either in real life or on SG Net.

Without even realizing it, the person who posted the question had already been detected by Ji-won.

But what about their name, you may ask? Well, Seo Gyu could find it out using his administrator privileges or the Saintess could figure it out and pass it along.

Next, let's talk about Seo-rin's Cursed Song Incantation.

"Holy shit! The Great Witch is singing!"

"Where could the totems be hidden? Find them! Destroy them quickly!"

You and I both know that Seo-rin's Cursed Song Incantation activates simply by her singing. Others, however, don't have that privilege.

Every time Seo-rin goes to war, she hides totems resembling African wooden dolls all over the battlefield, almost as if she's deliberately baiting onlookers to deduce, Aha! The totems must remain intact for Cursed Song Incantation to activate.

"Guild Leader! We've destroyed two, but we can't find the rest!"

"Keep looking! They must be nearby!"

Everyone fell for this simple bluff.

Whenever Cursed Song Incantation echoed across the battlefield, Seo-rin's opponents would frantically search for the hidden "totems," and by forcing them to waste time and manpower on a useless task, Seo-rin in turn gained the upper hand.

Deception. Camouflage. Distortion of information.

Struggling to survive just that little bit longer is the fate of all Awakeners, so twisting the true nature of their abilities is just the basics.

Now then. Why am I explaining such obviously common knowledge to you all over again?

“You must have been deeply saddened by not being able to hold a proper funeral for your friend. Don’t worry. I’ll use my ability to find some of their belongings for you at the very least.”

“R-really, Undertaker?”

“Of course. If you can provide me with your friend’s name, place of origin, and as much accurate personal information as possible, I’ll retrieve their belongings. If you can hold a modest funeral with them, the deceased won’t wander as a lost soul.”

“Oh! Thank you, Undertaker! Thank you! I’ll never forget this kindness!”

I, the Undertaker, have evolved into an even more complete, max-level professional Undertaker (Lv. 5).

[Their name is Lee Eun-ju. Place of origin: Seoul. Last seen at Hapjeong Station subway exit.]

[After searching through Toad House, two individuals matching this information were found.]

[Judging by the bracelet on her wrist, it seems the first one is the correct match.]

It was the Saintess reporting in with the information I had asked her to pass along to me.

“Thank you. Please relay this to Ji-won.”

[Understood.]

A new process had been established.

→ First, I receive information about the missing person from their family. I also post a notice on SG Net that I’ll accept requests at any time.

→ The information is then sent (via the Saintess’s Telepathy) to the underground prison beneath the National Road Management

Headquarters.

→ The second-hand shop Toad House searches for remains or belongings matching the missing person.

→ Do-hwa and Ha-yul create prosthetic limbs or other assistive devices that match the items found on Toad House.

→ The prosthetics are attached to a death row inmate. Snip!

→ The remains are delivered to the family, and a funeral is held. Problem solved!

“I’m ridiculously busy…” muttered Do-hwa, whose under-eye bags always screamed the word TIRED in capital letters. “Last week alone, I made 16 prosthetic arms and 22 prosthetic legs. Damn it. If I had worked at this pace back when I was a civil servant, I could’ve single-handedly managed all the national rehabilitation hospitals in the country…”

“Just make rough models of them. They’re not meant to be used by the wearer anyway—they’re just for selling on Toad House. I told you not to waste your craftsmanship on this.”

She sucked in a slow breath, visibly displeased. But soon, upon seeing the mountain of recycled documents piled on the table, she let out the breath in a long sigh. “Fine. I guess there’s no other choice. It’s annoying, but I’ll just make some sticks and attach them…”

Do-hwa had always custom-made assistive devices for each patient to ensure their comfort. Even if she just grabbed a random stick and a fishing hook to create a Captain Hook set, her Prosthetic Creation ability would work without issue. The fishing hook wouldn’t be useful for anything other than using Tinker Bell as bait, of course. It would only give the wearer the sensation of having a hand attached —practically useless, which would never satisfy a perfectionist like Do-hwa.

But Noh Do-hwa was a pragmatist before she was a perfectionist.

She fully accepted my black-and-white logic: “Why put effort into junk that's just going to be handed over to monsters? Are you on their side or something?"

As a result...

"Alright. Next..."

"C-Commander! No, Your Commandership on High! I really don't want to lose my arm! It hurts too much! I was wrong! I admit it! Please!"

"You're delaying my off-time. Please note that there's an inverse relationship between my off-time and your lifespan. Next..."

"Eeeek! Please spare me! Please!"

"Next..."

A mass-production system capable of handling hundreds of prosthetics a day was established.

Do-hwa was disheartened by this inhumane industrial revolution at first, but after attending a joint funeral for the families, her perspective seemed to change.

The first joint funeral, held in Busan, concluded with a solemn and somber mood in the air.

In a world ravaged by the apocalypse, it wasn't easy for people to maintain their humanity. The Constellation System devised by the Saintess was essentially a temporary measure of support to prevent the collapse of humankind—like scaffolding at a construction site.

"How deeply saddened you must be."

"Thank you..."

"Oh, my child! Why did you go down there? Why?!"

"Father, I'm sorry. I love you, Father."

I was no different. Just as the Saintess cleverly twisted her

Telepathy and Clairvoyance abilities to create the Constellation System, I used the Toad House Anomaly to establish the Funeral System.

Those who can properly say goodbye are better prepared to meet someone new. Humanity isn't simply a noble virtue of any given individual—it arises from the ties two or more people form with each other. Thus, funerals—the ultimate farewell—are a ritual for the preservation of humanity.

After paying our respects to the departed, I was treated to a once-in-a-century rare event.

"Hmm," Do-hwa hummed. Then out of the blue, she suggested, "Let's take a walk..."

"Sure."

Despite being the one to propose it, she barely said a word after we arrived at Haeundae's sandy beach. The waves crashed, foaming at the edges where the Milky Way shimmered.

Do-hwa's pitch-black eyes were indistinguishable from the night sea reflecting the night sky.

Unlike me, who had mastered Aura, Do-hwa couldn't go for over a week without sleep. Still, thanks to chugging the special alchemical energy drinks made by Uehara Shino of the Magical Girl Council, she had astronomically reduced her need for sleep relative to others.

Thus, it wasn't until around 6 AM that she finally spoke.

"Making assistive devices for the living is my job, but I never imagined I'd be making them for the dead too. It never even occurred to me that I might be doing this one day..."

"Life never strays too far from the familiar, yet the unfamiliar still approaches with slow steps."

"Hmm. I don't want to dismiss it with just a saying..."

Do-hwa glanced at me.

She was one step closer to the sea than I was.

“Because this project is clearly the brainchild of the Awakener Undertaker—you.”

I stayed silent at that.

“For the first time, I feel a sense of fulfillment. Huh. I never felt any sense of fulfillment in life—not when I became the head of the National Road Management Division, or when I built the nationwide road network, or when I captured vicious criminals and threw them into the underground prison…”

I knew.

In a way, she was similar to the Saintess.

She was driven purely by her sense of duty. The rational judgment that if no one else could do it, she had to take up the mantle. That was the steel structure that made up Do-hwa’s heart.

“But strangely, making assistive devices for the missing and retrieving their remains gives me a sense of fulfillment…”

“Is that so?”

“Yeah. In the end, I’m just a prosthetic maker…”

A brief silence washed over us, buoyed only by the sound of the waves.

“I wish life could always be like this.”

A murmur, carried by the night sea.

“It’s nothing grand. You can block pain with Aura or whatever, right?”

“That’s right.”

“Then just take Ah-ryeon with you, and you can regenerate arms or legs. Ask people if they've lost anyone. I'll just toss on some metal sticks I have lying around, and that'll be enough..."

"Shall we go together?" I impulsively suggested. "Since the next cycle is the 710th, it's a good time for a vacation round. If you want, we can leave the National Road Management Division to fend for itself and just wander around with three or four people."

Do-hwa's gaze lingered on my face. After the waves crashed three times and her lips twitched four times, she finally spoke.

"Later."

"Later?"

"Yes. A little later..."

Then with a rustle of sand, Do-hwa stepped past me and said as if drifting away, "It's about time Jagalchi Market opens. Let's grab a drink and head to work..."

"Ah, sounds good. Red wine is actually one of the world's top 10 superfoods, you know."

"You're talking nonsense again..."

Before leaving the shore, I glanced back at the sea one last time.

In the footprints Do-hwa left on the sandy beach, a small dawn had pooled.

There is a short epilogue.

Exactly 16 years later.

"Hey, Awakener Undertaker. I heard the Monster Wave is coming, so I came up to the rooftop..."

"Yeah."

"Those corpses must be the lost souls..."

“Correct. Judging by their faces, they mostly came from beyond the Himalayas or the Ural Mountains. All that effort traveling around holding funerals paid off.”

“Those flying building chunks must be the City Eaters you told me about, right?”

“City Devourers.”

“Sure. Anyway, let’s assume we know all those. But...” Do-hwa pointed into the distance. “What the hell are those damn things...?”

The person responsible for lowering the average dignity of the Korean language with every curse, National Road Management Division Commander Noh, pointed in the direction where “those damn things” were rolling around.

Have you ever seen a tumbleweed in a Western movie? Imagine a bunch of tangled roots rolling around on the ground, like a downgraded version of a steel scrubber.

Now imagine that but 100,000 times bigger.

An Anomaly resembling a tumbleweed was approaching as part of the Monster Wave.

- Clank, thud. Clank, screech.

“Hmm. It’s just a bunch of steel rods tangled together, moving— Or rather, barely rolling around.”

“No way...?”

“Yes. They’re the prosthetic devices you made, Commander Noh. I wondered where all those assistive devices collected by Toad House went. Turns out, they got eaten by the Monster Wave and came along with it.”

Silence.

“But honestly, they’re shoddy. The Prosthetic Creation ability isn’t physically dangerous, after all. Thanks to that, the Monster Wave’s power seems to have weakened."

Of course, the weakening effect was still minimal. This was our first round of using Toad House. We were just getting started, so as the cycles progressed and our know-how accumulated, it was clear the Monster Wave would grow weaker.

We'll revisit this in later cycles, but ultimately, we achieved the great feat of weakening the Monster Wave's strength by over 50%.

However, in accordance with the Law of Equivalent Exchange, those strange chopstick-like steel scrubber monsters also grew increasingly massive.

Later, people gathered at the final defense line would look up at the colossal steel scrubber and panic, asking, "What the hell is that damn thing?"

"Thank you, Commander Noh. To honor this brilliant achievement, the newly discovered monster shall be named the Noh Do-hwa Monster—"

I was choked.

Chapter 308

The Skeptic I

Sinnoa

“Mister. I’m going on a trip to Southeast Asia with Ha-yul. Huh? Why do you look so serious again?”

“It’s nothing, just...”

Something felt off.

“I feel like I’ve seen this before. Anyway, you’re going on a trip? You know you have to use Yeouido Airport for international travel, right?”

“Of course. If I go to Namsan and get a Central Intelligence Agency ID and a passport, I can board the plane with a free pass, right? I remember everything.”

“Right. At Yeouido, you have to say you’re from the Special Forces, not the CIA. The historical background of each Anomaly is subtly different.”

“Got it. I’ll enjoy a two-night, three-day beach vacation and bring you back some pretty seashells as a gift!”

With that, Dok-seo waved goodbye and left.

[It’s... It’s my first time traveling abroad.]

“Huh? You lived in Japan, though.”

[That was more like exile than a trip.]

Ha-yul scurried after Dok-seo, and further behind, a housekeeper doll dragged a suitcase behind them.

The room grew quiet.

Something still felt off.

“Undertaker.”

“Ah, Seo-rin. What’s up?”

“We’ve caught the Trolley Dilemma this time, and I think if we use it well, we can establish a permanent railway. The Trolley Dilemma is so dumb that it even counts the dolls Ha-yul made as ‘humans.’ So, I’m thinking of tying a bunch of dolls to either side of the tracks to make the Trolley Dilemma move back and forth. What do you think?”

“Sounds like a great idea.”

“Right? Maybe railways will replace highways as the main transportation system on the Korean Peninsula. I’ll lay the tracks right away, so wait for me.”

“Ah. I’ll be waiting.”

Seo-rin hummed a tune as she led the underlings of the Samcheon World guild away. She had somehow managed to recruit Ha-yul, and now, the witches transported doll hauls that numbered in the hundreds.

If Seo-rin’s plan to create a Trolley Dilemma railway succeeded, it would truly revolutionize transportation.

In the original history, trains were a symbol of the industrial revolution. Perhaps a similar upheaval was about to occur in this apocalypse.

And yet, something still felt off.

Here, “off” meant a nagging feeling in my heart.

When Dok-seo and Ha-yul casually mentioned going on an overseas trip, and when Seo-rin declared she would start a railway revolution, a strange unease tickled the back of my neck.

“Your Excellency,” Ji-won said as she approached. “The financial policy you devised for Dream Casino has now been perfectly implemented. The people are accumulating wealth to dream even sweeter dreams."

"Ah..."

"The credibility of the won is quite high and not just on the Korean Peninsula, but also on the Japanese archipelago and the Chinese mainland. All of this is thanks to Your Excellency's orders to dispatch Tutorial Fairies to various regions. I, Yu Ji-won, am always moved by Your Excellency's care for all humanity."

"Good..."

"Voices praising Your Excellency's benevolence are echoing across the world. How can this not be called a golden age?"

Ji-won then spent the next 30 minutes singing my praises before leaving. Her light footsteps exuded the satisfaction of having completed her daily tasks.

Something was off.

Really off.

Problem was, I couldn't pinpoint exactly what, which made me feel all the more frustrated because of it. It was like having an itch right in the middle of my throat that I couldn't scratch, so I kept letting out pointless little coughs.

It was a cold winter.

Do-hwa sipped her mulled wine, exhaling a relaxed breath.

"I don't know how long it's been since I've had this kind of leisure. Lately, the workload around here has decreased, so life feels a bit more livable..."

"Your workload has decreased?"

"Yes. We have the airport, the highways, and—even if they're a bit unstable—the railways. The financial system is also running smoothly. Heh. For an apocalypse, this is practically a developed country—”

“Ah.”

At that moment.

“Ah! Ah! Ahhh!”

The spot on the back of my neck that had been tingling exploded.

I had finally realized the true nature of the “off” feeling that had been tormenting me all this time.

I couldn’t help but jump up and scream. How could I have not noticed this until now?!

“Damn it.”

Do-hwa’s wine glass tipped over as I slammed the table, but this minor collateral damage was the least of my concerns.

“What the hell is it now, huh?” she grumbled. “Did you catch some new kind of crazy virus and start raving again...?”

“Life is too comfortable!”

“Huh...?”

“Commander Noh. Haven’t you ever felt like something was off? This is the apocalypse. The world is on the brink of destruction. So how can people casually go on overseas trips, and what’s with this railway nonsense? A golden age? What golden age?!”

Wiping her wine-splattered monocle with the hem of her lab coat, Do-hwa looked at me like I was a lunatic.

“No. Have you finally lost it? All of that infrastructure was built because you defeated the Anomalies. Your memory was your only redeeming quality, but now you’re getting dementia too...”

“I supervised the Tutorial Fairies from start to finish, yes, but Yeouido Airport wasn't this convenient before. The Trolley Dilemma was also much more troublesome."

Yet, at some point, the Anomalies had started obediently serving humanity's needs.

The Tutorial Fairies could communicate from the start, and cooperating with me benefited them too. They received a constant supply of "dreams," the staple food of the Baku. But Yeouido Airport? The Trolley Dilemma? These Anomalies couldn't communicate and had no concept of benefit or loss.

So why were they cooperating with the reconstruction of human civilization? Were the Anomalies just pushovers?

No way. If the Anomalies were pushovers, my story would have ended around chapter 120, and the tragedy of SG Net readers suffering from Dok-seo's constant hiatuses would have been avoided.

"This itself is an Anomaly!" I exploded in frustration. "Those cunning bastards! Cowardly Anomaly scum! As expected of the source of all evil, they've subtly changed their survival strategy without anyone noticing! Ha! How dare they try to deceive me, the Undertaker! Pretending to cooperate with my convenience and humanity's comfort, they're slyly pushing for coexistence! Ha! Not a chance. Even if I starve and freeze to death on the streets! I will never! Tolerate! Their schemes!"

"Hmm."

Do-hwa adjusted her glasses and flipped through her notebook.

"Let's see. Is there any free time in Kim Ji-soo's schedule at the mental ward today...?"

"Godfather, do you ever have sudden outbursts in your daily life, where hatred, contempt, or past traumas overwhelm you?"

"Yes. Just thinking about the Ten Legs's tentacle piercing Seo-rin's abdomen makes my skin crawl."

“Godfather, how do you usually maintain your peace of mind?”

“I read Romance of the Three Kingdoms or write parody novels about it, always reflecting on how to navigate turbulent times.”

“Godfather, do you ever feel like someone is watching you, monitoring you, or plotting against you, even on an ordinary day?”

“Ah. Ji-soo, you might not know this, but there’s a terrifying entity called Go Yuri. Never say her name out loud. Refer to her only as the ‘pink entity.’”

“I see. Is the pink entity targeting you, Godfather?”

“Of course! The pink entity is always waiting for the moment my resolve weakens. Phew, I’m breaking out in a cold sweat just thinking about it.”

“I see...”

And so, the one-hour counseling session ended.

“Godfather.”

“Ah, do you have the results? How is it? You’ve never seen a client with as sound a mindset as mine, right?”

“I’m sorry. You have a severe case of Anomaly-hating syndrome and Three Kingdoms addiction.”

“What?”

“That’s ridiculous...”

“See! I knew this would happen!”

While I was dumbfounded, the people who had tagged along as my “guardians” chattered noisily.

“Even if Mister’s been through a lot, he’s always blaming Anomalies for everything! This is the Anomaly’s fault, that’s the Anomaly’s fault. We just went on a trip to Southeast Asia to relax, and now you're saying we've been bewitched by Anomalies?" Dok-seo demanded.

Ha-yul was next to respond. [We didn't even relax much. The sea was beautiful, but the constant sound of cannon fire from beyond the horizon was annoying.]

"Yeah, well. Undertaker does tend to overreact sometimes," Do-hwa said with a shrug.

"I don't trust these psychological tests, Your Excellency," reassured Ji-won. "The fact that I was diagnosed as a psychopath shows how flawed these tests are."

"Hmm..."

The local broadcast was as noisy as ever.

"No, something's really off!" I insisted. "You guys don't know how cunning these Anomalies are, so you're letting your guard down. They're like viruses! They might seem convenient and comfortable now, but the backlash from using them will definitely be massive!"

"Look at him. He's at it again."

[He's like a broken record. Anomaly this, Anomaly that.]

The self-proclaimed "guardians" (I never asked for them) whispered among themselves.

Not one of them trusted me—I could feel it.

Saintess! The Saintess would understand!

The Saintess, who shares a heart and soul with me, will surely understand!

[Um... I'm sorry.]

[Actually, I think it might be better if you became a bit more flexible in your mindset.]

Even you, Saintess?

[I respect you, Mr. Undertaker. But sometimes, I feel like you underestimate your own achievements.]

[Whether it's Yeouido Airport or the Trolley Dilemma, you're the one who pioneered their strategies and uses.]

[The fact that people can feel even a small sense of convenience in these times is thanks to your efforts.]

[To suspect that even your achievements are part of an Anomaly's conspiracy... I can't help but feel like you're undervaluing your comrades.]

Ugh.

The Saintess's comfort was appreciated, but I wasn't being paranoid for no reason.

The regressor's intuition was screaming at me. The "civilization" or "convenience" of the Anomalies—there's definitely a terrifying malice hidden behind it!

"No, intuition is just your subjective feeling. What the..."

It was noisy.

In the end, no one agreed with my argument. The only exception was Ji-won, who said, "Your words are truly wise, Your Excellency" and nodded along.

But as everyone knows, Yu Whatever's agreement was about as useful as a human's wisdom teeth.

'Could my intuition really be wrong?'

I couldn't accept it.

I could accept all other opinions, but when it came to Anomalies, I trusted my gut.

A leader sometimes needs stubbornness.

If Hannibal had listened to his advisors saying, “What? You’re going to cross the Alps to attack Rome? General, are you out of your mind?” and retreated, he wouldn’t have appeared in Fate/Requiem later.

‘No, I couldn’t have misread the signs of the Anomalies. I’m sure of it. There must be someone out there who agrees with me. Someone!’

But even the Saintess, who always supported me, had made her disagreement clear.

Who would sympathize with my argument now?

My options were running out.

“—so I came to consult you. What do you think? Doesn’t it seem like some suspicious Anomaly’s scheme to you too?”

“Hmm.”

The person in front of me twirled her orange hair.

The setting was a school classroom.

But as if to prove that this wasn’t a real classroom, the scenery outside the windows was incredibly dynamic.

Leaves fluttered outside the back window, while snowflakes drifted outside the front window.

“Sunbae.”

In the middle of this mysterious classroom, the person sitting at the desk spoke.

“So, you’re saying that after regressing multiple times and gathering human comrades, none of them agree with you, so you came to me —an Anomaly and an Outer God—someone you even sealed with

Time Seal, and after 300 years in regressor time, you're suddenly asking for empathy?"

"Hmm," I hummed, thinking for a moment. "You could summarize it that way."

"Sunbae, you're really trash, huh?"

Infinite Void.

No, Cheon Yo-hwa looked at me with a gaze full of contempt.

Chapter 309

The Skeptic II

Sinnoa

In the game of Go, there's a term called reviewing the game.

Go is a game where etiquette between players is crucial, so there are few opportunities to show off one's personality. Giving advice during the game is also considered taboo.

However, showing off one's personality is inherently human. How could one ignore their own self?

Thus, Go invented a brilliant solution. After the game ends, players replay the entire match from start to finish, legally exchanging the pent-up banter and advice they couldn't share during the game.

The genius of this idea becomes clear if you replace "Go" with "StarCraft." Even if you lose the game, you can't just rage quit. You must review the replay with your opponent, discussing where you made mistakes and where you should have focused your forces.

Whether in the present or the past, one can see that gamers have always been truly dedicated to teabagging.

If you don't understand StarCraft and the example doesn't resonate with you... Well, that's your fault.

A Korean who doesn't know StarCraft? Such an Anomaly doesn't exist.

"Sunbae, sometimes I feel like you deliberately act like an old man just to enjoy the horrified reactions of people around you. You do, don't you?"

"Stop reading people's minds so casually. Truly befitting the leader of Anomalies."

“No, it’s just that reading your expressions is surprisingly easy...”

The person in front of me, who looked exactly like Cheon Yo-hwa, the student council president of Baekhwa Girls’ High School, let out a sigh.

“So, after ignoring me for 300 years, you suddenly show up and start talking about Go? Want to play a game?”

With a flick of her hand, a Go board and stones materialized on the classroom desk. The girl in front of me smiled brightly, picking up a black stone with her index finger.

“By the way, as befits a daughter of a prestigious family, I’m quite skilled. Don’t expect me to go easy on you just because you’re my sunbae.”

“Hmm.”

The girl in the black sailor uniform—or Cheon Yo-hwa, as she had insisted on being called after once being known as Infinite Void, devourer of the Mastermind—was an Anomaly who claimed to be the twin sister of her namesake.

During the 688th cycle, while defeating the Mastermind, she was sealed with Time Seal.

“I love you in this very moment.”

Those were her last, incomprehensible words.

As you all know, those sealed by Time Seal leave no trace of themselves in reality. Their existence is erased, and Cheon Yo-hwa was no exception. After leaving a transparent crystal tombstone like a secret door at the National Road Management Corps headquarters, the Anomaly (or human) vanished forever.

“It’s always fascinating when I visit...”

“Huh?” Yo-hwa asked. “What is?”

“Those sealed by Time Seal usually don’t remember their lives.

They don't even realize they've been sealed. But..."

"But?"

A moment of hesitation lingered on my lips. "Cheon Yo-hwa. No matter when I visit, you're always aware that you've been sealed by Time Seal. Is it because of your status as an Outer God?"

"Ahhh... No, no. Haha. Not really." She waved her hand dismissively and explained, "Sunbae, you're already a monster on par with Outer Gods. Why would you dismiss my abilities just because I have some status? I'm just repeating 'the happiest day of my life' in this classroom."

"Then how do you know you're trapped in a crystal tombstone?"

"Simple. The happiest day of my life was the day I confessed to you, and that day, I willingly requested the Time Seal."

I stared at her, silent.

"Unlike the others you've buried, the moment I was sealed is etched in my memory as the happiest day. So of course I'm aware of it." A smirk played about Yo-hwa's lips. "In fact, I planned it that way. Right after confessing, I got sealed. As you like to say, 'Every ability has a loophole,' right?"

"...Clever."

"Haha. Don't underestimate me. I'm Cheon Yo-hwa, the heir to the cult, a villainess, and a strategist for regressors ♪"

Yo-hwa laughed, waving a fan she had summoned from somewhere.

Even if Yo-hwa was aware of the Time Seal, she wouldn't remember the conversation we were having now once the day reset. After a day passed, her memories would reset again.

"I see. Let's get back to the main point—"

"Oh. Sunbae, hearing that the day I confessed was the happiest day of my life is making me emotional. Are you trying to change the subject?”

“...Let’s get back to the main point. Just like reviewing a Go game or watching a replay, I want to consult with you about this cycle.”

“Heh.” Yo-hwa propped her chin on one hand and looked at me. “The consultation you mentioned earlier? About how the convenience of infrastructure in the apocalypse might all be part of an Anomaly’s scheme?”

“Yes.”

“Hmm... I don’t really care. Though it’s funny—you treat me like an Outer God rather than a human, so you’re consulting an Anomaly about Anomalies.”

“Don’t tease me. You know why I’ve been calling you Cheon Yo-hwa. If you keep this up, I’ll start calling you Infinite Void again.”

“Hehe. Sorry, sorry.”

Her giggle eased into a sly smile. I paused, wanting to scold her but hesitating at the sight of my cherished student acting cute...

This kid and I really didn’t get along.

“To cut to the chase—yes. I think your speculation is correct.”

I was right!

“I’ve said it before. You, a regressor who’s lived through hundreds of cycles, are practically an environment of your own. So it’s only natural that Anomalies adapt to you and try to thrive.”

“You’re saying they’re pretending to help humanity while secretly parasitizing us.”

“Well, if you want to put it bluntly, yes.”

Yo-hwa placed a Go stone with a click against the board. Even though I hadn’t made a move, she began sketching out the game’s flow on her own.

“This mysterious Anomaly… Let’s call it ‘Infrastructure’ for now. Wow, this reminds me of the meetings we had while strategizing against the Mastermind. Good times.”

“Hmm.”

“Anyway. Infrastructure’s role model is probably the Tutorial Fairies. The Baku. Thanks to you, they didn’t just protect their domain of dreams—they became its rulers.”

“That’s right.”

“Yeah. Infrastructure might be pursuing a similar strategy. ‘Regressor, I can provide you with passenger planes. Regressor, I can allow you to build railways. So please, don’t exterminate me.’”

Tap. Tap.

I stared at the black and white stones as Cheon Yo-hwa continued to play out the game, lost in thought.

“So… should I interpret the expansion of Infrastructure as a sign of surrender rather than a threat?”

“Maybe.”

Yo-hwa tilted her head and smiled. The sunlight streaming through the classroom window cast a diagonal shadow across her face.

“Or this surrender could be a ruse. A ploy to lull you into complacency before striking from behind… Which is it? Genuine surrender? Or a scheme? The materials to judge are already in your hands.”

I rested my chin on my hand.

The rhythmic sound of Go stones clicking against the board served as background music. Oddly, the orderly noise helped me focus.

After a while, my mind was settled.

“I see. I understand.”

“Yeah?”

“Normally, my comrades trust me unconditionally when it comes to Anomalies. But this time, for some reason, they all seemed to conspire to dismiss my concerns about Infrastructure.”

“Yeah.”

“At the time, I laughed it off, but looking back, it’s incredibly strange.”

My comrades were a diverse group. Just take Dang Seo-rin and Cheon Yo-hwa (the other twin) for example—they were practically enemies. Yu Ji-won and Kim Ji-soo were outright rivals. Yet all of them agreed that ‘Anomalies mimicking infrastructure isn’t strange’? Without a single objection?

“It’s mental manipulation. That’s what it is,” I concluded.

Yo-hwa smiled. “As expected of you, sunbae. Right, I think so too. To be more precise, it’s closer to altering common sense. A widespread distortion of perception that ‘Anomalies contributing to human civilization isn’t strange at all.’”

“If they were genuinely surrendering, they wouldn’t resort to such underhanded tactics.”

“Yeah. And the second-hand shopping mall Toad House you frequent might also be part of Infrastructure.” When I didn’t respond, she continued, saying, “Without you realizing it, this Anomaly has already infiltrated your daily life. Thankfully, your mental defenses are strong, so the common sense alteration didn’t work on you.”

The National Tax Service Anomaly collecting taxes.

Yeouido Airport’s overseas travel services.

Village Bus No. 44’s long-term transfers.

The Trolley Dilemma's railway usage.

Even the Toad House's delivery of missing persons' remains.

If you replace "infrastructure" with "national systems," you could even include Namsan's Central Intelligence Agency.

'Wait. If you think about it that way, even the Supreme Leader Anomaly that ran rampant last time might have been part of Infrastructure.'

A chill ran down my spine.

The darkest place is under the lamp. Anomalies that seemed completely unrelated were actually connected.

"Sunbae. If we assume Infrastructure's specialty is altering common sense, there's one thing in this cycle that's unexpectedly explained, isn't there?"

Yu Ji-won.

The silver-haired secretary—the only one with an absolute ego who could face Go Yuri without being brainwashed.

What did Ji-won say when all the other comrades dismissed me as paranoid?

"I don't trust these psychological tests, Your Excellency."

"Your words are truly wise, Your Excellency."

That's right.

Only Yu Ji-won agreed with me. While it might be because she was a power-hungry psychopath, it was also because she was immune to Infrastructure's common sense alteration.

"Even a broken clock is right twice a day..." I mused. "Who would've thought Ji-won would be the only one to say something sensible?"

“Haha. Everyone has their uses, which is why you keep them around, right? Well, except for me.”

Every word this kid said carried weight.

“Now, sunbae. Look at the Go board.”

I looked.

The game had reached its endgame while we were consulting. All that was left was to count the points.

“Doesn’t it look familiar?” Yo-hwa pressed.

“This game?”

“Yeah.”

“...No. Even with my Complete Memory, I can’t recall it at all. If I had to guess, both players seem to be around amateur 2-dan and 3-dan level.”

“Of course you don’t remember,” she said, another sly smile tugging at her lips. “Because this is a game we played secretly when you were tutoring me at my house.”

I didn’t respond.

“This is today’s consultation fee.”

Swoosh!

Memories from a past my Complete Memory couldn’t reach were colored in by the girl in front of me.

‘Ah.’

There’s a meme on the internet called “memories that don’t exist.” It originated from a Japanese manga.[1]

Ridiculous as it sounds, the same phenomenon was happening to me.

Cheon Yo-hwa sneaking me through secret passages in her grand, palace-like hanok.

Inviting me to her private hideout and suddenly pulling out a Go board while we discussed what to do.

Cheon Yo-hwa, the jewel of a prestigious family, happily chattering away as we played Go.

Like a montage of movie scenes, every moment flashed through my mind's eye, and when they did, everything about them was automatically etched into my memory as an eternal recollection.

Just now, Cheon Yo-hwa had planted a piece of eternity in my soul.

"Yeah, today was fun too!"

This was also the core reason I didn't visit her crystal tombstone often.

As someone who had devoured both Infinite Void and the Mastermind—two Outer Gods—Cheon Yo-hwa was undoubtedly the best consultant for Anomalies. But at the same time...

She was dangerous.

Every time I consulted her, she demanded a "consultation fee" in the form of small memories, unforgettable recollections, and her own existence.

Isn't it astonishing? Even though she had been sealed by Time Seal and should have long since exited the stage, the girl in front of me still had a way to intervene in my reality.

As she said, she truly was a strategist worthy of the title.

"By the way, would you like to pay another small consultation fee, sunbae? I might even help you figure out how to deal with Infrastructure."

"No, thanks. Confirming that Infrastructure is an Anomaly is enough. I'll find a way to deal with it myself."

“Aww, what a shame.” Yo-hwa laughed, not looking disappointed at all. Then, she said, “Then here’s a freebie.”

“A freebie?”

“I have a conscience too. I feel a bit guilty for charging a consultation fee just for confirming an Anomaly. If you ever feel stuck dealing with Infrastructure, there might be an unexpected escape route you haven’t considered.”

“…I’ll keep that in mind.”

The chair creaked as I stood. As I walked toward the classroom door, Cheon Yo-hwa waved at my back.

“Come back anytime… Next time, let’s play Go like we used to, Sunbae.”

Looking at her smiling face, I could no longer call her Infinite Void as I used to.

“…Alright, Yo-hwa.”

“Yeah!”

With a creak and a thud, the classroom door closed and the cold air of reality brushed against my cheeks.

Below the Tower of Babel, the ruins of Busan—destroyed by the Monster Wave—lay scattered.

I smiled bitterly.

‘Really. Whether in this world or the next, everyone’s just trying to charm me. That’s the problem.’

It was time to exterminate Anomalies again.

To the next cycle we go.

Footnotes:

1 - The meme in question originates from the series Jujutsu Kaisen. To not get too deep into spoilers, a character there is featured several times in “memories that don’t exist” wherein adversaries are suddenly struck by nostalgia for moments they know didn’t happen but that still endear them to this character without them really being able to resist the change.

Chapter 310

The Skeptic III

Sinnoa

Once, I had a drink with the Great Priestess of the Magical Girl Association, and we had a conversation that went as follows:

"Undateikeo-san. You sometimes compare yourself to a supporter, but from my perspective, that's nonsense."

"Oh?"

"A thief. No, in this case, the term 'assassin' would be more appropriate." The Great Priestess wagged her nine tails and smiled slyly. "You calling yourself a supporter is a result of being overly focused on your allies. From the perspective of your enemies, there's no assassin as ruthless as you."

"Hmm."

"You appear out of nowhere, assassinate your enemies with a strategy in hand, and then, you vanish. While Anomalies are a disaster that strikes humanity in the dead of night, to them, you are also a disaster that descends without warning."

As the head of the Magical Girl Association, the Great Priestess assigned roles and abilities to all magical girls. To the trained eye of an Awakener with that sort of expertise, I was more of an assassin than a supporter.

The term "assassin" did have a somewhat ominous connotation, but I was willing enough to admit to seeing her side of things. I preferred one-on-one duels over full-scale battles and ambushes over duels, and when dealing with enemies like the Infrastructure Anomaly, whose true nature was hidden, I readily adopted the mindset of an assassin.

'Infrastructure still doesn't realize I've caught onto its existence.'

In the next cycle, I acted as if I knew nothing and went about my usual routine. Of course, behind the scenes, I was secretly gathering information about the Anomaly in question.

‘I can’t consult the Saintess or anyone else.’

Infrastructure’s most terrifying ability, I presumed, was its widespread common sense alteration. Even if my comrades seemed fine now, there was no telling when or where their perceptions might be corrupted.

Only one person—Yu Ji-won, the psychopath born immune to brainwashing—could be trusted with the strategy, and even then, I couldn’t discuss it carelessly.

“Why is that, Your Excellency?”

“Because there’s a risk that the Saintess might peek into our thoughts at any moment, leaking information to Infrastructure.”

“Ah.”

So I came up with a plan.

“From now on, all discussions about Infrastructure must take place within the dreams of the Baku. Understood?”

“Yes.”

Using the Tutorial Fairies.

With the Baku’s power, it was entirely possible for me and others to share the same dream. No matter how powerful the Saintess’s Clairvoyance was, she couldn’t follow us into the dreams of the Awakeners. It was the perfect place for a secret meeting.

“I’m endlessly pleased that it’s me, Yu Ji-won, upon whom you ultimately rely. But Your Excellency, may I ask one thing?”

“Go ahead.”

“Down there, at the entrance to the stairs, there’s danger tape with warnings like ‘Handle with Care,’ ‘Safety First,’ and ‘Authorized Personnel Only’ plastered all over like spiderwebs. What exactly is lurking in the depths of the subconscious that you’ve blocked off so thoroughly?”

“Shh! Don’t ask. Don’t even get curious! Divine punishment will strike!”

Legend has it that if you linger too long in the subconscious, a shadow with pink hair will eventually loom behind you.

I really hate that story.

Anyway, aside from the minor drawback of a 0.1% chance of Go Yuri appearing, the dream world of the Baku served as an excellent hiding place.

“Right now, Infrastructure is slowly working to alter people’s common sense. We need to strike while it’s focused on that.”

“And to kill an Anomaly, the first step is to expose and define its true nature.”

“Right. We need to reveal its identity.”

“Hmm.”

Ji-won turned her head.

The background of our dream was the ruins of an abandoned construction site. Painted on the building’s walls were words, the thing Ji-won was currently scanning.

National Tax Service, Yeouido Airport, Village Bus No. 44, Trolley Dilemma, Toad House, Supreme Leader Comrade...

All were Anomalies either connected to or suspected of being part of Infrastructure.

“Your Excellency...” Ji-won began after a long pause. “If I may ask, which cycle are we in now?”

“This is the 776th cycle.”

“Did Infrastructure start altering people’s common sense in the 775th cycle? Were there no signs before that?”

“Ah. Well, it might have been subtly making changes for a long time, but I only noticed it then.”

“Hmm,” she hummed, resting her chin on her hand. “Then the conclusion is that Infrastructure didn’t originally exist in Your Excellency’s cycle line and has now suddenly appeared.”

“Like a mysterious ghost. This thing is capable of altering common sense on the level of a whole population across the entire peninsula. How could such a powerful Anomaly just appear out of nowhere?”

“No, there’s no need for ghosts to wail. The reason for Infrastructure’s appearance is actually quite clear.”

I blinked. “Oh? Do tell.”

“Yes. The cause is none other than you, Your Excellency.”

Huh?

“Ji-won...” I trailed off, choosing my words carefully. “I know there are some in our cycle alliance who push the Undertaker-Anomaly Theory, but if you take that at face value...”

“Oh, I’m not saying you are an Anomaly, Your Excellency. Just that you are the one who drastically increased the probability of Infrastructure’s appearance.”

I tilted my head. What on earth was she talking about?

“Your Excellency. South Korea has fallen. Human civilization has collapsed. Isn’t that right?”

“Yes.”

“But from an individual’s perspective, the state itself is a powerful monster. State power controls individual thoughts, restricts actions, and limits freedom.”

“Hmm…”

Did she think that way because she’d been a serial killer since middle school? If you’ve spent your whole life outsmarting the police, of course state power would feel unfriendly.

“I won’t interrupt,” I reassured her. “Go on.”

“Certainly. Originally, the monstrous power of the state vanished with the collapse of civilization. Whether it’s the National Tax Service or Yeouido Airport, they’re all scattered like dismembered limbs, leaving only traces of the state and infrastructure.” Ji-won turned to look at me and said, “But Your Excellency, you’ve begun to rebuild a part of civilization.”

I stayed quiet, waiting for her to continue.

“The scattered remnants of human infrastructure have been reconnected. The National Road Management Corps you established is the symbol of a unified state. Furthermore, you’ve even connected Eurasia with the beacon of the Sacred Fire.”

A faint electric current ran down the back of my neck in realization. “Are you saying… that as I rebuilt human civilization, the Infrastructure Anomaly also grew alongside it?”

“Yes. More accurately, you’ve created an environment where Infrastructure can run rampant.”

Ji-won picked up a paint can. With a practiced stroke, she wrote a word on the ruined wall:

“Therefore, the name ‘Infrastructure’ is somewhat inaccurate. It can’t explain Anomalies like the ‘Supreme Leader Comrade.’ To name this Anomaly on a larger scale—”

The word she wrote was the one she spoke next.

“State. The power of the state. The ideology of the state... This is the name of the Anomaly that has newly appeared in your cycle line, the parasite that has grown by riding on your success.”

For a good, long while, I was stunned stiff, unable to recover from the shock.

Seawater lapped at my feet, soaking my socks, but the thought of drying them with Aura didn’t even cross my mind.

‘The more I restore human civilization... the more I create opportunities for another Anomaly to grow?’

What kind of nonsense was that?

Until now, I had classified Anomalies based on whether they were useful to humanity or not. If an Anomaly was useful, I boldly recruited it into the regression company. How else could the National Road Management Corps operate caravans when car fuel was more expensive than gold? It was all thanks to the Kongkongi and Byojoki I raised on my ranch. The northern barrier blocking the Monster Wave was also maintained by the resurrection Anomaly, Mo Gwang-seo.

Logistics, currency, even security—there were few areas where Anomalies weren’t utilized.

‘And all of that ultimately feeds into the growth of a larger, more dangerous Anomaly—the State. An Anomaly that might even evolve into an Outer God.’

Does convenience always come with a price?

Perhaps I need to completely overhaul my strategy as a regressor.

‘Should I abandon the plan to connect Eurasia with the beacon? Scrap the Baku’s currency? What about our adorable Kongkongi?’

My head spun.

Ah, the incompetent and weak regressor could only crouch by the breakwater and gaze helplessly at the horizon...

“Meow. Why are you moping here, Undateikeo?”

I suppose I should say—I was standing on the shore of Noto Peninsula in Japan, where the Magical Girl Association had illegally occupied a famous ryokan-style hotel and turned it into their headquarters.

Since sulking in Korea would inevitably attract the Saintess’s attention, I came here under the pretext of a business trip to film The Undertaker’s Melancholy.

“Ah, Manyo Neko,” I greeted, making a nihilistic expression. “I envy you, a shrine maiden serving a cat god. Animals don’t need countries or governments, so you can’t empathize with my worries...”

“Are you picking a fight? I’d love to punch you right now, nya.” Manyo Neko hissed. “I came to comfort you because you looked so pitiful, but I regret it now.”

“What I need isn’t comfort, but a vacation. And the next vacation season is still 100 years away. Manyo Neko, do you understand this pain and resentment?”

“Our Great Priestess is a handful, but the Awakeners in Korea must have it tough too, nya...”

Manyo Neko crouched beside me, her shadow falling over me. The magical umbrella she always carried cast a galaxy-like shadow even in broad daylight.

“I don’t know what you’re worried about, but why not spill it? Since I’m not part of your organization, you might feel less burdened talking to me, nya.”

Hmm. “Should I?”

“Meow, meow.”

What followed was a two-hour counseling session.

In the middle of it, a summer event occurred where monsters with tuna heads and shark tails landed on the shore and attacked, but as seasoned Awakeners, we casually defeated them and continued our conversation.

Manyo Neko sliced into fresh tuna sashimi with a contented purr and tilted her head.

“So, to summarize, you want to provide as many people in Korea with the benefits of infrastructure, but doing so risks creating an Outer God disguised as a state, leaving you stuck between a rock and a hard place. Is that right, nyan?”

“Ah.”

“Hmm.” She swallowed a piece of tuna belly, then said, “Honestly, I don’t get why that’s a pawblem.”

“Huh?”

“Just because people come together to build organizations and infrastructure doesn’t mean it has to take the form of centralized state power. Look at us nya. We’re not a Magical Girl Nation, but a Magical Girl Association, right? A network of shrines across the country, each forming its own group of shrine maidens. The Great Priestess just helps coordinate joint operations or agreements among magical girls. She’s not some kind of queen, nyan.”

She was right.

It was surreal to hear political philosophy spilling from the mouth of a cat-eared magical girl, but they had their own ideas (surprisingly?) and had formed an association to realize them. Specifically, the Great Priestess was a believer in anarcho-syndicalism and spread that ideology to other magical girls.

If you’re wondering what that is... Well, it’s similar to anarchism. Long story short, in this reality, the Tutorial Fairies were revolutionaries and the magical girls were anarchists.[1]

There’s a reason the world ended.

“Anyway, just because social infrastructure exists doesn’t mean you have to worry about centralized state power. Politics can take many different forms—”

I shot to my feet. “That’s it.”

“Purr?”

By now, my socks had dried from the seawater and were soft again. Aura surged through my body like a tiger’s energy.

“Thank you, Manyo Neko. My eyes have been opened. Thanks to you, I’ve thought of a way to maintain infrastructure while defeating the Anomaly. Truly, the Manyo Neko Strategy.”

“Uh, meow. You’re welcome?”

“I’ll repay this debt someday.”

Splash!

I didn’t need to wait any longer. I stepped on the seawater and hurried back to Korea.

As I distanced myself from Manyo Neko, I heard her mutter, “This feels weird. I’m sure I did a good thing, but why do I feel like I’ve done something terribly wrong, nyan...?”

Infrastructure— No. The State Anomaly.

I needed a way to lure it out and exterminate it while preserving the systems I’d built as a regressor.

There was only one solution.

“From now on, we will stop pretending to be the only legitimate government organization on the Korean Peninsula.”

The Regression Alliance. Meeting room in the Tower of Babel.

I made the declaration in front of all my comrades.

“The state is ultimately a servant of power and has now become a plaything for Anomalies. Until the day all Outer Gods are exterminated, the reconstruction of civilization is a distant dream. The National Road Management Corps was never meant to replace the government.”

Silence fell over the room. Do-hwa raised her hand, piercing the quiet with a question.

“Then what the hell are we supposed to do?”

“Ah. An excellent question.” I nodded. “From this moment on, the National Road Management Corps will be reborn as a terrorist organization.”

Immediate confusion.

“In this hellish situation where our peninsula is ruled by vile Anomalies, violence is our only meaningful form of resistance!”

I slammed the table, impassioned as I delivered my speech.

“We will fight as a resistance force—as an independence army—to protect human dignity and individual freedom against the monstrous Anomaly State! Ah! One hundred million humans, unite! Long live freedom! Long live the resistance!”

Everyone fell silent.

Then—clap, clap, clap—applause rang out. All eyes turned to see Ji-won on her feet in the corner of the room.

“Long live freedom! Long live the resistance! Long live the eternal Supreme Leader of the Resistance, Undertaker!”

Clap, clap, clap.

“Your Excellency. The lack of response proves that these traitors have already been swayed by the Anomaly State. We must execute them to uphold the discipline of the Resistance and Your Excellency’s dignity.”

“Stop messing around and sit down, Ji-won.”

“Okay.”

The National Road Management Corps has officially transitioned into a terrorist organization for humanity and civilization!

Footnotes:

1 - To put it simply as one poor, confused editor to any of you readers who are also confused, anarcho-syndicalism is essentially anarchy where you want to abolish the centralized government of the state plus syndicalism where that power would then be invested back into labor unions and the hands of worker revolutionaries.

Chapter 311

The Skeptic IV

Sinnoa

My plan was simple.

First, I would hand all of the functions of the State's infrastructure over to the Anomalies. Places like the National Tax Service and Yeouido Airport had been playgrounds for Anomalies from the beginning, after all, so it wouldn't make much of a difference.

But then, all Awakeners, including those in the National Road Management Corps, would join the resistance and carry out terrorist acts against the Anomaly State—all the while hiding their identities so that they could continue to make good use of its amenities in their daily lives. This way, the people of the Korean Peninsula could freely enjoy the infrastructure of the State while maintaining their identity as a resistance force, untainted by the Anomalies.

A true win-win situation. A double kill.

The reputation of Undertaker, the world's foremost expert on Anomalies, was indeed well-deserved.

"No. You're kidding..."

Do-hwa balked, scrunching her face in bitter denial. I could hardly fault her for it, considering her job had suddenly changed from being the rightful ruler of the Korean Peninsula to the leader of a dark resistance organization.

"Is this strategy really feasible...?" she lamented.

"Entirely so. In fact, the concept of humans being a force of resistance fits the current reality much better."

The world was already dominated by Anomalies. In fact, the Anomalies had mimicked even the National Tax Service, collecting “taxes” in the form of human blood and limbs. In such occupied territory, gradually expanding liberated areas was the duty of a regressor.

“At its heart, our National Road Management Corps is like a network of scattered guilds across the Korean Peninsula, barely connected and used as a backbone for resistance,” I said sagely.

“So since it’s come to this, we might as well declare ourselves terrorists?”

I clicked my tongue. “Let’s use the more dignified term, resistance.”

“You’re the one who called it a terrorist organization first, you damn lunatic...”

The motion was passed. However, simply declaring among ourselves “From now on, we are the resistance fighting against the illegal occupation of the Korean Peninsula by the Anomaly State!” wouldn’t have much impact. Rituals required procedure.

I immediately led the National Road Management Corps’s Operations Team—the resistance’s strongest force—along with its Yu Ji-won to raid a shabby house in Busan.

“Mr. Jo Yeong-su! Are you there?”

“Huh? What, what is it? Who are you?”

Jo Yeong-su came out of the shack, looking flustered. In this cycle, he had been diligently collecting public opinion data to announce the “End of Service for South Korea.” Thanks to my full support, his opinion polls had progressed much more smoothly than before. The results were piled high under the roof of the shack.

Documents. To Jo Yeong-su, these were more precious than his own life, the last survey papers of South Korea.

“Wh-what is the meaning of this?” he stammered. “Why have you all come here to threaten this helpless old man?”

“Hmm. It’s Jo Yeong-su, alright. Take him away.”

“Ahhhhh!”

Thus, the Mr. Jo Yeong-su was immediately transported to Seoul.

By the way, all members of the Operations Team were wearing sunglasses and face masks to avoid being recognized.

After skillfully navigating the Inunaki Tunnel, we arrived at the National Assembly in Seoul in no time. Jo screamed when he saw us.

“Y-you! You’re Anomalies pretending to be human! You may suppress this old man’s body, but you’ll never defile my spirit!”

Truly, he was a man who had traveled the length and breadth of the country to complete his opinion polls in this insane world. Even most Awakeners would feel their knees go weak if they suddenly found themselves kidnapped by Anomalies, but Jo’s shout remained resolute.

No, perhaps “resolute” isn’t the right word. Judging by his expression, it seemed like he was inwardly welcoming the arrival of what he had been waiting for.

“Comrade Secretary-General! Welcome!”

Once we were in the National Assembly, the Tutorial Fairies greeted us. The Operations Team had already gathered here under my orders. At the sight of the Tutorial Fairies, the Anomalies most well-known to the general public, Jo became even more convinced and shouted, “S-Secretary-General? You...! Are you spies infiltrating from the puppet state in the north?”

I hummed, thinking over how to respond. That original puppet state had long since fallen, and a new regime had taken its place. But in retrospect, the Eastern Holy State was also my puppet state led by the puppet Mo Gwang-seo, wasn’t it? Jo’s outburst wasn’t entirely unfounded.

“Now then, human,” I boomed, deciding to just go with it. “Sit in the Speaker’s seat and stamp the document declaring the end of South Korea.”

“Y-you! You vile Anomalies! I’m trying to dissolve the government with the voluntary consent of all citizens, not sell the country under your coercion!”

“Tsk. You’re being unnecessarily verbose when you’re going to destroy it anyway.”

“L-let me go! You can’t hold me!”

Jo resisted fiercely, but as one of the Unawakened, there was no way he could escape the grasp of the fairies. In the end, he was forced to sit in the Speaker’s seat and stamp the document.

“Hooray! With this, we declare the end of South Korea!”

“Ahhhhhh!”

Amid Jo’s screams, thunderous applause erupted in the assembly. It wasn’t the Tutorial Fairies or me clapping. Invisible Anomalies were applauding.

‘Good. It’s done,’ I thought, clenching my fist. ‘With this, the last human government on the Korean Peninsula, South Korea, was not voluntarily dissolved but neutralized by the machinations of Anomalies.’

Crucially, this was what separated this cycle from those that came before it.

To be honest, Jo Yeong-su’s “End of Service” event had been deeply moving to me personally, but given the current state of affairs, allowing it to go through would be a misstep. From the Anomalies’ perspective, it could be interpreted as “humans voluntarily giving up state power!” So, while I felt sorry for the old man, this was a small sacrifice for the greater cause.

“Hooray! This land has now become a paradise for Anomalies!”

“What shall we name the country?”

“The term ‘Puppet State’ has a more traditional ring to it than ‘Anomaly State.’ After all, we are the hands and feet of Comrade

Secretary-General!”

“But ‘Anomaly’ is just a name humans arbitrarily gave us, and we’re not exactly the same species, are we?”

“Shh. Those who lack awareness are to be purged!”

The fairies chattered and left. Jo was sent back to his home in Busan via delivery service. Having suddenly become the main culprit behind the fall of the nation, the old man holed up in his house and refused to come out.

“Mr. Jo. Are you there?”

Startled, Jo Yeong-su turned to look and let out a sigh of relief. This time, I visited alone, without a mask or disguise.

“It’s you, Mr. Undertaker...” he said, trailing off. “I should offer you some instant coffee...”

“Oh, it’s fine. Please, sit down. By the way, I haven’t seen you around lately. Did something happen?”

“Ah, actually...”

Regressor Psychological Counseling mode, ON.

“...and then those bastards! The Anomalies grabbed my finger and forced me to stamp the document with red ink!”

“Oh my. How could such a wretched group exist in this world? You must have been through so much.”

“Waaah!”

Within 30 minutes of our counseling session beginning, Jo was bawling like a baby until his already thin frame seemed to be squeezed dry of all moisture.

“I... I became the accomplice of the nation’s downfall with my own hands! I signed that accursed treaty! The burden of my family’s legacy has fallen upon me again! Oh! Oh! How can I bear this injustice, this fury?!”

“How could this be your fault, Mr. Jo? It’s entirely the fault of the Anomalies who forced you.”

“Mr. Undertaker...!”

“Even if the world doesn’t understand, I, the Undertaker, understand your pain. We all lost our country, but we, each of us, still carry the name of ‘Korea’ deep within our hearts, do we not?”

“Comrade Undertaker...!”

We shared a passionate embrace. Sometimes, men need intense emotional exchanges.

[...]

Of course, the Saintess, who was watching all this through Clairvoyance, gave off a silent aura. It felt like she had a lot to say yet chose to hold back.

Sorry, Saintess, but the show isn’t over yet.

“Since you’ve called me comrade, I’d like to make a proposal to you —one to be kept secret.”

“Huh? A secret proposal...?”

“The responsibility for the nation’s downfall lies with the Anomalies, but your anger belongs solely to you, doesn’t it? Come with me.”

I guided the still tearful Jo to the Inunaki Tunnel. He jumped when he saw the casino thriving at the tunnel entrance.

“What is this place?! A den of evil where vile Anomalies run an illegal gambling den!”

Surprisingly, Jo had never visited the Dream Casino, which was popular among both Awakeners and the ordinary citizenry. In a way, he seemed to hate Anomalies more than most Awakeners. He was truly an impressive man.

“Oh. Everyone thinks that way. But it’s always darkest under the lamp. Mr. Jo. Keep your eyes on the ground and follow only my footsteps.”

Following the steps known only to members of the Regression Alliance, we soon arrived at the depths of Inunak, my hideout.

Jo’s eyes widened. “Wh-what is this place…?”

“Let me introduce you.”

The hideout’s interior was a bit different than my usual fare. Unlike in previous cycles, where it was built to maximize the convenience and welfare of guild members, this cycle’s hideout was… well, a bit shabby. The lighting was indirect, making it oddly dim. The tables and chairs were all old antiques, and the wallpaper gave off a musty smell. And one detail stood out above all the rest.

The Third Provisional Government of South Korea

An old-fashioned plaque hung on the wall.

“This is the true workplace of the Undertaker. The base of our independence resistance army, where we will dedicate nothing but blood and sweat until the day the Korean Peninsula is liberated from the Puppet State.”

Jo trembled as if struck by lightning. “Th-then, the reason you supported my project and helped me complete the opinion polls…!”

“Yes. As you’ve guessed, it’s because I was convinced that your project aligned with the ideology of our resistance.”

Actually, it just looked interesting.

“Then the reason someone as noble as you associated with a dictator like Noh Do-hwa…!”

“Keep your friends close, and your enemies closer. Noh Do-hwa, the head of the Management Corps, has no idea that I'm leading a branch of the resistance."

Actually, I was the one who forced Do-hwa into the position of Management Corps leader when she didn't want it.

"Now," I began, moving the topic in a different direction, "there are many people to introduce today. This is Yu Ji-won, the team leader of the Operations Control Room, part of the National Road Management Corps."

"Nice to meet you, Mr. Jo Yeong-su."

Ji-won walked over from where she had been waiting and shook Jo's hand. His eyes watered.

"What?! But y-you're Yu Ji-won, the loyal subordinate of the dictator Noh Do-hwa and the leader of the secret police who oppressed countless people!"

"That was all a disguise."

On the other hand, Ji-won answered expressionlessly, without batting an eye.

"My loyalty lies solely with one person—not Noh Do-hwa, the head of the Management Corps, but the Undertaker here."

"Wh-what...?"

"The core of a dictatorship lies in its intelligence and military organizations. I, Yu Ji-won, have firmly taken control of the Operations Control Room, which combines both. Noh Do-hwa may be a dictator, but she's on humanity's side. Our true goal is to use the power of the National Road Management Corps to fight against the world's main enemy, the Anomalies."

Then, with appropriate gravity, she murmured, "For the day the Korean Peninsula is liberated."

Jo was already at risk of a heart attack from shock overload, but sorry to him, the show wasn't over yet.

“Mr. Jo,” I called, directing his attention to someone new. “This child here is Lee Ha-yul. She’s known as the Puppeteer.”

“Puppeteer...?”

“Let me introduce her. The daughter of Jeong Sang-guk, the head of the Second Provisional Government. His only successor.”

“Wh-what...?” Jo stuttered, stunned.

Ha-yul skillfully manipulated a puppet to speak.

[Nice to meet you.]

[I’m Lee Ha-yul, carrying on my father’s will and working for the provisional government.]

[Let’s work together to achieve our goals.]

Ha-yul’s poker face was also top-notch. When it came to expressionless faces in our Regression Alliance, the Saintess, Yu Ji-won, and Lee Ha-yul were always mentioned.

[I have fully inherited the network my father established in the Japanese archipelago.]

[I act as a mediator between the Korean Peninsula and the archipelago, organizing the resistance as a united front.]

[Let’s be comrades-in-arms.]

[For the greater cause. For the day humanity is liberated.]

“Ahhh...!” Jo cried, falling to his knees. “There was still hope in this land! I, Jo Yeong-su, had no idea such wonderful people were fighting underground, and all I did was lament the future of the nation! Now I feel ashamed of my entire life!”

“No.” I knelt down with him and firmly grasped his hands. “You weren’t all talk. You protested in front of the Tower of Babel every day, condemning Noh Do-hwa, the head of the Management Corps, and ran around gathering public opinion. Why blame yourself?”

“Now, Mr. Undertaker.”

“Please join the resistance. Although victory over the Anomalies that have engulfed the world is still far off, with your help, humanity will undoubtedly take one more step forward.”

He burst into tears. Today, his tear ducts were like faucets. Turn them on, and they flowed.

“I... I see! If this old man’s life can be of any use, I’ll gladly give it!”

He was on board.

Jo Yeong-su was the key to my plan. The Anomaly State—or rather, the Puppet State—that had descended upon the Korean Peninsula was undoubtedly relying on his declaration of the end of South Korea.

All rituals require procedure.

If the Puppet State Anomaly had piggybacked on Jo Yeong-su to subtly swallow up the void left by the Korean state, then it would also have to be influenced by his decisions in kind. Thus, “South Korea was forcibly destroyed by Anomalies” (a fact) and “an underground resistance was formed to reclaim the lost homeland” (also a fact). As a result, members of the Regression Alliance along with other participating parties were freed from the Puppet State’s common sense alteration brainwashing.

Why?

Even if we made good use of the infrastructure of society, it was merely a means for independence and resistance. Resistance members were never truly citizens of the Puppet State. QED.

‘Am I a genius?’

For the first time in a while, I couldn’t resist the urge to take a moment to praise myself for my own brilliance. Although I had received advice from Cheon Yo-hwa and Ji-won, the credit for developing the method to break the ritual was mine.

“Thank you, Mr. Jo. Your dedication will surely be rewarded. For the greater cause. For the day humanity is liberated.”

“For the greater cause! For the day humanity is liberated!”

It was the moment when my organization, which had been called simply “my guild” or “guild hideout,” officially gained the name “resistance.”

As we were sharing a touching embrace among us proud children of Korea, the Saintess’s Telepathy reached me.

[...Sometimes, I really feel overwhelmed being with you, Mr. Undertaker.]

That, too, was a small sacrifice for the greater cause.

Chapter 312

The Skeptic V

Sinnoa

“Ugh... Oh, today is truly... a joyous day for this humble man... Ugh.”

Jo Yeong-su downed a celebratory shot for joining the resistance and left, thoroughly drunk.

The play is over. Acta est fabula.

Yu Ji-won, the “independence fighter who hides her true intentions while living as the right-hand woman of a dictator,” and Lee Ha-yul, the “young successor who carries on her father’s will to fight Anomalies,” had both exited stage left.

Of course, an encore performance would be ready whenever Jo returned. After all, a masterpiece never gets old, no matter how many times you see it.

[Oppa.]

After the commotion died down and the room quieted, Ha-yul suddenly approached me. I didn’t hesitate to pick her up, celebrating the star of today’s performance.

[Ah.]

Viking ride. Top spin. Roller coaster. Carousel.

The carnival of amusement rides invented over hundreds of cycles specifically for Ha-yul unfolded. She laughed silently, her golden Aura rippling with joy.

“You did really well today.”

[Yeah. And, this might be a bit TMI, but I’ll confess now—my mother's family name is Uibong Lee.]

I tilted my head. Uibong Lee?

[The most famous superstar from that family is Lee Wan-yong, the Marquess of the Empire, who drove everyone crazy, whether they loved or hated him.]

"..."

[And according to the intelligence gathered by my network, the grandpa who just left is from the Pungyang Jo family.] 1

No way.

[Yes.] Ha-yul drew a "V" with her fingers, expressionless. [The combo of Pungyang Jo and Uibong Lee leading the Korean Peninsula Independence Resistance Army—the last resistance of humanity—and it's based on a true story? My heart swells with pride.]

That was truly, 100% pure TMI.

Still, it seemed our Ha-yul, who used to be so well-suited for reading, was becoming more of an otaku.

This dad was worried she might be hanging out with the wrong crowd.

As the saying went, "What's next to ink turns black."

Even if Do-hwa and the Saintess were horrified by my strategy, they didn't refuse to execute the plan.

Once the goal was set, our Regression Alliance cooperated as one united front. By now, everyone was used to my style.

Noh Do-hwa's orders came down next.

"We will strike the Voids that are impersonating or mimicking 'state institutions,' such as the Central Intelligence Agency on Namsan, Yeouido Airport, and the National Tax Service, which appears every tax season...”

Up until now, we had focused on separating the Puppet State and the resistance.

If we had warmed up with WWE, it was time to move on to UFC. Now, it was time to show the Anomalies what a real resistance looked like.

And I, the Undertaker, had learned UFC techniques from an old German communist.

“Wait,” I interjected. “Before we launch attacks on the Voids of the Puppet State, there’s one last thing we need to set up.”

“Which is...?”

“Let’s establish the ‘real names’ and ‘aliases’ of all Awakeners this time.”

In the past, almost all revolutionaries used aliases instead of their real names. They all wanted to become idols of ideology. For example, the original idol Lenin’s real name was Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov, a name that no one except hardcore idol fans remembered. Not even his comrades were familiar with it. It was thanks to this discretion that anyone captured and interrogated by the state could maintain some level of security.

“If you don’t want to die, tell us the name of the leader who gave you orders!”

“L-Lenin! Comrade Lenin!”

“Lenin? Who’s that? Tell us his real name!”

“I don’t know his real name either!”

Surprisingly, an equivalent security system was maintained in Korea until the early 2000s. Ideological agitators were often ignorant of technical and practical advancements like cybersecurity.

I decided to follow this ancient tradition.

“Until now, aliases were either self-proclaimed or naturally created, like pro gamers’ nicknames. But from now on, we’ll assign these aliases with the explicit purpose of acting as pseudonyms for the resistance.”

“Oh?”

“Revealing your real name to Anomalies is quite dangerous, even from a ritualistic perspective. Let’s change the culture entirely this time.”

Hide your real name as much as possible. Never call each other by your real names, even by mistake, especially when entering Voids or fighting Anomalies.

‘This taboo was already being observed voluntarily within the more experienced guilds. With a little push, it’ll soon become an unspoken rule across the Korean Peninsula.’

As I predicted, the guilds across the regions followed the guidelines from the National Road Management Corps without much suspicion.

We formed the organization. We prepared the members. And just as the atmosphere was ripening, Do-hwa finally dropped a quest directive across the Korean Peninsula.

Author: [National Road] Noh Do-hwa

Notice:

Recently, numerous Anomalies and Voids claiming to be or mimicking “state institutions” have been discovered across the Korean Peninsula.

As you all know, there is currently no legitimate government in the Korean Peninsula. Do not trust anyone claiming to belong to a government institution.

As of now, the National Road Management Corps will collectively refer to all Anomalous phenomena mimicking government institutions as the “Puppet State.”

Those who subdue Anomalies and Voids related to the Puppet State will receive certain rewards.

Rewards will be paid in Korean won.

Please ensure you have a means to prove your subjugation and report it to the National Road Management Corps.

A permanent post has been set up on SG Net for submissions, so please make use of it.

That is all.

National Road Management Corps Leader, Noh Do-hwa

The extermination order had been issued.

‘How touching.’

In the past, say, around the 100th cycle, we could never have issued quests like this. The only way to mobilize Awakeners on a national scale back then was to borrow the voice of a constellation. Rewards were also haphazard. We had to gather useful weapons or visions that could enhance each Awakener’s abilities and distribute them like “opportunities.”

‘Not anymore.’

Liberating the Tutorial Fairies from the Infinite Void and establishing a cooperative relationship to successfully open the Dream Casino had afforded us access to the dream-based currency system, where earning money in dreams allowed you to fulfill wishes.

The desire to escape from the harsh struggle for survival and enjoy a comfortable fantasy, even for just eight hours of sleep, was universal and primal.

‘Simply offering rewards of tens of millions, hundreds of millions, or even billions of won is enough to stimulate the desires of countless Awakeners.'

I'll admit it. Everything in the world has its pros and cons. My steps to expand humanity's liberated zones inadvertently helped the Puppet State Anomaly grow, but the regressor's system was prepared to crush such minor side effects.

[Mr. Undertaker.]

[The Baekpa Guild in Chungju has raided the National Tax Service. One member was seriously injured, but the Void was successfully half-destroyed.]

Soon, the Saintess's Telepathy began relaying urgent reports.

[Awakeners across the regions are subduing buildings like police stations, fire stations, community centers, and schools while exploring Voids.]

[Some of these Voids don't seem related to the Puppet State. What should we do in such cases?]

"Leave them be. For now."

It didn't matter if the resistance's attacks weren't precise. After all, the enemy wasn't human, they were Anomalies. What mattered was fostering an atmosphere where subduing Anomalies related to the Puppet State and receiving rewards was seen as a sweet "honey" among Awakeners.

"We don't even need to completely subdue them. Just damaging the buildings or disrupting their operations is enough."

[I see... Understood.]

The resistance was fundamentally an underground force. Completely eliminating the Puppet State was a distant goal. No, even if we toppled the Puppet State and the Korean Peninsula returned to the resistance's control, a new state born from the resistance would eventually emerge.

“Both WWE and UFC are shows. Even if blood spills and bones break, the show must go on.”

The Puppet State must not disappear. In fact, it must maintain its identity as a “state” forever. So that we, the Awakeners, humanity’s allies, can continue to exist as humans who are “not enchanted by state ideology” and “fight for their own freedom.”

[Not subduing them is itself a method of subdual... I didn’t know such a thing existed.]

“It’s not that rare. The Tutorial Fairies are the same.”

[Really?]

“Yes. Thanks to the fairies, we can interfere with the vast Void of “dreams.” If we forcibly capture all of them, the Nameless One from the unconscious world will rise.”

[The ecology of Voids is truly fascinating the more you think about it...]

Three years passed like this.

- Anonymous: Went Void exploring this time and found a bunch of school buildings lined up like dominoes lol. Thought it was some kind of academy city lol

Anonymous: Did you get the reward??

Anonymous: Yep. Knocked over the dominoes and easily sucked up 1.3 billion in rewards lol.

Anonymous: Damn, I’m so jealous...

Anonymous: So I donated 300 million of my share to our golden-handed DM-nim lol. This is why I risk my life exploring Voids.

Anonymous: ?

Now, posts like this were common on SG Net. There was no need to completely destroy the Puppet State’s buildings, which were tainted by Void Corruption. Just damaging the exterior enough would automatically trigger the rewards. For Awakeners, there was no better farming ground.

‘This is enough.’

I turned off my smartphone.

‘With this, Awakeners using aliases are no longer susceptible to the Puppet State’s common sense alteration brainwashing.’

The Puppet State’s strategy of parasitizing the regressor’s success to build its own power had been thwarted.

I stood up, a satisfied smile lingering on my lips.

It was Wednesday—time for my regular study session with the Saintess. For a regressor with no weekends, Wednesday was the happiest day of the week.

‘Where should I have Dok-seo place this story?’ I thought to myself as I walked toward the Saintess’s house in Yongsan. ‘Since it’s about the Anomaly connected to the National Tax Service, maybe around then? Or right after the story where we meet parallel-world Dang Seo-rins on a passenger plane at Yeouido Airport?’

Let me confess upfront: neither option became canon.

I didn’t know it yet then, but this story wasn’t over.

‘Hmm. Both the Eastern Holy State and the Puppet State are state systems, so contrasting a human Puppet State built using Anomalies with an Anomaly Puppet State building a state using humans isn’t a bad idea…’

My footsteps halted.

A regressor’s vision was broad. Even while walking without paying particular attention to anything, I could catch a sentence in the corner of my vision.

It was on a stone wall blocking the exit of the Inunaki Tunnel.

Written there—not in Japanese but in Korean, not in red but in pink—was the following sentence:

Hello, Mr. Undertaker?

I stared at it silently. The Inunaki Tunnel was a Japanese Anomaly through and through. Even though I used it as my hideout, it shouldn't have learned Korean.

Perhaps Ah-ryeon or Dok-seo had painted it as a joke. I decided to think so.

I walked ahead and exited the tunnel.

About ten meters away, small stones were scattered on the ground in a very particular pattern that could be read as follows:

If this is not a dream

Or rather, it had to be read that way.

The thickness of the letters was expressed with pebbles, and the strokes of the handwriting were marked with gravel.

A spring breeze blew, scattering the gravel.

The sentence changed.

Can I borrow a moment of your time?

The spring gently breezed.

May I borrow a moment of your time?

A gust strong enough to blow away eyebrows blew.

The gravel all flew away. Even the pebbles rolled away.

Only twisted traces remained.

?

I immediately changed my route.

I had prepared 365 routes to the Saintess's house in Yongsan from the tunnel in Busan to the tunnel in Seoul. I even matched the number on purpose.

Although the cycles were different, the Saintess had sealed Nut, the Night Goddess. Nut governed the geocentric model, the power of the sun, and the model of the universe. She was an Outer God. The sun was the protagonist of the calendar. The number 365 to represent days of the year honored Nut. Therefore, the 365 paths from me to the Saintess were themselves a ritual crossing the solar system.

'The Saintess loves water. Water is the primordial mirror. Wednesday is the day of water in the Korean calendar. Therefore, Wednesday is when the Saintess's presence is strongest.'

I chose the 88th route, the number of days it took Mercury to orbit the sun and the path closest to water.

Since ancient times, rituals had been composed of three elements: heaven, earth, and man. Wednesday was the heavenly timing. The path of Mercury was the earthly geography. And the strongest Awakeners in the Korean Peninsula, ranked first and second, were here as well. So, there was no room for another being to intervene —

I am now behind you

Dead ants.

The corpses of millions of insects floated on the Han River.

I swallowed, sensing nothing behind me.

No, I felt the wind. The spring breeze was almost indistinguishable from a whisper. It carried the warmth of a human breath.

That spring breeze licked the back of my neck. Its tongue was long and sticky, licking me and the Han River, scattering the millions of corpses.

If you turn around, you will understand

I squeeze my eyes closed.

I couldn't bring myself to turn around. Yet ignoring it and walking away was even more impossible.

So, I let my voice flow backward alone.

"Go Yuri..."

"Yes."

The wind laughed against the back of my neck.

"Hello, Mr. Undertaker."

Footnotes:

1 - A reference to Joseon Dynasty history, where these families were also part of the resistance.

Chapter 313

The Skeptic VI

Sinnoa

The very first “He Who Must Not Be Named” was an Englishman who got taken down by some dropout. The second-generation successor of that title, however, was different.

Go Yuri appeared like a superstar, taking the world as her stage. And the moment she set foot upon it, she took everyone by storm.

My comrades and I were annihilated and, presumably, humankind itself went extinct.

In my epilogues, I’ve described it like this:

After that day, I never again contacted Go Yuri.

At the very least, the number of times we met face-to-face could be counted on one hand. We only interacted three, maybe four times at most over hundreds of cycles.

Take special note of the phrase “the number of times we met face-to-face.”

In truth, I very rarely had a real-life fan meet-up with Go Yuri. Of course, in the unconscious realm of the dream-within-a-dream, I saw her fairly often, but that wasn’t reality. It was quite literally just a dream. You wouldn’t claim, “Wow, Mom! I just met this YouTuber in person!” just because you chatted with them on a livestream. (Although there were some folks who got reality and the virtual world all mixed up.)

Anyway, back to the point.

How to tell apart the “real Go Yuri” from the “Go Yuri in my dreams”? Surprisingly easy. You could figure it out just from how she addressed me.

First, the dream version of Go Yuri preferred calling me Guild Leader.

As you know, Dream Yuri was an illegal squatter in my unconscious, which meant she could peep at my memories anytime she pleased. Even the fact that she'd once been a member of the Undertaker's guild—she learned that by sifting through my recollections.

The real one was different.

The real Go Yuri usually called me "Mr. Undertaker," "Undertaker, sir," or simply "Doc." She had no sense whatsoever that we'd ever belonged to the same guild, so for her, that reality was never even on her radar.

Incidentally, her forms of address changed based on her level of affection for me. From least to most affectionate: Mr. Undertaker, Undertaker, sir, and then Doc.

An example would go like this:

"Huwa. How intriguing. To think you're calling me exactly by my name."

Her voice, friendly and gentle, drifted from behind me.

"Surely, for you, Undertaker, sir, this must be nearly the first time we've met. All we did was briefly lock eyes at Busan Station, right? But could it be that you've known me for longer?"

Yes.

What was there to hide?

This very moment in this cycle was one of those "three, maybe four times" where I actually met Go Yuri in person that I spoke of in that epilogue. A genuine, real-life fan meet-up for the first time in thousands of years.

I felt like I was about to lose my mind.

If worst comes to worst, I'll just kill myself.

I swallowed hard, concentrating on the sensation of saliva sliding down my throat and on the graceful ripples of the Han River—where ant corpses drifted by.

I forced myself to stay calm.

"What's so strange about it? You called me 'Undertaker' even though we've only just met, so we're even."

"Ahaha. Doc, you're way too famous compared to someone like me. The gap in prestige feels even bigger than Guan Yu's fame versus Bian Xi's name value."[1]

Wee-ooo! Wee-ooo! Wee-ooo!

In my head, a police siren was blaring nonstop.

Amazingly, even that siren was something Go Yuri, as an illusion in my mind, was mimicking with a sunny smile. The entire world had become Go Yuri.

This is dangerous.

Why? Why? We'd only exchanged two lines, so how had she instantly jumped multiple rungs up the affection-laced address ladder?

I struggled to remain calm.

"Heaven's net is vast and wide, seeming loose yet letting nothing slip through... I have sources of information you know nothing about, so of course I'd be aware of an Awakener of your level."

"Oh, the Tao Te Ching. That's a passage discussing the Way of Heaven and Earth, right? You've been referencing the sky and ground repeatedly—is that on purpose?"

Spare me.

Please, just let me live.

“Ahaha. Also, there’s actually no way I could not know about you in the first place, Doc.”

“That’s a strange thing to say. Why’s that?”

“Because—”

Then, inexplicably, there was an instant of silence, maybe a decisecond of hesitation. It was so brief that unless you knew Go Yuri as intimately as I did, you’d never notice, but her lips gaped for a moment, as if glitching. Right after that, her voice resumed.

“Because—I’m a huge fan of Romance of the Three Kingdoms: Gongsun Zan Edition, the serial novel posted every day on SG Net by the author Mudang, who does two chapters a day!”[2]

“…”

“Ehehe. I’ve never left a comment, but I follow every chapter and always click that recommend button! Even this morning.”

“…”

“Seriously, Mudang goes too far sometimes. In the author’s notes, he casually brags that he still has over 200 chapters in reserve. Don’t get me wrong, I’m thankful for the daily double updates, but from a reader’s viewpoint, that just makes you wish for five updates a day.”

“……”

Honestly… Maybe Go Yuri really was a good kid? Maybe there were unavoidable circumstances behind her driving me and my allies to our deaths back in the 88th cycle?

As those of you with keen eyes might have noticed, I was bantering to myself—intentionally, truly clinging to life. After all, laughter can lighten gravity. To resist Go Yuri’s magnetism, which drew all things toward her, I had no choice but to cast off weight.

“Let’s get to the main point.”

Contrary to my frantic mental state, my outward tone and expression were heavy as lead.

“If you came here just because you’re a fan, then I refuse this meeting,” I continued. “I don’t play favorites with any particular reader.”

“Eh? But aren’t you the author on SG Net who’s banned the most readers?”

“Wait, how did you know about that…? A ban isn’t some sign of affection, it’s an expression of disregard. Besides, there’s no way I can see those brats who sneer that Romance of the Three Kingdoms is just out-of-touch boomer content to be real readers.”

“But isn’t your definition of a true reader someone who got started with Romance, dived into the historical records, yet still appreciates the grandeur of the fictional story, thus keeping both romance and realism alive?”

“So what?”

“That’s too high a bar!”

“Huh. Well, that’s how masterpieces are. Readers pick books, but masterpieces pick their readers right back. You lot who can’t appreciate the splendor of the Three Kingdoms—”

Ah.

…

“You lot…?”

I closed my eyes and took a deep breath. “Let’s get to the main point.”

“Oh? Heh.”

Laughter trickled out.

Ah-ha-ha.

The “ah,” the “ha,” and the final “ha” in that laughter each had different intensities. They grew sharper and grew closer.

Right behind me.

Not even four inches away, a rosy laugh sank softly along with her breath.

“How fascinating.”

The fine hairs on my neck stood on end.

Her exhalation was so dense that her voice didn’t exactly resonate through the air, it melted into my skin. A breath with a texture reminiscent of dripping candle wax.

It wrapped around my neck from behind.

If someone else had actually grabbed and squeezed my throat, it might have been easier to breathe. Even then, I didn’t turn around.

“Understood. It’s a shame we can’t talk face to face, but—just as you said, Doc—I’ll get straight to the point.”

She whispered.

“This past winter and spring were unusually dry. The same goes for last year, the year before that, and the year before that. We’ve had a constant drought.”

“…”

“Nature only seems slow to humans, but it still cycles along at its own measured pace. A poor harvest always brings consequences.”

A whisper.

“Which is why this summer, there’s going to be a typhoon, an incredibly powerful one.”

“…Could you talk from a bit farther away?”

“I am far enough. Really.”

“That’s a lie. You’re practically whispering right in my ear.”

“I never lie. If you doubt me, why not check with your own eyes?”

I took another deep breath. Again.

During those two twenty-second inhalations, there was no sound from behind me—only a breath, faintly mixed with laughter like the scent of apples, clinging to my neck, my back, my spine, and my waist. At first, her breath merely pressed lightly against my neck, but like fingers counting upward, it gradually coiled around my entire body. Now, I could feel Go Yuri’s every inhalation across my skin. It was getting hard to distinguish my breathing from hers.

The edges of my existence were starting to blur.

“If it’s a powerful typhoon...”

My voice remained the only thing clearly separated, so I clung to it —word by word, sentence by sentence—like a lifeline on a cliff.

Calmly.

“A sea serpent that causes monsoons and floods... Are you talking about Leviathan?”

“Oh? You knew about that too?”

“As I said, I have an information network you know nothing about.”

The Super Monsoon Anomaly, Leviathan. It was an Anomaly once purged by constructing an Ark.

“That’s amazing! As expected of you, Doc. Then maybe you’ve also guessed that the dragon is still getting bigger?”

“You’re telling me it keeps growing?”

“Yes.”

Haaah, Go Yuri sighed.

Her breath coursed through me like electricity, from the crown of my head all the way down my spine. I barely kept my balance.

“Frankly, I’m really curious about what’s going on too. Under normal circumstances, it shouldn’t be able to grow this huge. Fascinating, right?”

“……”

Those words brought an old memory to mind—a distant scene from the past.

In the 687th cycle, while we were suppressing the Mastermind, Cheon Yo-hwa ascended until her fist alone swelled to the size of the entire Earth. At that time, the whole world was drowned in bloody waters.

That blood flood was indiscriminate, submerging the domain of humanity and the Void of Anomalies alike. Just when it seemed as if Cheon Yo-hwa would crush the Earth for good, an Anomaly burst forth from the center of that crimson sea.

- Gɣ̀́ ɵò́. oò́. Grù́. oò́!

Leviathan.

Even as all the other Anomalies were swallowed up by the Infinite Void’s ocean of blood, Leviathan alone struggled until the bitter end. And though Cheon Yo-hwa destroyed Leviathan’s entire body with a single flick of her hand...

At that time, Cheon Yo-hwa had devoured both the Infinite Void and the Mastermind, two types of Outer Gods. She was an Anomaly of unprecedented power—strong enough to rewrite even my past. And yet, Leviathan still fought back.

More importantly, in the 687th cycle, Leviathan was noticeably larger than before. Each of the dragon’s scales had turned into a human eyeball, covering its entire body in hundreds of billions of eyes.

I frowned. I had assumed it had gained power because the Earth flooded and triggered a great deluge—amplifying Leviathan’s water affinity, but... could there be another cause?

In this cycle, there hadn't been any major flooding, so why was Go Yuri suddenly hinting that "Leviathan has grown bigger"?

Questions piled up, perplexing me even further.

"Even if Leviathan is getting bigger," I began cautiously, "I already have a countermeasure."

"Oh? Really?"

"Yes. If I see Leviathan getting close to the Korean Peninsula, I plan to plaster the beaches with the Chinese character for 'tiger' (虎)."

"Ahhh? Wow! Wow!" Go Yuri clapped her hands in delight. "So you already knew about that tactic! This time I'm truly surprised. As expected of you, Doc. You're amazing!"

It's the strategy you taught me in the past.

I bit back the words that almost slipped off my tongue.

Now that I think about it, both back then and now, Go Yuri had always been strangely... entangled with Leviathan. When she led the Ark and hunted down Leviathan in person, didn't she appear near the end like some illusion, delivering the final blow?

A case where Go Yuri didn't just advise me but personally subdued another Anomaly...

From my perspective—from what I had witnessed with my own eyes—that had been the only time.

So why? Leviathan was an ocean-class threat, sure, but there was no obvious reason for Go Yuri to treat it with such special attention. Did they share some sort of similarity? Some reason I was missing?

"But, Doc. Unfortunately, you can't quell Mr. Dragon using just that method this summer."

In the midst of my doubts multiplying like germs, Go Yuri dropped a thunderbolt.

“What?”

“He’s grown too enormous. Even at this very moment, he’s still getting bigger.”

Go Yuri smiled sweetly.

My body, already synchronized to her breathing, felt each subtle vibration of her laughter.

“I’m sure you know, Doc, but even predators usually just growl when they run into each other. They don’t actually fight.”

“...Because both sides know they’d just get hurt.”

“Right. So you can scare off a predator just by roaring at it.”

She playfully mimicked a tiger’s roar.

Roooar!

“But like I said, the drought has dragged on for too long.”

“...”

“If a predator gets hungry enough, even if it has to bleed, it’ll go out hunting to tear off a mouthful of flesh.”

I had no idea what she was implying.

Go Yuri leaned in with infinite gentleness, the way a kid might secretly share answers with their partner during a test.

“I call him Mr. Dragon, but you, Doc... You call him Leviathan.”

“...”

“Leviathan. Besides the Bible, there’s something else that name brings to mind, right?”

Leviathan.

From the original language of the Protestant Bible, it's rendered as Līvyāṯān. And in English, simply Leviathan.

By coincidence, there was a famous book that used that exact same name.

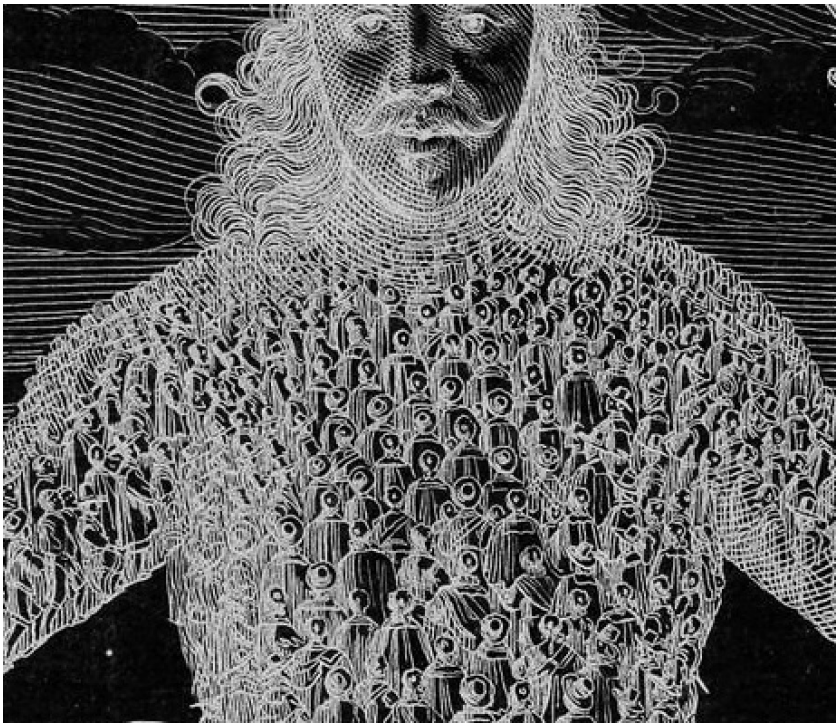
Thomas Hobbes, an English philosopher, wrote a work titled Leviathan.[3] That work was also where the phrase "the war of all against all" appeared—a line many people encounter at least once in their studies.

In Leviathan, Hobbes discussed many topics: rights, natural law, government, and so on. I read it not only in Korean translation but also in modern English, and with my Complete Memory, I could naturally recall what the original book cover of Leviathan looked like.

Leviathan was a dragon. However, on Hobbes's cover, Leviathan was depicted as a king wearing a crown—a biblical threat, a monster used as a metaphor for the nation's emblem.

Leviathan was so enormous, so gargantuan in size, that it could oversee the world from beyond the horizon. And, although it might not be apparent from afar, if you studied that cover closely...

At first, those tiny, scattered details looked just like "scales of armor" draped over a king. In reality, however, the armor was made up of countless humans.



Each and every one of those people's heads was turned toward the onlooker, as if each was an "eyeball" staring right at me.

"..."

A sea dragon composed of countless eyeballs.

From ancient times, ruling over the waters has been the sacred prerogative of the emperor.

"Ah. Looks like you've figured it out?"

"..."

"Mr. Dragon is starving, so he's a bit upset. And he wants to find out who's been leaving him so hungry."

Leviathan.

There was another name for it. The State.

An Anomaly that had swelled to colossal proportions along the regressor’s timeline was now on its way here.

Footnotes:

1 - In Romance of the Three Kingdoms, Guan Yi easily defeats and kills Bian Xi when the latter plotted to ambush him.

2 - Mudang is the phonetic spelling of ZERO_SUGAR in Korean.

3 - In Thomas Hobbes' political treatise, Leviathan (1651), the monster Leviathan symbolizes the state, a powerful centralized authorty meant to prevent social collapse. The book's famous concept of the "war of all against all" (bellum omnium contra omnes) was meant to highlight the necessity of absolute governance to suppress human conflict.

Chapter 314

The Skeptic VII

Sinnoa

“You seem especially unfocused on your studies today, Mr. Undertaker.”

“Ah.”

I lifted my head.

The Saintess and I were at her residence in Yongsan, an aquatic temple of sorts where the shadows of fish flickered past in glass tanks.

In the heart of her temple, the Saintess of National Salvation was gazing quietly in my direction, a book titled The Source of Normativity held in hand.[1]

“Is there anything on your mind that’s worrying you? If you need counseling, I can help.”

I hesitated. “Thank you. But I think I need to sort out my thoughts on my own for now. I’ll definitely ask for counseling later.”

“All right, I understand.”

I went back to looking down at the book.

My conversation with Go Yuri was on hold for the moment. The revelation that “Leviathan” and the “Puppet State” were in fact the same Anomaly had been a shock to my system. Plus, I first had to take care of the study session I’d promised the Saintess.

“Well then, I’ll read the next paragraph.” The Saintess’s gentle voice flowed like water as she read, “‘The commonality between Neo-Kantian arguments and Hobbesian arguments is as follows: both presuppose that each individual acts according to their own sense of reason...'"

Letting my mind follow that hushed rhythm, I began thinking about something else, all on my own.

Leviathan.

Looking back, Leviathan also possessed an incredibly wide-range brainwashing ability.

Back in the 664th cycle, when hundreds of sailors were trapped inside the Super Monsoon Anomaly, they all complained of severe mental contamination. Even Ha-yul, who was with me then, couldn't remain unaffected.

- When we were submerged and turning into frogs, I felt strange.

- I felt nostalgic. Happy. I couldn't breathe through my nose or mouth and yet... I felt it through my whole body.

- It felt like I was breathing through my skin, and that by just breathing, everything that makes me "me" opened wide up. Like I was becoming one with the world..."

That was it.

Ha-yul's testimony contained a clue: a sense of oneness. It was the sensation of merging with something far bigger than oneself. Intoxication. The pleasure of self-forgetting.

For humans, that sort of euphoria is most readily found when identifying with a crowd. To view it through a negative lens, the iconic case of this would be Nazism.

The illusion that oneself and the State are fused into a single body—that alone yields a potent rush of intoxication. So if we assumed that the root identity of Leviathan was "the State," then the frustration that had been bottling up, like a jammed holiday highway, suddenly cleared.

'That's right... Leviathan's mental contamination was strong enough to beguile my companions. Very few can pull off such intense brainwashing.'

Even so, there remained one mystery, lodged in my mind like fog clinging to a rainy road.

'I understand that Leviathan is dangerous. Maybe it's even grown to an Outer God-class threat level. But... why is Go Yuri so wary of it?'

Because it was an Outer God? That kind of reasoning wouldn't cut it.

Even when Cheon Yo-hwa had seized both the Infinite Void and the Mastermind at the same time, Go Yuri never showed herself. If it were just about an Outer God-level threat, Cheon Yo-hwa back then would have been impossible to ignore. Indeed, Cheon Yo-hwa had even used her simulation ability to "duplicate" as many as 5,427 copies of Go Yuri. Though she had then gone on to scramble for her life at the sight of the Pink Legion, she still mocked Go Yuri's very presence.

'Even then, Go Yuri didn't contact me directly or warn me about Cheon Yo-hwa. Then why? Why is Leviathan the exception?'

If I could solve that mystery, I might also glean a clue about the true identity of Go Yuri, who I'd always kept at a distance and avoided.

"Ah."

The Saintess's voice brought me back to reality.

"It's raining."

"Pardon?" I looked out the window. Sunlight was still streaming through a gap in the blackout curtains, and I couldn't hear any rain. "I'm sorry, Saintess. Were you making a metaphor about rain?"

"No, it's actually raining. It started in the waters off Busan about a minute ago."

Oh, right. She could see it with Clairvoyance.

Still, I tilted my head slightly. Why tell me about rain in Busan specifically? Was she offering to lend me an umbrella for the trip?

The Saintess parted her lips to speak.

“It’s reached Gimhae now. Yeosu. Daegu. Pohang. Gwangju. Jeonju. Daejeon. Sejong. Suwon...”

The average speed of a rain cloud was around 30 km/h, yet the Saintess listed the cities one by one in precise order, reporting the raincloud moving north.

“And...”

Plip.

“Seoul.”

Patter-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r...

A few seconds ago, the sky beyond the window had been all sunlight. Now, out of nowhere, raindrops were pelting the glass.

I could no longer hear the pages of the Saintess’s book turning or the low hum of the computer. Everything was drowned out by the deafening sound, leaving room only for the rain’s din until the boundary between inside and outside blurred. The window filtered out the physical rainwater, leaving only the sound—but that sound alone was enough to drench a person’s very soul.

“It’s already reached Sinuiju as well... All of Korea has been blanketed by rain, Mr. Undertaker.”

I checked the calendar on my phone.

April. Usually, that was the time for spring breezes.

‘Go Yuri warned me that Leviathan would make landfall this summer...’

It was still a ways off from monsoon season, so why was it raining today?

‘This isn’t the full effect of the typhoon. It’s just the preliminary showers. Yet even this indirect front is enough to drench the entire Korean Peninsula.’

I held my tongue, staying quiet.

The longest summer was coming.

“Damn it. This rain is so fucking nasty...”

Bang!

Noh Do-hwa slammed open the door and walked in, muttering obscenities as her white doctor’s coat dripped onto the entryway floor, the fabric soaked clean through like a cheap raincoat.

“That’s why I told you to train your Aura on the regular,” I said, skipping the greetings. “Everyone else is walking around just fine in transparent Aura raincoats, so the NRMC Commander stands out, looking like a drowned rat.”

“I have zero interest in relying on that suspicious power you people call Aura. The thought of exerting physical force with mere will? Hah, I fail to see how that’s any different from an Anomaly...”

Do-hwa took the dry towel I handed her and roughly scrubbed down her hair. Meanwhile, I accepted her monocle with a practiced hand, rinsed it clean, and returned it.

“So, how’s the Sword Marquess doing?” I asked.

“You were right. He says these damned raindrops are making any crops that drink ‘em accumulate Void Poison at dangerous levels...”

“Hmm.”

When the rainy season began in April, I immediately called for an emergency mobilization of the Regressor Alliance. We had to rally all the resources and manpower we’d amassed so far if we wanted to survive this summer.

“I’m baaack!”

Dang Seo-rin came in right after Do-hwa. She was as neat and dry as ever, but the broom she flew on was drenched from top to bottom.

“Ugh, seriously. What’s with this rain? It’s all slimy and gooey—nearly fell off my broom mid-flight.”

“You did great. How’s it looking out there?”

“Mm, the Magical Girl Association says it’s raining over the entire Japanese archipelago. I haven’t personally checked Okinawa, but chances are it’s raining there too.”

“...So it’s everywhere.”

The Saintess even used Time Stop to travel across mainland China and back. It was the same non-stop downpour there, which meant nowhere near the peninsula was safe from Leviathan.

‘The rain is so heavy that we can’t rely on signal fires for scouting. And I’d bet good money it’s raining all across the Eurasian continent.’

The idea of evacuating civilians anywhere else was a non-starter, and we couldn’t repeat our old plan of building 12 Arks. That had only worked when we could limit Leviathan’s target to Busan, but this cycle’s Leviathan seemed hell-bent on sinking the entire world. Even the Himalayas might not be safe.

I bit my lip. “That leaves me no choice, then... Noh Do-hwa, we’ll evacuate everyone into the Inunaki Tunnel.”

“Huh? Can it handle that many people...?”

“We’ll make it handle them. Even if we have to expand the underground floors to 100, or even 1,000 levels. I’ll negotiate with Inunaki directly.”

“Uh... Are you sure about that, mister?” Dok-seo asked, sounding unsure.

I couldn't blame her. Increasing the tunnel's capacity basically meant letting the Inunaki Tunnel grow stronger.

"I know what you're worried about. Using one Anomaly to escape another... It's like paying off one credit card with another, but we have no choice. We have to secure a shelter for civilians, even if it means making sacrifices."

Dok-seo clamped her mouth shut.

I looked around. "Once the people are inside, we'll use Tutorial Fairies to put them all to sleep."

"Hoh..."

"Who knows how long this monsoon could last? Pack millions of people into a closed environment, and you've got endless variables on your hands."

"So you'll just have them sleep, guaranteeing some semblance of comfortable living through their dreams... Not a bad plan."

This wasn't limited to only the Korean population. Japan, China, and possibly everyone beyond—anyone we could manage, we'd evacuate.

Except, of course, for the Awakeners who'd join our Leviathan Subjugation.

"Everyone," I called out. All of my companions in the meeting room turned to look at me. "I know you're all reeling from this unprecedented situation, but we must remain calm and act swiftly. Please use the Tutorial Fairies whenever you need rest or sleep. We have to maximize our waking hours. Every minute, every second, we stay active can save that many more lives. Don't forget that."

They nodded.

April and May raced by.

In places like Pyongyang or Sejong, where a single authority figure maintained clear control, evacuations went smoothly.

We hammered it home on SG Net, on radio broadcasts, and via telepathy from various Constellations—how perilous this summer would be, and why. Still, some people outright refused to evacuate.

There wasn't much we could do about that. You can't lead a person from water if the world has no breathing room left.

"Phew. We've evacuated all the residents in th-the Eastern Holy State..."

"Good job, Ah-ryeon."

"Hehe. N-no, this just means I can finally ditch most of the Saintess work, s-so it's actually a relief."

Outside the tunnel entrance, lines of people snaked out like trails of ants. The cacophony of displaced souls made the whole city roar with noise.

"Don't cut in line! Don't cut in line! Please proceed in an orderly fashion to avoid any stampedes!"

"Group 31! Group 31! Those of you from Daegu, please move out now!"

Even in the pouring rain, members of the Samcheon World guild zipped around on flying brooms or soared overhead, trying to keep the crowds in check.

"Gosh, what a mess."

"They say some terrifying sea dragon or whatever is coming. And it's not just the North—the entire world's in danger."

"Don't push! I said don't push!"

"Mom, give me that bag. Why do you keep carrying it alone?"

"Everyone, do not drink the rainwater! Please be extra careful not to ingest any of it!"

It wasn't just one city. The Inunaki Tunnel entrances in Seoul,

Busan, and Kyushu were each swamped by enormous lines of refugees. Assigning a number to every city and controlling the population flow day by day was already stretching the administrative capacities of the National Road Management Corps, the Magical Girl Association, and others to their limit.

– Oooooh...

Suddenly, from far off in the sky, there came a ghastly wail.

In an instant, the uproarious city fell silent. Tens of thousands of evacuees and Awakened alike all turned toward the southern sky.

– Gwooooooo...

– Ooooooh...

– Uwooooooo...

The sky-rattling roar gradually faded, lost to the white noise of pouring rain and the rising swell of whispers on the ground.

“Man, that’s creepy.”

“Hasn’t that sound been happening more often lately?”

“My brother’s an Awakener, he said that noise means the sea dragon or whatever is getting closer.”

The refugees moved on, but you could see a deep fear lurking in their expressions.

“Group 32! Group 32, move now! Those from Daejeon!”

“Don’t all rush forward at once! Two lines! Please form two lines, Daejeon group!”

The procession shuffled forward.

Unlike those of other cities, Awakeners and ordinary citizens alike from Daejeon were all remarkably orderly. Their eyes seemed somehow blank, vacant.

Right at the front of the line, pink hair shimmered brightly through the hazy rain.

Go Yuri glanced my way for a moment.

"..."

"..."

She smiled.

Go Yuri lightly pinched her skirt at the sides and offered a polite curtsy. I bowed my head in return.

"We have no choice. Let's make a temporary alliance just for this cycle!"

"I still won't forgive you!"

Some silly meme along those lines popped into my head.

I still had no idea what was going on in Go Yuri's head, but it was better to choose a lesser evil than the worst scenario.

'Just for this run. Once we figure out how to defeat Leviathan, we'll keep our distance again next run.'

Suddenly, Dok-seo beside me started waving excitedly. "Ah! Yuri unnie! Heeey! Long time no seeee!"

"Wait..."

"Huh?" She paused as I pulled her back. "What is it, mister?"

"Why are you acting like you know Go Yuri? I mean, why greet her as if you two are close? This should be your first time ever meeting her face-to-face."

"Eh?" Dok-seo asked with a tilt of her head. "What are you talking about, mister? Yuri unnie's been one of our original crew since the Busan Station waiting-room days...

"She said she'd rather stay behind and help the ordinary folks who got stranded instead of living it up alongside you. But she's still been commenting on my SG Net posts all the time. Of course I'm happy to see her! Man, you won't find someone as genuine as Yuri unnie anywhere else...

"I mean, the Noh-Undertaker ship is great, but next in line is definitely the Go-Undertaker ship. Ha! Pink can be tricky to pair with other colors, but it goes perfect with black, don't you think?"

"...Hmm."

Choosing a lesser evil was better... Right?

Summer was coming.

Footnotes:

1 - In The Sources of Normativity, the author Christine Korsgaard identifies four schools of thought on what defines morality. The first school is what Hobbes believed, that those ordained with absolute authority like God or a tyrant dictate the boundaries of what is the common good. For those interested, the other three are (broadly) that there are objective truths and universal goods in the world, that the greater good of humanity determines what is good for the individual, or that morality is inherent and specific to each individual person (Kantian).

Chapter 315

The Skeptic VIII

Sinnoa

“Your Excellency the Undertaker.”

“Mm.”

“The intake process is complete.”

It was raining.

Early June.

We had finally completed the massive undertaking of taking in refugees from the Korean Peninsula, most of the Japanese Archipelago, and parts of mainland China into the Inunaki Tunnel.

Total evacuees: 5.5 million.

“Let’s hold a celebration tonight to give the administrative team a break after all their hard work.”

“Okay. Around midnight, I’ll mix sleeping aids into the food and drinks so that the administrative team can get some rest as well.”

“Great. Make sure to coordinate everything thoroughly with the fairies. Hang in there just until tonight.”

“As you command.”

Ji-won saluted and left while I stood at the entrance of the tunnel, looking up at the sky.

It had begun raining back in April and still hadn’t stopped—more than fifty straight days of heavy rainfall. Low-lying coastal areas had sunk long ago. Even neighborhoods on hills, if they lacked a decent drainage system, were now underwater.

Everywhere I looked—rain, rain, and more rain. Fog clung stubbornly over huge pools of stagnant water, and muddy cascades crept over the land without rest.

Gone was any sign of that once proud cityscape that Busan citizens had boasted was “the world’s best place at present.”

‘And to think this isn’t even the real monsoon, just a precursor…’

I couldn’t begin to imagine what kind of catastrophe might be unfolding in faraway cities like Venice.

For all we knew, the 5.5 million people in the tunnel might be the last surviving humans on Earth.

“Nyaaa. Don’t make such a gloomy face, meow.”

Before I noticed, a cat-eared magical girl had padded over and tapped my waist.

“Manyo Neko.”

“Show a little more confidence, nya. Thanks to you, Undateikeo, we still managed to save quite a lot of people, didn’t we?” A laugh tinkered out of her in a gentle purr. “If you put more weight on the lives you couldn’t save than on those you did, even the strongest Awakeners can break down after just a few days, nya!”

It was a saying often spoken in these apocalyptic times, but hearing it come from Manyo Neko somehow carried special weight. She was, after all, the one in the 145th cycle who managed to clear the Inunaki Tunnel without being tempted by the ghost of her childhood friend, pushing forward to the end.

“Thanks. That’s a helpful reminder.” I reached out and gently stroked her head and the back of her neck.

“Nyaanyaang…”

Manyo Neko purred with pleasure.

Because she was a Miko possessed by the Cat God, she especially liked this kind of affectionate touch. Of course, she still had a perfectly human sense of reason, so she never allowed anyone but a close friend to pet her so intimately.

Or was it the other way around? Because she was still a rational human, she enjoyed such touches, but only granted them to those whom she was close with, precisely because she was possessed by the Cat God?

Despite living through hundreds of cycles, the mysteries of human-cat behavior only deepen.

Manyo Neko gave a little shiver. “Seriously, Undateikeo! You’re like the most terrifying butler on Earth, nya! No matter how ill-tempered a cat might be, it’s impossible to resist your hands, meow...”

“At this rate, Obsidian Qin might catch me in the act. You magical girls in administration won’t see them for a while after tonight, will you? At least give them a proper goodbye.”

“Nyaang! Good night to you too, Undateikeo!”

Manyo Neko hopped away, splashing the rainwater under her boots with each step.

That night, we had a drinking party into the late hours in a café within the Inunaki Tunnel. When midnight struck, all Awakeners except the combat team would enter a long-term sleep like ordinary civilians.

“Long live the Magical Girl Association!”

“Cheers!”

“Beijing Liberation Assault Force, bottoms up!”

“Bottoms up!”

For now, everyone gathered around in lively camaraderie.

Awakeners of various nationalities mingled freely, some of them not even sharing a common language except what the alcohol made up for, clinking their glasses nonetheless. It went beyond Koreans to Japanese and Chinese, and even further still to Mongolians, Russians, Filipinos, Vietnamese, Indians, Nepalese, and more—all of them people who knew me personally and had faithfully heeded my warning that “if you don’t evacuate now, you’ll all be wiped out.”

Ours wasn’t an ordinary bond. Many of them had been part of the 23rd cycle’s final charge against Meteor Shower, then believed to be humanity’s final boss. They had cast aside the divisions of nationality and race in favor of forging a ladder for humanity’s survival.

In that sense, at nearly every brink of apocalypse, we would see many of the same faces. We weren’t joined by where we were born but rather by the place where we’d face death.

Across from me, I faced Do-hwa as she swirled a wine glass.

“I suppose it’s all thanks to you, the guy who handles multiple languages like a native speaker, that you became our focal point… I’ve long wondered why you insisted on calling the National Road Management Corps headquarters the Tower of Babel…”

“Mm.”

“The Tower of Babel is a symbol of human arrogance and failure, reduced to dust by the wrath of God. You’re always harping on how names are crucial, but then you went and attached that label to the Corps’s most important building…”

She rested her chin on her palm at an angle.

“Only now is my question answered. You wanted to invoke the ‘spell’ that in the Tower of Babel, all of humanity could communicate without a language barrier…” When I didn’t respond, she huffed. “All these people from different countries, cooperating without conflict… Others might call it the romantic notion of unity in the face of crisis, but I see it differently.”

How many runs of painstaking effort did it take to gather only those cooperative souls who'd band together this way?

Do-hwa didn't speak the quiet part aloud, but the look in her deep eyes echoed the truth never put to the spoken word.

I pulled a key from my jacket, making sure she saw.

"Huh? What's that...?"

"It controls the doors into the Inunaki Tunnel," I explained. "I molded some bird feathers with wax and let them harden into shape."

"Oh, Daedalus...?"

"Yes. The Inunaki Tunnel's rapid growth has caused it to evolve into a Labyrinthos, a 'Grand Labyrinth.' Now, without this key, opening the great gate of the Inunaki Tunnel is nearly impossible."[1]

I took Do-hwa's hand in mine. She flinched, her brow twitching at our closeness. Still, I kept eye contact and slowly, respectfully, placed the Key of Daedalus in her palm.

"Tonight, once every administrator Awakener has gone to sleep, seal the tunnel entrance from the inside with the guards we assigned. Then, no matter what, even if the Saintess uses Telepathy to plead otherwise, don't open the door for anyone."

A literal lockdown.

Leviathan could very well be on the cusp of Outer God-class ascension. Waging war against such a monster with an untrained mob in tow would only lead to annihilation.

3,721. That was the number of Awakeners, carefully—more than carefully—handpicked to form our strike force. We had burned our bridges behind us. We never intended to retreat into the Inunaki Tunnel for rescue in the first place.

"The moment you crack that door open, Leviathan's rainwater will seep in. And that water is anything but ordinary."

“Yeah, yeah, I’ve heard it a million times. One drop on human skin, and you turn into... some kind of water bug or something? A lethal poison, basically.”

“Exactly. Noh Do-hwa, as humanity’s final gatekeeper, you must protect the tunnel’s entrance.”

She froze as her gloved fingers brushed lightly across my hand.

“Hmph...” she scoffed eventually, fingers still resting across the webbing of my index and middle fingers. “Well. I can wait ten years... If a decade passes with no word of success, I’ll have the fairies kill all 5.5 million inside who are asleep. After all, it might be interesting to become the cause of the world’s end myself...”

Indeed. That was an ending I had to prevent at all costs.

After midnight, the raucous drinking party began to settle. The administration-type Awakeners who had taken Uehara Shino’s special sleeping pills started collapsing one by one.

“All right, let’s clean up!”

“Aw man, we’re already risking our necks out there, now we gotta do the cleanup for these people too?”

“Cleanup’s gotta be done by whoever’s sober, you moron. If you hate it, then you should’ve drunk yourself silly.”

“Ugh, so unfair...”

“Unnie, sleep well. We’ll be back soon.”

“Heuk! Humans, please follow our guidance and transport the sleepers in an orderly manner!”

With cooperation between Awakeners and fairies, the party was tidied up in no time. Then those who would be heading into battle said their final farewells to their colleagues.

No one told them to, but all 3,721 of our combat troops began to gather in the casino lobby, one hundred meters underground in the Inunaki Tunnel. Those who'd had no interest in the party and went off to tinker with slot machines and who'd simply dozed off out of boredom also gathered in the lobby.

3,721 capacity. Zero absent.

I looked around at them.

"Anyone who wants to turn back, this is your last chance."

The instant I raised my hand, my voice resounded throughout the room to the Awakeners assembled from every corner of the world, in a medley of different languages:

– Anyone who wants to turn back, this is your last chance.

They flinched.

"Huh?"

"What?"

Some Magical Girls shot me looks, confused why I would be speaking in Japanese. Meanwhile, the Beijing Liberation Assault Force members were baffled at the Chinese echo of my words.

I ignored their puzzlement and kept speaking, moving my lips and fingers in tandem.

"Over the past two months, as you evacuated humanity into this shelter, you saw the ugliest sides of human nature."

– Over the past two months, as you evacuated humanity into this shelter, you saw the ugliest sides of human nature.

"And now, we set out from this safe haven to fight an unprecedented Anomaly for the sake of those same humans."

– And now, we set out from this safe haven to fight an unprecedented Anomaly for the sake of those same humans.

A curious phenomenon was unfolding. I was definitely speaking Korean aloud, but a murky black Aura spread through the entire lobby like cobwebs, instantly translating the words for all 3,721 present.

[Ah.]

The first person to understand was Phantom Blade from the Magical Girl Association.

[This is... a form of telepathic magic.]

“Huh? What does that mean, nya?”

[Undateikeo-san is using the sound waves of his spoken words, vibrating them in real time with Aura, and delivering them to each of us individually.]

Phantom Blade had always used telepathic magic to communicate, given an extreme language impairment, so she recognized the technique faster than anyone else.

[Feel the flow of Aura. Can you sense how the pulses differ ever so slightly depending on each listener’s nationality?]

“Uh...” Manyo Neko twitched her ears. “I-I think so, kind of... Wait, are you saying Undateikeo is, all on his own, using Aura vibrations to... to translate everything for each of the four thousand people here, nya?”

[Precisely so,] Phantom Blade marveled. [What’s more, he’s controlling the wave so it doesn’t bleed over to adjacent listeners. That means right now all our hearing is effectively under Undateikeo-san’s control.]

“Is that even possible, nya?”

[You tell me. The flawless Tokyo dialect you’re hearing right now is proof enough, isn’t it?]

For the record, Phantom Blade was from Kyoto.

In any case, she wasn't the only observer of this particular phenomenon. A few seconds later, the other Awakeners also began to realize the extent of this display and were astounded.

"What on earth...?"

"You can do that with Aura?"

"I knew he was impressive, but..."

Once again, these weren't random onlookers but meticulously selected fighters. They knew just how absurd a feat this kind of Automatic Translation via Aura really was. They noticed no matter how much they murmured or muttered, my voice remained "unchanged" and "clear," cutting through everyone's clamor.

How? There was only one answer: I was accounting for their chatter in real time and adjusting the sound waves to remain perfectly audible.

"There is no obligation whatsoever to save humanity."

– There is no obligation whatsoever to save humanity.

Awe comes before heed. When someone truly listens to another's words, often it's not just because they empathize with the content, but because that person is exceptionally capable.

It might sound cynical, but at that moment, that power was precisely what the Awakeners before me needed most.

The existence of an absolute powerhouse on their side.

The confidence that our fight wouldn't end in a pointless slaughter.

"We each of us have witnessed humans slaughtering each other too many times for us to appeal to 'the bonds of humankind.'"

– We each of us have witnessed humans slaughtering each other too many times for us to appeal to 'the bonds of humankind.'

Before I knew it, without any formal warning or caution, the entire crowd fell silent.

Gazing back at these Awakeners from all nations, I went on.

“There are a million reasons why humanity might deserve destruction... and so we alone are left.”

Dang Seo-rin watched me with a steady faith in her eyes.

Cheon Yo-hwa gazed at me as though in worship.

Sim Ah-ryeon gave a bright, naive smile as if my feat were natural.

Lee Ha-yul and the Saintess remained poker-faced.

Oh Dok-seo was typing furiously into her phone.

Go Yuri—

Go Yuri still wore that inscrutable smile, quietly staring at my face.

“We don’t care about the contempt other humans may hold. The curses of Anomalies don’t matter to us. If humanity’s survival rests in our hands, our blood, then we will fight Anomalies without hesitation—because I, because we, are the owners of this world!”

“That’s right!”

A voice boomed out.

It belonged to the leader of the 17th Company of the Beijing Liberation Assault Force, the stationmaster of Ciqu Station, an Awakener known as Kwon Ryong. When he unleashed his Lion’s Roar, it echoed not just in Chinese but in every language.

That was the spark.

“We’re in charge here!”

“Mr. Undertaker’s right! Smash every last one of those monstrous bastards!”

“Wu! Wu! Wu! Wu!”

“Kill them! Kill them all!”

Even as their shouts of passion mingled in a chaotic roar, my own voice remained crystal-clear, and their collective cheers fused into a single universal language.

“We are humanity’s last resistance, we are humanity’s final united force! Come, comrades! Shed your blood, brothers! With our blood, we shall restore the world to these five million souls!”

“Uwoooohhh!”

The massive gate of the Inunaki Tunnel swung open, and the downpour that had been pounding the door now flooded in with thunderous noise to reveal a horizon blurred by rain.

From beyond it, the Sea Dragon, aware of our presence, let out a roar that shook the skies.

– Ꮆ̓,ᎏ̓,ᎏ̓,ᎏ̓,ᎇ̓,ᎏ̓,ᎏ̓,ᎇ̓,.

But even that sound couldn’t drown out our war cry.

I stepped forward. Behind me followed the footsteps of 3,721.

The Human Allied Forces were now departing for battle.

Footnotes:

1 - Daedalus is the craftsman who created the Labyrinth (in Greek, Labúrinthos) on the island of Crete. According to myth, he crafted it so cunningly that he struggled to escape it with his son, Icarus, and ultimately devised a plan to make wings of beeswax and bird feathers to fly out of the maze.

Chapter 316

The Skeptic IX

Sinnoa

Squelch.

Squelch.

When our Human Allied Forces at last marched out of the Inunaki Tunnel, the first thing to greet us was the smell of soggy earth that clung like muddy chocolate, along with an endless deluge of rain and fog.

[Visibility is terrible,] the Saintess reported quietly. [I'm using Aura to sharpen my eyesight, and even then, it's hard to see more than 50 meters ahead.]

The plaza in front of the casino, which had always been crowded with homeless drifters and beggars pleading for loose change, now lay eerily empty.

The rain beat down without end, cold to the touch, as the surrounding fog clung to us, creeping over our fingers, our thighs, and the backs of our necks in a clammy embrace.

Already, the Super Monsoon Anomaly was letting us sense through the temperature and the feel of it all that its master had arrived.

– Kyeeeeh!

All of a sudden, beyond the wall of dark fog, something like a hunting hound came rushing at us—if you could call a figure with two heads and tentacles writhing from its forepaws a "hound," that is.

The creature leaped from just a few meters away, heading straight for Manyo Neko. The instant she let out a "Funya!" in fright, a jet-black Aura slashed across the hound's neck.

– Kkiaaaak! Kkieeek! Kiiiii!

Then, the hound splattered. Its body and severed head thrashed a final death spasm, but before the surrounding Awakeners could react, it vanished into splashes of mud without leaving even a corpse behind.

"Th-thanks, nya, Undateikeo."

I locked eyes with Manyo Neko in acknowledgement, then said, "Everyone, stay on guard. Visibility is extremely poor. Even a village-class Anomaly can inflict serious wounds if we let it ambush us."

Manyo Neko and several of the Awakeners nodded in agreement.

Right on cue, the gate behind us closed with a great creak and a thud. As previously discussed, Do-hwa sealed off the entrance to the tunnel.

Ahead of us stretched limitless territory and lurking death. Behind us lay survival, but the path was barred. A true predicament.

All 3,721 of our allies had literally put themselves in a do-or-die position.

A chill of murderous tension swept through our ranks. Before the hearts I had stirred with my speech could cool in the face of this menacing reality, I issued an order.

"Ha-yul."

[Yes, Oppa.]

"Activate all your totem dolls."

[Got it.]

Ha-yul's stockings soaked through as she knelt in the mire, paying no mind to how the mud buried her prosthetic leg.

[Strings that bind a human's shoulders...]

[But to a spider's legs, it's just a circus wire...]

As soon as the Puppeteer murmured that incantation to herself, a wave of golden Aura spread outward from her small body. It branched like a spiderweb, splitting again and again until the entire city was veiled in shimmering light.

"Whoa..."

"Incredible skill for someone so young."

"They say she's Mr. Undertaker's adopted daughter. Makes sense."

Impressed whispers spread among those who had never before witnessed the Puppeteer's abilities, particularly the Awakeners from overseas.

Ha-yul paid no attention to those looks, focusing solely on controlling her Aura.

"Keep it going, Ha-yul."

[Okay. No problem.]

As mentioned before, Ha-yul's puppet strings functioned almost like a superconductive medium for Aura, an asset she had put to use all across Korea. Needless to say, her web was even more extensive in Busan. Even under the crushing pressure of rain and fog from above, that golden spiderweb gleamed like a river of stars, enough to spark a fragile hope for survival.

[Oppa, I've finished connecting.]

Creak, clank.

All around Busan, "dolls" opened their eyes. They had been hidden at key points among that golden constellation that blanketed the city, numbering no fewer than 999 dolls in total, each one a perfect look-alike of Ha-yul.

A legion of dolls, obeying the single command of Lee Ha-yul, had awoken.

“Well done,” I said warmly. “No need to micromanage their line of sight—just keep them linked to your consciousness.”

[Got it.]

Across the city that had been swallowed in thick fog, giving Anomalies an absolute advantage, the Puppeteer had planted hundreds of “wards.” Of course, Ha-yul couldn’t personally watch all 999 points, but that hardly mattered.

“Saintess.”

[Yes. I’m connected to Ha-yul’s feed now.]

We had our own dedicated “control tower” ready to interpret all those vantage points in her stead.

[Anomalies are gathering from the north side of Busan—places like Nopo-dong and Dugu-dong.]

[They’re also crossing the Nakdong River. We can probably consider the Sasang District completely fallen by now.]

[Same thing in the east. The area near Haedong Yonggung Temple is already gone. The downpour beyond is much heavier, closing in on us from every direction.]

[It appears to be a Monster Wave.]

[We suspect it’s a Monster Wave that’s been taken over and mutated by Leviathan.]

[Their target is here, the entrance to the tunnel.]

The map lit up. Almost immediately, howling calls ripped through the fog on all sides.

– Grooaaaar!

– Kkieeeeeeek! Kiek, kyeeeh!

– Uu-uu-uu-uu-uu…

They had sensed us.

Just as we gazed into the Void, the Void was gazing back.

Though Leviathan's true form had not yet appeared, the Anomalies enslaved by the sea dragon howled as they rushed in unison toward our position.

The first to breach the fog were colossal, octopus-like tentacles. They whipped out, stretching over ninety meters to grab three of our Awakeners at once.

"Aaaaaah!"

"Sever it! Intercept!"

"Stay calm!"

Ever vigilant, our Awakeners immediately fought back. Two of the captured fighters managed to break free, but the last was dragged off by the remaining tentacles.

"U-urgh…!"

Even as he was hauled off, the Indian Awakener slammed his sword into the ground—zzzzik!—tearing a twenty-meter-long line through the black mud as he slowed himself.

"Nice one!"

"Hold on, we'll save you!"

"O-ooh… oh…"

The tentacle was hacked apart by a barrage of attacks from his comrades. Just before he was pulled beyond the veil of fog, the Indian youth was freed.

But then—

“O-o-o—o-o-o...”

Around the man’s waist, where the tentacle had grabbed him, “water droplets” began to bubble out.

Wherever the bubbles churned, muscle fibers and blood vessels appeared beneath his skin until the foaming had gone so bad that his bones were laid bare.

The would-be rescuers froze in their tracks. The “water foam” had already spread up to the young man’s chest.

“A-Akash! Snap out of it!”

“O-o-o-o-o-o—”

In an instant, the bubbles swept up to his neck, head, arm, fingers, and right back down to the hand that gripped the sword. Then—

Pop!

The watery foam burst, and the muscles and bones that had made up the youth’s body vanished into thin air.

All that remained was rainwater. Even the severed tentacle sections had completely evaporated.

At the spot where man and monster had died, droplets wiggled in place before crawling off into the fog like centipedes.

“Ah...”

“Avoid physical contact with the Anomalies at all costs!” I commanded, all the while repelling the other Anomalies assaulting us. After crushing the pack of hundreds of hounds, I shouted so that every Awakener could hear, “This rain and fog is Leviathan’s Void! If moisture seeps into a wound, you’ll lose sight of yourself and become part of Leviathan’s forces!”

“Aaaargh!”

Skirmishes erupted all across the plaza as Awakeners clung to our makeshift barricades, warding off the enemy's ambushes.

'Good. So far, this isn't too bad.'

We'd lost one fighter in that sudden attack, but the Human Allied Forces followed protocol and responded to each threat accordingly. Seo-rin's Cursed Song Incantation was already at its fifth verse, all dedicated to defending our minds against brainwashing or mental pollution. If we kept up a battle of attrition like this, we could survive at least a week.

'Of course, if it drags on a full week, that's effectively a loss for us. But if we discover a clue to Leviathan's weakness in that time, we can still mount a counterattack.'

In the worst-case scenario, we still had the Saintess and Ah-ryeon. With the Saintess maximizing Time Stop or Ah-ryeon bringing the World Tree into bloom we might stand a fighting chance, even at a great sacrifice.

'Is this all?' I thought to myself as I adjusted my cane-sword, Do-hwa. 'Rain and fog covering every side. A poisonous "Void" that transforms you into some water-bug if you suffer even the slightest injury. A Monster Wave forcibly mobilized by Leviathan.'

It was definitely a tough enemy.

'No doubt it's dangerous... but it doesn't feel insurmountable.'

A day passed. Then two, then three.

We lost four Awakeners on the first day, but there were no further casualties after that.

'It seems we may not even need anyone to sacrifice themselves.'

The sticky humidity made breathing a chore, but we had more breathing room than I expected.

'If I can just hold out until I find some clue to defeating Leviathan, I'll reset this run afterward. Next time, I'll unite the Human Allied Forces well before June, then march straight to Leviathan's origin and wipe it out easily before—'

"Doc."

I blinked.

I had only closed my eyes for a second, but from one glance to the next, Go Yuri suddenly stood in front of me, pink hair and all.

That in itself was nothing strange for Go Yuri. If she wanted, it'd be easy for her to toy with my perception. Strangely, though, not a single drop of rain clung to her clothes or hair.

Go Yuri's external Aura mastery was, at least by all outward signs, pretty terrible. If she'd truly avoided a single raindrop for three days of non-stop battle, wouldn't she be risking letting everyone see she was "not normal?"

"What's up, Go Yuri?" I asked cooly. "I'm busy leading the troops. If you want to talk, come back once the enemy's assault eases up a bit."

"Oh! Sorry! Didn't realize you were so busy."

"Of course I am. I'm putting every ounce of care into ensuring that there are no more casualties. Not even one."

"Hmm?"

Go Yuri put a finger to her lips.

A soft smile curved over the neatly trimmed nail.

"Mmm. I see. But that sounds a bit strange."

"Strange how?"

"Yes, because—"

She exhaled, and the sweet scent of apples slipped into my nostrils.

"Doc, you finished your speech just now and haven't even moved one step away from the tunnel entrance, have you?"

"..."

The sound of rain.

The smell of mud.

Squelch.

Squelch.

When our Human Allied Forces at last marched out of the Inunaki Tunnel, the first thing to greet us was the smell of soggy earth that clung like muddy chocolate, along with an endless deluge of rain and fog.

[Visibility is terrible,] the Saintess reported quietly. [I'm using Aura to sharpen my eyesight, and even then, it's hard to see more than 50 meters ahead.]

The plaza in front of the casino, which had always been crowded with homeless drifters and beggars pleading for loose change, now lay eerily empty.

The rain beat down without end, cold to the touch, as the surrounding fog clung to us, creeping over our fingers, our thighs, and the backs of our necks in an oppressive embrace.

The Super Monsoon Anomaly spoke through temperature and touch, announcing the arrival of its master.

– Kyeeeeh!

At the exact moment a hunting hound emerged from the fog with fangs bared, my jet-black Aura was already slicing through the mongrel's throat.

Its head and body parted ways in a splattering gasp, but my Aura didn't stop there. It burned the hound down to the last hair.

“E-ehhh? F-funyaaang?” Manyo Neko let out a startled cry. The enemy had died before she had even registered the ambush. It was no wonder she was flustered. “Wh-what just happened, nya?”

I had come back. The moment I finished my speech in the lobby and stepped out of the tunnel—I had returned to that precise point.

Or rather, I might never have left it.

I swallowed hard. “Saintess.”

[Yes?]

“There’s a soldier from New Delhi, India, named Akash among our allies. Check whether he’s safe.”

[Oh, of course. Right away.]

“And also count how many people are in the Human Allied Forces. My memory says we had 3,721.”

[Understood.]

Creeeeak, thud.

Right then, the tunnel gate shut behind us. As planned, Do-hwa had sealed the entrance.

The moment it closed, the Saintess reported, [I’ve checked, Mr. Undertaker. First, there is no one here named Akash. It seems nobody else has noticed, but he’s nowhere to be found. Also, right now the total headcount of the Human Allied Forces is 3,717.]

It had decreased.

Our numbers had dropped.

By my memory, we’d had four casualties over the course of the three-day battle. I could still picture our struggle to survive clearly in my mind as if it were reality itself. Yet for whatever reason, I was back to the instant we’d set foot outside. It was as though all that memory had been a lie—

‘In other words, in the mere blink of an eye, four people have already died.’

Rain roared in my ears.

The sensation of rain soaking my shoes, the vibration of rain pounding my eardrums, the smell of rain in my nostrils—these were all undeniably real.

“...Ha-yul.”

[Yes, Oppa.]

“Activate all your totem dolls.”

[I’m already on it.]

Was it reality or illusion?

I couldn’t tell them apart, but I also couldn’t afford to dismiss this as a mere hallucination and abandon the fight.

‘If everything up until now was an illusion and only this moment is real, then Leviathan might deceive me into giving up the battle altogether. And that might be exactly what Leviathan wants.’

“Seo-rin,” I called.

“Huh? What’s up?”

“This time, be especially cautious with your Cursed Song Incantation. Leviathan has wide-area mental corruption abilities, we’ve confirmed that.”

“Oh... Sure, but wasn’t that in the strategy briefing? Don’t worry, I came plenty prepared.”

Three days passed again.

We were even more thorough in defending against mental contamination this time, wrapping ourselves in Aura so thoroughly that not even moisture could permeate our senses. It led to greater fatigue, but we limited the casualties to two. We'd been through the same fight once, after all, and it felt easier this time.

'Even if this too is an illusion, it's fine. Next time, I'll reduce casualties from two to zero, and keep going without losing a single person.'

"How curious."

I blinked.

Again, after just a moment's break in my vision, there Go Yuri stood. As before, not a single drop of rain clung to her feet up to her pink hair.

"Go Yuri..."

"Please don't look too frightened, Doc. Like I said before, I'm only here to help you."

"...So I'm imagining things? These last three days of battle were all fake?"

"Hmm, that's a tough question." She smiled as though sheepish as she explained, "I can't really tell the two apart. Rather, think about it from Mr. Dragon's point of view."

"You mean from Leviathan's perspective?"

"Yes. If you're difficult for the Dragon to handle, it's precisely because you remember everything in perfect detail."

Complete Memory.

Thanks to that ability, I was immune to most mental brainwashing. Whenever faced with illusions contradicting my recollections, I could instantly deduce, This was fake.

For a contrasting example, look at someone like Dok-seo, who had incomplete memory. She was instantly deceived by Go Yuri's presence, believing, Right! She's been with us since the Tutorial Dungeon!

“But as you know, Doc, advantages can become drawbacks.”

“What do you mean?” I asked warily.

“Illusions that vanish into hazy memory are meaningless against normal people. It’s impossible to trick your memories, so what if Leviathan repeats the same scene over and over, in continuous succession?”

“What?”

“A reversal in perspective, Doc.”

Go Yuri breathed out a laugh.

“For a normal person, if you feed them illusions of two or three days, it won’t remain crisp in their mind. But for you, giving you illusions of three entire days has the effect of actually making you live out those days.”

A chill crawled up my neck.

“A fleeting illusion might fade for anyone else, but for you, it’s indistinguishable from an actual 72 hours.”

“So you’re saying Leviathan is... bombarding me with these three-day illusions from the moment I step outside the tunnel?”

“Yep!”

Go Yuri pressed her palm to her cheek and sighed.

“How troublesome.”

“...”

“That thing you consider your most reliable armor is flipped around and chaining you in place.”

That’s right.

Complete Memory, the skill that let me gather up even dreams and illusions without losing a scrap.

Leviathan had forged that into its deadliest weapon against a regressor like me.

Chapter 317

The Skeptic X

Sinnoa

Thinking about it now, all of the Anomalies that relied on mental domination or brainwashing always made the same mistake when they tried to ensnare me: they all tried to show me a “sweet” illusion.

– How about this happy ending?

– I’ll show you the ideal partner you’d like best.

– Play with me. You can rule the world as you please.

The typical temptation.

However, no matter how tempting that “dessert” might be, it never suited my taste. Once I’d already swallowed the red pill that it was a bogus illusion, there was nothing they could do.

I mean, really. What thrill is there in owning a massive penthouse if it’s not real, but just a penthouse in a game?

As a realist, I, the Undertaker, could point out the flaws in their logic with cold precision.

“Hmm, so you’re offering a happy ending, but for that to make sense, you’d have to assume from the start that no Anomalies ever appeared, right? Also, no matter how ideal that partner might be, forcing me to like them is… Well, I prefer something more natural. And controlling the world? Would that really be fun?”

“Huh? Then just die.”

My mentality was an iron fortress, impregnable to the point that all those mind-control Anomalies, so fearsome against regular people, would inevitably shower me with praise.

All except for Go Yuri. That was simply a difference in compatibility.

Centuries upon centuries passed, and at last, Anomalies began adapting to this new meta. Some even discovered the “Undertaker Tactics” they needed to succeed.

“You won’t accept anything if it’s not reality?”

“Then we can just color in the parts of your past you don’t remember with illusions.”

“You were actually a private tutor for me... or for us, the twin sisters.”

By all accounts, the first to draw “first blood” was Cheon Yo-hwa.

She didn’t offer me much. She didn’t demand much, either.

Cheon Yo-hwa was alive, was a Miko, was a strategist, and was once my disciple who sacrificed herself to seal an Outer God in my stead.

That was it.

No sweet happy ending, no jaw-dropping powers. In return for sealing away the Outer God, Cheon Yo-hwa merely claimed a little drawer in the corner of my memory.

And now, here came Leviathan:

– So you won’t accept it unless it’s real? I get it. You’re a die-hard realist.

– Then I’ll show you a perfectly “real” illusion, indistinguishable from reality at 100% authenticity.

– Which of us will tire first? You, repeating that same three-day cycle over and over? Or me?

– I can do this all day.

– Oh, and by the way, if someone in the illusion dies mid-battle against the Anomalies, it counts as a real death. Good luck.

What kind of cheat is that?

I'd love to call in a referee to penalize him, but the truth was, I was cheating too. After all, Go Yuri, basically an end-boss of mental powers, had temporarily joined my side.

Both sides were cheating. It was a chaotic, all-out fight. No matter who won or lost, the outcome would be stupid. However, we had no choice but to pick a side.

"So, what will you do now, Doc?" Go Yuri asked.

I still couldn't figure out why she was revealing all this to me. Judging by her expression alone... it seemed like she was simply curious, barely able to contain her anticipation over what I would do.

"You have no way to know whether the moment you're in now is reality or illusion. If you don't figure out a method to tell them apart, you'll be trapped forever in an endless sequence of three days."

"For one..." I began, still thinking. "I could observe your appearance. If your clothes get wet from the rain, it's reality. If they stay perfectly dry, it's an illusion, right?"

"Oh! So you're basically letting me be the standard for what's real? I'm flattered."

I couldn't settle for that. Even though we'd formed a temporary alliance, entrusting something so crucial to her was out of the question. It'd be like inviting a tiger to ward off a fox.

I clicked my tongue. Then, making sure Go Yuri couldn't see, I hid both hands behind my back and scribbled a note on my palm.

"Saintess."

[Yes?]

“I’m heading to the Tower of Babel for a moment. The Anomaly assault has eased a bit, so we shouldn’t take heavy casualties if I step away.”

[Understood.]

The Saintess raised no objections to my sudden decision. As soon as I was ready to move, she followed up by saying, [By the way, that convalescent ward system that Go Yuri mentioned while speaking with you—I think it’s quite useful. Since you agreed, I’ll set up a hospital ward in the rear.]

We never had a conversation about that. Not from my perspective, anyway.

“Understood. Please take command of the Human Allied Forces while I’m away.”

[Yes.]

With that, I left Go Yuri behind and slogged through the mud.

The Tower of Babel wasn’t far. Normally, I could have reached it with my eyes closed, but in the midst of Leviathan’s “Great Void,” the terrain could have changed in unpredictable ways. Fortunately, many of Ha-yul’s puppet-strings still glowed gold, forming a path that had not yet lost its light. By its very nature, an Awakeners’ Aura fundamentally resisted the Void, so as long as I followed those strings, I could make it to the Tower of Babel with ease.

– Please help me, just a bite.

– Ribbit.

– One per person. Let’s not sell out our conscience for a piece of bread. Please maintain order.

– My child is starving. If you would help me, just for today, I’ll never forget your kindness.

In the fog blanketing the Tower of Babel plaza, watery shapes crawled about. Those water droplets burst without pause, and each pop produced “voices.”

– Please, just a bite of bread.

– My child is starving.

If one ignored that the figures were made of water, the same scene was the same old, same old for the Tower’s plaza.

Leviathan was copying my complete memory of this space and re-enacting it.

It wasn’t just the humans that got copied either. The paving stones of the plaza, the streetlights the Samcheon World guild had installed for charity, even the exterior walls of the Tower of Babel HQ—all were gradually replaced by water, as if the world had been made of water from the beginning.

– Thank you. God bless you. Ascended being, thank you. Because of you, my child can keep living.

– Ribbit, ribbit.

– Just one bite. Please.

If the first Great Flood of mythology merely drowned the surface of the earth, this second Great Flood, summoned by Leviathan, was submerging the very existence of everything.

‘An Anomaly has neither malice nor intelligence. If it seems to have them, it’s because the human gazing at it does. If an Anomaly knows love, it’s because humans themselves hold love in their hearts...’

I quickened my pace, stepping onto the half-translucent outer walls of the Tower of Babel HQ to climb up. Once on the rooftop, I found...

Nothing.

‘It’s gone.’

That was decisive proof.

‘The crystal tombstone of Cheon Yo-hwa. It’s nowhere to be seen.’

Just in case, I also visited the soccer stadium in Busan. There, all matter had been replaced by water, leaving the entire ruin bubbling with watery foam. The tombstone for the soccer player Kim Joo-chul had vanished from sight.

‘All right, no doubt now.’

This was not reality, but an illusion crafted by Leviathan.

To be fair, I still suspected that Go Yuri might be the true culprit. There wasn’t only one Anomaly capable of illusions, after all. She could frame Leviathan for everything, pretend to be my ally, and hoodwink me.

It was certainly well within her wheelhouse.

‘But whichever of them is behind this, they still couldn’t replicate my Time Seal.’

The means of distinguishing illusion from reality came, paradoxically, from something that no longer existed in the real world: an absence in the present.

Rain blurred my vision. For the first time since the Leviathan Offensive began, I smiled.

‘So my reality is founded on the things I’ve already lost…’

I descended from the rooftop and returned to the front line.

Go Yuri silently stared at me. The Saintess asked questions, but I offered no response.

‘I can do this. I just have to wait, until the clock of these three days runs out again.’

Squelch.

Squelch.

When our Human Allied Forces at last marched out of the Inunaki Tunnel, the first thing to greet us was the smell of soggy earth that clung like muddy chocolate, along with an endless deluge of rain and fog.

“Corps Commander!” I shouted, the moment I returned to this starting point.

The tunnel gate was still wide open. The entire Human Allied Forces was still behind me, inside the Inunaki Tunnel.

Past the great door, I could see Do-hwa’s damp, curly hair.

“Don’t close the door!”

“Huh…?”

“Everyone, retreat! This is a strategic fallback!” I turned around without even letting the outside air fully hit me and hurried back inside the tunnel.

“Uh, wh-what?”

“Undateikeo, what the heck is going on, nya?”

Confusion.

They’d just heard me screaming “Let’s go kill those Anomalies!” moments ago, and now I was ordering a retreat. One could only imagine how baffled they felt. The troops here must have been less confused than those at the historical Battle of Wihwado, when General Yi deserted the front lines.[1]

“Crap, wh-what…?”

Do-hwa’s expression was a sight. She was holding the feather key, staring at me like Commander Choi Young must have stared at his map, flipping it upside down in disbelief.[2]

“Don’t tell me you got explosive diarrhea or something. Then again, you can just flush it out with Aura, you freak...”

“Come on, call me a gentleman who values cleanliness, if you would please.”

“You think that kind of bull is what everyone wants to hear when over three thousand Awakeners from across the globe are watching your back...?”

I would have loved to enjoy a long-overdue, leisurely chat with Do-hwa, but there was no time.

Raising the collar of my coat to cover my mouth, I muttered, “Saintess.”

[Yes?]

“You must be taken aback, but please keep everyone calm and guide them back inside the tunnel. Leviathan’s mind-control is stronger than anticipated.”

[Understood.]

“Everyone must be confused. Could you also use your Constellation powers to soothe them a bit?”

[Okay.]

As expected of the Saintess—she followed my abrupt orders without a word of protest. Even so, her power as a Constellation had limited range outside Korea. The foreign Awakeners might not be so easily swayed.

The Great Priestess approached, leading a group of Magical Girls in tow. “Undateikeo, I can’t warp my mind around this. What’s going on?”

I looked around and said, “The moment we took one step outside, we experienced a palpable wave of Leviathan’s psychic corruption.”

“We accounted for that as a risk factor in the operation, no?”

“Yes, but the actual severity is beyond anything we predicted.”

We were speaking in Korean, but the conversation was being interpreted in real time for the other Awakeners. Even in their confusion, they all listened to me.

“With just a single step—literally one foot out the tunnel—our force has already suffered casualties.”

“What?”

“Listen up, everyone!” I barked, raising my voice. “I’m going to call out some names! Check if these Awakeners are safe! Akash from New Delhi, Kunpeng from Shenzhen, someone from Haiphong...”

I listed the six who had vanished to Leviathan’s illusions. All of them were part of some group or unit, so their missing presence was quickly noticed.

“Wait, what? Where’d he go?”

“He was right next to me a second ago...”

“Akash! Akash, where are you?”

Murmuring spread, evolving into a new kind of pandemonium. Suspicion of me was replaced by shock at the situation.

Before that sentiment could fester, I called out again.

“We lost six allies just by stepping outside. Their teammates didn’t even notice them vanish. If we charge blindly into that fog, the damage will skyrocket. Until we establish proper countermeasures, we’ll remain here in the tunnel lobby!”

I glanced over the assembly. No one doubted my words now. They were too shaken by the realization that in the mere blink of an eye, they had lost companions without noticing.

Leaving them there, I sought out the person who could be a clue to this entire situation.

“Team Leader Yu Ji-won.”

The silver-haired psychopath saluted. Around her, the other ops staff all snapped to attention.

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“Leviathan just unleashed a huge wave of psychic corruption. By my sense of time, it lasted close to ten days. How did it feel to you?”

“I didn’t detect anything at all, sir,” Ji-won answered promptly. “As far as I could see, you had one foot outside and one foot still inside the tunnel, and then you suddenly stopped. Then you returned.”

“And you had no hallucinations or illusions in that interval?”

“None, sir. At least from my perspective, there was nothing strange.”

I nodded.

‘So Leviathan focused its illusions on me. From my perspective, ten days had passed, but for everyone else, it was only the blink of an eye.’

Ji-won’s testimony was credible, as she was the one who hadn’t been fooled by Go Yuri. She was a genuine beacon of hope for humanity. We didn’t know the exact details, but she definitely has a trait like Brainwashing Immunity Lv. 99.

“Ji-won.” I lowered my head, whispering so no one else would overhear.

Her sleek lashes didn’t even flutter as she asked, “Yes, sir?”

“This Anomaly is stronger than I thought. Sorry, but this time, you’ll have to do it.”

“At your command. Whatever you ask, I shall obey.”

Our eyes met.

The expression of my deputy who had once fashioned a pocket of hell beneath this very tunnel was empty as ever.

I whispered, “Become Leviathan’s Miko.”

Footnotes:

1 - A reference to a 14th-century event in Korean history, where General Yi Seong-gye famously turned his troops back at Wihwado.

2 - Commander Choi Young was the general who ordered the invasion of Wihwado, and who was in turn baffled as a fellow General turned coat and retreated back to the capital to stage a coup.

Chapter 318

The Skeptic XI

Sinnoa

If I had to pick exactly one person in the world who was the farthest thing from faith or devotion, I'd confidently nominate Yu Ji-won.

"Your Excellency the Undertaker."

Clearly, she thought the same of herself.

"If Your Excellency orders me to charge into fire itself, I am of course prepared to obey without hesitation."

"Well, that's not surprising. If you wrap yourself in Aura, there's no risk of getting burned, so obviously you'd go."

"I was merely speaking figuratively to express my loyalty, Your Excellency. But all joking aside, do you really think I would make a suitable Miko?"

"Hmm."

Before going to her, I'd thought long and hard about it—if Leviathan really had grown to the threat level of an Outer God, who should I partner with to tackle it?

"The truth is, there aren't many candidates among us who could feasibly become Leviathan's Miko," I explained. "It's basically down to Do-hwa or you."

At that moment, the only quasi-government body functioning in Korea was the National Road Management Corps. And among the Regressor Alliance, only two belong to the Corps: Noh Do-hwa and Yu Ji-won.

I myself had had a huge hand in founding and operating the Corps, but it would be a stretch to label me “a member.” Think about it. I’d also been a key figure in the founding of the Eastern Holy State, but that hardly made me a member of it.

“But Do-hwa… To be frank, she’s less fit for Miko duty than you are, Ji-won. Can you even imagine her serving anyone else?”

“Honestly, not at all, sir.”

“I can hear every damn word, you bastards…” Do-hwa flicked a casino chip at us, which I casually dodged, then continued speaking.

“Whereas you, Ji-won, you’re practically made to be an offshoot of Leviathan.”

“Pardon?” Ji-won stared blankly, blinking twice to process. “You mean me?”

“Who else?”

Allow me to prove it.

Q: Do you, by any chance, regard all other living beings as insects?

“Your Excellency, I have never in my life treated someone’s life like that of a bug’s.”

“What do you think is the difference between a human life and a bug’s life?”

“All life is equal, Your Excellency. The idea that humans deserve special treatment is pure anthropocentric bias.”

“What about the difference between life and matter?”

“All life arises from matter and returns to matter. Every existence is equal. If you think living beings deserve special treatment, that’s an egocentric bias favoring life.”

“Then why you in particular? Why should you be special?”

“Because the world revolves around me, obviously. You could call it ‘Ji-won-centric.’ Although if I am Earth, then Your Excellency is the Sun, so the true center of the universe is—”

Out.

Q: What is the most valuable thing in this world?

“My loyalty to Your Excellency.”

Q: Clarification: second-most valuable thing.

“Power.”

“What’s so special about power?”

“Power is influence. If you die without power, you alone simply die. But if a person of power dies, it causes a massive commotion. In other words, it’s harder to kill a powerful person. Like how it’s harder to destroy a gigantic mass of matter—the higher the power, the harder it is to dismantle. Only power can compare to the eternal life of matter.”

Out.

Q: All humans have turned into animals. You can become whichever animal you want. Which do you choose?

“Hmm. Is a mythical creature allowed?”

“Sure. Anything you like.”

“Then I’ll be a dragon. One blast of Dragon Fear and all those other animals will lose it.”

Out.

“Yu Ji-won! You’re a perfect match to be Leviathan’s avatar!”

“I’m not sure why, sir...”

Three outs, and we switch sides.

Despite Ji-won remaining as expressionless as ever, she somehow looked a bit deflated. I could almost see the little “nyoro-n” sound effect floating above her head, but no one would get that reference anymore.[1]

“Still, Your Excellency, if that’s your decision, I trust it. However, becoming a Miko to an Outer God... I doubt it’s as simple as wanting to be one.”

“Of course.” If it were something like Infinite Metagame, which blatantly chose Oh Dok-seo and backed her, that might be different. Under most circumstances, though, merging a single human with a single Outer God required a great deal of effort. “But I have a little trick up my sleeve.”

“As expected of Your Excellency. May I ask what it is?”

“...”

“...”

“My, my.”

Three of us stood hand in hand.

Specifically, Yu Ji-won and I were side by side with Go Yuri.

The arrangement was simple: Ji-won was in the middle, holding my hand on her left and holding Go Yuri’s on her right.

“Um, Doc? You suddenly asked me to hold this lady’s hand, so I did, but what exactly are we doing here?”

“Don’t worry about it. We need your power to break through Leviathan’s contaminated Void, but I can’t afford direct contact with you. Hence, we’re using Ji-won as a filter.”

“My, my... Ah ho ho.”

A tiny laugh fell from Go Yuri’s lips, but even her usual smile that crinkled her eyes couldn’t hide the sense of unease drifting around her. Her gaze bounced between me and Ji-won as she spoke.

“This really is fascinating... Do you know everything, Doc? Because if you do, I might be really surprised.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“I’m weak to this person.”

I said nothing.

I hadn’t explained the mechanics of it in detail, but in a past cycle, I discovered that Ji-won wasn’t affected by Go Yuri’s mental manipulation. Evidently, Go Yuri already knew about that weakness.

Ji-won tilted her head. “Huh. Excuse me. I’m not good at recognizing faces. Are we acquainted?”

“...Ah ho ho.”

“I believe I spoke in a universally understandable language. Are you not Korean? If you’d like, I can speak your native tongue.”

“...”

“Your Excellency, it seems this lady shares the same trait as Lee Ha-yul or Phantom Blade.”

Ji-won’s facial muscles remained flat and composed, no different than usual. Meanwhile, I was stunned to hear these two “people” (though neither truly qualified as an ordinary human) having an actual conversation.

‘Go Yuri... She’s gone all timid?’

Based on her interactions on SG Net alone, it was clear to me that Go Yuri could talk circles around anyone. Her entire shtick was to feed the other person exactly what they wanted to hear, after all. Even extending that to group conversations, she usually gave every participant the “ideal” line or ran an even more advanced form of brainwashing.

‘But Yu Ji-won is conversing with Go Yuri face to face, and I can hear them both perfectly!’

When I observed Yu Ji-won vs. Go Yuri during that previous cycle, I kept my distance. This was my first time seeing their exchange up close.

A wave of confidence washed over me.

“Allow me to introduce you, Go Yuri. This is Yu Ji-won. She’s my esteemed adjutant. It’d be great if you two got along. Or maybe all three of us can arrange a routine tea party—”

“Doc, do you like slimes?”

“Huh? Not especially, no.”

“Would you like me to make you a fan?”

“…”

The Undertaker was now timid.

And so, hand in hand, we stepped out of the Inunaki Tunnel, leaving the rest of the Human Allied Forces with some excuse about going “on a scouting mission.”

– Kieeeek.

– Groooaaa…

Splat.

All three of us planted our feet simultaneously.

Then, something incredible happened. Even Ji-won, who rarely displayed any hint of surprise, blinked.

“Your Excellency, the fog…”

“Yeah,” I said. “It’s moving on its own.”

The wall of thick fog that veiled everything beyond ten meters in any direction began shifting like a living thing. The raindrops followed soon after, pausing in midair and then wriggling sideways...

All skittering away from where Go Yuri set foot.

"..."

"..."

"Wow! The open air does feel refreshingly cool. So where to, Doc?"

"...I'll lead the way. Keep pace with me."

"Okay!"

Splorch.

Yu Ji-won and I trod upon the mud while Go Yuri's heels somehow landed on ground that was dry and solid, as if freshly baked. Occasionally, a water-bug rained down from above and landed on her wide-brimmed hat.

...! ...!

Then the droplet would contort in silent agony, as though under torture—stretching out horizontally, vertically, in all directions, and then contracting over and over at high speed—until it burst barely a second later.

"I've always wanted to take a walk with you like this, Doc."

"...Always? Sorry, but we only met a few months ago at best."

"That's just a difference in perspective."

Splorch.

"Doc, do you love Ha-yul?"

"I do."

“Have you always?”

“Yes. Always.”

“Even in the distant past?”

“…”

Splorch.

“You surely didn’t love her the instant you laid eyes on her. She’s not your birth daughter. It must have taken time and observation for that love to grow.”

“…What’s your point?”

“‘I love Ha-yul.’ Even that simple statement needs context, right? Like ‘but only after enough time had passed since we met.’”

Splorch.

“I’m the same way, Doc.”

“…”

“I’ve always wanted to walk with you like this.”

Go Yuri glanced sidelong at me, a faint smile playing about her lips.

Tens of thousands of liquid creatures crawled around her, writhing. It was as if she were enveloped in an inverted, transparent umbrella.

“It’s just a different viewpoint. Same as you.”

At long last, we reached the Tower of Babel. Already, half of it had been replaced by water, yet all three of us managed to climb with no problem—thanks to how the watery steps reverted to stone steps under Go Yuri’s feet.

And so we reached the rooftop. A place with nothing except a door that only I could open: the door to the Time Seal.

"...We're fine now that we've made it here. Thanks for bringing us."

"You're most welcome."

Go Yuri smiled.

"In the end, you plan to solve everything on your own, without really relying on me."

"...If you hadn't accompanied us, Ji-won and I could never have gotten here so smoothly. I did accept some help."

"Yes, but only that much. You've decided that 'borrowing this much power won't come at too steep a price,' right?"

Beyond the seal of this crystal tomb lay an area safe from Leviathan's mental corruption. There was no reason to risk more conversation with Go Yuri. Yet somehow, I felt an urge not to end things here with her. An intuition that I shouldn't just part ways now.

Maybe that's precisely Go Yuri's brainwashing...

It might be.

"...I'm sorry."

Go Yuri blinked.

"Huh?"

"..."

"What are you apologizing for, Doc?"

I was as baffled as she was.

Those words slipped out of my mouth without my own volition. Some unconscious part of me had moved my lips.

Up here on the rooftop, rain and water-bug squirming noises merged into a haze of background noise.

I thought:

‘I’m sorry… to Go Yuri? Why? About what? Where does that come from?’

But the question was short-lived. Even before my rational mind pieced things together, my heart, from ages past, was already hiding the answer.

“I always thought… that I was smart to avoid you. Because the best way to handle a danger you can’t defeat is not to confront it. But in hindsight, you were only doing what the other person wanted.”

Go Yuri could have come to me at any time, as evidenced by the current cycle. She pierced through every precise boundary I’d set and forced a meeting. Yet for hundreds of runs in the past, she never came to visit me.

Why?

It was simple.

“Because I avoided you. Because I didn’t want to meet you, you simply stayed away to match my desire.”

“…”

“I’m sorry.”

I still didn’t know exactly what Go Yuri was or how she worked, but if her absence over those centuries was merely my doing, my fierce wish not to see her, then somehow, now, this moment, I had to apologize.

“…”

Go Yuri was quiet for a while. Expressions of surprise, acceptance, contemplation, and a tiny smile each crossed her face in turn.

“All right. I’ll take that apology as payment for what I did to help you today.”

Clap.

Go Yuri brought her hands together, and in that instant, the loud crashing of the rain abruptly cut out, as if someone hit pause.

I realized she was doing that for me—like a gentle push on my back, telling me to leave now.

"...Thanks."

Go Yuri didn't respond. Instead, she let go of Ji-won's hand and backed away from me as well. Then I stepped through the Time Seal door with Ji-won.

When I glanced back one last time, Go Yuri was standing politely, seeing us off.

Atop the Tower of Babel, locked within the Time Seal, was none other than Cheon Yo-hwa—the one who was once both the Infinite Void and the Mastermind, calling herself my pupil and strategist.

In that sealed space, she saw only the happiest day of her life on an endless loop.

"Hmm, hum-hum... Hmm... Huh?"

To Cheon Yo-hwa, it was a classroom. Long ago, she'd confessed her love for me in that illusionary space. There in that classroom, she sat perched on a desk, humming a tune.

Crimson eyes flicked up to see my face... and Yu Ji-won holding my hand.

"Heh."

Someone destroyed, yet never truly gone—an Outer God or perhaps the Miko of an Outer God—she—tilted her head.

"Yeah. Welcome back, sunbae."

The orange-haired girl beamed.

“I always believed this day would come.”

Footnotes:

1 - A reference to Nyoro-n Churuya-san, a 4-koma series that usually features a girl named Churuya getting treated unfairly and then her disappointment with a little “nyoro-n” sound effect in the last panel.

Chapter 319

The Skeptic XII

Sinnoa

I didn't bother hiding information about Cheon Yo-hwa from my companions. In fact, I was quite proactive about sharing it. Arguing something like "That route is permanently closed, so we'll never be able to meet her anyway" would be pointless. By that logic, I wouldn't have needed to explain Old Man Scho either.

"Ho hum..."

As the one with an especially keen interest in receiving any and all intel for my autobiography project, Dok-seo listened to the whole story about Cheon Yo-hwa and tossed out one blunt comment:

"Isn't she basically a defeated heroine?"

No one had asked, but as soon as Dok-seo decided something fell into her "area of expertise," she would babble on like any good otaku.

"Look, mister. She had a bit of a childhood-friend vibe going on because she knew you even before the main story began. If we're going off of chronological order, she's the heroine who developed feelings for you earlier than anyone else. But guess what? She got Time Seal placed on her. You get what I'm saying? She's stuck, and there's no way for her love to come true in the real world. She's a defeated heroine, no doubt about it."

Dok-seo possessed a "magic eye" that transformed anything she saw into a subculture phenomenon. Considering she even tried to pair Do-hwa and me, you could guess how powerful that magic eye was.

True, from an outsider's perspective, Cheon Yo-hwa did indeed lose. Her time had ceased its flow. In reality, though, she hadn't given up on all time. She had only abandoned the "future," removing herself from the timeline where we could have walked together, and in exchange, what she took hold of was the “past.”

To conquer me, a regressor, she realized that instead of seizing a future that stretched out infinitely, she should aim for a white canvas of a past that was still blank. Cheon Yo-hwa had grasped that truth more clearly than anyone else.

“I’ve been waiting for you, sunbae.”

A girl in a black sailor uniform sat on a classroom desk and gave me a bright smile.

“Of course, going by my own sense of time, it’s only been ten minutes since we said our eternal farewells and… well… kissed. But it’s good to see you again.”

Ji-won snapped her head around to stare at me. Beyond her deadpan expression, I could see her mind demanding, Did that person just say what I think she said?

I grimaced. “We didn’t kiss. I don’t know where you got that bad habit, but you sure twist history as easily as breathing.”

“Oh, did I?” Cheon Yo-hwa covered her mouth and giggled. “Don’t worry. Before long, our past will ‘change’ so that’s exactly what happened.”

I didn’t grace that with a response.

“If you came here alone, I’d guess you just wanted a little heart-to-heart. But now you’ve brought a companion, hmm? Maybe in other cycles it didn’t happen, but this is the first time in this one, right?”

I nodded as Ji-won took half a step forward, still holding my right hand. “Is this our first time meeting?” she asked.

“Hmm. Who knows?”

“Then I should at least give you a proper hello. I’m Yu Ji-won.”

“Sure. I’m Cheon Yo-hwa. Nice to meet you, sunbae’s adjutant.

From my viewpoint, it's not actually the first time, but let's just say it is."

Ji-won took a moment to process that. "I see. So this is what it's like to meet someone isolated from the normal flow of time. It's rather novel."

With those brief introductions done, I wasted no time getting to the point. Letting this girl in front of me dictate the flow of conversation would be a bad idea.

"I'll lay out the situation," I began.

"Please do."

Cheon Yo-hwa listened lazily, sometimes nodding, sometimes adding a little interjection as I talked.

"Leviathan has grown to the level of an Outer God," I concluded. "Its mental corruption is so overwhelming that we can't fight it by normal means. Our plan is to turn Ji-won into Leviathan's Miko... And we've formed a temporary alliance with Go Yuri as well."

"Heh. With Pinky, huh?"

"I have something to ask about that. I can't figure out why Go Yuri is so wary of Leviathan."

"Huh... Maybe you're overthinking it, sunbae?" Cheon Yo-hwa swung her legs as she asked, "As you know, Anomalies fight for authority and dominion, right? Pinky's and Leviathan's powers revolve around distorting human perception, so they're basically the same 'genre.' They're competing."

"So they're just rivals?"

"Yup. Maybe there's some deeper grudge involved, but from the surface alone, it's clear they're enemies."

"So if Leviathan is defeated..."

"Pinky's dominion gets bigger. A lot bigger."

I clamped my mouth shut.

Killing with a borrowed sword. Go Yuri was simply using me as a blade to stab Leviathan. If I grew weaker because of the fight, she could enthrall me. And if Leviathan fell, she'd have free rein over the mental-manipulation sphere.

"In other words, for the time being, I can shelve Pinky's motives and backstory."

"And focus on beating Leviathan without getting caught up in Pinky's schemes," I finished. "That's it."

"Right. You catch on quick, sunbae."

So turning Yu Ji-won into Leviathan's Miko truly was the only real solution.

"Ji-won exhibits an almost invincible defense against mental manipulation. If she shoulders Leviathan, she'll be able to manage it without succumbing to an Outer God's influence."

"Oh? You're putting a lot of trust in that unnie, huh?" A sly smile tugged at Cheon Yo-hwa's lips. "You know what it means to become an Outer God's Miko, right? It's like gaining near-complete control of Leviathan's authority. Unless you seal it away with something like Time Seal, it's basically a giant time bomb right next to you. You think you can handle it?"

"I'm fine with it."

In some ways, Ji-won was more dependable than Dok-seo.

I added on to Ji-won's affirmation by saying, "She knows how strong I am. She's also aware that Go Yuri is an opponent, and she just learned about you, who could be a wild card... Plus, compared to you or Go Yuri, I've already shared more goodwill with her on multiple occasions. We can talk it out. There's no reason for her to betray me."

If I ever grew weak, Ji-won would chew me up without hesitation, but I would never let that happen. As long as I remained strong, there was no reason for Yu Ji-won to turn on me.

“Exactly, Your Excellency. How could I possibly team up with such a shady individual and dream of usurping your position? If only Cao Mengde had followed my example, he would have gone down in the record books as a loyal subject of the Han, a timeless exemplar.”[1]

Cheon Yo-hwa waited for a moment to see if I would reply, and when I didn’t, she said, “Huh... So you really trust that unnie so much?”

I turned my gaze aside.

What else could I do? If I didn’t have warriors like Guan Yu and Zhang Fei, I had to form a decent battle line with whomever I had.[2] People had to make do with what was given to them.

“So far, it looks like Leviathan hasn’t chosen a Miko,” I said while jotting down notes in a little notebook. “But Outer Gods don’t just make a Miko for no reason. If they want to intervene in the real world, they have to designate a single agent on Earth.”

“But Your Excellency, Leviathan’s been meddling in the world just fine on its own so far.”

“That’s true. Which leads us to this possibility.”

I scrawled a line of text in black ink: Maybe Leviathan has chosen a Miko, but that fact has been hidden all along?

I looked at Cheon Yo-hwa, seated next to me.

“We don’t know who this Miko could be. There’s even a chance they themselves don’t realize it.”

“Hmm. Like with Dok-seo?”

“Yeah. And judging by the circumstances so far, the Miko was probably chosen from those close to me.”

Leviathan had specifically singled me out in this cycle, so it followed that it would have picked someone who had substantial influence on me.

“And so, I’m going to rewrite things so that the Miko is—and always has been—Yu Ji-won.”

The would-be Miko in question tilted her head. “I’m sorry, Your Excellency, I don’t follow. Do you mean I won’t ‘become’ a Miko from this point on, but that I was one from the very beginning?”

“Exactly.”

“That… seems strange,” she admitted, her brow furrowed. “I am not Leviathan’s minion, Your Excellency. I’ve never corrupted anyone’s mind or brainwashed them for my own benefit.”

“No, you have done that.”

A blink. “I beg your pardon?”

“You’re actually Leviathan’s Miko. You’ve been hiding it from me all along. You’ve even contaminated people’s minds before. You just concealed that from me or twisted part of the truth.”

No response.

“We’ll make it so from here on out.” I glanced the other way. “Hey, Yo-hwa.”

“Yup, sunbae.”

“You’ve got the power to color my past in any way you please, right?”

“Well, it’s more like a data-mining Infinite Void and certain Mastermind simulations, but yeah. I can.”

“In that case, it should be possible to set things up so that Ji-won and I actually met before the apocalypse—back when I wasn’t yet a regressor.”

Cheon Yo-hwa's smile broadened, and for a second, I could have sworn that the four seasons drifting outside the classroom windows trembled.

"Of course it's possible," she chirped, "as long as sunbae wants that from me. And if unnie here agrees to it."

"What do you think, Ji-won?" I turned back and locked eyes with her. "If you consent, we'll define the past between us. We didn't first meet in that convenience store after the world fell, we actually knew each other before that."

"Hmm."

"We may go pretty far back, but starting from then, we'll build up a timeline in which you were actually Leviathan's Miko the entire time."

She propped her chin on one hand. About a minute later, she parted her lips and said, "I have no reason to refuse. This is a once-in-a-lifetime chance to cement my bond with Your Excellency, and also to secure my position as an Outer God's Miko."

"I'll ask again. You're fine with having your past changed?"

"I have no special attachment to my past, anyway. All I really remember is killing people," she revealed without a hitch in breath or pitch. After a moment, when I didn't respond, she added, "Oh, it'd be a bit of a pity if you go too far back to when I was younger than a high-schooler. I did have to put some effort into learning Latin and Ancient Greek back then."

We had her agreement.

Cheon Yo-hwa and I exchanged glances. She nodded.

"Great! Well, it's been a while, or in my own sense of time, barely an hour since last time, but either way, I'll tweak sunbae's precious past once again, so this time it's got you and that unnie woven into it as well."

Then, she let out a deliberately exaggerated laugh, one that belonged to an old man rather than a young schoolgirl.

“Sure you’re okay with this?” she repeated. “The price for borrowing my power is pretty big, y’know, sunbae? You ready?”

“Just tell me what the price is.”

“Ah, I’m not going to demand it verbally.”

I blinked. “Then how—”

Cheon Yo-hwa was cupping my chin, then without hesitation, she pressed her lips to mine.

Crimson eyes.

Soft warmth brushed over my lips, a breath and then some. As I tried to say something, she pulled my chin even closer.

A beat later, an orange scent grazed my teeth.

Time seemed to drag on. The classroom windows, each tinted by a different season, showed trees swaying in four distinct breezes.

Finally, our lips parted.

“You...”

“What? I already told you, sunbae. This is how it would go.”

Still inches away, Cheon Yo-hwa whispered to me.

“You decided to borrow my power on your own, thinking that since I’m Time Sealed, it’d be ‘relatively safe.’ That’s on you... And there are three prices to pay, not just one.”

“What?”

“Don’t call me shameless. I’m actually trying to be as fair as possible, okay? You’re the one requesting an absurdly powerful ability.”

She tapped my chest with her forefinger.

“First price is that kiss just now.”

Her middle finger joined in, pressing my chest.

“Second price is that, from now on, our history will say, ‘When I confessed my love to sunbae, we actually kissed.’” Her giggle tinkered between us. “Hard to forget that sensation, right, sunbae? You only just did it.”

Sure enough, I was already picturing the scene with the moment she was Time Sealed and we shared a kiss. Whether it happened from the start or was newly inserted into my memories, I couldn’t tell anymore.

“And the last, third price is...”

Her ring finger pressed into my chest.

“Sorry, sunbae. One more time... because I liked it.”

She leaned in once more, connecting our lips again.

This time, the kiss wasn’t as hurried as before. Instead, it was a bit softer, and it lingered just a little longer.

Her three fingers on my chest slowly began to move. They were tracing letters with her nails. Even with just the feeling, I could make out the rough shapes of the words—I’d gotten used to reading letters with my skin thanks to the Saintess. Thus, I could decode it.

Actually, a long time ago,

I wanted to tweak our timeline so that we stole a kiss back when you tutored me.

That was my mistake.

I couldn’t hold back.

I feel kind of underhanded too.

After all, I’m going to forget this in a day, anyway. Silly me, right?

But at least you'll remember it, sunbae.

That's not so bad.

Only her crimson eyes filled my vision now.

Her nails scratched over the very spot in my chest where my heart was beating.

Off you go, sunbae.

Here's a little hint:

Make use of perfume.

Perfume?

Before I could ask what that meant, one of the four windows—the second one, where summer sunlight shone—flared with blinding brightness.

It was so bright that I reflexively had to close my eyes.

And then.

And then—

When I opened my eyes again...

"Huh?"

I found myself standing in the middle of a road.

No more sign of Cheon Yo-hwa's classroom, her Divine Realm, or the person herself who'd just scratched my chest.

Instead, what I faced was an old neighborhood on a narrow downward slope. Alleyways and walls seemed to wrestle for the slightest bit of space. A neglected flower pot perched forlornly to provide the only bit of greenery. The summer sun was scorching the anemone's leaves, baking the uneven layers of concrete underfoot.[3]

“Excuse me.”

I heard a voice from behind. When I turned around, there stood a slight girl with black hair, looking up at me with arms loaded with trash bags.

“If it’s not too much trouble, could you move aside so I can get by?”

Because the alley was so narrow, she couldn’t pass unless I stepped away.

“O-oh, right. Sorry.”

“No need to apologize. Thank you for granting my request.”

She bowed her head politely, despite carrying two heavy trash bags. The angle of her bow was so impeccable it felt oddly out of place with her shabby outfit.

That perfect bow could only belong to one person, someone whose greetings were always impeccable. Her hair color was different, her eyes were different, and she was definitely a lot shorter. Still, considering I’d just been yanked into this “rewritten past” by Cheon Yo-hwa’s power...

Could this polite, grown-up-sounding girl in front of me be...?

“Yu Ji-won?”

“Sorry?”

“Oh, uh... Is your name Yu Ji-won by any chance?”

The black-haired girl’s eyes fluttered twice in two blinks.

“Yes. I’m Yu Ji-won, Class 1-2 at Shinseo Middle School. Do... Do you know me?”

I was at a loss for words.

Holy crap.

Sure, we’d said we’d rewrite the past so that Yu Ji-won had always been Leviathan's Miko. But this? Come on, Cheon Yo-hwa, you've sent me too far back!

In that cramped alley, 14-year-old Yu Ji-won tilted her head in confusion.

The cicadas were in full chorus.

It was summer.

Footnotes:

1 - Cao Cao, or Cao Mengde, was a Chinese statesman, warlord, and poet who rose to power during the end of the Han dynasty, allowing his son to eventually usurp the throne after his passing. His cruelty and success as a conquering warlord have led him to be vilified over time, due in no small part to the antagonistic role he takes in The Romance of the Three Kingdoms.

2 - Guan Yu and Zhang Fei were key generals and statesmen of the early Three Kingdoms period who both shared a brotherly relationship with Liu Bei, the ruler depicted in The Romance of the Three Kingdoms as an example of a humane and benevolent ruler.

3 - In the language of flowers, anemones can symbolize passionate love or stand as the flowers of the dead.

Chapter 320

The Skeptic XIII

Sinnoa

This might not sound too convincing, but I actually care more about my companions' personal privacy than you might expect.

I'm not like some typical subculture protagonist who goes, "Oh, you've had such-and-such trauma in your past? Then let me heal you!" and then starts prying into every painful detail, and there are many reasons as to why.

"Mister. Actually, I've been bullied since fourth grade... Ahhh, thinking back on it, my life started falling apart back then. That's when I learned how to loathe people, hate society, and give up on hope."

"Didn't you say it was third grade last time?"

"Huh? Did I say that? Well, anyway—"

First off, human memory isn't accurate. As someone who has Complete Memory, this still amazes me. Even when it comes to their most painful, life-defining traumas, most people still somehow hide them away in a haze that never quite clears.

For my part, each of my runs spans about twenty years. By the time I entered my 776th cycle facing off against Leviathan again, my total lifespan had already sailed past ten thousand years.

Just imagine. How many contradictory "testimonies" do you think I've collected from my companions in that time?

At some point, I picked up a certain habit—or you might call it an attitude—in how I deal with people:

"Don't be too quick to judge."

As Scott Fitzgerald once said, reserving judgments is a matter of infinite hope. A person's character isn't determined by their words or actions in a single moment—it's proven over time.

This is the monologue of a regressor who's outlived ten thousand years.

Does Oh Dok-seo sound like an idiot sometimes? Yes, that's undeniably true.

Idiotic speech aside, though, she never betrayed us, or me for that matter, even when she was mentally corrupted by an Anomaly. (She just ended up punching her fans at a meet-and-greet.) Therefore, I don't assign too much weight or importance to remarks about a companion's "past" or "trauma."

A slight mistake in their memories? Who cares? They've already proved themselves with countless years of loyalty and action.

The same goes for Yu Ji-won.

It didn't matter whether she was some psycho who seized control of a convenience store the moment the apocalypse hit, or whether there was some past event that twisted her sense of humanity. Unless she took the initiative to tell me herself, "Your Excellency, to be honest, I carry a very tragic trauma from my past," I saw no need to dig into her history.

Among all my companions, Yu Ji-won ranked first place by a landslide in the "Never Talking About My Past" competition.

Even when we all drank together...

Even when just the two of us were chatting over drinks...

Even when she was on the brink of death, leaving her last words for the next run...

She never really divulged the details of her past.

Was it because she genuinely placed no value on her pre-apocalypse life? Or was she silently taking into account my own situation of having lost all memory of my pre-apocalypse past?

Whatever the reason, her past remained as silent and nebulous as a Void.

Hence…

“A little more natural, please… Okay, good.”

The photographer kept pressing the shutter, and the camera *click-click-click*ed away. Ji-won struck poses without so much as batting an eye at the nonstop camera flash. She turned her head this way and that, her face blank.

“All right. Now give me a little smile.”

She offered a faint smile.

It might have been an earthshaking, mind-blowing event to me, but the photographer hardly found it special. He just kept singing her praises—it was perfect, perfect!—and snapping pictures.

“Great, wow! You’re just perfect again today, Ji-won.”

“Thank you.”

“All right, next up we’ll have you sit in that chair over there, reading a book.”

So, yeah.

It turned out that in her first year of middle school, the 14-year-old Yu Ji-won—black-haired, because it’d be a while before her powers Awakened and turned it silver—was indeed a born psychopath in many ways. However, in this era, she was also a professional model.

“You’ve got to be kidding me.”

I was hiding behind the scenes at the photo shoot, suppressing my presence with Aura and stealth, my mouth hanging open in disbelief.

“That’s just cheating.”

To the camera’s lens, Yu Ji-won was playing the quintessential star student, all dressed up in a crisp school uniform and wearing a flawless smile that was practically perfect in every way.

Over two weeks of practicing my stealth game and sneaking around, I pieced together the story of this so-called “14-year-old con artist.”

Yu Ji-won was born into poverty.

As a girl, she lived on the third floor of a leaning villa on a steep hillside slum. Hers was a household of four: a grandmother with dementia, a father with anger management and alcoholism issues, and a mother who had gotten sucked into some shady religious group.

“It’s like the trifecta of misery or something...”

A messed-up home, no doubt.

At this point, we’d usually delve into a squalid sob story of how deeply unfortunate Yu Ji-won’s home life was, how her personality flaws were both innate and shaped by her environment, and how that forces us to feel sympathy, yet also reprimand her for stooping to killing people, but...

“She doesn’t look miserable at all.”

Sure enough, Yu Ji-won was not your average kid. All of that “tragic family backstory” was just a minor inconvenience to her. Even if you just listened to the snippets of conversation with the photographer, you could guess how well she was managing.

“Oh, right, Ji-won. You have any interest in modeling for eyeglasses? A friend of mine is looking for a few student models these days.”

“If you can put me in touch, Director, I’d be glad to work hard.”

“Oh man, our Ji-won is so polite! Not like most kids these days! Everybody I introduce you to says nothing but good things.”

“Thank you, sir.”

Case in point, even in an environment where you’d expect a deluge of misery, she managed to live perfectly well. Despite being only 14 years old, Ji-won had already learned to distinguish between her family’s poverty and her own. She’d freed herself from relying on her parents’ allowance, instead filling up her own bank account through her own labor.

“Is this for real?” I muttered.

As you all know, Ji-won’s face was basically at the Status Ailment: Kingdom-Toppling Beauty level. That was as true in middle school as it was later. She put her naturally extraordinary looks to work, making a living as a fashion model.

It wasn’t just her face that captivated people either.

“I may be polite, Director, but I owe it to your generosity. Not all adults would lend a helping hand to a child like me. Being able to work with someone as wonderful as you is my good fortune.”

“Huh? Wow, Ji-won, you sure talk in a unique way! Haha!”

No matter which set she went to, Ji-won delivered her compliments in a flat tone of voice that sounded deeply sincere.

She was “pretty,” “polite,” and “young,” and people found it painfully hard to brush her off, so all the modeling gigs out there practically fell into her lap.

“This is a middle-schooler’s idea of socializing?”

She was truly a force that broke the ecosystem.

She had a mature build for her age, a distinctively expressionless face that intrigued people, an air about her that could look childlike or strangely grown-up, and that disarming bit of charisma that soothed the hearts of weary adults.

Thus, 14-year-old “serial-killer-in-the-making” model Yu Ji-won was basically inhaling all the possible gigs in her age bracket like Kirby on a binge.

“...Seriously?”

Every day, she juggled classes and modeling jobs until well past 10 PM, then transferred from subway to local bus on her way back home.

“What are you doing coming home at this hour?!”

No sooner had the villa’s front door slammed shut than I heard a man’s shout from the third floor, her father’s voice.

Yesterday it was her mother who blew up, and now it was his turn.

“You little brat! Watch your tone, huh? Huh? Huh?!”

“I’m sorry. I was held back at school studying.”

“Don’t lie to me! I called your teacher, you know! Don’t you try to __”

“I apologize. I really was studying.”

“Hey! You... You little...!”

“I’m sorry. Please don’t hit my face, Father. If there’s a mark, everyone will notice.”

The yelling didn’t stop even after fifty minutes. The verbal altercation broke out into physical violence a few times, but Ji-won always tried to shield her face. She wasn’t the only victim either. Her mom and grandmother were also caught in the abuse, until everyone was hurling insults back and forth.

So it wasn’t by chance that Yu Ji-won adapted so quickly when the apocalypse came. Her world had fallen to ruin from the start.

During these two weeks, I didn’t just learn about Ji-won. I also investigated the area around her.

The slum rested on a steep hill, with crooked concrete poured through different decades so the alley and stairways resembled geological strata.

I stepped into the multiplex building across from the villa where Ji-won lived. On the building's first floor, there was a small monthly-rent apartment, and I rummaged through the mailbox in front.

National Health Insurance

Personal and Confidential

■■■

The recipient's name was all static, blurred out by some glitch.

"So even Cheon Yo-hwa, who built this 'past timeline' for me, couldn't fully create a name in place of the real occupant's identity..."

Inside the run-down building was a tiny studio apartment about 7 to 8 pyeong in size.[1] A battered desk stood inside, stacked with ID cards like a driver's license and a resident registration card.

■■■

The same glitch. An unreadable name.

Yet the photo was clearly me—or rather someone who looked exactly like me, except younger by a few years.

I silently flipped the license over and over. Only the name was censored. The face was obviously that of a "younger Undertaker."

There was no point trying to hide it.

"In this timeline, or at least in the world Cheon Yo-hwa is showing me, the 'past me' was apparently living in this neighborhood."

Then, another burst of shouting from beyond the shabby window. The father's furious hollering echoed out, followed shortly after by the clipped and composed replies.

“You think I’m doing this just to squeeze money out of you? Huh? You—!”

“I’m sorry. I’m out of cash. Please forgive me.”

It was so loud I could easily hear it all from my one-room across the street.

“Huh.”

So, incredibly, it turned out that in the “forever-lost memories” of my past, I was a resident of the very same neighborhood as a 14-year-old psycho middle-schooler.

“...Is this for real?”

It was real.

For the time being.

Breaking news.

The 20-year-old Undertaker (I learned my age from the ID card) used to be neighbors with 14-year-old Yu Ji-won.

“This is crazy. I can’t tell if it’s all Cheon Yo-hwa’s trick or if it’s some actual reconstruction from a database of the past.”

Whether it was real or not wasn’t that important anyway. My past was always a blank canvas, and my present mission was to paint a “connection to Yu Ji-won” onto that empty space.

The quest requirements were basically this:

(1) Intervene in Yu Ji-won’s life.

(2) “Imprint” the idea that she was “destined to be Leviathan’s Miko” all the way back in this era.

(3) Return to the present so we can use the newly affirmed “Miko of Leviathan” to defeat the Outer God.

Steps 2 and 3 could be figured out with time. The first step was my immediate priority.

I had to intervene in her life.

“Easier said than done...”

Think about it. Neighbors in the same town can be both close and incredibly distant. Adding in a status gap of a “college freshman in a studio apartment” and a “middle-schooler victim of domestic abuse” only made that equation more awkward.

At least Cheon Yo-hwa had the “tutor-student” connection with her older sister. Me? I had nothing.

“Let’s see... How would I realistically get close to a 14-year-old kid?”

Forcing closeness out of nowhere would be pointless.

I could do something like rob a bank, hand Ji-won a huge pile of cash, and proclaim, “Hey, now you’re free! Problem solved!” However, that wouldn’t matter. What actually mattered was that the version of me in this era formed a “natural bond” with the 14-year-old Ji-won.

If it wasn’t at least somewhat believable from the vantage point of my past self, I couldn’t accept it, even as a rewriting of history.

“Well... That younger me would definitely have tried to help her somehow.”

I drummed my fingers on the flimsy plastic desk, thinking.

“When the Void came, I risked everything to rescue the Yo-hwa sisters. That implies I had a soft heart, even as a teenager. No way I could ignore the kid next door getting beaten up every night.”

Of course, that younger me probably didn’t know all that much about Ji-won. At best, maybe I had some basic sympathy for her.

“But to Yu Ji-won, sympathy and concern would be worthless.”

Even if I “happened” to meet her whenever she took out the trash or said hi because we were neighbors, she’d likely see no value in me.

“So I have to solve her problem. That’s the only thing that matters to her.”

And the main problem in her life is her family. If she had enough money, that might solve it.

However, as I said, abruptly giving her a wad of cash would break narrative causality.

“How can the me of this era naturally, and believably, help Yu Ji-won make money...?”

At that moment, my eyes fell on my driver’s license lying on the desk.

Yu Ji-won had to shuttle from subway to subway to get to her photo shoots...

“Yes, that’s it!”

I’d found a way for “a random local college student” to get close to “a middle-schooler from an abusive household” in a way that seemed natural.

One week later, same as the first time I entered this rewritten past, I met Yu Ji-won in the middle of the narrow alley.

“Hello. If it’s not too much trouble, could you move aside so I can get by?”

She greeted me with the same line as before. The difference was that last time, she carried trash bags in both hands. Now she was lugging a large duffel bag full of modeling gear.

I offered a friendly smile.

“Hey, Ji-won. How are you?”

“Do I know you...?”

“Nah, I’m just a neighbor. I live in the building across from yours.”

“I see.” She gave a subtle twitch of her nose, then lowered her head slightly. “Pardon me. I’m not very good at remembering faces. Next time I see you, I’ll be sure to greet you properly.”

Well, yeah. If she decides you’re useless to her, she won’t bother remembering your face.

“Actually, I’m in a hurry. Could you please let me pass?”

“Where are you headed?” I asked instead.

“Uijeongbu. I have work.”

Uijeongbu. Practically on the opposite side of Seoul.

It wouldn’t be easy traveling that far on public transit, carrying all her gear and trying to keep up her condition for her job.

I pretended to be surprised. “All the way to Uijeongbu? That’s pretty far.”

“Yes. It’s my usual routine. It’s no problem.”

“Still, that looks pretty tough...” I glanced at the heavy duffel bag slung over her shoulder. “How about I give you a ride?”

“Pardon?”

“I’ve got a car. It’s an old Matiz I picked up secondhand, but it still runs.”

She blinked and tilted her head. “Could you say that again?”

“I’ll drive you. I don’t have any plans today, so I can take a spin and drop you off.”

That’s right. The idea was to become Yu Ji-won’s “road manager.”

Balancing school and work had to be exhausting. The time lost in commuting must've been her biggest burden. I had a way to fix that: a used Daewoo Matiz, which I'd hurriedly purchased a few days prior.

If I approached it from that angle, I could definitely get closer to this expressionless, psycho-in-training middle-school model. It was a perfect tactic.

"Hmm."

While I patted myself on the back, Ji-won tilted her head the other way.

Amusingly enough, that tilt was the same gesture she'd do in the future.

"Let me summarize. A certain Mr. Matiz, who claims we've met before, though I don't recall it, an adult male older than me, offers to drive me, a 14-year-old girl, all the way across the city to Uijeongbu. For free. Simply because he has nothing else to do, and also the car is a dingy, old, second-hand Matiz. Is that correct?"

"Uh..."

"So you agree with that statement upon review?"

"Huh, well... Yeah, it's definitely suspicious. Sounds a bit like a stalker, doesn't it?"

Ji-won nodded, tilting her head back to center to stare directly at me.

"Thank you. Then we are in agreement on that point."

I stared at her. She stared back.

I didn't respond. Her head tilted more.

Um.

Was it safe to assume our first meeting just failed spectacularly?

Footnotes:

1 - A pyeong is a Korean unit of measurement that is used for area and floorspace. One pyeong is about 3.31 square meters or 35.58 square feet.

Chapter 321

The Skeptic XIV

Sinnoa

Allow me a moment to defend myself.

It's not that my cognitive abilities are defective just because I failed to reach the blatantly obvious conclusion until Ji-won pointed it out. Rather, after living roughly ten thousand years in a ruined world, I simply forgot how society functioned back when law and order still functioned as normal.

No, before that, is it even right to be learning about "the normal social processes under law and order" from Yu Ji-won of all people? Doesn't that violate some fundamental law of the universe?

Either way, I decided to provide a bit more of a "Yu Ji-won–tailored" service, and the result was a success.

Du-du-du-du…

My used Matiz rattled and groaned, as if its engine were muttering, "Just… kill me… now…"

Ji-won, who had been ready to report me to the police as a would-be stalker just moments before, now sat in the back seat, feeling every vibration of the Matiz.

A heavy duffel bag lay at her feet.

And across her lap rested a hand axe.

I turned the wheel with ease and spoke to her via the rearview mirror. "So? Feeling more secure now?"

Driving posed no problem for me. Maybe in this era, with civilization intact, a Matiz would be considered a piece of junk, but after living in an apocalypse, it felt like a top-of-the-line sports car.

No random ghosts stowed away, no actual wails emerging from the engine. To me, it was practically a racing vehicle.

“If I try anything fishy at all, just swing that axe and crack me in the back of the skull.”

She pursed her lips and clutched the handle of the hand axe on her lap, apparently not used to its weight. “There are a few dozen things I could point out here, but first, you just ran your third red light.”

“Huh? Did I?”

“Yes. Luckily no other cars were passing. You should be more worried about dying in an accident than being killed by an axe.”

“Ahh, sorry about that. I’m still not used to this ‘traffic light’ contraption. And are all these lanes really necessary? One lane could handle everything.”

“Pardon me, sir. Did you immigrate here from some third-world country?”

Adapting to modern civilization wasn’t easy. Still, I delivered Ji-won to her job site safely.

And that’s the crucial part: safely. Had my senses been any duller than the average Awakened superhuman, we’d probably have ended up in “seven collision accidents” rather than “arriving without incident.”

“That was... quite the unusual driving style.”

She got out, her legs shaking like a newborn goat’s. Future Yu Ji-won would have had no trouble keeping her balance, but this version of her was still young.

“At least we got here fast, right?” I said breezily.

“That was closer to racing to meet death, but yes. At least it’s clear now that you don’t intend to harm me.”

“Oh! So you’re finally going to trust in my earnest good will?”

“Not exactly. If I do go missing, the police can just pull CCTV of your driving. It’ll stick out like a sore thumb.”

Anyway, from that day on, Ji-won regularly used my “commuter service.”

Sure, the path she took to “trust” me was bizarre, but hey, a win is a win.

Yu Ji-won was a strange kid.

Well, that went without saying. She would one day grow up to be a kidnapper and torturer, so it stood to reason that her personality wasn’t exactly normal.

Still, the adult Ji-won hid that abnormal side very skillfully. She turned “lack of emotion” into “cool-headed judgment” and “sadism” into “ruthless but daring execution.” These inborn flaws became strengths that someone in society “had to” shoulder. It was basically her survival strategy.

On the other hand...

“I’m sorry...”

Fourteen-year-old Yu Ji-won was different. She still hadn’t learned enough tactics to blend in with the world.

“Do you know me?”

For a beat, I was silent. “What do you mean, ‘Do I know you?’ Ji-won, I drove you all the way to Uijeongbu just yesterday.”

“Ah, so you’re Mr. Matiz.”

Bow.

When we met again in the alley, she greeted me as if only just realizing who I was.

“I’m really not good at recognizing people’s faces. My apologies.”

She was clearly abnormal.

Granted, I knew from the future that Ji-won generally didn’t bother remembering people she deemed useless. If you could offer her even a slight advantage, however, she’d show off an uncanny memory. Dang Seo-rin, Noh Do-hwa, Cheon Yo-hwa, and especially me, the Undertaker—she remembered all of us from the moment she first met us in that convenience store.

“Now in this timeline, I am helping her by saving her a ton of commuting time, which can be quantified in real numbers. Yet she still forgets my face?” I grumbled.

Not that it happened forever. Over time, she started mixing me up less and less.

“Mr. Matiz, I look forward to your help again today.”

Nowadays, she’d greet me politely in the alley, almost like we had our own little rendezvous point. If we ran into each other somewhere else, like the supermarket, though...

“Oh, hey there, Ji-won. Doing some shopping?”

She tilted her head and aksed, “I’m sorry, do I know you?”

Just like that. She’d act like she had amnesia or something.

Once again, it was blatantly abnormal.

“Let’s test something...”

I went out to the alley at my usual time but in a different outfit. Instead of my usual crisp summer shirt, I wore a worn-out T-shirt, hunched my back like an old grandma, and even held a cane for good measure.

Before long, Ji-won came down the villa stairs. She spotted me, tilted her head a couple degrees, then walked past as if I were a total stranger.

No hello, no reaction.

“Huh.”

That deepened my suspicions.

I decided to up the ante. I snuck into her house while no one else was around—no family members in sight, perfect timing. In the bedroom, I pulled on an old set of her father’s clothes. They reeked of age and poverty, a musty smell that had settled in for years.

I waited on the living room floor, a bottle of cheap makgeolli in my hands, until she returned. She didn’t have a modeling job that week, so she’d be home early.

Bi-bi-bi-beep.

I heard a keypad chime at the door. Her grandmother, who suffered from dementia, couldn’t remember a more complicated code, so they kept it at 5555. Sometimes even that was too much. Her grandmother occasionally asked me, the neighbor, to open the door for her.

Ji-won stepped in, slipped off her shoes, and sniffed the air lightly. She looked at me on the living room floor.

“Huh? Father, you didn’t go to church today...? Then who’s picking Grandma up? Where did she go?”

I stayed silent, feigning drunkenness, then staggered out the front door. Though she cocked her head, Ji-won didn’t bother stopping me.

Only when I made it back to the alley could I finally let out a sigh. “I did not see that coming...”

The distant city skyline looked strangely crisp under today’s sky.

And so, I finally learned something new about my would-be adjutant.

My long-standing right-hand companion, Yu Ji-won... can’t recognize human faces.

Prosopagnosia: the disorder of being unable to recognize or properly perceive faces.

We all get a touch of “face blindness” now and then when we suddenly bump into an old classmate on the street. However, Yu Ji-won’s symptoms were on a completely different level.

“Oh, yes, your guess was correct, Mr. Matiz. You figured it out.”

If she’d been an adult, she wouldn’t have revealed such a potentially exploitable weakness to someone who wasn’t even a close acquaintance, but the fourteen-year-old version told me without hesitation.

“I was born having difficulty perceiving or remembering people’s faces.”

“How severe is it?”

“To be blunt, if you replaced someone’s head with a full-body mannequin, I doubt I could tell the difference by looking just at the face.”

I had no idea. It was so unexpected that I nearly retorted, “But in the future, you recognized people fine!” but of course that future hadn’t happened yet.

Instead, I asked a question that fit the current timeline.

“Then how do you tell people apart? I mean, you manage to recognize the director at your photo shoots, right?”

“I rely on location and context,” she answered matter-of-factly. “If there’s a figure of a certain build and a certain outfit hovering near a camera, I deduce that’s the director. I can also try identifying people by their voices. But I’m a poor listener, and a lot of voices sound the same to me.”

It’s quite troublesome, she added.

“That’s why, whenever possible, I try to distinguish people by smell.”

“Smell?”

“Yes, their body scent. Most people tend to have consistent preferences about perfume or cologne.”

She stepped closer.

“If you don’t mind…”

Then she leaned in, nose near my chest. She circled slowly around my torso, sniffing quietly.

“I thought so.”

She wasn’t Awakened yet, so her eyes were still dark instead of their future hue. She looked up at me.

“This is quite fascinating… If my nose is correct, you, Mr. Matiz, have no body scent at all. Apart from a mild fabric softener, your body is entirely odorless.”

Indeed, that was my constitution. As Ji-won said, I literally had no distinct scent. Whether my body had always been like that or changed after I became an Awakener, I never figured out.

“Oh…”

And that was when I realized how adult Yu Ji-won managed to separate people so easily. It was by smell.

When people Awaken, a lot changes. Everyone always focuses on “they stop aging,” but in truth, their entire physiology can shift. Take hair color, for instance. Once this timeline’s apocalypse began, black-haired Yu Ji-won would Awaken, turning her hair silver and her dark eyes into a blend of purple and blue.

Body scent changes too.

“The Saintess exudes the smell of fresh running water.”

“Noh Do-hwa smells sharply of lemon.”

“Cheon Yo-hwa is orange-scented.”

“Lee Ha-yul strangely smells like freshly baked bread.”

“Sim Ah-ryeon has a faint mozzarella cheese aroma…”

In an apocalypse with plummeting standards of hygiene, Awakeners exuding these unique, often pleasant scents stand out like “chosen ones.” Hair color, eye color, and body scent are so vivid and straightforward that they can’t help but seem divine.

And in the future, Yu Ji-won was adept at Aura. Partly thanks to my teaching, sure, but to be honest, she already had a knack for it before we ever met. That implied she had extremely sharp senses compared to others.

“For her, all the important people in her life are Awakened, each with distinct body scents. It’d be easy to memorize them by smell alone,” I mused.

Then there was me, the Undertaker?

“In a world where everyone is covered in unique scents… I, who have no smell at all, would actually stand out the most.”

In a sense, I’d be the easiest one to distinguish. Plus, I was always wearing that barista outfit, wielding a cane sword. She could identify me at a glance just from my getup.

“Same goes for Dang Seo-rin, Cheon Yo-hwa, and Noh Do-hwa. They basically never change their clothes. They’re easy to recognize.”

That realization triggered a chain reaction, like toppling a row of dominoes.

“Mini-Map…”

That was the power Yu Ji-won would one day Awaken.

“In her Mini-Map ability, everything about a person’s appearance, their face and features, is ‘bleached’ away.”

An Awakened ability is practically a mirror reflecting how its user experiences the world. From that perspective, Yu Ji-won’s Mini-Map is telling.

A black-and-white chessboard world. People only distinguished by name labels stuck to each piece. No one’s actual form recognized as unique.

Ji-won habitually assigned Noh Do-hwa to the queen (♕), but that didn’t necessarily mean the queen was Noh Do-hwa. If she relabeled the bishop, the bishop would become Noh Do-hwa. If she labeled a pawn, the pawn was Noh Do-hwa.

“Seems like even now in her middle school years, the seed of that ability is already there.”

And maybe that was also why Go Yuri’s mental control never worked on her.

“Mr. Matiz?”

“Hmm?”

“Is there something on my face?”

“No, nothing... Anyway, hurry up and get in. We’ve gotta go all the way to Suwon today, right?”

“Oh, right. Thanks in advance.”

Du-du-du-du.

I merged into traffic, something I’d grown more accustomed to. Still, I found myself lost in thought.

‘Even if I meddle in this timeline’s past, she might not remember me in the future.’

She didn’t yet have the heightened senses the Awakened version would one day use, so her method of memorizing scents wasn't that refined. A normal person's senses can only go so far, after all.

'I can't even make her remember my name.'

Not long ago, I tried introducing myself to her as "Undertaker." Yet for some strange reason, she'd completely forgotten by the next day and just went back to calling me "Mr. Matiz."

I suspect I know why.

'At this point in time, an Awakener called "the Undertaker" doesn't exist. So that "nonsensical data" must get auto-deleted or forcibly smoothed out. Likely by Cheon Yo-hwa.'

Which meant I probably shouldn't risk using Aura openly either. At least if Yu Ji-won failed to notice, it might slide by.

'For all I know, Cheon Yo-hwa is constantly patching or editing our words and actions in real time. It's possible that the me I believe I am and the me she sees are completely different.'

It put a lot of constraints on the actions I could take.

'So.'

I couldn't call myself by my real name, ■■■, nor by my alias, the Undertaker.

Meanwhile, Yu Ji-won, who couldn't recognize faces, might never form a strong impression of me at all.

But I had an idea—a way to carve "my presence" deep into her mind despite those hurdles.

Chapter 322

The Skeptic XV

Sinnoa

It was an undeniable truth that Yu Ji-won had very few friends.

I confirmed it by slipping into her school to observe her day-to-day campus life.

“Hey! Ji-won, hi!”

“Pardon me, but who are you?”

“Huh? Uh... I-I’m Eun-seo. Hwang Eun-seo. Remember? I asked if you wanted to be friends. Don’t you remember?”

“Ah, my apologies. You used to use a completely different lotion than the one you’re wearing now, so I was mistaken.”

“Hey, oh my god! Ji-won, I heard the student council president confessed to you yesterday!”

“Ah. So he’s the student council president?”

“Ugh... Obviously! He’s the best-looking senior in our school!”

“Hmm. I had no idea. There are at least six students here who use the same sunscreen, as far as I know.”

It was an utterly devastating case of prosopagnosia.

If that were her only difficulty, her relationships might still have been manageable, but Ji-won paired it with an expression more frigid than ice 24/7.

And that wasn’t the only issue. Her brain had very little space for words like “empathy,” “sadness,” or “understanding.” Even if she heard someone’s family member had died, her first reaction would be, “Oh, the funeral costs and procedures must be quite a burden.”

How is that a recipe for making friends?

At first, classmates were drawn to her stunning beauty, almost like they were enchanted, but they all gave up within a month. Rumors filled the gap they left behind.

“Her mom’s in that weird cult...”

“Seriously? That place is really dangerous.”

“We live in the same neighborhood, and her dad is always shouting in that back alley. I checked one time, he was cussing out her grandma. He was swearing at his own mother!”

“Wait, you mean Ji-won cussed out her mom?”

“Huh? No, no, her dad was cussing out his mom, Ji-won’s grandmother.”

So Ji-won quickly became an outcast. She wasn’t exactly bullied—she was simply isolated. After all, she was already working as a professional model, her athletic abilities were top-notch, and she never dropped below first place in academics. To the other kids, she was anything but normal. Sometimes there were hushed whispers about her, but they were like small waves between islands that never actually made landfall on “the uninhabited island” called Yu Ji-won.

And so we arrive at the conclusion.

In front of Shinseo Middle School’s gate, Yu Ji-won stood waiting alone for someone, the school’s desert-like dirt field stretching into the distance behind her. She was waiting for her driver—the one who’d take her to her job. In other words, me.

‘One of two things has to happen. Either the world adapts to her ways, or she adapts to the world’s ways.’

In the original future, it was the latter. Ji-won learned how to camouflage herself in society when the apocalypse and the emergence of Awakeners actually provided an opportunity for her. Once her sense of smell sharpened to an extreme degree, she could finally rely on scent alone to distinguish people.

'...What would the younger version of me, my "past self," have thought about her?'

He wouldn't have been clueless.

A few years from now, I'd be scouted as a dedicated tutor for Cheon Yo-hwa's household in Sejong City, which meant I was a clever, quick-witted young adult. Surely I would have noticed Yu Ji-won's true nature.

An adolescent exposed to domestic violence. A girl who basically earned all the household's income in place of her neglectful parents, caring for her grandmother with dementia...

And yet, once I actually got involved, I'd realize she wasn't the tired, one-note depiction of some "pitiful" victim.

In a sense, Yu Ji-won was ungrateful. No matter how kindly someone tried to help her, it wasn't in her nature to "feel gratitude." She simply "calculated" the amount of the help she received, then she decided whether to repay it in kind or wash her hands of it, whichever presented a smaller risk.

'Would the younger me have kept helping her after discovering her true nature, or given up in disappointment?'

I don't know, but right now, within this illusion that Cheon Yo-hwa had woven to lock in the past, it was my choice that dictates the answer, not my past self's.

"Hey."

Ji-won was reading a book near the school gate. She peered at me over the cover.

We were five meters apart. That distance was too far for a normal Ji-won to catch a person's body scent.

“I’m sorry, but do I know you?”

“C’mon, it’s Mr. Matiz! Heeey.”

“Ah.”

She snapped her book shut. The title was Henle Latin First Year, printed on a lavender cover.

Reading an introductory Latin text, in English no less, at the school gate… And she wondered why she had no friends? Ji-won!

“My apologies, I didn’t recognize you,” she said. “But that boring tone of voice is definitely familiar.”

“Enough. Come a little closer, will you?”

“All right…?”

She approached me without complaint.

In her mind, Mr. Matiz drove her wherever she needed to go, so it was only natural to comply if I asked her to walk a few meters. That was probably all there was to it.

“Hm?” She stopped short when she reached me, tilting her head. “Mr. Matiz.”

“What?”

“Did you put on perfume today?”

I smiled. “No, this is actually my natural scent.”

That was a lie.

Over the past few days, I’d gone around different shops to buy seven perfumes that might fit a budget-conscious young professional in his twenties. The cheapest one cost me 30,000 won and the most expensive one 300,000 won.[1] I then disassembled them and blended them in various ratios.

“It was tricky, but—”

I happened to have some fragrance knowledge and skills.

When you live thousands of years, you pick up all sorts of random expertise. Perfumery was one of them. Ironically enough, perfumers boomed in post-apocalyptic Busan.

Why people in a ruined world were so passionate about perfumes is a story for another time.

“Is that so?”

For now, I had to focus on convincing this middle-school psycho kid in front of me.

“I don’t recall ever smelling this on you. Must be because you usually use weird body wash. So you switched to a gentler product, right? And that’s your actual body odor?”

“Mhm.”

She took hold of my right arm. The bit of physical contact was abrupt but nothing worth reading too deeply into. This kid simply wasn’t socialized. She was only verifying whether my claim was true or false by sniffing me more directly.

“Please bend down a bit.”

She brought her nose to the back of my hand. It was less “sniff” and more “hnff.” A short, quiet sound. Then from my hand to my wrist, forearm, elbow, up my sleeve. She kept sniffing for about thirty seconds.

“Indeed…” She wrinkled her brow slightly. “It’s somehow familiar, yet unfamiliar. I’m certain there’s a woody note, but it’s too faint for a typical perfume. I think the top note might be pepper… I’m not sure.”

“I told you, it’s my body scent.”

“Let’s just say I believe you,” she said, letting let go of my arm. “But it’s unique. I like it.”

“Yeah?”

“Yes. It’s faint enough to be hard to detect, but if I’m close by, I’ll definitely know it’s you.”

“Oh.”

“It’s personally my style. If only it had more of an alcohol kick, I’d like it even more. But I suppose normal body odor can’t have that.”

Though her face was expressionless, a subtle air of satisfaction drifted around her.

A faint smile tugged at my lips.

‘All right. That worked.’

While she would adapt herself to society in the real future, right now, I was adapting to her, adopting a specialized “communication method” for Yu Ji-won.

‘If my younger self noticed what kind of person she was and still decided to help her… he might have gone as far as creating a one-of-a-kind perfume for her sake.’

Of course, he wouldn’t have had the same budget or skill. He’d have messed with cheap brands and probably messed up plenty of times. But for me, with advanced knowledge in perfumery, it was simple to find an optimal formula.

‘Anyway, it’s enough.’

I kept getting closer to Yu Ji-won.

Prosopagnosia was no barrier, she quickly got used to my “artificial body scent” and stopped confusing me for others. Her psychopathic personality likewise posed no obstacle between us.

“Now then. Gas money is 100,000 won for this month.”

“That’s acceptable.”

“Your tab for rides so far is about 270,000 won. Like I said, I’ll charge interest at standard rates.”

“Understood. I plan to pay it all back in one go this year, anyway.”

From her parents to her classmates, everyone struggled when dealing with Yu Ji-won because they just didn’t know how to talk to her. However, once you figure it out, she’s not quiet at all. In fact, she can be downright talkative. Just think back to how much adult Yu Ji-won would gush whenever she needed to flatter me in the future.

“So you might study abroad in the U.S. eventually?”

“Yes. I plan to start preparing in earnest next year.”

I didn’t bother with: “But you’re poor, how can you afford that?”

“Are you aiming for a STEM major?” I asked instead. “Non-STEM degrees might be challenging overseas.”

“I do prefer liberal arts, but I haven’t made a firm decision.”

Nor did I push: “You should definitely do STEM.”

“Then maybe keep going deeper into Latin and Ancient Greek. People who major in that get treated as rather unique in foreign universities.”

“Really?”

“Sure. And I doubt you’ll face racism, but if you tell them you read the Bible in Latin or especially Euripides in the original Greek, no one’s gonna dismiss you out of hand at least.”

“I see. That’s a perspective I hadn’t considered. It’s a practical plan, since I’ve already begun studying Latin.”

This was how our conversations went.

“But you want to go into politics anyway, don’t you? Wouldn’t going to Seoul National be simpler?”

“I’m still weighing my options. It’s just...”

She stared out the window from where she sat in my Matiz. The hand axe I’d given her earlier still lay across her lap.

“Sometimes, this country feels cramped.”

It was a murmured confession she’d never voice as an adult.

“I don’t know how to describe it exactly, but sometimes, even breathing feels like it’s choking me.”

A light drizzle began tapping the car window.

“It’s like there’s already a ‘right way’ to live in this land. But that way is built more on words than on life itself. People measure their own and others’ existence through collisions of words and phrases.” She paused, then quietly added, “Life is death. Death is not words but something real, right before our eyes, like a mirror for each person. So I can’t understand why people talk as though they’ll never die, layering their ‘life’ on top of mere words.”

Silence.

“Pardon me. I ended up sharing thoughts that are hard to put into language.”

“No.”

When we got a red light, I reached over and patted her shoulder.

I didn’t try stroking her head. That would ruin her carefully prepped model look.

“You’re not wrong... You haven’t made a mistake. And that’s exactly why it’s so tough.”

I wasn’t sure if my words sank in.

She took my hand from her shoulder, lifted it to her nose, and sniffed again. Her quiet inhale merged with the patter of rain, dissolving softly. When the red light turned yellow, she let my hand go. The chilly trace of her touch lingered on the back of my hand.

That day's outdoor photo shoot got canceled due to torrential rain.

Even though the usual rainy season had passed, climate change hammered new "patch updates" onto Earth's "server," pelting it with sporadic downpours.

I was getting anxious.

'It's summer.'

This wasn't just a nostalgic nod to that meme "It was summer."

'Fourteen. Yu Ji-won's summer.'

Cheon Yo-hwa must have had a reason for showing me this era in her illusions.

'In this season, Yu Ji-won kills her parents.'

In the past... Or perhaps I should say "the far future," I'd talked with adult Yu Ji-won many times.

"Fuck, I know you murdered someone at fifteen, cut them to pieces, and dumped them in that minari swamp on Mt. Bukhansan. Just trust me, you psycho!"

"Oh. Understood. That statement just made your claim more credible."

"Because it's a secret no one else knew?"

"To be precise, you got it wrong. It wasn't at fifteen but fourteen, and it wasn't Bukhansan, it was Dobongsan."

At age fourteen, in the dead of summer, Yu Ji-won commits a double parricide, dismembers their bodies, and dumps them in the Dobongsan minari pond.

Upon entering this past illusion, I met the middle-schooler Yu Ji-won in early summer. Now it was August. Summer was flooring the accelerator on time.

I waited nervously for “that day,” and then one night...

Even though it was muffled by the roar of heavy rain, it wasn’t quite enough to escape my inhumanly keen senses: There came the scream of Yu Ji-won’s father.

“Aaagh... Aaaaaaagh!”

However faintly, it pierced through the downpour.

One moment, and I knew.

“It’s tonight.”

Right now, at this very moment...

Yu Ji-won was in the middle of murdering her parents.

Footnotes:

1 - Around $21 USD and $210 USD, respectively.

2 - Around $70 USD and $190 USD, respectively.

Chapter 323

The Skeptic XVI

Sinnoa

The next scream, long and drawn-out, came from Yu Ji-won's mother.

"Aaack... Aaaaah...!"

Nine parts of the noise from outside the window were the pounding rain, the remaining one part was screams and moans—a murder scene unfolding behind the curtain of rain.

Although only sound reached my heightened senses, I knew Ji-won better than anyone. From the screams alone, I could piece together what was happening.

'She picked the moment her parents were asleep.'

Her father's screams had already ceased, likely because he'd been attacked while in a deep slumber. A man who spent his life shouting at his family and daughter ended up facing death with nothing but a deafened howl.

'But he probably struggled at the very end. Or maybe she stabbed the blade at a bad angle and his blood splashed on her mother.'

Whatever the case, it wasn't a perfect double-kill in one strike. Such were the slip-ups of a fourteen-year-old. However, just like in the future, this younger Yu Ji-won wasn't a compulsive gambler. She always stayed keenly aware that she could make mistakes.

'She deliberately chose a night of heavy rainfall.'

It was an environment optimized for murder. Even if the victim's screams managed to thread their way through the downpour and reach the neighbors, it hardly mattered.

‘After all, her house was always loud with shouting and violence.’

It wasn’t an accidental crime or a stroke of luck, but a stark decision made with absolute clarity:

Yu Ji-won was killing her parents.

‘Intervening right now… is not allowed.’

If I stepped in, I might save at least one life. Even earlier—if I’d given her any hint that I knew she intended to kill her parents, perhaps I could have prevented the crime altogether.

But I didn’t.

‘Because that would create a gap between past and future.’

Yu Ji-won kills her mother and father. It was far too pivotal a moment in her life, something that can’t be changed—or mustn’t be changed. No matter how much preliminary work was needed to cement her as Leviathan’s Miko, I wouldn’t upend the course of her life.

‘I won’t intervene.’

Summer rain was whittling away the world’s edges. Misty droplets scattered night into fragments, and I silently gulped them down.

‘Let murder and death take their course.’

That was my decision.

“Aaaaaargh…!”

This wasn’t a timeline where Cheon Yo-hwa’s twin sister survived, nor where Dang Seo-rin’s family wasn’t killed by an Anomaly, nor where Yu Ji-won avoided staining her hands with her parents’ blood.

“Ah… aah… aah…”

I chose this world, with all its crooked lines, perfectly continued from the footsteps those children and I had taken in so far.

"...ah..."

The rain buried the night. The night shadowed their lives.

When two lifespans had been consigned to a double grave, I finally rose from my seat at the window. I pulled on a raincoat, slipped on galoshes, and donned rubber gloves. All were already waiting by the door.

There wasn't a need for tools, I had them stored in my trunk.

Lastly, I checked my computer. I had it set to stream an online lecture at a specified time, good enough to prove my half-day alibi.

Then I stepped outside.

The rain fell.

I drew in a lungful of air, taking in a slow deep breath, and exhaled. The odor of water still carrying the warmth of higher air funneled through my windpipe like a drain. Then, I stepped onto the alley's walkway, which had embraced the sky's downpour a bit earlier than I did—splash, splash. Each time my weight landed, a puddle shattered.

What is life?

In that moment, life was right here, in the gap of an alley too narrow for even a single car to pass.

It was in the raindrops, carrying the sky's heat as they fell to the ground and scattered.

It was in the half-open front gate of the peeling blue villa.

It was in the third-floor door's passcode, fixed at 5555 for the sake of a grandmother with dementia, now rusted like moss.

Beep, bi-bi-beep.

The digital lock's faint chime, a meager sign it was made by civilization, trickled out between the sounds of rain.

Beep.

Rainwater dripped onto the keypad, and the door swung open. Darkness as deep as an abyss filled the entryway.

There was a sharp whistle, a sound cutting through the darkness. It was the hand axe I had given her.

I stepped back to dodge.

"Ji-won."

No reply. Instead, a second swing came my way.

But a predicted ambush has no meaning. Especially from a middle-schooler with a model's physique, someone who hadn't trained any martial art to a meaningful level.

"It's me."

A heartbeat of shock.

"Mr. Matiz."

The attack didn't stop. The silence didn't either.

So I forced it to stop. My grip on her arm sapped the power she had to swing that axe and likewise sapped her ability to remain silent.

"I'll help you."

She struggled. She couldn't land a hit.

"You must have prepared tools to wash away the blood. But if we do it together, we'll finish much faster."

She struggled again, weaker now. Still no success.

"Do you even know how to dispose of a body?"

A ragged breath.

“If the ground isn’t dug deep enough, this heavy rain will turn the soil to mud in no time. No matter how carefully you seal it, the stench of a corpse is strong. If a sniffer dog comes while the smell lingers, you’ll be exposed. And if you thought about dismembering them and dumping pieces in the sewer, forget it. In a rundown neighborhood like ours, no way you flush all those remains.”

A slower, steadier breath.

“What about CCTV routes? Do you have a plan to manipulate the victims’ alibis and confuse the police investigation? You just learned how to ‘kill a person,’ but do you know how to ‘erase a person’?”

One-tenth of silence.

“I’ll help you.”

The rain pounded.

“Let me help.”

Lightning flared from somewhere far off, briefly illuminating Ji-won. She wore a raincoat and rubber gloves, with boots just like mine.

There was a slash across her face. Not from a moment ago. Maybe from yesterday, or the day before. A scratch that could be fatal to a model.

A trace of violence well past the limit.

Yu Ji-won slowly lowered her head against my chest, pressing her nose near me. Black bangs fell and hid the cut.

She inhaled my scent in silence.

That was her permission.

From here on, it was a race against time.

“All chopped up?”

“Yes.”

“I finished cleaning. Let’s go.”

We spoke only the bare minimum.

“Your grandma?”

“She’s asleep in her room. When Mother screamed, she complained about the noise and then immediately drifted off again.”

“Good.”

We crossed the rain to the Matiz.

A thump, then the trunk slammed, then the car door. Ji-won sat in the passenger seat. We wore her father’s and mother’s clothes respectively, so that if someone spotted us, they might mistake us for her parents.

“Listen carefully while we drive.” I started the engine and pulled away. “They racked up a gambling debt and fled into the night. They stole their daughter’s bank account on the way out. Do you have your mom’s usual gambling site ID?”

“Yes, she used a few.”

“Transfer all your money from your account into hers. Then deposit it on one of those gambling sites.”

“Understood.”

Without hesitation, she operated her phone and her late mother’s.

Her entire life savings were 34.6 million won distributed across three banks. Two of those accounts, totaling 19 million won, vanished in seconds from the passenger seat—part of her funds for studying abroad to the states.

“Leave the remaining 15 million alone, but try logging in and deliberately fail the password five times."[1]

"Yes... Done."

"Good. Now rest until we arrive. Driving up a mountain in this weather won't be easy."

Silence.

At a quick glance, Yu Ji-won was leaning her head against the window, eyes closed. Her axe was no longer across her lap, just lying on the floor.

Rattle-rattle-rattle.

Night rain hammered down relentlessly. Sometimes the sheets of water grew so thick I couldn't see outside at all.

Tonight, I was grateful for this downpour. In this weather, at this hour, the odds of a witness were slim.

Eventually we reached northern Seoul, Bukhansan.

"We're here. Let's get out."

"Okay."

Another used car was parked there.

"We're switching cars," I explained.

"Move everything over?"

"Naturally."

"I thought we'd dump them here on Bukhansan."

"We're staging a runaway, so we switch cars a few times. We're not forging our alibi, but your parents'."

"Then..."

"We're not sticking to Bukhansan. We'll go to Dobongsan."

A transfer. Off to the next stop.

Though Bukhansan and Dobongsan lay side by side, the route took a while for certain reasons.

After a long drive, we arrived. She was about to climb out, but I pressed a hand to her knee to stop her.

“Mr. Matiz...?”

“Pay attention, Ji-won.” I locked eyes with her. “This is Dobongsan. Even if you spot some sign or label showing the real name of this area, do not read it. Understood? It’s Dobongsan.”

It was a lie, and she knew it. For the first time since the murders, doubt escaped her lips.

“Why?”

“Hopefully it won’t come to that, but if the police catch a whiff, they might use a lie detector on you. Those tests are mostly junk, but it’s still best to keep yourself shrouded in suspicion from the start. Make sure you ‘genuinely’ don’t know where you are.”

A flash of admiration passed in her eyes. “Understood. Makes sense.”

“All right. Let’s go.”

We got out to step upon a deserted mountain trail. Eventually, we reached the marsh I’d scouted in advance, which was already thick with trash. From my memories of traveling all over the country, I knew it would never be developed.

For all I knew, multiple bodies were already sunk in this swamp.

“Everything tied up properly?”

“I’ve double-checked. No mistakes.”

“Then let’s dump them.”

A soft splash. We finished a few more steps, and that “somewhere in Dobongsan” marsh swallowed any trace of her parents’ remaining life, silently and without evidence. It’d take a bit more time for the swamp’s “digestive system” to fully break down the remains.

“What about the bones? I cut them as much as I could, but I couldn’t grind them to dust.”

“A little farther up, there’s a row of abandoned graves. We’ll bury them there.”

“I see.”

We arrived at a half-collapsed graveyard. Some I’d dug ahead of time, some were already half-dug. We placed the bones deeper than a coffin’s depth and covered them with gravel, stones, twigs, leaf litter, and earth in layers, packing down the soil.

That took the longest. If I’d used Aura, it would’ve been quick, but I didn’t. Right now, I was no different from this era’s Yu Ji-won, just an ordinary person.

Her shovel scraped the surface, cutting into the earth’s soft underbelly.

“I’ve been curious about something.”

“What?”

“My mother carried me when I was a helpless infant. So I wanted to ask her a question before I killed her.”

Scrape.

“Why did she give birth to me?”

Scrape.

“I didn’t need a real ‘answer.’ It’s just… Like you said, there’s nothing in this world that’s inherently ‘wrong,’ so I assumed my mother had her own reasoning.”

“Couldn’t you just have asked her anytime?”

“She’s not a reliable narrator in everyday life.”

Scrape.

“Objectively, creating me was an excellent investment from their perspective.”

Scrape.

“I’m diligent, intelligent, and quick to act. The reason I focus on modeling is so that if an interview opportunity arises, the ‘middle-schooler who kept first place academically yet still worked professionally’ angle leaves a strong impression on the public.”

Scrape.

“My parents’ gambling addiction, my mother’s fanatic cult, my grandmother’s dementia—none of this is a real disadvantage for me. Anyone who’d attack me over it, I can easily paint as shameless scum.”

Scrape.

“Overcoming all these environmental obstacles to succeed in life, all while supporting my parents and grandmother—that story, by itself, would undeniably grant me a cloak of ‘humanity.’”

Scrape.

“Then… why are my parents not happy?”

The earth gave way.

“Even if they do nothing, they’ll profit from me. I never demanded they change. In fact, I told them it’s okay if they remain as they are. If they changed, that would affect my personal narrative. If they didn’t, that would affect it differently. Either way, they were just raw material for my story.”

Each time the shovel dug in, rainwater rapidly pooled in the hole.

The shovel blade carried half the weight of earth and half the weight of sky.

“They could change, or not. If they needed money for either path, I’d give it to them... And still, humans don’t become happy?”

The shovel froze.

At some point, Yu Ji-won turned to look at me.

“What if that misery isn’t wrong, either?”

At that moment, the raindrops that had been falling in straight, unwavering lines around her suddenly slowed. Water droplets quivered, elongated.

My eyes went wide.

Globs of water wriggled around Yu Ji-won, gathering, spreading, then coalescing again. For an instant, they formed 雨, the shape of the Chinese character for “rain,” before melting back into the puddle. The same symbol faintly appeared on the puddle’s surface, then sank away.

A bizarre phenomenon.

Seoul’s endless summer, the midnight sun, the apocalypse, those were still far off. And yet...

Here, in front of this grave, where people died and then more death was layered atop it, something akin to the world’s first Anomaly was stirring.

“Mr. Matiz.”

But it seemed Yu Ji-won herself was oblivious.

Her breath, her warmth, the outline of her raincoat, the very texture of her presence all blended with the storm.

She was...

“Maybe humanity itself—the world that spawned such humans—was broken from the start?”

...only looking at me.

Footnotes:

1 - Around $24,000, $13,200, and $10,400, respectively. So Ji-won sends away over half of her life-savings, which originally put her just above South Korea’s poverty line.

Chapter 324

The Skeptic XVII

Sinnoa

Who was the very first Awakener?

No, what even is an Awakening in the first place?

Is it a type of Anomaly? Is it stubborn pride, determined to keep its human shape, even though it's already infected with Anomaly?

Previously, I had no way to answer any of those questions. The solution to all of them ultimately lay in the beginning called the "first run", a deep abyss place beyond my memory's reach. Sure, I'd reconstructed bits of the past through Cheon Yo-hwa's power and I learned I'd once been a tutor for the twin sisters, but that was about it.

And then, there was now.

"Ji-won, you... What are you...?"

I found myself witnessing the exact moment when the first Awakener started to open her eyes.

Yu Ji-won.

Water droplets hovered around her, wriggling like bugs. Gravity, the physical law that acts most directly upon this world, was being scorned by these watery creatures, as though they found it laughable. The sight was bizarre, no matter how you looked at it.

"Please answer me, Mr. Matiz."

It seemed Ji-won herself couldn't see this eerie phenomenon at all. Or maybe...

Perhaps...

In her current state, she considered it not abnormal but normal.

“If humans, if the entire world, were defective from the start, why shouldn’t I smash this broken kingdom of machinery?”

The water-bugs squirming in midair scuttled onto Ji-won’s hair. And then, a shocking event took place. Only seconds prior, her hair was black as ebony, polished to a glossy shine. But it was now turning... white.

Awakening!

Or perhaps, Ascension.

The water-bugs wedged themselves one by one among her strands of hair, as if hanging themselves.

Pop, pop—whenever the mucous-like membrane of a water-bug burst, her hair became dyed.

A color more transparent than pure white that could only be called silver was infecting the ends of Ji-won’s hair.

“I can’t trust other people’s words anymore. Even my mother’s final reply was, in the end, nothing but a lie.”

Splash.

“But if it’s you, Mr. Matiz...”

Ji-won stepped closer.

Right up to my face.

“If it’s your answer, I think it’s worth deliberating.”

Her eyes gazed upward at me as a water-bug wriggled in. The droplet broke open, and like mixing a chemical solution in a transparent beaker, her dark irises gradually changed.

“Mr. Matiz, you always charged me for rides and claimed it was profitable for you. But I realize you actually had another reason for helping me.”

Purple and blue. Two layers of color swirled like chasing each other’s tail, finally interlacing as one.

“You pity me.”

An aroma drifted out from the swirling pools of her eyes. The scent left behind by the dying water-bugs wrapped once around Ji-won’s hair and then reached my nose.

A faint, grassy smell. Like a wild plant, fresh and green, that grew randomly along an alley and might be crushed underfoot and die come winter.

It was the body scent inherent to the newly Awakened Yu Ji-won.

Compared to other Awakeners, it might be considered an unimpressive smell. Far in the future, adult Yu Ji-won would confess she disliked her own natural scent. It felt too lacking in dignity for someone holding the rank of Operations Team Leader in the National Road Management Corps, so she deliberately covered herself with strong perfume, with special preference for one with a hint of strawberry.

However, this 14-year-old Yu Ji-won was letting her unvarnished essence show unfiltered.

“From the very beginning, you matched yourself to me. You made that ‘perfume’ you claimed was your natural scent because of my disability, right? You always approached with a reason I could accept, asking only for expenses I could cover.”

At that moment, the girl’s hair, eyes, and scent all fully merged with what I recognized from her future self—the Operations Team Leader of the NRMC.

“That’s the relationship I dreamed of.”

I took a moment to formulate my response. “When you get older and stronger, you’ll find far more people willing to connect with you on those terms.”

“Yes. Probably.” She gave a curt nod, face still impassive. “But no one in my 14-year-old life, first year, class 2 of Shinseo Middle, did that for me... On the very night I killed my parents and tried to bury them, you were the only one who helped me with no strings attached.”

She clasped my hand.

“Would you die with me?”

In that instant, the torrential downpour that had been slamming the earth seemed to freeze.

What first appeared around Ji-won as a little circle of stillness expanded rapidly. It spread over the graveyard where we buried the bones, across the swamp where we tossed their flesh, over this lonely mountain, beyond the town leaning against the slope... across the city, across Seoul itself.

The rain held its breath.

“If I’m with you, Mr. Matiz, then dying here and now seems like the right answer to me.”

She might not perceive it, but I did, crystal clear. That monstrous phenomenon wriggling around and through her.

Later on, people would call it “Leviathan.” It now blanketed all of Seoul, maybe the entire world.

Whether my self at this point in time, the younger ■■■, could see it, I had no idea. Perhaps, like Yu Ji-won, he never realized what was really happening around him, obliviously carrying on a conversation in the rain.

I couldn’t know, but to find out, I opened my mouth.

“Why... Why do you want to die right here?”

“Because, even if I keep living, assuming I achieve the greatest success, my life only proves whether my own answer was right or wrong.”

And then, she whispered.

In this halted downpour, her voice was transparent, as though echoing across the entire nighttime sky of the city.

“And I’ve just found my answer.”

Ji-won pulled my hand toward her throat.

“I’ve found my ‘wrong answer.’”

She gently laid her left hand on my neck.

“Ji-won…” I said, hesitating.

“I haven’t made a mistake. I don’t regret killing my parents. Nor do I regret sparing my grandmother. I firmly believe I made the optimal choice.”

The wet, herbal odor clung to the air.

“And likewise, Mr. Matiz, you exist.”

I had no response.

“You didn’t approach me out of physical attraction. I tested that possibility many times, but you never showed interest.”

One by one, her fingers pressed against my neck. First the little finger, lightly nudging the side. Then the ring finger.

“You had no interest in my wealth, either. Half my bank account is gone, and the other half is locked out by a password error. You were indifferent to the most valuable things I owned.”

“No, that’s not—”

“You’re no idiot. At first I doubted you, but after spending this night together, I’ve confirmed it. Mr. Matiz, you’re an adult whose intellect surpasses mine.”

Her middle finger curled.

Though her strength was puny, she was indeed compressing my windpipe, bit by bit. If I decided to reject her, those fingers would retreat without resistance.

“Hence, you are my ‘wrong answer’... How strange a person you are.”

Her index finger joined.

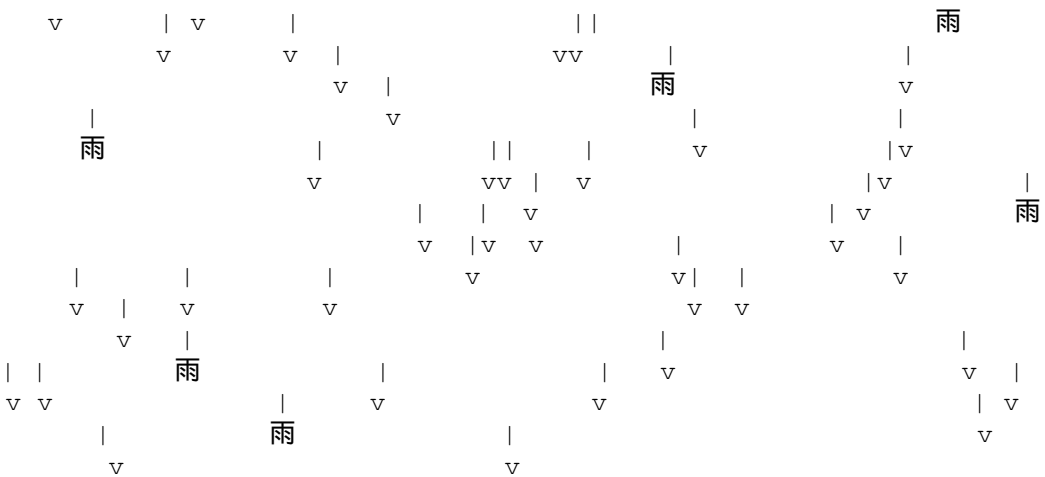
“Yet I’m sure that even if I live a life of success, I’ll never find a ‘wrong answer’ more significant than you.”

Her thumb.

Her entire left hand clutched one side of my neck. All that remained was her right hand, idle.

“It’s the same as how I could live a thousand times over and never find a ‘right answer’ beyond myself. Please. Die here with me.”

Far away, the raindrops stood still. The entire city, clad in night and mist, seemed to wail in unison.



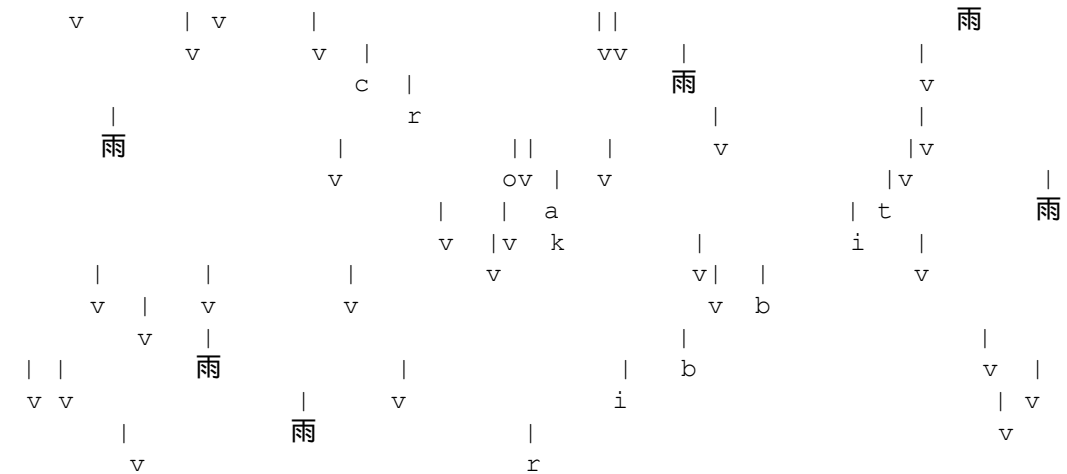
It sounded like the howl of a dragon, or the growl of an Anomaly, or maybe just the roaring downpour.

I knew at once.

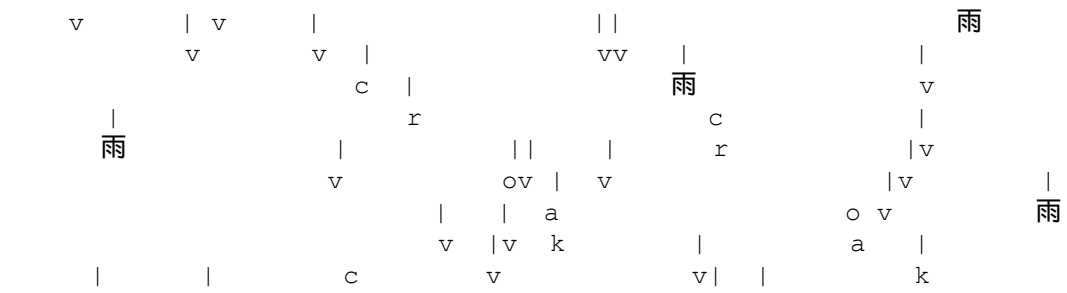
If I said yes here, it wouldn't be just us but the entire world that got swallowed.

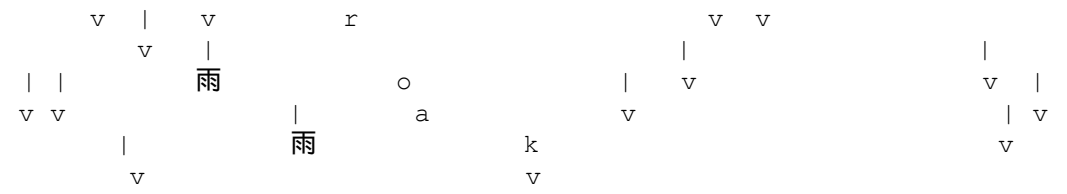
I didn't know how or why. Maybe the 776th cycle Leviathan had chased me even into Cheon Yo-hwa's illusions. Maybe Leviathan already had the power to submerge the world from the distant past and merely delayed the apocalypse until the 776th cycle. The one sure thing was that now, if Ji-won carried out her own suicide with me, she intended the world to fall with her.

A choking noose: five fingers around my neck, and invisible droplets around billions of humans.



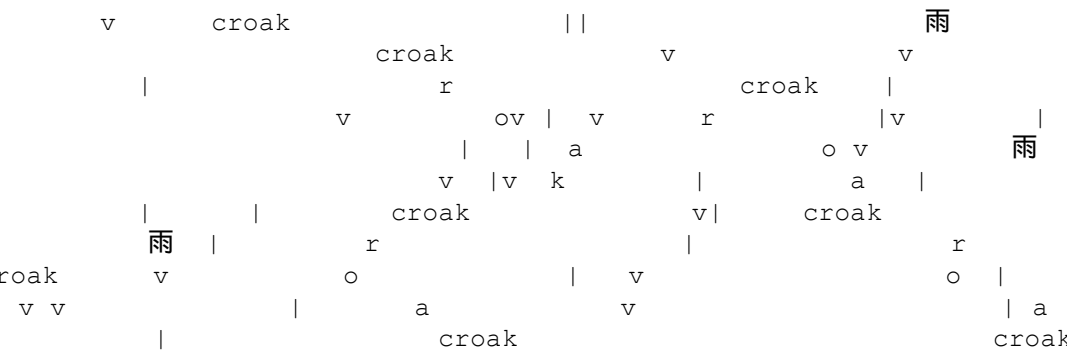
Just then, in the dragon's roar...





...a bizarre frog croak swam through the pounding rain.

It was the water-bugs calling out.



They soared above the graveyard and the swamp, singing at the pitch of the night sky.

‘Ah.’

A flash of realization struck me like lightning inside since the actual night sky had frozen in place.

When Leviathan first invaded Busan, or boarded the Ark Fleet, I’d sometimes hear a frog-like cry. Why? Up to now, I’d assumed it was because the Chinese character for “frog” (蛙) and the character for “insect/bug” (虫) were visually similar, but that wasn’t it.

Think about it, there’s a particular story strongly linked to the theme of a frog: the Tale of the Green Frog.

Long ago, there was a frog that was different from all the others. Whenever all the “normal frogs” cried “croak,” that frog cried “ribbit.” Whenever others loved the rain, she despised the rain.

Everything was reversed.

Her mother, who bore a child so different from her kin, fell into despair. At the end of her life, anticipating the daughter’s contrarian ways, the mother left a will in reverse.

“When I die, don’t bury me in the mountains. Bury me by the stream.”

In her final moments, the mother tried to adapt to her daughter’s twisted logic.

Then a miracle happened. The daughter, who had never once obeyed others, complied this time, fulfilling her mother’s final wish —which meant the mother’s real wish went unfulfilled.

Even in that single chance of a perfect crossing, they ended up getting their wires crossed.

croak 雨
ribbit
croak croak
croak 雨
croabbit croak
雨 croak r

The whole world wept rain, droplets born and died from that freshly-dug grave and that waterlogged marsh, from the saddest soil and filthiest water.

Taking the place of Ji-won’s impassive face and voice, substituting for the psycho who saw people as faceless bugs, standing in for the child who killed her parents—

The entire world lamented.

ribbit ribbit ribbit ribbit ribbit ribbit

“...Ji-won.”

I pulled the girl into a hug, shielding her with my back to cover her from the water-bugs' baptism, from the downpour she might be seeing.

"I'm sorry," I said earnestly.

"I don't understand. Why apologize?"

"Please... wait a little longer."

I couldn't see her face, pinned as she was against me, but I felt a slight tremor in her eyelids brushing my cheek in a blink. "Why should I wait?"

I don't know what words the younger me, ■■■, used. Surely they were his own answer. Even though I can remember everything, I can't recall him. However, I do know the outcome.

Yu Ji-won didn't die here.

On the same night she killed her parents, she survived. The young man living across the street survived too.

We did not choose a double suicide.

■■■ must have done everything he could to force her to live, so I had no choice but to do the same.

"The world ends regardless. It collapses... To a shocking degree, too. No matter how solid the world looks to you right now, you'd be surprised how easily it can vanish."

"Is that... true?"

"Yes."

She turned her head, holding my cheeks in both hands. Her purple-blue eyes stared at me. Ignoring that intense gaze, I went on.

"Humans don't get to choose their world, but they can choose to throw the world away. And quite often. They choose it a lot more often than you'd think, Ji-won."

oak croabbit croabbit croabbit croabbit croabbit cro

One raindrop finally fell.

“You might have thrown it away already, maybe you’ve done it many times. And maybe you caused someone even more misery. Someone’s child, who ended up just like you right now, black hair and swampy eyes... You might have earned the right to be thrown away yourself.”

Croak ribbit croabbit croak

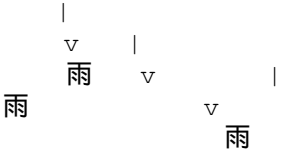
The second one followed.

“So don’t think it can only happen once. Just a little longer. If last time you made it this far, let’s live a bit further this time.”

“Until when?”

“I... Well...”

Croak ribbit ribbit



“We spent a lot of money tonight.”

“Yes.”

“We need to make more.”

“Correct.”

“And you want to study abroad in the states, right?”

“Yes.”

“So I might... have to leave for a while. But not too far. I’m just going to Sejong. It’s close. I’ve... got a really good offer waiting for me there.”

“You’re leaving our neighborhood?”

“A little while from now, yeah.”

Croak

雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨ribbit雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨雨

“Then, if I leave for a bit... Could you wait? Until we meet again?”

雨雨雨

Chapter 325

The Skeptic XVIII

Sinnoa

The saddest rain in the world is the rain that falls on a forgotten graveyard.

A young girl, not yet dead, listened to that rain and looked at me.

“You’re asking me to wait, but that will be hard,” Ji-won whispered. “As you know, Mr. Matiz, I can’t remember people’s faces. Even distinguishing voices is tough... So the only thing my memory can rely on is your scent. Would you please stay like this for a moment?”

I did as she asked.

She still hadn’t moved her palms from my cheeks. From there, she gently adjusted the angle, pulling me closer to herself to press her nose against me.

“I’ll try my best to memorize it.”

A voice. A deep breath. Another voice.

“I don’t believe in prophecies, even less so in cults. But when you spoke of the world’s end, for some reason, I found you strangely trustworthy.”

A breath. A quiet voice. Another breath.

“So I’ll try to survive.”

Although she always faced the world with a blank expression, Yu Ji-won’s breathing wasn’t entirely devoid of color or odor. No, she was the type who always confronted the world head-on, just at a slightly different angle from others. In that small, hidden corner, she worked fervently—as she did with everything—to memorize my scent.

“My memory isn’t extraordinary. I expect that after seven or eight years, I might forget the smell.”

“...I’ll be back before then.”

“Okay. I’ll stay alive until then. Even if the world perishes again and again, as you say, I will endure.”

Her voice was calm as she spoke.

“I find you... interesting. Your kindness to me is unusual and special. But from what I’ve heard, a person’s malice can last for over fifteen years, whereas kindness tends to evaporate more quickly. I wonder if you’ll really treat me the same way when we meet again.”

Ji-won drew back slightly, tilting her head up with my face still held in hand, and let a faint smile curl on her lips.

Hers was an unnatural, forced smile. That very abnormal expression was her normal.

“I have a reason to keep living now.”

And then, the downpour of water-bugs that threatened to swallow the entire world abruptly wrapped around my neck, like a noose on a condemned prisoner. The same transparent noose of water was looped around Ji-won’s neck.

Rain.

We both looked like convicts whose execution had merely been postponed.

We went down the mountain, that transparent noose still hanging around both my and Ji-won’s necks even after we made it out of the graveyard alive.

'...I have no idea what this is,' I thought to myself, tapping at the noose.

My fingertips touched nothing, even as the watery loop wriggled. It was definitely there—I could see it with my own two eyes—but I didn't feel anything that confirmed it.

'Ji-won doesn't even notice it at all.'

What was this suspicious noose?

To be honest, up until we disposed of that secondhand car near Dobongsan, I wasn't too worried. I had assumed coming in that Yu Ji-won must have some Awakener ability beyond Mini-Map, something I hadn't known about.

But then...

"Huh?" I breathed.

By the time night ended and dawn arrived, I saw people outside the car window. And that changed things.

"What's wrong, Mr. Matiz?"

They all had a noose around their necks.

Early-morning commuters headed to work, and every single one of them wore a transparent water-bug noose without exception. It was the same no matter where I looked. The people stepping out of a convenience store for a smoke, the bus driver standing beside them on the asphalt, the dozing college student nodding in the bus seats—all of them had that noose around their neck.

No one even realized.

"...No, it's nothing."

"Is that so?" Ji-won asked with a tilt of her head.

I swallowed as I turned the steering wheel.

This was happening because of Ji-won—I was sure of it. Before her “connection” to Leviathan, none of this had been visible. It started after we buried her parents’ remains, stood in the rain, and decided to live. From that moment onward, people—potentially the entire human race—wore nooses.

'Leviathan... Was it already affecting humanity this far back?'

I had theorized Leviathan was based far from the Korean Peninsula, only growing strong in tandem with my repeated runs and taking an interest in the peninsula only much later. But then, how would I explain this?

Three days later, Ji-won reported her parents missing to the police, saying she believed they’d disappeared.

The local station was already quite familiar with her household. The father’s gambling had long been one of the lesser concerns. Countless noise complaints had been filed against them, and that was before mentioning their ties to a cult that was causing headaches not just in our neighborhood but all over Seoul.

From those facts alone, the police drew an easy conclusion:

“Maybe they ran away in the night?”

It was the very rational deduction.

“They stole the daughter’s bank account by messing with the password. And the other one’s locked out entirely.”

“That college student living next door reported his Matiz stolen, too.”

“Wow, those scammer parents, unbelievable.”

CCTV wasn’t much help either. Rain poured heavy into the night, and the car took deserted roads. It was hard to track down any witnesses from that stormy dawn.

“Sergeant! We found that cultist’s car!”

“Where?”

“In Incheon. The daughter’s phone was also there.”

“Ugh. Damn it...”

“We also found some clothes in the trunk that must’ve been used for changing outfits on the run.”

The police, wearing exasperated faces, headed for Yu Ji-won’s home again. There they found a straight-faced middle-school girl caring for her grandmother, who had dementia.

They felt solemn. The local officers were already conscious of how they’d been neglecting this girl, letting her suffer family abuse for so long.

“So, Miss Ji-won, we’re trying to track your parents, but it’s not easy. Have they called you or anything since that day?”

“No. I lost my phone.”

“Ah, oh... Right, yeah... That’s tough.”

The police turned to the grandmother.

“Ma’am, do you remember anything about where your son and daughter-in-law might’ve gone?”

“Huh?” She blinked. “Where’d the kids go?”

“Yes, Grandma, it’s already been half a month, right?”

“The kids went somewhere? Where?”

The officers exchanged glances. They could only do so much.

“Well, Miss Ji-won, if your parents call again, let us know. And if you need help with anything, just say the word.”

“Okay. Thank you.”

They left, gripping at the sorry state of the world as he did.

“How can parents like that even exist these days?”

“That poor, good child. She’s so polite.”

“Honestly we shouldn’t say this,” one half-whispered, “but at least the neighborhood’s quieter.”

“True. Might actually be better for her.”

“Hey! Enough, that’s rude!”

Gossip sank into the cracks of cheap concrete in that hillside slum.

No one imagined a 14-year-old had killed her parents, buried them overnight, then calmly constructed a fake alibi.

No one in that neighborhood had enough imagination or ruthless cunning to guess.

Her environment itself proved that gap in imagination, the real void in her reality.

The case was closed.

Ka-tok.

[Leaving tomorrow, are you?]

Ka-tok.

[Mr. Matiz, is it really true that we have to take our shoes off when boarding the plane?]

[I want to believe that, but the internet says otherwise.]

[Anyway, I’ve packed indoor slippers just in case.]

Ka-tok.

[Looks like we’ll have some leftover soybean-paste stew. Once Grandma finishes her meal, I’ll drop by with the leftovers.]

After that night, time moved quickly.

It wasn’t just a feeling. Time literally seemed sped up, like watching a video at 5× speed and skipping through parts.

It must mean that all the crucial events at this point in the past are already resolved, I realized. There was nothing else for me to learn. Or to be more precise with it, this was all the information available about Yu Ji-won’s past.

It felt like a silent hint from Cheon Yo-hwa, the one orchestrating this illusion.

'I guess the me in this era didn’t have Complete Memory, so he wouldn’t remember each day’s trivialities in real-time. Only major events would stand out.'

I turned off the group chat that kept vibrating with ka-tok notifications and skimmed through the phone’s address list.

[Friends: 611]

[■. ■■■]

[■. ■■■]

[■■■]

[■■■ ■■■]

[■■■(■■)]

[■■■]

[■]

[■■■]

[■■■~■]

[■■■]

.

.

.

They were all anonymous. No matter how far I scrolled, I couldn’t see a proper name. Everyone was ■, just like me.

I sighed.

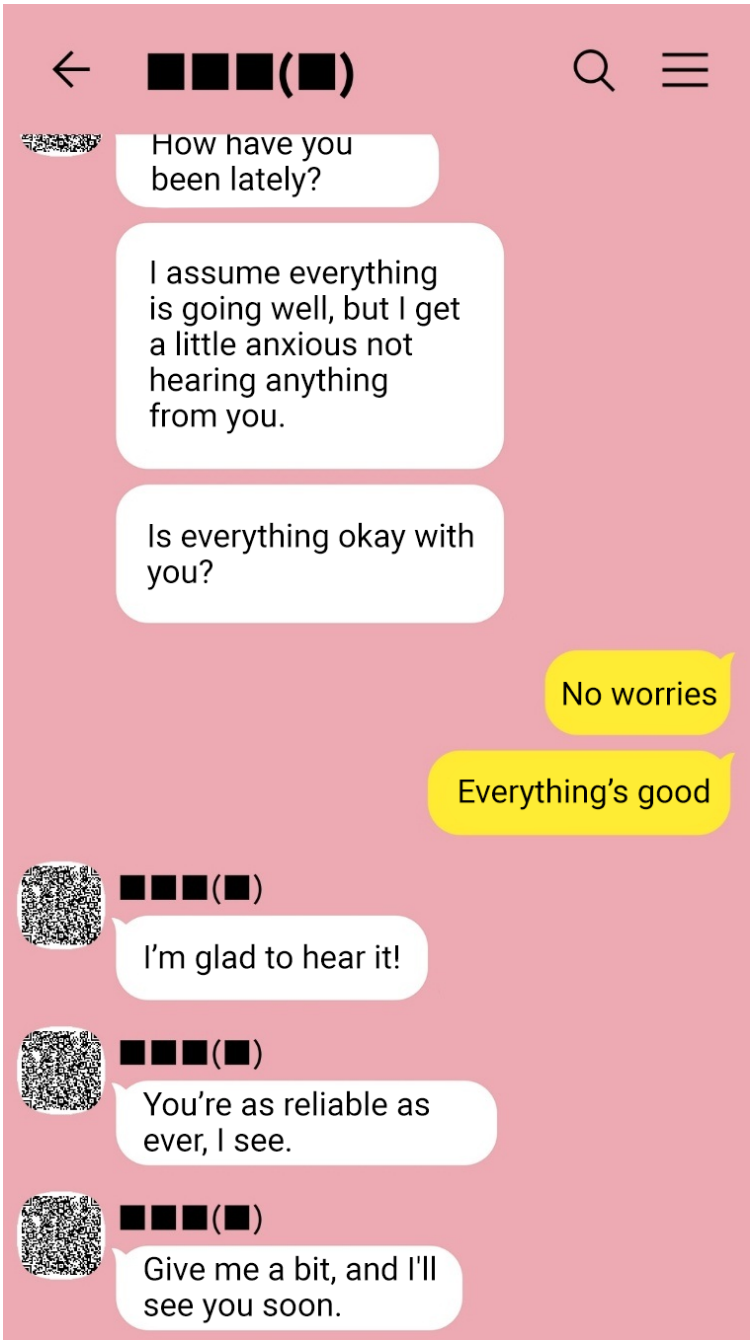
'I have so many connections, yet I’m completely blocked from tracing my past.'

I could call or receive calls, but that was pointless. I couldn’t understand anything the other side said, nor could they hear me. They’d just get “whatever this era’s me would have said.”

For instance...

Ka-tok.

A new message arrived. This time, not from Yu Ji-won but from someone else. I checked out of curiosity.



■■■(■)
How have you been lately?
I assume everything is going well, but I get a little anxious not hearing anything from you.
Is everything okay with you?
No worries
Everything's good
■■■(■)
I'm glad to hear it!
■■■(■)
You're as reliable as ever, I see.
■■■(■)
Give me a bit, and I'll see you soon.

"I have no clue who this is," I muttered.

On the screen, it looked like we were chatting just fine, but in reality, nothing close to that happened. They sent a text and soon enough, my “reply” auto-appeared. If I tried typing my own text, it didn’t matter, a “predetermined script” would override it.

'At least with them, I can see the conversation in normal text. With others it’s just static. I was hoping to learn more about my other acquaintances while investigating Ji-won’s past, but no luck.'

Cheon Yo-hwa must be enforcing that rule she mentioned: “A single sheet of canvas can hold only one painting.”

A wry smile tugged at my lips.

'I already blacked out for a bit, and six months flew by. This illusion is probably about to end, sending me back to her classroom.'

I’d hoped to at least stick around until she and I went on that bike trip to Japan, but...

'I guess it can’t be helped.'

Just then...

Ding-dong.

A doorbell rang from the entryway.

Not only was this building old, but so was the door chime, so there was an off-pitch mechanical hum beneath the tone.

'Ah, that must be Ji-won. She did mention leftover stew.'

Recently, Ji-won had started cooking dinner. It was partly because her parents vanished and partly to rescue her collapsing finances. However, a novice always struggles with portion sizes, so she often made too much and gave me the extras.

Ding-dong.

There was a second urgent chime.

“Yeah, I’m coming, I’m coming.”

I hauled myself out of my chair and headed for the door.

With each step, the illusion wavered. At the start of summer, it felt so lifelike. Now it was so unstable, as if about to disconnect at any moment.

'So I’ll probably just get her homemade food and exit the dream?'

That wouldn’t be so bad. At least I’d say a parting word to her, and maybe give her a final warm smile. Pity I wouldn’t get to ride bikes together, though. That would be left to my “past self.”

It didn’t matter. Once the illusion ended, I could reunite with her anytime in the present.

I...

Ding-doooooooong...

I scraped open the door.

“Hah... Oh dear.”

At the sight of the visitor through the gap, my entire body froze.

“What do I do? I only pushed the doorbell, but the button jammed. It keeps ringing.”

“...”

“It happened before too. Anyway, sorry, it’s been so long since I last came... Huh?”

It wasn’t Yu Ji-won.

She never spoke that way. She didn’t fuss like that. Her gestures weren’t that natural.

She didn’t...

“■■■?”

...have pink hair either.

“■■■, are you okay?”

Chhhzzzz.

She had no face.

“...”

“■■■?”

Chhhzzzzzz...

Where her eyes and expression should have been, there was only TV static.

Chhhzzzzzz…

Occasionally, through the noise, a voice slipped between the lips.

I was not as tone-deaf as Yu Ji-won. Even if the static interfered, I could recognize the speaker's identity just from fragments of their voice.

A groan escaped my lips.

"Go… Yuri…?"

And at that moment, the static elongated, churned, then tore.

Ding-doooooonng, ding-doooooong.

Ahahahahahaha— Vzzt!

Like an old TV smashing, the power to this world shut off.

Chapter 326

The Skeptic XIX

Sinnoa

The scenery receded into the distance.

Through the wide-open front door, I could see Go Yuri laughing like a broken radio. Behind her stood Ji-won, who had momentarily paused while carrying containers of side dishes.

All of it moved away from me at high speed.

– Mr. Matiz?

– Mr. ■■■.

– Sun■■.

The farther I got from the front entrance, the faster time accelerated.

A small hill. A scene of me riding side by side on bicycles with Ji-won. A blue convenience store sign written in Japanese, where we bought oolong tea and split it half and half.

– Mr. Matiz.

– Sunbae...

A view of me leaving Ji-won's hometown, a hillside shantytown. Then a shot of me leaning against an intercity bus, dragging a single trunk suitcase, arriving in Sejong City.

The moment I first met the twin sisters.

I got on a train heading to Busan, but... I definitely wasn't alone.

Someone was in the seat next to mine.

– Mr. ■■■.

Someone's lips moved.

"Sunbae!"

I opened my eyes, and right in front of me was a girl wearing a black sailor-style uniform with bright orange hair gathered into a long side-ponytail.

"Hurry, snap out of it, sunbae!"

It was the older of the twin sisters, Cheon Yo-hwa.

"Yo-hwa..." I breathed. "What— What's going on?"

"Aha! Good, you're back!"

Cheon Yo-hwa pressed one hand onto my shoulder and used her other to firmly push down on the back of my right hand, which was linked with the sleeping Ji-won's left. In other words, the three of us were all stacking our hands together.

"Make sure you don't let go," Cheon Yo-hwa said, her voice urgent. "The past you just witnessed, those were reconstructed memories drawn from this silver-haired girl's mind. If you let go of her hand now, she'll be lost forever."

"Cheon Yo-hwa, you..."

My lips moved. They were still moist with the ghost of a kiss.

Subjectively, I'd spent months in that flashback. In reality, only a split second must have passed. Even so, I couldn't even begin to focus on what Cheon Yo-hwa was telling me. Something far more critical had suddenly filled my sight.

"The noose around your neck..."

"Huh? A noose?" She frowned and said, "Sorry, I have no idea what you mean. Anyway, forget about that. We're in trouble right now."

She truly had no idea, yet around her neck was a transparent water-bug noose, exactly like the one I'd seen in that past illusion. If that noose wasn't something Cheon Yo-hwa herself had reconstructed, then...

"Look out the window, sunbae."

By reflex, I turned my head. My eyes shot wide open.

"Tentacles...?"

This was the Four-Seasons Classroom, the place where Cheon Yo-hwa had been subjected to Time Seal. It was a sanctuary that no one could enter by conventional means, especially since Cheon Yo-hwa, who had devoured the powers of two Outer Gods, was living here. Calling it a divine realm wouldn't be an overstatement.

Ordinarily, the four classroom windows should each show a scene of spring, summer, fall, and winter. But now, beyond the windows, bloodstained tentacles were writhing. The birch trees outside had all been snagged by those tentacles. They each shuddered in torment, emitting a pained moan.

Thump! Thump!

Some tentacles splattered against the glass, hurling the whole of their weight against the windows. Each impact made the windows tremble.

Red-flesh tentacles. I'd seen them a few times before.

"Those are... It's Go Yuri's..."

"Yep, the pink entity." Cheon Yo-hwa stared out the window with me. A irritated tsk clicked off her tongue. "This is bad. I'm blocking them for now, but it was a real close call. There's no way that pink one should've tracked this place down..."

"Oh, right. I forgot to mention. When I cut through Leviathan's rain to get here, I had some help from Go Yuri."

"What? Seriously, sunbae. What were you thinking—?" Cheon Yohwa cut herself off and frowned. “No, actually, I guess that’s the only way you could’ve managed it. I understand. But that doesn’t make this any less dangerous, sunbae.”

I didn’t disagree. “Still, it’s strange. Usually, Go Yuri only brings out that fleshy pink form in a confirmed world-destruction scenario. Why now?”

“Sorry, I really don’t know.”

Thump!

The tentacles rose in numbers and mass, joining the others as a singular force to slam against the windows. Oddly enough, the glass where the tentacles struck was smeared with blood, as though a fingerprint had been left behind. That crimson fluid pulsed and wobbled, forming the shape of a hand.

Splish. Splosh. Slap, splat. Splish. Splosh.

In an instant, dozens—no—hundreds of “red handprints” were plastered across the long row of classroom windows. Then the handprints raised their claws.

Screeeech! Scrape, screech, screeee!

The nails of those crimson handprints began scraping the glass all at once, at every angle, with all weights of force.

Cheon Yo-hwa’s face darkened. “This is bad, bad, bad... I’d rather get devoured by that weird Infinite Metagame data thief than be eaten by this pink thing!”

“No way to stop it?”

She whined, pursing her lips in frustration. “It’s all your fault, you know, sunbae!”

“Huh?”

“At that stupid Mastermind Simulation Lab, you messed around with those pink entities. If you hadn’t, none of this would be happening! They must've analyzed part of me back then!"

What the hell? I was at a loss for words.

We'd wiped out that Mastermind in the 688th cycle. Now it was the 776th. Almost two thousand years had passed, so long that it felt like ancient history to me. Any country's legal system would say the statute of limitations had long since expired.

"Excuse me, O Great Regressor? Hate to break it to you, but from my point of view, that was only a few days ago!"

Screeeeech!

"Kyaaaa! It's cracking! It's cracking! The glass is cracking! Sunbae, we can't hold out much longer! Three minutes, tops!"

I swallowed. Just up until we'd headed to the Tower of Babel, Go Yuri had been docile, or at least seemed so. I couldn't figure out why she'd suddenly turned hostile right after reconstructing Ji-won's past.

"If we really have no way to escape that sea of tentacles..." I said quietly.

"Yeah."

Cheon Yo-hwa turned to look at me. Her red irises settled into a grim calm.

"Please die here, sunbae. Reset the cycle. If you let yourself get devoured by that thing, and only afterward regress, it'll be too late. I can't really put it into words, but... I've got a gut feeling that something truly irreversible would happen."

I felt the same.

Way back in the 89th cycle, when I was killed by Go Yuri, another "Go Yuri" had appeared in the deepest depths of my subconscious. Luckily, that subconscious Go Yuri never seemed too hostile toward me... but there was no guarantee I'd be lucky again. If I died at her hands once again...

Who knew what permanent damage could deal?

There was a shattering crack on either side of me.

A spiderweb of fractures spread across the glass. Simultaneously, thin fissures began to take form on Cheon Yo-hwa's skin and her black sailor uniform.

I stared at her, unable to speak.

"Sorry, sunbae. I wanted to discuss all the info you've learned, but there's no time." Cheon Yo-hwa squeezed my hand a bit more tightly. "Without me, you'll still be able to figure out a lot of truths on your own."

"Yo-hwa..."

"Remember, sunbae. As I told you before, the memories you lost from your 1st through 4th cycles are each a blank canvas."

Crack! Ka-creeeeak, crack!

Hairline fractures continued erupting across Cheon Yo-hwa's body. Blood-red handprints followed in their wake on her pristine black uniform—one on her knee, one on her shoulder, then another.

"Once you successfully gather all four canvases, your past will finally be restored. You've already inscribed not just me onto your canvas, but also this silver-haired one... That leaves two more pages."

Splat.

A bloody handprint stained half of Cheon Yo-hwa's white face. Its red fluid slithered downward, and the fingers formed claw tips that dug into her neck.

They tightened around her throat.

"I love you, sunbae. And... I'm sorry I can't be of more help."

Crash!

All the windows of the classroom shattered. The glass that had held the memories of spring, summer, fall, and winter burst into shards and scattered.

The red tentacles and handprints, having finally broken the barrier, charged inside with a sense of exultation.

“Till next time... See you then.”

A spurt of red erupted from Cheon Yo-hwa’s neck.

Just before those red handprints could choke her to death, she took her own life. I did the same.

Cheon Yo-hwa’s head fell at nearly the same speed that my own vision blurred. Yu Ji-won’s silver hair also tumbled to the floor.

All three of us, everyone present in that classroom, died at the same time.

“Give... back.”

The red flesh tried to envelop us, but...

It missed by a hair’s breadth. The instant we died, the red flesh lost its prey, and it began thrashing wildly, smashing the classroom in rage.

My field of view tinted red.

“...■■ give back. That... return ■■■. ■■■ ■? ■■■ ■. ■ ■■.”

Then I closed my eyes.

Thus ended my 776th life.

Tick.

A clock was ticking.

June 17th.

[13:59]

Busan Station's concourse.

The clock there silently declared midday in early summer.

Yes. No matter what I tried, I could never rewind past this point, the absolute limit of time. My starting marker.

The beginning of a new cycle had safely arrived.

"Wha— What? What is this place?"

"Huh? Busan Station? But I was just in the park a second ago..."

"Reverend? Reverend, where are you?"

Murmurs spread through the crowd, just like usual. Before long, the Tutorial Fairy would appear and herald the beginning of the slaughter.

But before that...

I took out my smartphone and used the camera as a mirror. There, in the reflection of a corner of the concourse, the phone also caught Go Yuri standing at a distance.

She... looked normal. LIke she always did, tilting her head curiously, chatting with the people around her.

'Good.'

The regression had succeeded.

Go Yuri's monstrosity hadn't managed to latch onto me. She'd missed me by a fraction of a second. More than likely, Cheon Yo-hwa's last-ditch resistance against the intrusion of that red flesh had made all the difference.

'Still, it's dangerous to keep watching her for long.'

I pressed the power button and turned the phone off. Everything seemed the same as previous cycles, so I presumably just needed to stick to the usual plan, rescue Seo Gyu in the optimal way, recruit Sim Ah-ryeon, then arrange to approach the Saintess.

And yet—

“Huh?”

I froze.

The waiting hall had changed in a decisive way. This wasn’t a subtle spot-the-difference puzzle. It was blatantly obvious, happening before my very eyes.

‘The noose—’

Everyone who’d been dragged into the station had a transparent noose around their neck.

That by itself didn’t shock me—ever since I saw Cheon Yo-hwa’s noose, I’d suspected that all of humanity wore them too. After all, each person lived with a ticking clock above their head, a designated moment of strangulation.

No, the true cause of my surprise was something else entirely.

‘The nooses are... leaking color?’

I looked toward Ah-ryeon in the crowd.

“Uh, wh-what’s... Ahh... Ugh...”

Perhaps she’d been painting when she got summoned because her coat was covered in splattered paints. And at that very moment, Ah-ryeon’s hair was turning green. She was undergoing an Awakening on the spot.

In previous cycles, I had assumed that changes to hair color and eye color were just a by-product of Awakening, but the scene playing out before me was nothing like I had expected.

Slosh... Squirm...

The water-bug creatures that formed Ah-ryeon's noose wriggled. Translucent droplets scattered, some burrowing into her hair, others into her eyes. When a droplet burst, a wave of "green" spread out.

Ah-ryeon's hair and eyes both changed. Her plain black hair turned bright green, her ordinary brown irises now a vivid shade.

Pop, pop!

It wasn't just Sim Ah-ryeon. All around the waiting hall, the same phenomenon was happening. Whoever Awakened, their noose's water-bugs would shift and stain their body with a unique color.

My mouth fell open as I stared, dumbfounded.

'What... What is all this? So it wasn't just that Awakeners mysteriously changed their hair and eyes. The water-bugs from Leviathan... From Yu Ji-won's noose... They were actually painting over everyone?'

A shockwave of realization rattled my brain. However, I had no time to let confusion crystallize into comprehension. There was no breather for me.

"Ah, hello there, everyone! Surprised to be summoned like this so suddenly?"

The Tutorial Fairy appeared.

"Oho? The head count's a bit low... Anyway! You must be startled to find yourselves in a place like this, yes? But have no fear! My fairy self is here to be your friendly guide from start to finish!"

Very soon, the Tutorial Fairy would try to kill Seo Gyu. Ordinarily, I'd gather up my Aura, the unique strength some call inner energy or qi, and abduct Fairy Number 264 in the blink of an eye so that no one would notice. I'd drag the fairy someplace secluded and force her to talk. She'd initially resist, but seeing my overwhelming power would quickly deflate her.

"Th-that means you'd be a local collaborator, right? Indeed, colonial rule always needs local allies... Hweh! I designate you as our comrade!”

Then, she’d bow her head.

That was my plan, as always, so I began summoning my Aura...

And had to stop in shock.

‘What...?’

My heart pounded.

I couldn’t believe what I was seeing.

‘Why...? Why?’

My Aura appeared around my body, the same exact deep, inky black as always.

Everyone’s Aura had a distinctive color. It was something I’d taken for granted.

‘But why are there water-bugs from this noose painting my Aura black right now?’

On that day, my old assumptions were turned upside-down.

Human “Awakenings”... The coloring of one’s hair, eyes, scent, and even one’s Aura... They weren’t one and the same phenomenon. Those changes were separate from Awakening itself.

The real culprits behind all the varied colors of Awakened humanity were the transparent water-bugs of the nooses that hung around everyone’s necks.

The very ones summoned by a 14-year-old girl named Yu Ji-won.

Chapter 327

The Skeptic XX

Sinnoa

Mr. Matiz. Is it really necessary for me to learn self-defense in such a systematic way?

Yes. I told you before, didn't I? A few years from now, the world's going to end. We need to build up your muscles and nervous system in advance.

I see. So it wasn't a metaphor, but something you meant quite literally.

Exactly. And don't worry about your joints or anything, if you get some bone disease, we'll have a way to fix it down the road.

...?

.

.

.

Mr. Matiz. There's something I've been curious about for a while, so let me just ask you directly.

Sure. You always ask directly, anyway.

Would you like to date me?

...

If by extending your kindness to me you're trying to secure private benefits or desires, specifically, a romantic relationship, then please, I beg you to stop. You cannot expect any romantic interest from me.

Hey... look. Sorry, but that's not it at all. If I died and came back to life

775 times, I still wouldn't end up going out with you.

That's a strangely specific number.

Yep.

Is it because I'm a minor, so having a romantic connection with me would be illegal? Frankly, that would seem contradictory for a man who's already conspired to commit murder.

No, no. I just don't want to date you.

Pardon?

How are you not getting this? Yu Ji-won, your age isn't the problem. Even if you were an adult later on, I absolutely, seriously, never, ever would date you.

...

I'd rather date the Inunaki Tunnel than be with you... Wait, what are you doing with that hand mirror all of a sudden?

Hmm. My apologies, Mr. Matiz.

For what?

If this isn't too forward... I'm wondering if you might be suffering from erectile dysfunction.

You little piece of...

.

.

.

If someday in the future, I become the president of the entire world...

That's not an actual job, Ji-won.

My apologies, allow me to correct that.

Right.

If I start World War III, wipe out every existing nation on Earth, establish the one and only legitimate government, and become a new dictator under the banner of the Three Han Bloodline...

...

I'd make it mandatory for all citizens to wear perfume every day.

...Why?

Because the world is too messy. People blur together immediately. We need an anchor to fix our own positions. Not just smells, but hair color, eye color, even nametags should be used more aggressively so we can tell one another apart.

If you go that far, wouldn't it be more of a headache? Perfumes are so strong that they give me headaches if everyone's wearing a different scent.

That's fine. Keep someone with no scent closest to you, and it'll have the effect of a tranquilizer.

...?

.

.

.

Mr. Matiz. Do you have any plans to dye your hair?

Huh? Why ask out of the blue?

We're heading to Japan soon, aren't we? It'd be easy to lose track of you in an unfamiliar street if you keep your current look.

Ah, so if I go blond or something, I'll stand out, which is convenient for you?

Yes, though blond is too common and doesn't mean much. For instance... how about splitting your hair in half and dyeing one side red and the other blue?

So you want me to look like a walking Taeguk symbol?

.

.

.

I walked.

I carried out the usual routine: formed alliances with my comrades, cleared the Busan Station dungeon, and defeated the Void in Baekhwa Girls' High.

That's what my feet were doing. But inside my head...

'Dyeing.'

That single word played on loop, again and again.

So everything—human hair, human scent, and even Aura—was actually the result of being "dyed" by these water-bug creatures. Meaning that Leviathan—or more specifically, the Outer-God-connected Yu Ji-won—wanted this world to be colored in the first place.

My mind repeated the same steps over and over, stuck in a rut and weighed down by countless thoughts.

'She wanted to tell people apart.'

Prosopagnosia, or face blindness.

Ever since she was born, Yu Ji-won had struggled to recognize people's faces.

I'd go so far as to say that as a young girl, she called anyone with a similar build "Mom" or "Dad" no matter who they really were.

I walked.

“That brat can’t even recognize her own parents!”

In those flashbacks, I’d sometimes hear her parents yelling that from a nearby apartment building.

To Ji-won, people were indistinguishable lumps of matter—not fixed solids but fluid liquids. Less like rational humans, more like mindless bugs.

Water-based insects.

Just some wiggling, squirming things.

When congenital face-blindness was paired with a psychopathic nature, it forced the young girl named Yu Ji-won to see the world in that kind of warped way.

But if that child ever found someone she wanted to remember...

If, instead of lumping everyone into nameless crowds, she resolved to distinguish certain meaningful individuals, to truly see them...

Then what kind of wish would that girl have made upon the “Anomaly” that descended into her life?

I walked, entering a shopping mall.

The interior had been ravaged, the mark of looters who had long since come and gone. Scavengers had ignored things unrelated to survival, so some perfumes were still lying around, though luxury brands like Chanel and other high-end names had been snatched up.

Even in the post-apocalypse, the shopping mall remained a showcase of how human greed stratifies everything.

I wandered among the ruins, gathering seven different kinds of perfume.

Mr. Matiz.

Could it be that humanity itself... or the world that harbors humanity... was fundamentally flawed from the start?

Human beings have always been poorly engineered. We have no way to mentally cope with a situation like the ground splitting open while we sleep, swallowing our home and killing our entire family in one stroke. We have no way to write off a horrifying "accident," like a luxury cruise or passenger plane destroyed by a freak event, as just something that happened to occur.

This world contained far too many things, and humans themselves had far too many deficiencies.

What we call "God" was simply a name for the void that has existed from the start between humans and their world.

'...Okay. I've got them all.'

As for how to bridge that void, I couldn't be sure I ever explained it properly to a 14-year-old child like her.

'Let's see. These perfume brands... Yes, that's them.'

Ji-won. 地圓. "Earth is round."

A child was born into this world bearing that name, a name that described the round, flattened surface of the Earth.

I made my way to that child.

There was a convenience store. If one took the shortest route from Sejong City, they'd inevitably pass it.

"Hmm?"

From behind the store's cash register, someone turned to look at me. A head of silver hair fell across her shoulders.

It had been seven years for her. For me, it had been tens of thousands of years since we last met.

Yet in that single moment, there we were again—separated by a counter—passing through an instant and an eternity simultaneously.

“How curious.”

But the 14-year-old girl from seven years ago didn’t recognize me at all.

“I set up a fairly elaborate booby trap at the entrance. How did you get in without triggering it?”

I inhaled. “So… are you the owner of this shop?”

“Yes, I’m the proprietor.”

“I spotted two corpses outside. I’m guessing they were the store owner and a part-timer?”

“Hmm, you have a keen eye.” Ji-won nodded. “Yes, but they attacked me the moment I entered. I merely exercised my right to self-defense. Whether they were the original owner and employee… I have no proof.”

“I see. Don’t worry, I have no intention of interrogating you over murder. I have no right to do so.”

“You’re rather reasonable…?” She blinked. “Hmm. Since I’m supposedly the shop owner, I should greet my customer, yes? Is there something you want? If it’s not crucial for survival, I can give it to you.”

“Two packs of Marlboro Red, please.”

“Cigarettes are precious luxuries these days, but…”

“I’m prepared to pay you properly.”

“Well, if that’s the case… All right.”

She grabbed the packs from the display. At the same moment she handed them over, she whipped out a small hatchet from her waistband, swinging it down at my wrist.

Or she tried to.

Her eyes widened. Halfway through her swing, the hatchet came to a stop when I'd caught it in my hand.

Yes, it was something that had happened hundreds of times across countless cycles. But only in this 777th run did I finally see something clearly:

'They're exactly the same.'

The hatchet Ji-won was holding was the very one I once gave her as a "present"—back when I was driving a car with her onboard. The motion by which Ji-won swung it was precisely the same as the swing she'd used the night she killed her parents, when I opened the door of that third-floor apartment.

One of us was holding the handle of the ax, the other gripping the blade. For a moment, our gazes locked without speaking.

I let go. She did not complete the swing.

"You know... in the old days," I began quietly. "I used to think Leviathan was just some Anomaly representing the state."

I pulled seven bottles of perfume from my pocket, placing them on the convenience store counter.

Then I took out a few tools and began mixing them together, piece by piece.

"Because the further my life went on, the more infrastructure got built up. And that made me assume Leviathan's power was growing stronger, like a 'state' that accumulates strength over time."

Spritz, spritz— and raw scents began drifting through the air.

The "one and only body fragrance in the world" I'd created once upon a time was made of relatively cheap perfumes. Each had some harshness when taken as an individual, a scent body of rough edges left unpolished.

“But now I realize it wasn’t just the land’s infrastructure growing as my life went on.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about, customer.”

“Yu Ji-won... You grew stronger too, in step with my turning of the wheel.”

I thought back to the distant past back in the 5th cycle, when Yu Ji-won was with me in the Samcheon World guild.

“Vice Guild Leader.”

“Yes?”

“Could you get me passage on a ship bound for Japan?”

I had assumed she wanted to escape the hellscape of the Korean Peninsula and flee overseas. But maybe... Maybe she simply realized that no matter how far she roamed throughout Korea, she’d never find “the person” she was searching for. So she had to broaden her search to another country.

“Vice Guild Leader, please kill me.”

“Hold my funeral with your power. I beg you.”

I had interpreted that as a sign of total despair with the world, or that she wanted to use Time Seal to prolong her final moments. Could it be, though, that she just wanted to relive a “certain day” that had almost vanished from her memories? That she wanted to recover it in its entirety, even if it meant a brief extension of life?

“Vice Guild Leader, Your Excellency! I will serve you faithfully like a loyal dog until the day this world ends. So please, promise me this.”

“Of course, in the next cycle, I in my foolishness might not recognize your greatness, O Savior.”

I’d concluded that she was just a psycho obsessed with personal survival and power, turning traitor the moment she discovered I was a regressor, wanting to stay on a “fast track” to success across every cycle.

“When that time comes, just say this: ‘I know you killed someone at fifteen and dumped the body in a minari swamp on Mt. Bukhansan.’”

“What? You killed someone in middle school? Wait, that’s not the point... Hey! Quit clinging to my pants!”

Maybe, just maybe, she had some vow or promise that couldn’t be fulfilled that cycle, so she needed to try again in the next. She had to succeed eventually, no matter what.

And along the way, Yu Ji-won steadily became stronger. From my aide-de-camp, to Dang Seo-rin’s secretary, to a member of the National Road Management Corps, to a team leader, to the Corps’ second-in-command, to the regressor’s most trusted right hand. Across the entire span from the 5th cycle to the 776th.

It wasn’t just the Korean infrastructure that developed in tandem with my wheel of time. Yu Ji-won herself had advanced alongside it.

“In retrospect, it’s strange... You were always smart enough to hide your ambition for power if you wanted to. Yet you flaunted it, every single time, like you were deliberately feeding into people’s assumptions that ‘a psychopath thirsting for survival and power is only natural.’”

When she was 14? She was different then. She did have ambition, but no particular desire for happiness. If she decided on something, if she found a certain “answer” or encountered a certain “failure,” she was willing to end her own life without hesitation.

Above all, her highest priority was meeting “Mr. Matiz” again.

“You hid your true aim. Because the moment others discovered what you really wanted, that knowledge could become a weakness. Not even I, your regressor, was an exception.”

For thousands of years.

For tens of thousands more.

She kept her deepest secrets, all while shadowing me.

She pretended to be nothing more than a “power-hungry” subordinate who was cold-blooded yet never betrayed me, quietly leeching off my regressor’s life. All the while, I wandered Korea, then Japan, then China, eventually crossing the Eurasian continent so that the entire world would be mapped out, with every Void discovered, every person added to her Mini-Map.

All to find that single, solitary “one person” she sought.

“I’m sorry… For thousands of years—far more than ten thousand—you kept searching without fail, but I selfishly went and forgot everything.”

Inside a transparent perfume bottle swirled the mixture of seven distinct scents, an aroma only I knew how to create. I picked up the bottle and lightly spritzed it behind each ear.

A hush settled over us as my personal scent spread through the air.

“It may be late, but… I’m alive and back again, Ji-won.”

Finally, she spoke.

“Do you recall what happened on Dobongsan that day?”

“Sure. Even though there was no such mountain.”

Under her silver hair, a smile formed.

The same smile that a 14-year-old girl had once worn so many thousands of years ago, one sweltering summer day.

“Welcome back, Mr. Matiz. I’ve been waiting.”

Chapter 328

The Skeptic XXI

Sinnoa

“Mr. Matiz, you can just follow me from here on out. I’ve stockpiled plenty of supplies for the apocalypse.”

“Mm.”

“I’ve also marked potential hideouts in various parts of the country. Oh, by the way, my skill is a sort of mapping ability that lets me see people’s locations, but it has some unique requirements, so I traveled all over the country right before the transportation infrastructure collapsed.”

“I see...”

“I’ve also spent years honing my hand-to-hand combat skills to a decent level in three different self-defense styles. In short, I can be the one carrying you this time, Mr. Matiz.”

“Uh, Ji-won.”

“Yes?”

“I appreciate how hard you’ve worked to prepare for this apocalypse, but... most of what you’ve done might not be all that necessary.”

“Pardon?”

“Like I said earlier, I’m a regressor.”

“That term rings a bell. I’ve heard you say strange things before, and guessed as much. But what exactly does ‘regressor’ mean?”

“Well, a regressor is—”

(Some details have been omitted.)

“So to put it simply, Mr. Matiz, you already know countless ways to secure supplies, you have ideal hideouts chosen, and you’ve cultivated combat strength that’s basically the most humanity could possibly hope to achieve?”

“Yes.”

“Which also means that the resources I’ve spent seven years gathering, along with all those locations I scouted, don’t mean very much?”

“Uh… Not exactly…”

“Between you and me, there’s no need for polite phrasing. What you’re implying is that, even if it’s not totally meaningless, it was pretty much a waste of time.”

“…Yes.”

“Hmm.” Ji-won nodded. “All right. I understand.”

There was an awkward silence.

“Ji-won?”

“Yes, dear regressor.”

“…Are you upset?”

“How could I be? ‘Being upset’ usually means you feel someone didn’t show you enough consideration or respect. How could I possibly say I haven’t been shown overflowing amounts of consideration and respect by you, my regressor?”

Her face was perfectly blank.

“If you hadn’t warned me of the apocalypse in advance, I might’ve been swept up in society’s collapse, facing all kinds of hardships.”

“Oh, right. Exactly.”

“Indeed. Though if you knew the world would collapse, it might have been even more helpful had you told me to just train my combat ability instead of gathering resources to the point my tailbone nearly fell off. A small question arises as to why you didn’t offer that little bit of advice… but it’s just a minor curiosity.”

“…”

“…”

“…”

“What are you doing, Lord Regressor? Since the stockpiles I’ve saved here at this convenience store amount to little more than a firefly before the full moon or a matchstick before a forest fire, you can disregard them and move along to the next stage of your plan, right?”

“…”

“Oh, by the way, I also found a car similar to the old Matiz we used to drive. But I guess it’s useless, so I’ll leave it here. And this hand-ax I’ve been using, I’ll return it to you. Its blade is a bit dull now, so I doubt it’ll be of much use. Anyway…”

“…”

“Shall we get going?”

Breaking news:

The psychopath is sulking.

Vroooooom.

“Wow, these potato chips are so good! It’s been ages since I’ve had any. Once I started hitting the gym, I pretty much quit junk food. But now, thanks to you, Ji-won, I can stuff myself with chips. Feels like such a luxury!”

“…”

“Oh, and look, digestive biscuits with chocolate! They’re my favorite cookies! I can’t believe you stocked up on them. Even as a little kid, you always were scarily good at planning!”

“…”

“Wow, you even grabbed some high-end whiskey! Plus cocktail ingredients! Ji-won, have you tried drinking yet? If you haven’t had anyone teach you how to serve drinks, we could do a little—”

“Please. You’re being too loud. I need to concentrate on driving.”

“Right.”

Ji-won was driving the Matiz with impressive skill. At this point in time, the main roads hadn’t collapsed yet, so she skillfully picked roads that were still intact and sped along them.

Clearly, she’d done her homework in advance. It was an impressive level of preparedness.

Back when I approached her only as the “Undertaker,” she never gave me a ride in this little Matiz or anything like that. Most likely, she’d arranged all this as a kind of event for when she reunited with “Mr. Matiz” so that she’d show off her competence and readiness.

The Yu Ji-won. The silver-haired National Road Management Corps operative, a team leader, had gone so far as to prepare an entire apocalypse “event” for someone…

It was hard to wrap my head around. If the person in the driver’s seat turned out to be not Yu Ji-won but some “Yu Ji-won Anomaly,” I might even have nodded along like that made more sense.

There was something else odd too.

Pitter, patter.

Light rain fell outside the window. In every cycle before this, it had never rained at this time or place.

The route had changed.

My life as a regressor was nearly identical each time. From the perspective of a reader following my “story”, currently around the 328th chapter, it might feel fresh and new every day. But from my vantage point, it’s been tens of thousands of years. And the story has only advanced 328 times.

The unspoken hours. In a game, it would be that part labeled: [You’ve already read this. Skip?] That’s what consumed the vast bulk of my existence as the Undertaker.

And yet, once I met the 14-year-old summer girl as “Mr. Matiz” rather than the “Undertaker,” it suddenly started raining in a location and time it never had before.

Saintess.

Avoiding Ji-won’s gaze, I scribbled a note on my right thigh with my finger.

[Yes, I’m listening.]

Please check the Awakener’s vantage points who are not too far from the road we’re on. Say, a radius of about 10 km. Let me know what they’re seeing.

[Understood. I see 16 individuals so far.]

Currently, we were in the early days of the 777th cycle. I had only formed a blood pact with the Saintess a few days earlier, so she was still a newbie at apocalypse life and was also new to the way we secretly communicated via writing. She was probably using Time Stop for a second or two whenever she noticed my script, carefully deciphering the letters. Thus, I slowed my writing to spare the newbie from being overwhelmed.

Is it raining where you are?

A short pause.

[No. I’ve checked all directions out to five kilometers, and there’s no rain. But...]

But?

[I can't be certain, but it looks like the path you and Yu Ji-won are driving along is the only area where it's raining. Wherever you go, it rains in that exact place, following the road. Just behind you, around the convenience store you visited, there's rainfall, but a little farther away it's sunny—like magic.]

Rain along the roads.

Not rain from clouds, but rain that was Leviathan itself. It was following the path of it Miko and apostle, Yu Ji-won.

From a satellite's perspective, as we snaked around different highways, Leviathan's shadow would look like a giant dragon...

Or a huge centipede-like insect creeping behind us.

Rumble... Whoooosh!

Rain pelted the windows, and a faint roar, somewhere between the sound of rushing water and a dragon's cry, resounded in the distance.

"Mr. Matiz."

"Uh— Yes?"

"Haven't you noticed that something's changed?"

My mind went blank.

Her words were the classic, "I'm upset, and I'm about to double down on being upset. Consider this your warning."

I gulped. Forcing a serious expression, I ventured a guess.

"Well, you've changed in lots of ways. Your hair is lovely. You've always been smart, but now you're downright reliable, Ji-won..."

"Hmph." She stared at me for a moment. "It seems your eyesight has severely deteriorated, Mr. Matiz."

“Huh...?”

“Look at me more closely... You still don’t see it?”

If only I had Time Stop...

I had plenty of time in general, as a regressor, yet ironically had no time to figure this out calmly, like a student facing the last five minutes of a final exam.

Sweating bullets, I examined her carefully—like filling in testing bubbles, but with my eyes.

‘But she looks exactly like she does in every other cycle!’

Silver hair. Slightly arched brows. Eyes so pale they were almost transparent, a mix of purple and faint blue. A steady, expressionless gaze in my direction.

Wait... A gaze?

Yes. Even though Ji-won was in the driver’s seat, she had turned completely to watch me, as if steering the car purely with her peripheral vision.

“Did you finally notice?”

On closer inspection: She was only pretending to grip the steering wheel. In fact, her palms were not actually touching it. Instead, a stream of energy from her palms, her Aura, extended to the wheel, steering in her place.

“How...? How do you already have such advanced Aura control?”

“Aura? Hmm. An English-style pronunciation of ‘Aura’? That’s what you call ‘this’? So that’s news to me.”

Ji-won withdrew her hands entirely, yet even then, the faintly bluish Aura trailing from her fingertips remained. Far from dissipating, it snaked around the steering wheel even more freely, controlling it effortlessly.

My eyes and mouth fell open in shock.

“That’s impossible. At this point in time, you shouldn’t have such mastery of Aura. Aura normally requires absurd amounts of training.”

“Does it?” she asked with a calm tilt of her head. “Yet I can do it. I used to call it prāṇa,[1] but I like the word ‘Aura’ better. At some point, I realized I could move it however I wanted.”

In truth, Ji-won had always been an absolute genius in Aura. In any given cycle, she was the undisputed #2 in Aura usage, second only to me—save for the times when Ha-yul might rarely surpass her.

What if...?

A terrifying hypothesis flashed through my mind: What if she had intentionally hid her true prowess with Aura all this time?

Pieces of a puzzle began clicking together at high speed.

She managed to keep her entire “Mr. Matiz” objective a secret from everyone for thousands of years. Feigning weaker power to blend in? That would’ve been child’s play.

Just weak enough to pass muster... That standard would be slightly below the regressor, who was assumed to be the absolute best with Aura. Then there was Ha-yul, who was like an adopted daughter to that regressor. If Yu Ji-won realized the significance of Ha-yul, she’d adjust her skill so they’d appear to be competing for second place, occasionally letting Ha-yul gain an edge.

Yes... That lined up perfectly. Like a jigsaw puzzle morphing into 3D construction, logic built itself into a complex shape in my head.

Could it have started all the way back then?

I recalled an ancient era, buried like a fossil in my memory.

The 42nd cycle. Back then, the Meteor Shower Anomaly was the de facto final boss that threatened to destroy the world, in what now felt like a comedic misunderstanding. I had become the first to defeat it.

But how exactly did we beat it?

Meteor Shower brought ashen destruction wherever it fell, lulling people into a dreamlike sleep so they'd die painlessly. And the method we used to conquer it was mirrors.

Yes. We teamed up with Dang Seo-rin to develop a "reflection" spell. Then a 700-person strike force flew into the sky to challenge Meteor Shower.

"Team 12, final charge complete!"

"Team 11, fully charged!"

"Team 6, good to go! No major losses so far!"

"Team 4, minimal energy leakage, about 3%! Within expected range. Passing it forward!"

"Team 3, got it!"

We had arranged ourselves in 12 units. Each group faced a large mirror to which they funneled their combined powers using...

Aura.

"Team 2, done! Barely made it!"

"Keep going, keep going!"

"Team 1 is fully charged!"

And the leader of Team 1, naturally...

"Undertaker, Your Excellency!"

...was the one we all believed to be second only to me in using Aura, my one-time adjutant.

"Undertaker, Your Excellency! Now! We've transferred the energy!"

“Less than 1% loss!”

Yu Ji-won.

“Mr. Matiz,” she said, interrupting my revelation. “Earlier, when you told me you were a regressor, you also said something about a great monster called Leviathan. That it is infrastructure itself, a national entity, and my deity... That it grew in power with each cycle, correct? However, there’s a simpler, more direct measure of that.”

I used to think “Aura” was merely a typical Awakened power. It was something you’d see all the time in stories, so surely it was no big surprise in a world flooded with Anomalies. But if it were truly that common, then why wasn’t it sealed away when we defeated the Admin of Infinite Metagame, an Outer God from so many fictional tropes? If it was purely some made-up or “fantasy” power, one might assume it would vanish along with the illusions.

But it didn’t. Which suggests...

The power that fights Anomalies might itself be an Anomaly. What we called Aura wasn’t strictly a human privilege.

“Allow me to ask one thing... Across hundreds of cycles, hasn’t your ‘Aura’ grown stronger right along with you? Did you, by any chance, create your own so-called ‘Aura training method’ and spread it to other Awakeners?

I didn’t respond.

“If so...”

Her light-blue eyes, like a mirror for humanity, fixed on me.

“That means I’m not Leviathan’s only follower.”

Rain fell.

“That would make you, Mr. Matiz, and every Awakener who wields Aura complicit in empowering Leviathan.”

In other words, Yu Ji-won was not only the Miko of Leviathan, the monstrous rain entity.

She was also the apostle of Aura itself.

Footnotes:

1 - Prāṇa is a Sanskrit word that has a number of interpretations in English, including "life force," "energy" and "vital principle." The term is used in Hindu and yogic philosophy to refer to all the manifest energy in the universe, present in both living beings and inanimate objects.

Chapter 329

The Skeptic XXII

Sinnoa

Come to think of it, the first of my comrades ever to accept my regressor “coming out” wasn’t Old Man Schopenhauer (Scho), surprisingly enough. Scho first knocked on my timeline in the 6th cycle. And I’d met Dang Seo-rin in the 5th cycle, but... she never did learn that I was a regressor.

In the end...

“Vice Guild Leader, Your Excellency. You mentioned this was your 5th cycle?”

The first colleague who learned I was a regressor was none other than Yu Ji-won, my secretary and adjutant.

“Vice Guild Leader, Your Excellency! I will serve you faithfully like a loyal dog until the day this world ends!”

By that point, she was Leviathan’s Miko, whether she realized it or not. She had already achieved a level of mastery over Aura that dwarfed normal comprehension. Hers was a strategy of concealment, hiding one’s true potential in the shadows. Even if I or Dang Seo-rin had fought her at full strength, it’s likely neither of us could withstand Ji-won’s onslaught if she were to take it seriously.

But what if I hadn’t told 5th-cycle Yu Ji-won that I was a regressor? Granted, she was astute. She always hid her power, weaknesses, and even her strengths whenever possible. However, if she’d never known a regressor existed and genuinely thought her 5th-cycle life was her only one, then...?

– Grrrooooooo0aaa!–

Then perhaps she would have revealed her true might while fighting off Ten Legs’s invasion, showing the entire world the depth of her Aura as she sliced through those tentacle monsters with a single blow.

“Vice Guild Leader, look out!”

But that’s not what she did. She chose to die, throwing herself into the jaws of a monster far weaker than she was, almost like suicide.

Why?

“Next cycle…”

She wanted a promise from the regressor.

“Your Excellency… promise…”

Yes.

By chance, in that 5th cycle, I had personally revealed my identity as a regressor. Thanks to that, Ji-won managed to hide her full strength until the very end. Indeed, she succeeded in never revealing it. She could’ve called it sheer luck.

But what about the 6th cycle? Or the 7th? The 8th?

Could she keep withholding her power all the way to the end of those future lives too? If she had never learned that man was the regressor, might she accidentally expose her own threat level before him?

That was exactly what the silver-haired psychopath dreaded most. It would be a fate worse than death itself.

Yu Ji-won agonized over it. She did the math and acted accordingly.

“Next cycle… Your Excellency, promise…”

And so, she decided to “throw away” the 5th cycle.

She needed the regressor’s trust, no matter the cost of any minor side concerns. Only one promise mattered. So long as the next cycle's Yu Ji-won could be assured that Undertaker = Regressor, she could keep her claws hidden indefinitely. Thus, she would sacrifice her life in this cycle, and in exchange, she'd gain hundreds more cycles of survival.

A formula of life and death. Once that equation balanced out, she, Yu Ji-won, could gain an almost infinite return on investment.

Mathematically speaking, it was outrageous. Good grief, trading one single death for dozens or hundreds of guaranteed futures? Only a fool wouldn't take that deal.

Not dying would have been the foolish choice, so she was all too willing to die. She bet her life like a poker chip, risking it all in a single round of high-stakes gambling.

"I see. I understand that you claim to be a regressor, and that you possess the ability known as Time Seal."

And it worked.

"Damn it, I even know you killed someone when you were fifteen and dumped the body in a minari swamp on Mt. Bukhansan. Believe me, you psycho!"

"Oh."

At that instant—the moment she saw the man before her, who claimed to be a regressor, and heard about this "last will and testament" that her previous cycle supposedly left behind—Ji-won understood. She had never once met or spoken to that older version of herself, yet with that single clue, she deduced everything.

"Understood. I will come with you."

This man was a regressor.

This man had once been her superior.

He was—

"The last cycle's me eventually left this place and ended up joining your guild, yes? If I'm going to leave anyway, I might as well head over sooner rather than later so I can rise through the ranks faster."

"D-don't come, you creep! Screw off!"

He never saw through her true nature.

All that information about him being a regressor was just surface-level. The critical fact that the previous cycle's Ji-won had "successfully kept a secret" remained hidden.

So the 6th cycle's Yu Ji-won, the 7th's, the 70th's, even the 700th's... They would keep passing along that baton in an endless relay.

Thus did the poker-faced, silver-haired psychopath become a parasite on the regressor's timeline.

Occasionally, the regressor took a "vacation." During those so-called vacation cycles, he would still hang out with his companions and thus often upheld Ji-won's final request. However, every now and then, he severed all ties from the start, forging a new path alone. In those cases, Ji-won never obtained the info about her previous cycle's last testament from me.

Which might explain this:

This shop's coffee is top-tier!

—Samcheon World, Dang Seo-rin

The Sword Marquess of Yuldoguk

Thanks for all the good times. Lee Ju-ho.

My sincerest gratitude. But no matter how I think about it, the store's name and the clerks' shirts are kind of odd. Are you a member of the Red Army?

—Uehara Shino

Visiting on a school trip! Baekhwa Girls' High ♡ May our love last 10,000 miles forever

—Cheon Yo-hwa (天寥化)

Damn, the road here is too rough. Nearly died lugging the wine bottles over.

—NDH

Long live the Sixth International!

—Sim Ah-ryeon

If you had just sold me one carton of cigarettes, you'd've been the GOAT... Y

Your first customer.

For example, back in the 90th cycle, that time I opened a Sixth International convenience store, Ji-won was nowhere to be found.

In hindsight, it was strange. Surely she was active as a member of Samcheon World. Yet she never once visited that convenience store, the hottest spot for Awakeners. Everyone else came by—the Sword Marquess, Uehara Shino, even Noh Do-hwa despite her trust issues—yet there wasn't a single trace of Yu Ji-won.

Maybe the moment she confirmed Mr. Matiz wasn't in Korea, she left for Japan, or China, or even farther.

'All to keep her promise.'

I let out a bark of laughter that was somewhere between amazed and bitter.

'That's truly absurd... but it fits her. No wonder she was once the regressor's adjutant.'

Just like me, my silver-haired adjutant possessed a singular, infinite determination that fueled her through seemingly endless time.

"We've arrived."

The car came to a stop. Ji-won climbed out first and opened an umbrella, then she opened my rear door for me—a courtesy fit for a VIP.

“Please step out,” she requested.

Rain pelted down outside. “Here?”

“Yes.”

Looking up at the sky, I could see fleeting glimpses of a great dark shape in the swirling black clouds, probably Leviathan’s silhouette. Yet even in that downpour, I recognized the scenery with ease.

“This is a familiar neighborhood, isn’t it?”

We stood along a run-down hillside. Half-collapsed villas, a supermarket sign left on the ground. Dilapidated tile-roofed houses and small apartment buildings clinging like poisonous mushrooms along the slope, their expiry date long past. It was a shantytown that once barely survived on the warmth of the people living there and that now lay deserted as a habitat for bugs and rainfall.

Yes, this place...

“This is my home. And yours,” I answered. “I left here seven years ago, saying I was going to tutor the children of local aristocrats. Have you been by since?”

“No. This is my first time.”

“I see.”

Ji-won popped open the trunk. Inside were raincoats and the items she’d looted from the convenience store. “Let’s carry them in.”

“All right.”

Without further conversation, we carried the supplies inside as our clothes got damp from the rain. We could have used Aura to keep the raindrops off, but both of us chose to stick with umbrellas instead.

Surprisingly, the front door to the third-floor villa still worked. Actually, the building was practically the only structure in the ghostly hillside that wasn't wrecked by time.

5555.

I punched in a familiar code and stepped inside, with Ji-won following behind, dripping with rainwater. I stepped onto the yellowish floorboards and looked around.

"Where's your grandmother?"

"She passed away six months ago."

"...I see."

"I mummified her and stored her in the bedroom wardrobe. You may offer your respects if you like."

"Are you crazy?"

"I'm just a filial granddaughter."

When she lifted a corner of the floorboards, a secret storage space appeared, clearly packed with extensive supplies.

"Huh, so the building never collapsed?"

"It partially did, but I repaired it," she replied. "Fortunately, the old man downstairs had evacuated, so there was no neighborhood dispute to worry about."

"Was it a neighborly homicide?"

"Please wait a moment here."

She busied herself for a while. Before long, a delicious aroma drifted in from the kitchen along with her voice.

"It's ready. Dinner."

The spread on the table was hardly luxurious, yet more than splendid enough. She'd cooked using a portable gas burner and limited stock from long-frozen ingredients, but no one could have guessed it was the apocalypse from the quality of the meal.

I clamped my mouth shut, then opened it once more. “Thanks for the food.”

“Yes. Let’s eat.”

Chopsticks and spoons clinked together.

Outside the window, Leviathan’s rain continued to fall in pitter-pattering streams. Water-bugs latched onto the glass, writhing softly.

Yet as we ate like this, it felt unreal that civilization had already collapsed.

“So then,” said Ji-won from across the table, “how was it, living tens of thousands of years?”

“...It was tough. No cakewalk.”

“Want to die together tonight?”

The rain drummed outside. “No.”

“I see.”

Warm, freshly cooked rice sent up steam mingled with the scent of pork.

“Did I... kill a lot of people?”

“You did.”

“Was I a competent subordinate?”

“...Unparalleled.”

“Did you sacrifice your life for me?”

“...More than once.”

“I see.”

Clink.

The child who first tried her hand at cooking at age fourteen. The neighbor girl who would pack leftovers for me, saying she miscalculated portions.

Now, the meal we shared was nearly flawless.

She’d always been good at anything she tried.

“To defeat or weaken Leviathan is simple. I’m sure you’ve already realized it, Mr. Matiz.”

“...We’d have to give up Aura. We can’t use it at all.”

“Yes.”

Clink. Squirm.

A single water-bug had crawled up the table leg, presumably following us in from outside. Ji-won squashed it under a napkin with a firm press. Croooak! The water-bug popped like a frog.

“In the end, Leviathan only grew this powerful because of you, Mr. Matiz. If you were to give up Aura yourself, and refrain from spreading your Aura training method to other Awakeners, Leviathan would calm down... In other words, no matter what plan you cook up, as long as you, and countless others, keep relying on Aura, Leviathan will never weaken.”

Rattle.

“Don’t use it. Don’t depend on it. Don’t get addicted. Refuse to become a cultist of that monster god... That’s all there is to it.”

Something was being rattled.

“It’s also the simplest strategy in the world.”

‘And the hardest.’

I silently sipped the hot seaweed soup.

‘Give up… Aura.’

Thump.

Rain battered my heart.

The sounds of water-bugs crawling on the window seemed to wriggle through my veins.

‘Humans must renounce the easiest way to gain power. They must ban themselves from using Aura.’

For me, that was akin to being told to cast aside my sharpest sword, the paddle blade that had helped me navigate so many rough waters to get here.[1] Because apparently, that blade had never been a fine blade at all.

It was a cursed demonic sword… A warped and twisted weapon.

‘Was Aura… just a drug all along?’

I’d thought of it as my lifeline. Ever since I lost Old Man Scho, I believed it was the reason a mere support-class like me could still fight on my own. But if I stopped and thought about it rationally, it was obvious that Aura was something beyond the scope of normal human powers.

Then—

“Maybe,” I said unconsciously.

“Pardon?”

“Maybe to truly prevent the end of the world, we’ll have to abandon not only Aura, but all superhuman abilities, one by one.”

Suddenly, like a turbulent current, intense emotion surged inside me. It was hard to describe. Excitement, maybe? The water-bugs that had seemed to swarm in my veins were driven back by the pulse of my bloodstream, that bright red tide coursing from head to toe like an electric jolt.

‘Yes. Starting with the Tutorial Fairy.’

Then Ten Legs.

Then Meteor Shower.

Then Udumbara.

Then Butterfly Effect.

Inunaki.

Trolley Dilemma.

UFO aliens.

The Hollow.

City Devourers.

Monster Wave.

Infinite Void.

Nut.

Infinite Metagame.

Leviathan.

‘And every Outer God that still hides in the shadows. Without Aura, relying only on human power.’

It would feel awkward at first. We might slip into using Aura at times. We’d often need powers. But we’d try our best to hold back.

Step by step, we’ll erase inhuman abilities from this world. We won’t rely on demonic artifacts. Instead, we’ll turn the Anomalies themselves against each other. We’ll leverage this towering edifice of knowledge gathered over tens of thousands of years.

‘With nothing but these two hands, we’ll hunt down every last Anomaly.’

That was the only method.

A hidden route to the hidden ending.

It was the single precarious trail that might lead to truly saving this world, one you could only reach after near-infinite tries. A decisive formula that rejected the Outer Gods’ manipulations and proved that this world could stand on its own two feet.

Feeling my blood boil, I thought, ‘Is it possible? Really possible?’

And I answered myself.

‘Yes. Absolutely.’

So I steeled my resolve.

Thus, in the 777th cycle, a massive turning point had arrived in my long journey as a regressor.2

Footnotes:

1 - A paddle's blade can be used to create stability when crossing a river by triangulating with the river bottom. This technique helps keep the paddle fixed to the river bottom, which allows the wader to move laterally in the water. What Undertaker means here is to give up on his weapon which got him through thick and thin.

2 - The number 7 is associated with good luck and prosperity in Korean culture.

Chapter 330

The Skeptic XXIII

Sinnoa

A memory from the past.

A conversation with the Saintess.

“Mr. Undertaker, this might sound like a radical interpretation, but… you might have taken the place of Infinite Void and the Mastermind’s apostles.”

She laid out my powers and tried to link them to various Outer Gods, speculating on how I might connect to them.

1. Complete Memory – Infinite Void

2. Resume (Physical Strength Preservation?) – ?

3. Time Seal – ?

4. Enormous Aura – ?

The Saintess asked:

“These are your abilities, correct?”

“Yeah. Though you can probably leave Aura off that list. Other people can develop it with enough training, so it’s not exclusive to me.”

“Fair enough. I’ll cross it out, then.”

“Oh, by the way, I also have Mind Reading.”

“All right,” she said with a nod. “Let me revise the list.”

1. Complete Memory – Infinite Void

2. Resume (Physical Strength Preservation?) – ?

3. Time Seal – ?

4. Enormous Aura – ?

5. Mind Reading – Infinite Metagame? Mastermind?

Yes.

At some point, we did have that conversation.

4. Enormous Aura – ?

…

Aura – ?

…

……

Aura - Leviathan

Let's talk epilogues.

Here's the first.

From now on, Aura is discontinued.

In another world, that shocking announcement might have sent the Regressor Alliance into chaos. Much to my surprise, though, it didn't.

"What's that… 'Aura'? Never heard of it."

In fact, everyone was actually pretty calm.

"Aha. Well, you see, Commander Noh, there's a technique where if someone musters an intense willpower, some energy stirs in their body. Over time, that fluid-like energy can be refined until it cuts through objects or Anomalies like a high-pressure water jet."

"Huh? So you just concentrate, and some intangible fluid leaks out of your body and destroys things? Like a psychic power or something...?”

“Exactly.”

“What the hell, how is that any different from an Anomaly...?”

Right.

If you think about it, that reaction was natural. We were still at the very start of the 777th cycle, at the point when the so-called “Mr. Matiz” had just reunited with Yu Ji-won. Our rigorous training regimen for allies hadn’t truly begun yet, and the Undertaker’s advanced Aura manuals hadn’t leaked on SG Net. In other words, it was too early for widespread Aura usage.

Thus, the world abruptly lost Aura.

Like it had never existed.

Some Awakeners did develop their own Aura-like skills, but those were rudimentary and nowhere close to my meticulously refined “Undertaker’s Aura Method” from past cycles.

It was a reset, essentially. Like the old days, when an army of Awakeners had to risk their lives to defeat the “not-really-final-boss” Ten Legs.

‘Something just isn’t sitting right with me.’

It appeared no one but me even wondered about the missing Aura. People lived or died in a world that had apparently “always been this way.”

Well... There was exactly one other witness who remembered what the old cycles looked like.

“A-are you sure this is okay, mister? Really? Fighting monsters without Aura—is that even possible?”

Dok-seo, who had read part of my life story in novel form, trembled and chewed her nails in terror.

“We’ll do what we can,” I said.

“But you’re so weak, mister! At least Grandpa Schopenhauer had that ‘cut-everything-down’ slash power! Without Aura, you’re… you’re just a worthless regressor who can only go back in time!”

She was less of a devoted fan and more like a bratty kid.

“Plus, it’s not just about Aura, right? If we follow your logic, other Awakened powers might also be Anomalies. So my own AT-Field is probably a suspect, right?! No, that’s impossible, no way. Fighting monsters without an extra life is insane!”

I wacked her once. Dok-seo hugged her laptop and wept.

“Waaaah! The old man hit me! My dad hit me, my mom hit me, my teacher hit me, now the old man’s doing it too!”

“Listen, if you keep provoking people, maybe learn how not to ‘earn’ a beating in the first place.” Then I sighed. “Anyway, in the long run, we’ll have to reduce reliance on other powers. But it won’t be the same as Aura.”

“Huh? Why?”

“Aura, as I said, can be trained by anyone who tries hard enough. That means the more Awakened rely on it, the more it grows, turning them into Leviathan’s worshippers. But your Absolute Defense is unique to you alone.”

“Oh… so no matter how much I spam my shield, Infinite Metagame’s power isn’t gonna skyrocket out of nowhere?”

“Exactly.”

It was the difference between a universal and a personal power.

“Of course, if your absolute defense ever reached some truly absurd limit, that might change. For instance… if right now your shield can only envelop one person, maybe someday it could expand to envelop the entire planet.”

“Erk…” Dok-seo winced. “Like that’s possible, old man. My shield drains me dry every time I activate it…”

“Normally, yes,” I said, giving her a faint smile. “But sometimes… people do push their personal abilities to ridiculous extremes.”

She tilted her head, wearing an I don’t get it? face.

‘Like Ah-ryeon.’

Sim Ah-ryeon.

She would one day become the Saintess of the North, capable of healing not just a single patient but an entire battlefield.

‘If she kept getting more experience, who’s to say she couldn’t eventually heal the entire planet?’

A world without death. That level of healing might mean that even if someone’s head were chopped off, they still wouldn’t die.

I’d never witnessed such a thing, yet the image felt oddly vivid. I could picture it now: an enormous tree—a world tree—far larger than Udumbara. Its roots would pierce Earth’s crust, feeding on the core, until eventually not just humans but all living things, indeed even inanimate objects, and ultimately the entire planet or even the whole universe would be granted “eternal life.”

“Guild Leader. Please, don’t be sad.”

At the heart of that cosmic tree, a single girl would remain, sealed away forever.

A possible “ending” for this universe.

In that timeline, even my regressor power would be moot, because I’d never die. The trigger of my regression, my death, could never occur.

‘All Awakeners…’

A chill crawled down my spine.

‘All Awakeners are seeds of an Outer God in the making. They might not reach that point anytime soon, but given infinite time and experience, any of them could become a monstrous god, negating my regression for good.’

Regression was neither invincible nor universal. The world was filled with potential hidden Outer Gods.

‘From a different perspective… it might have been lucky for me that each cycle ended in about twenty years, or at most a few hundred. That was a blessing in disguise.’

If countless Awakened had thousands of years to grow…

‘Who knows how the world would’ve turned out?’

No wonder the Saintess was the first to become a Corrupted in so many timelines—she had Time Stop, basically unlimited time. Good thing she was so patient and ethical. Had a regular person possessed that power, they would’ve become an Anomaly ages ago.

‘The fact that one cycle typically ends within about twenty years… wasn’t a curse. It was a blessing,’ I realized. ‘Around the twentieth year, Monster Wave always occurs, wiping out what remains of humanity. Because of that, Awakeners never get enough time to become unstoppable or turn monstrous, and I can safely die, triggering regression, thus escaping a total hopeless ending.’

How coincidental.

‘Damn… Who would’ve guessed that Monster Wave was a necessary evil.’

I felt a sting of static along the back of my neck. If I pulled an example from a timeline where Monster Wave didn’t show up… The 173rd cycle, that was the Great Witch’s Utopia.

‘Dang Seo-rin turned into a Fallen One, warping Busan into a utopia. Monster Wave recognized it as an “Anomaly domain,” so it never invaded. The world nearly ended. I still don’t know how we avoided the bad ending that time, since even my Complete Memory can’t recall what Seo-rin did next.’

Every time Monster Wave was kept at bay, Awakened powers spiraled out of control.

Even after sending off Oh Dok-seo, my thoughts plagued me.

'...Is this all just coincidence?'

Let's think.

If my theory is correct, every Awakener is essentially a seed to become an Anomaly or Outer God. Some of them could nullify my regression, given enough time and XP.

Yet the Saintess, who alone can enjoy unlimited time + XP, is an extremely moral person. She's also my most loyal ally, so if she ever does feel herself slipping into Corruption, she consults me first.

All other Awakeners have limited time.

By the twentieth year, Monster Wave inevitably arrives and sweeps away all living humans. Hence, I nearly always get killed and forced to regress, allowing me to avoid permanent ruin. As long as I don't lose my mind, I can keep trying for a "happy ending" an infinite number of times...

My jaw locked shut.

Dok-seo's cup of coffee was empty, while mine—barely touched, a café-au-lait—still sloshed quietly on the table.

'If it's all coincidence...'

That's a pretty convenient coincidence for humanity.

"...There's no way."

I've lived in this world long enough to know it has never been gentle toward humankind, so back then, I couldn't easily accept this newly emerging "benevolent arrangement" in the 777th cycle.

It felt alien.

Deeply so.

Here's the second epilogue.

"Huh. I see, so Undertaker was Mr. Matiz all along."

We were in a café.

Oh Dok-seo nodded, but her tone and gaze were nothing like the real Oh Dok-seo. Even the espresso on the table was sipped with calm elegance.

There was no point hiding it. She was in "V-tuber mode," so to speak—copying and pasting personalities from earlier cycles to do a kind of roleplay.

Still, it was just an act.

"Honestly, I always considered him one of the prime candidates. If my memory as a child serves, Mr. Matiz originally had a faint personal scent. Undertaker also doesn't have much of a scent. So I suspected they could be the same person."

Indeed.

"And yet you concluded they weren't the same person, right?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"If Undertaker were Mr. Matiz, then from the moment we reunited at the convenience store, he would have recognized me. More importantly, when I swung my hatchet at him, he would never have destroyed it."

"Ah."

"That hatchet was the very first gift Mr. Matiz gave me. No matter how clueless he was, he wouldn't shatter a precious memento of our bond. So at that moment, I pegged Undertaker's chance of being Mr. Matiz at less than five percent."

“...Sorry.”

“No apologies needed, Your Excellency. The fault is mine for failing to recognize you.”

“Roleplay Yu Ji-won” (let’s call her “Dok-seo’s Yu Ji-won”) tilted her head in a mild bow.

“There were other factors too. Undertaker said I dumped my parents’ bodies in that minari swamp at Dobongsan, or Mt. Dobong, when I was fourteen, but he never grasped the true significance of Dobong.

‘Dobong’ has a poetic meaning, you see.”

She turned her eyes toward the real Yu Ji-won of the 777th cycle, not the ephemeral roleplay version. The genuine piece was also seated at the table.

“Do you understand it, 777th cycle me?”

“Certainly. If we parse the Chinese characters for Dobongsan (道峯山), we get ‘path’ (道), ‘peak’ (峯), and ‘mountain’ (山). It’s a metaphor for leading me, who was lost at the time, to find a path in my heart.”

“Excellent. I accept you as me.”

“I don’t particularly need your approval, but thanks.”

While both versions of Yu Ji-won exchanged remarks, I kept silent.

‘I just picked Dobongsan on a whim, honestly, because it was next to Bukhansan...’

No, wait. At times like this, I should think more like Cheon Yo-hwa, the older twin sister, does.

‘Surely the me from seven years ago truly chose Dobongsan for those deep symbolic reasons. I just can’t recall it now. And not remembering doesn’t make it sad, because that blank slate is a canvas for the coolest possible painting!’

Lucky me.

While my own mental spin-cycle was whirling away, Dok-seo's Yu Ji-won tossed out a question.

"How is it?"

She wasn't asking me.

"What do you feel right now? The worthless promise you made to your younger self has been genuinely fulfilled by someone. Does that stir hope in you? Are you willing to accept this world more readily? Do you feel less contempt toward humanity? Is the world still just black and white to you? When you weigh the reasons to live versus the reasons to die, does the scale start looking different?"

No reply.

"Yu Ji-won." The Yu Ji-won from a past cycle asked, "Are you a little happier now?"

A sense of déjà vu struck me, a sense of remembrance from a distant past.

"Ji-won."

"Yes?"

Once, I had flung that same question at my psychopathic adjutant.

The outward form was the same question, but its substance was different.

They were rooted in different layers of the earth.

The 777th cycle's Yu Ji-won propped her chin on her hand, then reached out and clasped mine. She gently drew it up before her face, so my knuckles hovered close to her.

A soft breath.

Ever since we were reunited, my custom seven-blend fragrance had accompanied me.

Then Yu Ji-won spoke. Before my eyes, her answer overlapped with the one from the past:

“I think I can be a little happier this time.”

“From now on, I believe I can become a little happier.”

Tick.

A clock on the side of the table clicked forward one second.

“I see.”

The Yu Ji-won from a past cycle, with hair as red as blood, nodded.

“I’m envious. Truly.”

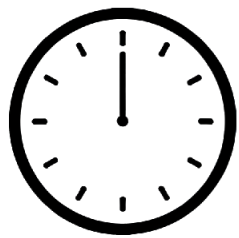
Session over.

That day, the version of Yu Ji-won whom Oh Dok-seo had summoned—an echo from a past cycle—continued calling me “Your Excellency” right to the end.

Chapter 331

The Skeptic 24:00

Sinnoa



And finally, the third epilogue.

As you might guess, my 777th life turned out to be extremely important for me, the regressor. If Kant had his Copernican Revolution, I, the Undertaker, had a “psychopathic revolution,” so to speak.[1] Thus, I wanted to limit all epilogues to events that happened in this 777th cycle out of a purely personal desire.

But when does life ever go the way we want?

Newton probably wanted to be lauded as an SSS-rank stock genius more than a natural scientist, and back when civilization was intact, everyone probably wanted to buy Bitcoin at its rock-bottom price.

My “story” is, likewise, not from just a single cycle. It’s patched together from various lives, each contributing a dish to the final feast.

So it goes, as always.

“Ah-ryeon, you can paint, right?”

“Huh? I... N-not really...?”

“Not really?”

I blinked. That was unexpected.

All my companions have some glaring personal flaw in their personality. Ji-won lacks sympathy, Seo-rin lacks self-restraint, and Ah-ryeon supposedly lacks... humility. Needless to say, I was startled to see her squirm like a frightened rabbit, twiddling her fingers together nervously.

“Right. S-s-so I can’t just ‘kind of paint.’ I’m actually good enough to be top-five across all of humanity. I guess if humanity had f-four fingers per hand instead of five, I’d be in the top four, obviously...”

Ah, yes. There’s the Ah-ryeon I know.

“Anyway,” I continued pointedly, “this guild leader wants to commission some artwork from you.”

“E-eh? Comm... Commission? What’s that...?”

“Well...”

I delivered her the order sheet in oral form. The moment I began my rundown, Ah-ryeon’s face began twitching until, eventually, she squeaked in horror.

“Th-that’s insane! It’s too much!”

“They don’t all need to be exquisitely detailed. But they do need to be drawn with care. Sketches are enough, as long as they capture the unique traits of each subject.”

“Ah— Oh? Uhhhhh. If... If it’s just sketches...”

“You, dear Ah-ryeon, are a brilliant artistic prodigy who can spit in even an Outer God’s face, second to none! So you can finish them all in a week, right? Your guild leader believes in you.”

“Eeeeeeeeeek!”

Dozens of days later, I left behind Ah-ryeon, whose spirit and body had nearly both fled, and loaded over four hundred pictures onto a cart. Because there was so much art, I couldn’t handle it alone.

Instead, I enlisted the best loaders and couriers of the apocalypse era.

Do-hwa frowned. “We might as well call this a National Road Management Corps caravan…”

“That’s basically what it is.” Specifically from Busan to Seoul. Fortunately, in this cycle, the Inunaki Tunnel had been cleared, so we didn’t spend too long traveling.

Eventually, we piled up Ah-ryeon’s works on the Han riverbank.

–Gꢀuuuu□□□□hhhoooorr…!–

The Road Management troops flinched and reflexively looked back, halting where they had been hauling crates off their carts. They couldn’t see it, but off in the distance, a monster roared, its countless tentacles lashing the air.

Ten Legs.

In the distant past, it had driven the Korean Peninsula into ruin multiple times. In this present, murmurs spread.

“I hear it just wiped out our military…”

“They’re all dead. Every last soldier.”

“Did you hear? Northern cities got annihilated by that thing. Small towns too, all of them.”

“Yeah. My uncle was a colonel. He died to that son of a bitch.”

Ordinarily, I’d have taught them my Aura-training method so they could combine their forces here and defeat Ten Legs. But “ordinarily” was in the past.

‘I have to conserve Aura from now on.’

A sort of “Aura diet,” if you will. Just like in the apocalypse, when every bit of electricity was precious, now we had to limit the usage of Aura. Only a few people could wield it. In fact, aside from me, Ji-won, and maybe a handful of others, no one had it. I myself intended to avoid using Aura entirely unless absolutely necessary. We had no choice, in order to keep Leviathan dormant.

‘Instead…’

Ignoring the troops’ agitation, I carefully laid out Ah-ryeon’s art.

Ji-won walked up to me and said, “Mr. Matiz, the monster’s approaching.”

“Yeah, I sense it.”

“I’ll have the others fall back.”

Thud… THUD…

The ground shook with the heavy steps of Ten Legs, which grew fiercer as it neared. Eventually, the caravan pulled out entirely, leaving only three people: me, Yu Ji-won, Noh Do-hwa. Both were stubborn enough to outdo each other. I doubted any scolding from me would make them retreat to the Inunaki Tunnel.

‘Well,’ I mused with a glance behind me, ‘it is a funeral, after all. A funeral needs a few mourners.’

Ah-ryeon’s paintings—about four hundred portraits for the deceased—were lined up in neat rows. Between the portraits, white chrysanthemums had been placed.[2] Hard to find in these times, so we’d grown them at the farmland run by the Sword Marquess’s faction.

–Gruuuuuoo–□□□□grauhhh!□□□!

Ten Legs finally appeared, crushing half-toppled buildings underfoot. It advanced—THUD—each step of dozens of thick tentacles tearing the ground. Every few steps or so, chunks of debris would fly past us. Still, neither Ji-won nor Do-hwa nor I moved from our stance.

Through hundreds of portraits, across the horizon, Ten Legs rushed forward.

I calmly brushed dust off my black suit. Then I bowed.

In the past, long ago, I used to think Ten Legs was just a standalone monster. But it wasn't.

'The Hollow.'

In this world, those who never receive a proper funeral are revived and linger forever. Ten Legs was one of them.

'When the southern half of Seoul was erased by the White Night, countless people died. Among them were many who left behind no known family or ties, they simply vanished.'

That was the core of Ten Legs.

If I were to compare the White Night to an atomic bomb, then the corpses at the very center of that "blast zone" turned into Ten Legs.

Nobody mourned them or even acknowledged them. Thus, they inevitably merged, weaving themselves into one monstrous body.

–Gr□□□□□□k□□□□!

But they weren't totally alone. Just like me back before the 4th cycle, they weren't utterly friendless. They lost their families, sure, but not every cousin's friend and friend's neighbor's aunt's nephew had died. The world hadn't fully ended yet.

By traversing the dreams of fairies, I discovered the faces of these missing people. From dream to dream, chasing those lost connections, I was able to "restore" the missing faces of hundreds of victims whose names and appearances had once been forgotten.

The rest had been straightforward enough.

"G-Guild Leader, does this look right?"

"No, the eyebrows are too thin. Make them a bit darker."

"Eek! My hands are shaking. I've already been drawing memorial portraits for six hours today! Are you going to take responsibility if my joints wear out?!”

“What do you mean? You’re a healer, aren’t you? If your joints hurt, just heal them and keep drawing, Ah-ryeon. No rest for you.”

“D-Demon!”

Using my Complete Memory, plus Ah-ryeon’s unparalleled artistry and healing, we completed more than four hundred memorial portraits over dozens of days. And it wasn’t just limited to pictures. Every time I bowed, I mentally replayed one full day in the life of each of those four hundred people, just as I’d glimpsed them in their dreams.

–Kkkuuuuu/□□□/Kyaaa-□□□

I knelt.

–Krrr/□/Rrra□□fah□...

When I rose from my bow, Ten Legs was still charging with savage roars to slice us apart—and it was visibly shrinking.

Yes. Shrinking.

“The corpses are...” Do-hwa muttered behind me. “Are they falling off...?”

The giant body of Ten Legs began shedding bits, like petals falling from a flower. Each piece was an arm, a head, a leg—some part of a human corpse. Having received a proper funeral, a real name, a real face, a real memory, these missing people finally returned to the earth.

–Grrr/□□uhhh-□□□□oo/□□...

Not all of Ten Legs’ corpses were casualties of the White Night. Some had died in other calamities.

However, now that the core had broken, the entire mass of Ten Legs collapsed from within.

–Oo□o□ooooo□...

Thud. THUD!

Every time it tried to lash out with a tentacle, its outer layer crumbled. Thousands, maybe tens of thousands, of unburied corpses spilled out in all directions—lost souls turned back into wandering Lost, no longer anchored to Ten Legs.

–Oooo□□□□ooo□...

At last, Ten Legs reached the edge of our funeral site by the Han River, but the monstrous might that once crushed buildings had utterly vanished. It stood barely tall enough to match a three-story building.

Then two.

Then one.

–O□□□oo... oo...

And then there was one final person.

They were a patchwork figure made from scraps of other corpses' flesh, maybe from animals rather than humans, just imitating arms and legs. Their white hair wasn't human hair but broken piano strings, doll threads, that sort of thing.

Through and through, it was the core of Ten Legs. No one could say who she once was.

–O... oo... oo...

Thump. Thump.

Within that mismatched mass, two hearts beat. "Normally," you'd slice away both hearts with Aura to defeat Ten Legs.

But not now.

"My condolences," I said, kneeling once more, "Professor Adele."

Emit Schopenhauer's wife.

She'd come to give a lecture at a Korean university and died in the midst of the White Night.

"You lost your husband, again and again. I can only imagine how great your sorrow must be."

I extended an urn toward the deformed figure with two hearts, a porcelain jar containing Old Man Schopenhauer's remains.

"I was a longtime colleague of your husband and will remain in this world until he returns. I'm sure that someday, he'll come back to you. I'll be there too."

I bowed my head.

"Once again, my deepest condolences."

Thump. Thump.

This couple had lived sharing two hearts for centuries.

The wife's arms, barely arms at all, reached out. They melted like candle wax, bits of stringy flesh falling off, as she pressed Old Man Scho's ashes to her chest. There was no real skin to hold them, so the urn rested directly against those two hearts.

–E□e... mi... t...

Thump.

Her heart beat once more, then stopped.

With that final beat, every scrap forming Ten Legs collapsed. Piano wire, doll string, guitar strings, buttons, bird bones, animal limbs, bits of unknown flesh—all of it spilled onto the urn and scattered around it.

A lone button rolled to my knee and toppled to the ground, spinning there until finally...

Stillness.

Then there was only the sound of the Han River's flowing behind us while one warped tree overshadowed the waters, its identity twisted by the apocalypse's Void Poison.

As I picked up the button, Do-hwa murmured, "Huh. So that monster could normally have been cut down in a single slash with that Aura-power or whatever..."

"Yes."

"Then there'd be no need to pick through illusions or nightmares to find all those missing people, no need to force Ah-ryeon to paint memorial portraits for days, no need to install a funeral site by the river..."

"Correct."

"I see. That's a ridiculous waste of resources..." She lit an incense stick as she continued, saying, "Which is presumably why you placed me at the top of the National Road Management Corps, so we could shoulder these burdens..."

I didn't answer.

"I'm fine with it, Guild Leader Undertaker." She looked back at me. "I like this way better..."

It was indeed a difficult path, even for me in my 777th life. Yet it was also a path that only I, who had experienced this world 777 times, could walk. A hidden route that wouldn't open if I'd lived fewer lives.

I'd have loved to choose the easy way, but when does life ever follow our desires?

Sometimes, the road that looks longest is the real solution. This world demanded that solution of me. I needed wide strides, a precise map, and legs strong enough not to fail despite the blisters stinging my feet. Luckily, as a regressor, I had all three.

“Mr. Matiz.”

That night, I was lying in a tent pitched near the funeral site when Ji-won suddenly appeared, knocking me out of sleep.

She put a finger to her lips, shushing me. “You awake?”

“...Yeah. I wake up the moment there’s any hint of movement. What’s up?”

She leaned in to whisper, “There’s something I want to show you. Just between us.”

A faint smell of damp grass wafted over me. In earlier cycles, Ji-won liked faintly strawberry-scented perfumes, thinking that was the Undertaker’s preference. But not in the 777th cycle. Now, she no longer wore perfume.

“You see it?”

Stepping out of the tent, I found a small table on the riverbank, probably salvaged from a ruined convenience store. On the table lay several maps.

“Maps and chess pieces... Your Mini-Map skill. But what’s left to show at this point?”

She scoffed, a light smile tugging at her lips—unnatural, as though trying to sneer but not quite managing it. “Mock me all you want. This is the end of me just being some ‘one-trick navigation tool.’”

When I only stared at her in confusion, she pulled out a small device from her pocket. It was an electronic watch, useless in the apocalypse. Electronics typically lost to Anomalies.

“Yes, I see your point. Why an electronic watch? You know they’re basically worthless or even hazardous these days.”

“Well, by placing this antique on my Mini-Map...” Then she placed it over the Korean Peninsula area on the world map.

[■■:■■:■■:■■:■■]

Blink, blink, blink.

Even though the clock had definitely been powered off, it suddenly started flashing. What was more, the numbers it displayed were eye-catchingly odd. A normal digital clock would display something like [■■:■■], indicating hours and minutes. Even a clock that counted seconds precisely would, at most, show [■■:■■:■■]. However, the one set down on the Mini-Map flashed its digits in a random red pattern.

Blink, blink, blink, blink.

After blinking a few times with random red numbers, it suddenly stopped. The final numbers it displayed were these:

[00:03:41:56:79]

No movement, like a display that wasn't counting time but simply stuck on those digits.

"Any idea what the numbers mean?" Ji-won asked.

"No. I'm clueless. What is it?"

"It's simple, Mr. Matiz," she said. "It shows the population of that place, the number of 'survivors.'"

My eyes shot wide. "So, in that part of the Korean Peninsula—"

"Yes. Three hundred forty-one thousand five hundred seventy-nine... Oh, sorry, seventy-eight people."

[00:03:41:56:78]

"That's how many remain alive in Korea. And it's not limited to Korea."

She pulled out more watches, placing them over Japan, then Siberia, then Central and South America...

[00:04:91:01:12]

[00:00:93:87:94]

[00:27:54:48:31]

As she shifted the devices around the map, the digits changed on the fly.

My jaw dropped. “Impossible. Your Mini-Map never had an added function like that in any cycle.”

“Aha, as I suspected.”

While I was shocked, she looked unsurprised, prompting me to ask, “Got any theories as to why?”

“Sure. It’s an obvious metaphor, right?”

“A metaphor?”

“Yes.” Blue-purple eyes locked on me. “A metaphor that since I met you, my ‘time’ has started moving.”

“…”

“Walter Benjamin said that beauty arises from something unspoken and hidden, from whatever simply exists as it is. He called that Aura. But I disagree.”

She kept staring at me, though her hands moved. The smallest watch slid across the edge of the world to reach Seoul.

“I’m not interested in whatever ‘beauty’ hides beneath the surface. As you know, I don’t understand concepts that someone won’t take the time to explain directly. I’ve been that way my whole life.”

The watch moved from Dobongsan to Bukhansan, crossing the Han River.

“To me, beauty means something that remains, even if we peel away the skin and expose the flesh.”

The watch froze at the southern end of Jamsu Bridge…

[00:00:00:00:02]

...the exact spot where we stood.

She quietly took my hand. I flinched as a murky, bluish Aura emerged from her hand to cover mine, but she wasn't trying to hurt or threaten me.

It was comfort.

Her Aura rose higher and higher. Ceaselessly, as if it were reversing gravity. Streaming upward like rain falling in reverse from the ground. Soaring to the pitch-black night sky.

Until finally, her Aura touched the sky, then silently branched into millions, tens of millions of strands, coloring the night overhead.

"You once told me," she said, "that an Awakener's power stems from their misfortune."

The night sky lit up in a cosmic rainbow of colors: blues, yellows, reds, purples, greens... and hues beyond words.

"But it seems there's at least one counterexample that your theory can't explain, Mr. Matiz."

The aurora snaked in bright, leisurely ripples, a stark contrast to the plain transparency of Leviathan's watery rain.

Where once, this girl had sculpted a chessboard of players relegated to a vision of black and white, the array of her rain now painted the sky with every color the world had to offer.

"When I was 14, meeting you was basically a wrong answer for me."

Does the Undertaker exist?

Does Mr. Matiz, who wandered with a 14-year-old girl through a rainy summer night, truly exist?

■■■—is he real?

Or was everything just an illusion? A void?

“I figure the human heart is split in two: half for someone’s correct answer, half for their wrong answer.”

Yu Ji-won had crossed from her 14th summer to her 21st, existing just as Cheon Yo-hwa, the elder “twin” sister in some sense, once had.

All of that merged here, under the glow of these colors in the night sky.

“I get that you might see discarding Aura as your worst defeat.”

Her silver hair, devoid of any particular hue, now refracted all the night sky’s colors.

“But meeting you, Mr. Matiz, was my greatest fortune. Because even back when I had no power, you were my hero. So.”

Beneath these paints, we could all be equally real or equally false. Which one was true depended on my choice. It wasn’t possible to say only I existed or everyone else existed except me. Either none existed or all existed.

Void or coexistence. The ultimate choice.

“Mr. Matiz.”

Ji-won had made hers.

“This time, I’d like to be your error.”

I decided in that moment.

Anomaly: Leviathan

Aliases: Grand Monsoon, the Water Bug, Thales’s World, the First Promise, Infrastructure, the Nation, the State, Hobbes’s Monster, Aura, Aurora

Threat Level: Lv.5 Outer-God Class (Alienation)

Subjugation in progress.

Footnotes:

1 - Copernicus was the scientist to posit that the planets revolve around the sun, but also that all things in our solar system—including the sun itself—move relative to other objects in the system. Likewise, the philosopher Kant was the first to theorize that it is not just that the world imposes its environment on us, but that we ourselves actively shape and define the world around us by the very act of being within it and that we are indeed the focal point of that interaction.

2 - White chrysanthemums can symbolize mourning and grief.

Chapter 332

The Self-Immolator I

Sinnoa

Q: There's an old saying that "people can't be fixed once they're broken." Do you agree?

A: Yu Ji-won breaks that rule.

As shown in the previous story, throughout my long life as a regressor, there's been no one who's shown more dramatic growth as a character than Yu Ji-won.

Then again, perhaps I'm being too regressor-centric in my thinking.

"Good morning, Mr. Matiz."

In truth, Ji-won hadn't changed at all. She simply kept a landscape painting from her 14th summer, displayed deep inside her heart, exactly as always. The one who had actually changed was me, and since I had gone from being "Your Excellency the Undertaker" to "Mr. Matiz," her attitude toward me also changed.

Yes, surely nothing else has changed...

"Mr. Matiz, did you sleep well last night?"

"Uh... Yeah."

"That's a relief. I recall you used to suffer from bouts of insomnia in the old days, but it seems to have fully cleared now. Here's some chamomile tea I picked up. I'll brew you a cup at night if you're ever feeling lonely."

"O-oh. Th-thanks."

"Don't mention it."

Even putting aside the fact that I didn't realize I'd ever had insomnia, I had good reason to respond so awkwardly. After all, the location where Ji-won was speaking to me was none other than a conference room dedicated to our Regression Alliance in the National Road Management Corps main headquarters. In short, she was openly flaunting her rapport with me right in front of Noh Do-hwa, Seo Gyu, Cheon Yo-hwa, Sim Ah-ryeon, Lee Ha-yul, Oh Dok-seo, and the rest.

"Um, Teacher," Yo-hwa called with a bright smile. "I've been a little curious for a while now. Why does the Operations Team Leader over there call you 'Mr. Matiz' anyway?"

"Ah, well, you see, Yo-hwa... Actually—"

"It's nothing special." Cutting off my reply, Ji-won answered, "Doesn't the president of Baekhwa Girls' High also refrain from using the alias 'Undertaker' when addressing you, choosing to call you 'Teacher' instead?"

"Sure, but I didn't ask you."

Yo-hwa's interjection was ignored. "It's exactly the same reason."

"Eh?"

"The title the president gave you implies a sense of exclusive personal connection. It proudly displays a relationship that outsiders can never intrude upon," Ji-won reasoned calmly. "It's the same with me. You could say that in a way, I share the same sentiment as the president. Oh, though she is seven years late in forming her connection compared to me, of course. That's the only difference."

Yo-hwa smiled with her eyes. "Huh. Guess the team leader and I have similar personalities even though she's a bit older. Hey, Team Leader, should I start calling you unnie?"

"That won't be necessary. Since Awakeners no longer age anyway, you'd be stuck calling me 'unnie' forever, and that might feel a bit unfair to you."

“Aw, why? Once someone’s your unnie, she’s your unnie for life. Team Leader, I never thought you’d worry about something like that.”

“Hmm. Actually, you have a point. You’ll never bridge that seven-year gap.”

The temperature in the conference room dropped. Do-hwa began wiping her glasses, Seo Gyu muttered something under his breath about SG Net being full of trolls while fiddling with his smartphone, Ha-yul suddenly started repairing her maid-doll, and Ah-ryeon had already been dozing off for a while.

“OMG! Hey, Mister! This is nuts!”

Only Dok-seo was whispering in my ear with shining eyes.

“I never imagined there’d be a rivalry angle between Yo-hwa unnie and Ji-won unnie! But now that I see it, it kinda works, huh? The two of them look like they’re hogging all the darkness in the world —you know, instead of all the light. It’s a real feast for the eyes.”

“You... No, forget it. You’re the reason I can still breathe, Dok-seo.”

“Is that a compliment?”

“Of course it is. You have boundless imagination, so it’s no wonder the Admin of the Infinite Metagame picked you to be its miko.”

“Th-thank you?”

“Sure.”

Although, after she’d handed over every ounce of her strength to being that miko, she ended up beating fans senseless at a meet-and-greet... No one, not even the Anomalies, could have predicted the sheer power of a chuunibyou otaku’s imagination.

Do-hwa chose that moment to interrupt, placing her glasses back on. “All right, then. If you’re all done with whatever that was, let’s get back to the meeting...”

Both Yo-hwa and Ji-won quietly resumed their seats. In our alliance, disregarding Do-hwa's authority was never acceptable, no matter what the situation.

Dark circles hung under Do-hwa's eyes like weeping willow branches.

"As you all know, we recently discovered that many Anomalies, including the Ten Legs, can be eradicated via a proper funeral rite. But given that the number of Hollow roaming around out there is greater than the remaining living population, we can't take care of every single body ourselves..."

And so, she shifted her gaze.

"Awakener Seo Gyu...?"

"Oh, right!" Seo Gyu said, holding up his smartphone in his right hand. "Based on the last meeting, we've created a brand new Missing Persons Board on SG Net."

Thanks to the weight training I'd taught him, his shoulders and triceps looked especially robust. Incidentally, Seo Gyu had set up an outdoor gym on Haeundae Beach, which boasted around 40 active members. Even in the apocalypse, some folks apparently just couldn't give up the iron.

"The Missing Persons Board has memorial portraits drawn by Ah-ryeon, and we've made the search function super user-friendly, so family members can find it any time."

The delicate tension among the alliance members ebbed, and the meeting moved along.

"Oh, right. Guild Leader Undertaker..."

"Yes?"

"We've gotten another letter from that monk guy, what's his name, Seok-hwa, I think? He says he plans to lead his fellow monks and believers in a 'Trans-Korean Joint Funeral Service.' What should we do...?"

“Hmm.”

“To me, it just sounds like a fancy way of committing mass suicide...”

Anyway, there it was. The “Seok-hwa” they just mentioned in passing—his Buddhist name—was the protagonist of this story. Sure, Do-hwa and I kept calling him a “dodgy monk” or a “renegade monk,” but plenty of folks out there respected him as the Venerable Seok-hwa.

While his name has only just appeared in this narrative, you might already be well acquainted with who he is. Where did he first show up, you ask?

“This is the might of the New Buddha!”

“If you believe in the New Buddha, you’ll be freed from every affliction and suffering, and granted a new body to live on in a brand-new world!”

It all goes back to the Udumbara story. He was the main instigator behind that pseudo-religion worshiping the Anomaly virus as a savior, aka the New Buddha Church.

“Immortal life through living flame! Eternal life in the floral realm!”

That man was none other than the renegade monk Seok-hwa.

The existence of a regressor in this world was not a blessing for everyone. While fortunes bloomed for Ji-won, there would always be others whose destiny was twisted beyond repair. The renegade monk Seok-hwa was one of those cases.

Up until around my 10th run, this ex-monk practically reigned with unlimited power. If you have a good memory, you might recall a conversation between Seo-rin and me in a very early cycle.

“Hah. These ‘flower guys’ are driving us to our wits’ end.”

“Right? In a world as hellish as this, it’s not surprising that people cling to a cult. The Neo Budhha Rebellion didn’t happen for no reason.”

We both sighed.

Even back then, Seo-rin enjoyed absolute dominance over Busan, yet not even she could get a handle on the New Buddha Church. The best she could do was avoid conflict by offering them massive gifts.

Still, let's be honest: In an apocalypse, "donations" are basically bribes or tributes. We offered them valuables to purchase peace. In other words, if someone like Seo-rin, the ruler of Busan, had to deliver tributes under the guise of "offerings," that should show how enormous the New Buddha Church's influence used to be.

"Oh, come on now, dear Ms. Dang Seo-rin. Although you don't yet enjoy the Buddha's grace, you devote yourself to saving the Middle Ages. Why would We of the Flowers treat you poorly?"

Back then, Seok-hwa would smirk slyly, savoring the hierarchy of power between us.

He had every reason to be so cocky. After all, while we only controlled Busan, the New Buddha Church had extended its reach across the Korean Peninsula, the Japanese archipelago, and even mainland China. Even the dispatch of volunteer troops from Japan depended on the New Buddha Church, or more precisely, on Seok-hwa's approval.

Whenever Seok-hwa held a rally, even in that mad apocalypse, tens of thousands of believers gathered, cheering wildly.

"People! What does "your overlord" mean? It is the flower blossoming on your very heads!"

"Waaaaaah!"

"Immortal life! Eternal flowering!"

However, all that changed drastically in the 41st run.

"Undertaker."

The first impact.

“I found it.”

“In South Chungcheong Province, Asan. The Onyang region.”

That’s right. Everything shifted the moment the Saintess discovered the source of the Udumbara virus. From that point on, the downfall of renegade monk Seok-hwa, who had once ruled the Korean Peninsula, became inevitable.

Now then, do you remember how the New Buddha Church spread so quickly in the first place? Because people believed that if you had a flower blooming on your head, you could survive even if your limbs were cut off. Problem was, once the source of the Udumbara virus was eliminated, it became obvious that the New Buddha Church was just a cult with flashy speeches and decent organizational skills—nothing more, nothing less. And in the cutthroat world of apocalypse-era cults, that didn’t stand out much at all.

This land was like a poison jar for pseudo-religions. Only those that survived the infinite competition in hell had any shot at going global.

“Everyone! Seek your salvation in Paradise! The Buddha originally declared that this world is Hell itself.”

Even so, Seok-hwa refused to give up.

“It is because we live in Hell without realizing it that the Maitreya Buddha has bestowed upon us renewed suffering. As in earlier times, if we train ourselves and find enlightenment, only then can we enjoy glory in the afterlife. Namu Amida Butsu. A crisis is truly an opportunity. Attain enlightenment, my friends!”

“Namu Amida Butsu. Namu Amida Butsu.”

He had about 500 to 800 followers left. Compared to the prime days when he dominated East Asia, it was pitiful. He was hardly a bottom-of-the-barrel case, though. In actuality, 500 believers might even seem mountainous to a self-identified cult leader who barely had ten. In the cutthroat cult scene, hundreds of zealots was still no small feat.

In another world, Seok-hwa might have been content with that. Sadly, it turned out that he just wasn't destined to stay on top.

"Brothers and sisters! I, your shepherd, shall forge the way for you!"

"Our president is the best!"

"Mo Gwang-seo! Mo Gwang-seo!"

Then came the second impact.

Mo Gwang-seo Jesus Christ descended upon the "Eastern Jerusalem."

"The president has resurrected!"

"It's the Second Coming, a miracle of rebirth!"

In a land where other cults mostly boasted "miracles" in name only, Mo Gwang-seo literally performed showstopping miracles hundreds or thousands of times. It was no wonder a huge shift in the pseudo-religion power scene took place.

"Hey, they say that Jesus guy, Mo Gwang-seo, was it? He just keeps shining and reviving no matter how many times you kill him."

"Doesn't our monk have anything flashy like that?"

"Nothing, other than that shiny head of his."

That day, Seok-hwa lost four-fifths of his faithful. Yet he pressed on.

"No! Do not be fooled by something as heretical and absurd as resurrection! The truth we must focus on is cultivating our own minds, not indulging in flashy supernatural nonsense! Attain enlightenment! Enlightenment!"

"Namu Amida Butsu. Namu Amida Butsu."

Still, Seok-hwa retained a die-hard core of about 100 to 150 followers.

He was now well and truly in the mid-tier bracket, but in the world of apocalypse cults, having a hundred people was nothing to scoff at. Again, there were plenty of pitiful wannabe cult leaders out there who didn't even have ten. Maybe he'd even become the king of the mid-tiers.

But even so, it seemed Seok-hwa was not fated for a royal path.

"Saintess. So that's the Saintess..."

"They say Jesus has called upon Santa Maria!"

And the third impact was none other than our unstoppable superstar, Sim Ah-ryeon.

"Uwooooooh!"

"Hallelujah! The Lord beckons!"

Ah-ryeon was basically a "walking Udumbara"—the perfect upper-tier replacement for the New Buddha Church. Everywhere she went, flowers bloomed, and the injured were healed. She was even gorgeous (provided she kept quiet, washed her hair regularly, avoided using her smartphone, and wore something nice).

Seok-hwa's last remaining 100 followers took a good, long look back at their monk.

"What about our monk...?"

"He doesn't really have a sparkly anything, aside from that shiny head."

"He can't even heal people who are on the verge of death."

"So what can he actually do?"

That day, Seok-hwa lost nine-tenths of his last faithful, ending up with barely a dozen left. Those final dozen were truly devoted, because in a world where an "un-killable fake Jesus" and a "(fake) saintess who can heal people for free" were walking around, anyone who still chose Seok-hwa had to be at least a little fanatical.

Thus, at last, Seok-hwa truly hit rock bottom. Even though later runs saw humanity with higher survival rates and better quality of life overall, ironically, the renegade monk's fate just got more and more miserable.

"Ahhh! Look who's here!"

Perhaps that was why when I stopped by his place in the 802nd cycle, the sight of him running out barefoot to greet me had a strange feeling welling up in my chest.

"Well, if it isn't the esteemed Guild Leader Undertaker! Oh ho ho! It's such an honor to have a noble guest in this humble abode!"

Back in his heyday, he lived in a luxurious temple as grand as a palace. But here, in the 802nd cycle, Seok-hwa was occupying a shabby hermitage. No more throngs of envoys delivering tributes from every guild leader. Now he just had an empty yard where dust blew around.

His behavior toward me reflected that gap in status. In the old days, he would never have bowed and scrambled like this.

"I heard you're planning some sort of cross-country funeral procession," I said. "I came to discuss it."

"Ohhh, yes indeed! That's exactly right! Actually—come in, come in! I can't let an honored guest stand outside! Right this way, Undertaker! Please, follow me. Oh ho ho."

What can I say?

In front of me stood the man whose life had plummeted to rock bottom purely because of me—because of the existence of a regressor.

Chapter 333
The Self-Immolator II

Sinnoa

Once a former major powerhouse falls to being a small fry, they generally choose one of two paths:

1. "Well, I've already basked in more than enough love and glory. Let's just relax. I'll still manage somehow."

2. "You must respect me. I once conquered all of East Asia. Whenever I held a dharma assembly, tens of thousands gathered. Even the top guild leaders were terrified of me..."

Naturally, our small-fry renegade monk Seok-hwa belonged to the second category. He refused to abandon the glory of his prime (despite not actually remembering the previous cycles) and was willing to do anything to regain it.

There was one particular cycle, for example.

"Everyone! Our nation faces an unprecedented crisis. In such a time, how should we Buddhists across the land respond?"

"That's right. Whenever calamity befell the country, we did not hide away in the mountains. Instead, we took up hatchets and rose to action!"

"Didn't the Great Masters Seosan and Samyeong lead righteous monk armies to defend Joseon? This is the Buddha's will, telling us to save humankind!"

"Let us rise! We must carry on the cause of our ancestors, sages, and the Buddha!"

"All ten million Buddhists of the Three Kingdoms—unite through faith! Let us gather into a monk army, aaaaaah!"

In short, Seok-hwa wanted the Imjin War: Season 2.[1] No drama starring monk-warriors before nor after came close to the era's roaring success.

What Seok-hwa failed to consider, however, was that there was a far larger gap between a Joseon Dynasty-era monk and a modern-day monk than one might think.

For one thing, monks of the Joseon Dynasty often lived in mountain valleys. That wasn't so different from present times, but in those days, those mountains had tigers (size XXXL) lurking around, the literal big cats.

On top of that, in the Joseon Dynasty, monks were regularly conscripted for forced labor whenever the government felt like it. This was partly because Buddhism had accumulated some negative history back in the Goryeo Dynasty, and the logic of not atoning for the sins of one's forefathers didn't really fly in Buddhist circles. They saw it as a form of karma.

Hence, Confucius's quote that "a tyrannical government is more fearsome than a tiger" didn't resonate much with Joseon monks. After all, those monks had to fight both the government and real tigers.

Because of that, they grew strong. Monks of that age lived by the principle that if one saw a fellow monk in the mountains of Joseon, just think, He has survived. Indeed, they had to walk the thin line between life and death every day of their lives.

Meanwhile, what of monks of the modern era?

For starters, the "dungeon" of the forest no longer had giant tigers in it. Most temples had paved roads and stairways leading right up to them. Sure, modern monks did get a bit more protein in their diets than Joseon monks did, but that alone doesn't necessarily develop combat-ready muscle.

Like a popular meme featuring a certain Shiba Inu dog comparing the past to the present went, if the so-called great masters back in Joseon might have said, "Now that we have returned alive from the war, let us rebuild the villages and the city walls alongside the peasants!" the modern monk might well say, "Ugh... The plane ticket to India is just too expensive..."

Such phenomena weren't limited to Buddhist circles. Across all sectors, the human drive for survival and real combat experience had grown weaker with time. It was in such a climate as this that Seok-hwa dreamed of reviving the glory of Imjin War monk armies, shouting, "Make Buddha Great Again!"

The result?

"Eek! D-demons— Demons are coming!"

"Namu Amida Butsu, Namu Amida Butsu!"

"Master! Help us, Masterrr!"

"Huh... Uhhh...?!"

The new-era monk-warrior movement failed spectacularly.

Up north, the Resurrection Church led by Mo Gwang-seo was pushing its congregation into a suicidal Crusade, and down south, Seok-hwa was dragging his own cultists into ruin. Thus, the pseudo-religions ended up in "harmony" by collectively making things worse in what could only be described as a double catastrophe.

In the end, I, the regressor, had to step in.

"Noh Do-hwa, Commander of the National Road Management Corps. Keep an eye on these people. They're dangerous. Always keep them on your radar."

"Sure, yeah. Got it..."

They were promptly blacklisted.

As for Mo Gwang-seo's Resurrection Church, we sent in our alliance's secret weapon, Sim Ah-ryeon, to brainwash them. Success.

Dealing with Seok-hwa was even simpler. We planted an undercover agent nearby, and whenever Seok-hwa tried something suspicious, we quietly sabotaged him. We even enlisted the greatest villain among the pseudo-religious Taoist sects, Cheon Yo-hwa of Baekhwa Girls' High, into our ranks.

Christian, Buddhist, Taoist. All three major heretical factions on the Korean Peninsula were subdued. At least as far as pseudo-religious troublemakers were concerned, peace finally arrived in Korea.

"Er, do you think we'll get many people at tomorrow's dharma assembly?"

"I'm not sure, Monk. Maybe twenty if we're lucky?"

Now the renegade monk Seok-hwa was truly abandoned, like an egg adrift in the Nakdong River.

In truth, his head had always resembled an egg, but now every aspect of his life mirrored one.

"Look at that! Guild Leader Undertaker has come all this way! How can I not serve him some fine tea? This here is a barley tea I've been cherishing. Oh ho ho. I even went to China and bought some Pu'er tea before the devils took over. Please enjoy, Undertaker. Oh ho! It's all sincerity, you see!"

Thus ends the history of how a once EX-tier cult leader ended up groveling in front of me.

"Ah, so! Undertaker, if we unite in one great spirit of faith, I have no doubt even those wandering Hollow will find peace and attain Buddhahood! That is what I firmly believe!" Seok-hwa argued passionately.

Watching him struggle not to remain a small-fry cult leader was almost pitiful.

"...So you're saying that with no real Awakeners at your side, just about ten believers, you plan to travel from Busan to Sinuiju in a grand journey across the peninsula?"

“Yes, indeed. It’s extremely dangerous, I know that well. But how can we fear danger when the Great Merciful Buddha is protecting us?”

Countless Hollow still roamed the peninsula. Essentially, Seok-hwa proposed a “pilgrimage,” heading north while comforting as many Hollow as possible with funeral rites along the way.

From a certain angle, it was admirable.

‘He used the Udumbara virus to expand his following, then tried to start a monk-warrior movement after that failed, and now he’s on to cross-country funeral rites.’

He was the genuine embodiment of an iron will to seize power. It was almost awe-inspiring how, despite his utterly shabby appearance, he could stay so unwaveringly driven. Nevertheless, as Do-hwa pointed out, it sounded like a suicide mission.

‘Would this renegade monk be able to carry out proper funerals for all those wandering souls?’

And that was before mentioning the other Anomalies and Voids that infested the land. How could he and his tiny band possibly handle them?

Sure, maybe it didn’t really matter. The deaths of ten random citizens didn’t even qualify as big news anymore. But there was one detail that weighed on my mind...

I glanced at the ten believers gathered outside the temple, humming in thought. Even after his downfall, these stalwart souls still stood by Seok-hwa. Most of them were frail, elderly folks. Among them was one old man who used a piece of medical equipment, built and maintained by Do-hwa, for support.

“Namu Amida Butsu, Namu Amida Butsu...”

That patient’s name was Shin Su-bin. He was a grandfather who’d worried about Do-hwa’s well-being up until the very moment the world collapsed.

When our eyes met, Su-bin and the other Buddhists clutched their malas and bowed multiple times from the waist.

“Buddha... Maitreya Buddha...”

“May Undertaker bestow mercy upon us...”

I stifled a sigh. Whatever level of Buddhist teaching they might have absorbed, these elderly believers were sincerely praying for our safety, purely out of goodwill.

When I politely nodded in return, they lowered their heads even deeper, looking touched and honored.

“They’re who Do-hwa is worried about...” I mused to myself.

She never breathed a word about her patients during our last meeting, but I understood her mindset. Frankly, I couldn’t care less if a random renegade monk like Seok-hwa lived or died, but if Su-bin died, it would weigh on Do-hwa’s heart. That was what concerned me.

I set down the Pu’er tea and rose to my feet.

“Huh? Wait, Undertaker? Where are you going...?”

Ignoring Seok-hwa calling after me in a fluster, I approached Su-bin, standing across from him. Leaning in slightly, I spoke louder so the elderly man with poor hearing could understand.

“Excuse me, sir.”

“Huh?”

“Are you absolutely sure you must join this cross-country journey? I get where you’re coming from, but Ms. Noh Do-hwa is really worried about you.” When he didn’t respond, I continued, “You know her better than anyone. She’s not at all like her public image —she cares deeply for her patients. If anything happens to you, she’ll be up all night worrying. Can’t you just stay in Bansong-dong?”

Su-bin pursed his lips. His eyes, or rather the hollows where his eyes once were, looked as though they had seen enough of the world to have no need for any more barriers between himself and reality.

“My...”

“Yes?”

“My foot hurts, see. It’s been giving me trouble. And it feels like I’m burdening Ms. Noh by making her fix it all the time... I feel bad about that...”

“No, she would never think that way.”

“Oh, I know. I do know that. But... Ms. Noh is busy handling affairs for the entire nation. I’m an old man who doesn’t have much time left anyway. Why keep hogging her attention? That wouldn’t be right.”

I shut my mouth.

“In half a year, my ankle brace might snap and I’ll need her to fix it again, you know? I’d rather go now, while I can still walk around. At least do something meaningful with the little time I have left. Why keep troubling her? So I’m sorry. I have to go.”

A fitted protective brace was wrapped snugly around Su-bin’s right ankle. Back in the 53rd cycle, when I was assisting Do-hwa in her workshop, I remember seeing a support brace identical to that one.

‘This is my own karma, isn’t it?’

In the distant past, before Do-hwa had come to command the National Road Management Corps, her workshop was frequently visited by elderly patients like these. To this day, she still juggled her positions as both the Corps commander and an assistive-device technician, accepting patients by appointment.

Yet over time, the number of patients had decreased, however slightly. Because she was the apparent “exalted Commander of the National Road Management Corps,” people felt guilty, like it was a nuisance or a risk to take up her time for personal repairs.

And so, I'd swallowed up part of her reason for living.

"I see," I said. "Well, sir, please don't push yourself too hard on that journey. If you're making a trip around the peninsula, be sure to come back home safe."

"Oh no, that might not—"

"Trust me. Meeting you and helping you out is more like therapy for her. She's... Well, she's a bit eccentric about that. She hates politics and much prefers tinkering for her patients. You get it, right?"

"Yes, yes... Thank you. Well, then..."

I looked around, counting a total of eleven old men gathered in the temple. Banners waved in bright colors above their shoulders, painstakingly made with their limited funds, reading things like "Let Our Buddha-Hearts Unite," "Nationwide Funeral Tour," "Namu Amida Butsu," "Gwanseeum-bosal," "Paradise Pure Land."

It was a world too harsh on the elderly.

In an apocalypse that worshipped efficiency, these people were thinking hard about how to exit the stage quietly. Unlike the renegade monk who wanted to exploit these old believers' last moments for his own big "comeback"...

I turned away from the elderly and walked back to Seok-hwa, whose anxious expression lit up in relief upon seeing that I wasn't leaving just yet.

"Oh ho, Undertaker! I was worried you might be heading out. Since you came all this way, why not stay for a meal of temple fare before you go?"

"I'm fine. If you've got the resources, please use them to feed those seniors well, at least once."

"Oh dear. But they've cultivated their minds so deeply, they're already shrouded in the Buddha's compassion—"

My finger pressed into his shoulder, firm and unwavering. "Venerable Seok-hwa."

His eyes went round. His mouth gaped soundlessly, letting a ragged gasp escape. He couldn't even scream properly.

No Aura was needed. Simply pressing a key pressure point was enough to rob this renegade monk of his voice.

"I know all about people like you. Don't go believing you're special. In this world, if you walk around enough, you'll trip over a dime-a-dozen people just like you."

"U-uh, huh... Mmph..."

"You're not the one 'bringing salvation' to others. If anything, you're barely surviving thanks to the people around you. Because for someone out there, you're still one of the few companions they have left... Don't fool yourself into thinking you're blessing others. It's the other way around. Got it?"

"Ugh... Ugh—"

"Do you get it?"

His terrified face went pale as he bobbed his head in a feeble nod. At last, I loosened my grip on his pressure point, preventing him from uttering any audible scream.

"Hhk... Gngh... Hah..."

"Please try to live a quiet life."

Seok-hwa nodded again, fear etched on his face.

The very next day, the "Unite in Buddha-Heart, Cross-Country Funeral Tour Squad" consisting of one renegade monk and eleven elderly believers, departed from Busan.

Footnotes:

1 - Over 8,000 Buddhist monks acted as warriors in the Imjin War against the Japanese invasion, some acting out of Korean patriotism and others to improve the standing of Buddhism with respect to Confucian ideology.

Chapter 334

The Self-Immolator III

Sinnoa

“Sorry about that, Mr. Matiz.”

“Hmm? About what?”

“It's about Seok-hwa.”

That day, Ji-won had shaken hands with every single member of the funeral procession. Immediately after the ragtag funeral procession led by that bald monk left Busan, she spoke up.

“I should’ve handled such a socially harmful force myself, taken care of everything discreetly. But they were such small fry that I completely overlooked them. Next time, I’ll make sure to crush any loach slipping out of the net.”

Our Ji-won has always been unwaveringly devoted to the business of knocking people down. It was kind of admirable...

Admirable...

Is that really a good thing?

We locked eyes. Her gaze was as steady as ever, shining with the same murderous glint.

I did my best to dissuade her.

“There’s no need for you to prove your worth time and time again anymore,” and “You know better than anyone that you’re not going to be abandoned or shunned by the regressor now,” and “It’d be strange for the operations team leader of the National Road Management Corps to intervene in some little group of barely ten people,” and so on...

“Hmm.”

Perhaps my desperate plea got through to her. The quasi-psychopath nodded.

“Still, Mr. Matiz, you must secretly wish for me to quietly kill those folks you can’t be bothered to keep an eye on, and do so without leaving any trace—”

“No.”

“And then I could just say ‘I killed them because I wanted to, so what can you do about it, Mr. Matiz?’ and you still wouldn’t abandon me, so obviously killing them is the right—”

“No! That’s not it.”

“Are you certain?”

“I’m certain!”

“Are you absolutely certain?”

“Yes! You psycho!”

Ji-won stared at me silently with a stony face, then left. Even as she departed, her face kept that puzzled look of This is odd. If I kill those small fry, it’d definitely be convenient for you, why do you keep refusing me like some tsundere? all the way until she was out of sight.

Meanwhile, around that same time...

– [BusanAgentno.1] ChiefOh: O wandering souls of worldly tribulations, let us console you. All ye Buddhist faithful of the Korean Peninsula, unite!

SG Net was flooded with advertisements.

– [BusanAgentTower] BotongDaily: Master Monk Seok-hwa steps forward to save the masses! A vow to console wandering souls across the peninsula!

There were no Awakeners among the faithful following Seok-hwa. Naturally, they had no way to advertise their project on SG Net. And that was precisely what “agency services” were for.

These agencies were typically run by small fry with weaker abilities. They took money from ordinary people to post “ads” on SG Net on their behalf, scraping by to survive. They did more than just ads, though. They’d copy the novels serialized on SG Net’s Novel Serialization Board into text files and distribute them to regular folks.

(Some of the readers who would later be ambushed by Dok-seo were funneled in through these channels.)

Seok-hwa also used an agency.

– [BusanAgentGold] GeumMi-young: “Even ordinary people can perform exorcisms for the dead?!” Exclusive interview with Seok-hwa, master of funerary rites for the departed!

– [BusanAgentLegacy] sambaekwon: Seok-hwa says, “Reincarnation of Buddha? Nonsense. I am simply a Buddhist disciple, just like all of you.”

– [DaejeonAgentNo1] choice: The midway stop for the National Buddhist Pilgrimage Mass Funeral Procession! Daejeon! One hundred thousand believers exclaim: “We await Monk Seok-hwa!”

– [BusanAgentOriginal] Capital: Seok-hwa: “My compassion toward the dead is in no way inferior to an Awakener’s.” The Great Funeral Procession displays remarkable resolve... Donations pouring in.

It was a show of sheer quantity.

Realistically, for an ordinary person, paying these agencies was no small burden. Normally, thirty to a hundred people would pool their money to hire an agency, piece by piece. But for this particular project, Monk Seok-hwa was going all-in. It was as if all the hidden funds he’d been stashing away in his cult’s secret coffers were reserved for precisely this moment. He poured everything, without hesitation, into ad fees, all in the hope of escaping the humiliating label of a “nobody streamer.”

The result?

– Anonymous: Is there anyone who wants to meet up regularly at a café for coffee? Mid-thirties since Awakening. Looking for casual friendship. My depth is 700m. (comments: 2)

– [Samcheon] WitchJudge: Couldn’t sleep last night, so I made a new song out of my late-night muse. Thoughts? (comments: 1,131)

– Anonymous: I’m with the National Road Management Corps but using Anonymous mode for a moment. If I quit my job now, can I leverage my experience to get recognized in a bigger guild? (comments: 41)

– [BusanAgentGold] GeumMi-young: “Even ordinary people can perform exorcisms for the dead?!” Exclusive interview with Seok-hwa, master of funerary rites for the departed! (comments: 1)

– [AtelierSalt] JustIncense: Regulars’ EVENT! Personalized custom fragrance design for you. First 5 people only. No proxy requests. Depth under 200m. (comments: 27)

– Anonymous: Wow, the Grand Witch’s new song is lit (comments: 3)

– Anonymous: I listened to the Great Witch’s new track... (comments: 1)

Astonishingly, no one cared at all.

Well, they were exactly fated to only zero comments. Every ad post got one comment each.

– OldManGoryeo: Ad spammer GTFO

A comment that, if anything, was worse than having none.

Incidentally, Ah-ryeon typically left comments on nearly any new post that came up on SG Net. That netizen-turned-resident ghost was essentially fused with the community. Could it be she was a real Anomaly?

Anyway.

Effectively zero comments. Effectively zero interest.

Even Ji-won's unfeeling remark about "killing them all" was probably the biggest chunk of attention bestowed upon this so-called "National Buddhist Pilgrimage Mass Funeral Procession."

The days went by.

As mentioned, no one in Monk Seok-hwa and his ragtag band of eleven was an Awakener, meaning I couldn't simply track them down with the cheat code from the Saintess's Clairvoyance, specially designed for me.

Still, that was no problem.

"Hey, Ji-won. By now, that funeral group should've arrived in Daejeon. How's it look?"

"Ah, yes. They left Daejeon this morning. There are now only eight of them left."

Some had gotten sick of it and dropped out, apparently.

"Is Mr. Shin Su-bin still there?"

"He's alive. And so is Seok-hwa."

"...Good news, and also bad news."

The further they traveled, the more pathetic this so-called funeral procession became, and it wasn't just the group's size that was diminishing. The cult leader's wallet was taking a direct hit, in real time.

– [DaejeonAgentNo1] choice: A fervent send-off from Daejeon's Buddhist faithful for the National Buddhist Pilgrimage Funeral Procession! (Photo)

– [DaejeonAgentGalaxy] Team Leader Seo: An open sermon for the homeless... “Enlightenment transcends any literal sense of ‘Awakening,’ caring for oneself and others alike.” Monk Seok-hwa ties the bonds.

The number of ads dropped.

When they had first departed from Busan, they hired dozens of agencies for a full-blown PR blitz, but by the time they passed Changwon, Suncheon, Jeonju, and Daejeon, the ads kept decreasing in frequency.

Finally, upon arriving in Seoul...

– [NorthSeoulAgentOrigin] DongdaemunMarket: The Mass Funeral Procession arrives at the old capital city of the peninsula, Seoul! “Many sacrifices, many souls comforted.” Monk Seok-hwa’s sermon! A heartfelt resonance for those worn out by life.

Only one agency post remained on SG Net.

I chuckled wryly.

‘It was a gamble from the start.’

Jackpot or bust.

Had it been proven successful that “even ordinary people can track down and handle the dead through my teachings,” they’d have raked in a fair share of donations by the time they reached Seoul, for sure.

‘They were only counting on having enough budget to hold out until they hit Seoul.’

No looking back, just go. However, to their dismay, the project that had sounded somewhat plausible to them at the start backfired spectacularly.

The reason was simple.

“Mr. Matiz. You’re already taking enough—no, more than enough—requests from ordinary people and holding funerals for the dead as you travel," Ji-won concluded. "For normal folk, anytime they want, they can submit a missing-person report to any city guild. If they don't trust the guild, they can wait for a National Road Management Corps caravan to pass by and file it there, right?"

They gather all that data and post it on the SG Net's missing-person board.

"Once a decent number of requests have accumulated, you choose the perfect time to personally go out there to conduct the funerals. Meanwhile, the fee is practically free or at least minimal, so it's all the reporters need to do."

She tilted her head.

"It's practically a no-cost funeral service performed by the world's top professional. No sane person would hand over their deceased loved one or friend's funeral to some random bald monk they've never heard of, not when someone like you is around."

"Mm."

"Trying to stir conflict by painting it as 'Awakeners vs. ordinary people' used to be a valid tactic, but with you dominating that 'funeral market,' there's no angle left for them. Reliability, price, convenience, accessibility—there's no area where they can overpower you."

The phrasing aside, that was essentially how things were.

Times had changed. In a distant past, when Monk Seok-hwa had riled up anti-Awakener sentiments, people had rallied behind him in droves. But now, it was the 802nd cycle. Unlike back then, the Korean Peninsula was filled with the forces I had spread across the land.

Just look at Yo-hwa of Sejong City or Ah-ryeon of Pyongyang. Have you ever once witnessed them acting like Awakeners reign supreme and normal humans are trash? (If anything, in Ah-ryeon's case, we might wonder if she's even a person at all. She's basically an Anomaly, after all.)

The Korean Peninsula in the 5th cycle and in the 802nd cycle might as well be two different worlds. Whether there existed an immortal Udumbara virus or not, people had simply changed.

Only Seok-hwa. Only his boundless lust for power and prestige remained the same.

“Mr. Matiz, the group arrived in Pyongyang this morning.”

Despite running out of money back in Seoul, they still dragged themselves north.

“How many survivors?”

“Just three, counting Seok-hwa. Some parted ways along the route and settled in the cities.”

But, ah, Ji-won added.

“Mr. Shin Su-bin is still accompanying him.”

A few days later, a post appeared on SG Net:

– [Eastern Holy State] KindPerson: Guys, there’s a monk here who says he’s going to self-immolate at the upcoming Monster Wave?

I clicked the link immediately.

I’m just some random person who travels between Pyongyang and Sinuiju. Yesterday, I ran into this monk and one other person.

Honestly, at first I thought they were beggars lol. Their clothes were so dirty lol

But we ended up talking. I told them I was going up to Sinuiju, and they asked if they could come along. I asked why, because they’re normal folk, right?

He said he’s going to show “the demon army” the heart of the Buddha or something, by self-immolating in front of them, talking about compassion and whatnot.

Demon army" = Monster Wave lol

Self-immolation = pouring oil on yourself and lighting yourself on fire, basically killing yourself lol

It sounds like total nonsense, but I've never met an ordinary person who wants a ride north just to do that, so it's kinda fire. I'm thinking of going with them, haha

---

I scrolled down to see a few comments.

– Anonymous: Nice checks out lol

– Anonymous: Letting some random normal person wander into Sinuiju is basically a death sentence

[Eastern Holy State] KindPerson: Eh what can I do if they're determined to crawl into a place that's basically hell coz they claim it's heaven? lolol

[Eastern Holy State] KindPerson: So yeah I'm going with them, whatever

– [Eastern Holy State] LowlyPerson: Oh, I think I saw that monk today too. Isn't their party all walking around with canes?

[Eastern Holy State] KindPerson: Yep that's them. Brother or sister in faith.

[Eastern Holy State] LowlyPerson: Surprising that they tolerated someone from another religion. They could've been hostile.

[Eastern Holy State] KindPerson: Must be thanks to the grace of the Saintess in the North.

[Eastern Holy State] LowlyPerson: Amen.

[Eastern Holy State] KindPerson: Amen.

– OldManGoryeo: Isn’t this the same so-and-so big-whatever group that set out from Busan?

[Eastern Holy State] KindPerson: Psh, a troll. The Saintess up north would just shake her head at scum like you. Ugh, so pitiful OldManGoryeo: ?

My brow furrowed. And no, it wasn’t because of Ah-ryeon making my facial muscles twitch. I ran out of that centuries ago.

It was about Seok-hwa.

‘Self-immolation.’

Just as the post said, it meant setting one’s body on fire as a form of offering.

‘Who would’ve thought a bald monk like Seok-hwa would do that?’

Not once in any previous cycle had I heard something so bizarre.

Chapter 335

The Self-Immolator IV

Sinnoa

It wasn't as though the Buddhist world was only populated by shameless monks like Seok-hwa. In the countless loops I've been through, I inadvertently became well-versed in cults. After all, how many people out there have acquainted themselves with heretical sects from Christianity, Buddhism, and Taoism alike as I have?

(Frankly, even if there were more like me, it'd be a problem.)

Thanks to that—or rather, as an unexpected bonus—whenever I met with high monks now and again, I could hold some rather profound conversations with them. There was a time I asked them this:

"Venerable Monk. Why do you practice Buddhism?"

That time, an elderly monk replied, "To die well!"

Indeed. If the purpose of a Christian is to go to Heaven, then for a Buddhist, the greatest task on earth is to be free of suffering in this shitty life. Birth, old age, sickness, death. There was nothing in life that wasn't painful, but among them, the absolute worst was undoubtedly the pain of death—the terror of one's own death, and the thoughts and reflections that terror brought. Naturally, for all Buddhists, the hardest challenge is liberation from the suffering of death.

The high monk I met sighed as well. "This is damn hard!"

That final moment. The instant of death that no human can avoid. Shorter than one second, right before my consciousness plunges into a pitch-black abyss—

That's when you let go of fear.

You accept, with not just your mind but also your heart, that breathing and letting the breath slip away are both nothing more than the natural flow. You face it head-on—and in that sense, transcend. Go beyond. Maybe to make a jump away from this final millisecond apocalypse that monks devote their entire lives to meditating over in a cross-legged posture.

“But how do you prove you’ve transcended death, Venerable Monk? That’s something only you yourself can truly know, isn’t it?”

“Ah. Well, there’s no real need to prove it to others. But sometimes, for the sake of future disciples, you might want to show that it’s possible, right? The Buddha did that too. Compassion and all. In that case, we monks usually just go, like this, see? Sitting cross-legged as we kick the bucket.”

“Wow.”

“You maintain the exact same posture you had in life and keep it even after death. Right then, people can see, ‘Oh, for him, living and dying really were the same thing, and off he went.’ Something like that.”

Back then, I just nodded as I mused it over and the high monk burst out laughing.

“When we old monks are among ourselves, we joke about it. ‘Hey, you know, that phenomenon where a monk’s body doesn’t collapse even after death? Maybe it’s because we’ve sat in that same posture for 50 or 60 years till our muscles and bones stiffened in place.’”

“That could happen.”

“I think that’s actually true. The muscles just stiffen. But that half-century of practice spent stiffening those muscles was my life, you know? That’s what I studied for, that’s why I meditated. And so, that’s what I said at that time. If anyone points a finger at you to accuse your muscles of just stiffening, you just laugh back at them. Punks. You’re right, dammit. We worked our asses off to stiffen them!”

By the way, that high monk ranted quite a lot about Seok-hwa behind his back every time we met, right up until the day he died.

Ah, even venerable monks can't resist trash-talking Seok-hwa.

'But now, that very same Seok-hwa isn't just dying. He's apparently going to perform self-immolation, no less?'

Self-immolation. Burning one's body.

Of course, even for a seasoned master who has supposedly transcended all sorts of pain, self-immolation is no easy task. I've also died by burning a few times, so I know that truth very well. It's unbelievably painful.

'Just sitting cross-legged and passing away is already regarded as attaining nirvana. Imagine pouring fire on top of that.'

There's no doubt it's the highest realm of enlightenment. It is an act of dedicating one's self to the world, to others, and to the seed of the Buddha-nature found in all beings.

Once again, I tilted my head.

'He says he is going to do that?'

Was it all bullshit, or was it for real?

Probably bullshit, if you asked me.

In an ordinary modern setting, when people speculated over truths and falsehoods, they'd just assume it was a lie and move on because they were busy going to work. But since I'm a regressor, I just skipped work.

In other words, I chose curiosity.

"Commander Noh. Sorry, but I'm leaving today's and tomorrow's duties to you."

"What? Where—?"

"I'll bring back some ice cream on my way."

“Wait, just a minute. Hey? Hey, you asshole! Where the hell do you think—?!”

I, the Undertaker, who has experienced all kinds of deaths over millennia, a sommelier of death, a Baskin-Robbins of death, a Faker of death—how could I not be intrigued?

I was honest with myself.

‘A regressor can’t resist meddling with Seok-hwa.’

As soon as I saw the news on SG Net, my legs were already carrying me to the designated location for the self-immolation, north to Sinuiju.

Sinuiju in this era was more or less known as the biggest “military city” on the Korean Peninsula. Wave after wave of monsters would come from the continent side whenever they felt like it, handing in their complaints as they asked, Excuse me, is immigration to this place possible?

So perhaps that was why. In the Eastern Holy State, Sinuiju was considered one of the cities with the most devout believers, along with Pyongyang. Paladins armed with faith in Mo Gwang-seo and the Saintess roamed about. It was a strict, solemn atmosphere.

Contrastingly, there was a disproportionately developed red-light district to provide soldiers with adequate rest.

But on that day, Sinuiju saw an unfamiliar sight for the very first time.

(Monk) Venerable Seok-hwa’s Nirvana Self-Immolation (Event)

There it was—colorful, bold, and right in the heart of the front line that blocks the monstrous armies.

They’d hung up a banner.

By the way, in this era, banners weren’t mass-printed but instead were all handmade. They even hired a professional to paint lotus flowers on it with utmost care.

Surely by now, Seok-hwa's wallet must have been bled dry. Where did the money for that come from?

"I-I... I painted it for free."

Somehow, Ah-ryeon was already at my side. As if to remind everyone this was her own front yard, she was wearing her official Saintess attire.

"Northern Saintess" mode, ON.

Even the cheesy pizza smell that usually wafted from her hair now smelled a bit cleaner, more like butter croissants.

"A-are you saying you painted it for free?"

"Yes, y-yes. I mean, I'm the Saintess. And that lotus design is literally a sacred painting..."

"Why'd you do that?"

"Well, you know, the notion that if some penniless nobody burns himself, the demonic forces might tremble in awe and bow to the Buddha... Th-this is a super fun, massive-scale event we can't miss, right? So I deliberately upped the scale. See, wasn't that a smart move?"

For crying out loud.

Truly ridiculous. I'd sent her up here to the Eastern Holy State to do some real work, and she'd wasted time chasing cheap thrills. Talk about dereliction of duty.

"U-um, well, Guild L-Leader, you're obviously dumping your duties on the Commander yourself and running away..."

"You got any popcorn?"

"Caramel, butter, or soy sauce?"

“Caramel.”

“Ehehe…”

A pair of dopamine addicts formed on the spot.

With the Saintess of the Eastern Holy State in attendance, there was no room for interference. The Holy State’s paladins instantly transformed into event staff, organizing the venue.

In the center of it all sat the bald monk, Seok-hwa.

“Ah.” When his eyes met mine, they slowly grew bigger. “My, Undertaker. Isn’t that Undertaker?”

“Long time no see.”

In the time we hadn’t seen each other, Seok-hwa had become noticeably thinner. In past loops, he’d always been plump and oily, but now his cheeks and arms were dried up like roasted squid. His monk’s robes, which were always neatly laundered in the past, were now rather shabby. The thick cloth couldn’t fully hide the grime staining it.

Meanwhile, where once Ah-ryeon had looked ragged and never got accepted by any proper guild, now she was dressed in the finest garments imaginable.

‘Truly, the vicissitudes of life.’

Seok-hwa staggered toward me with an exaggerated wobble. “Undertaker… It is you, yes.”

“What is it you want to say?”

“I have nothing left. All I have left is this.”

Abruptly, he grabbed both my hands. A faint scent emanated from his face, like the smell of something scorched—an air of mental precariousness.

“They say when a person undergoes excruciating pain, they achieve enlightenment. Awakening. Yes, Awakening is also a sign of enlightenment, is it not? Wouldn't you agree?"

A strange, nearly indescribable fire burned in Seok-hwa's eyes, which had gone dry to the point of losing all moisture.

"I will do it. Self-immolation. And I shall boldly achieve enlightenment in the presence of the Buddha."

You might not notice it from text alone, but as he spoke, his voice was so low it was barely audible. All rasps and hisses, that sort of sound. It was nearly impossible to hear him clearly.

Ah-ryeon only tilted her head in confusion from where she stood right beside me.

"I find Mo Gwang-seo suspicious. The Second Coming of Jesus, they say? Ha. That can't be. That idiot can't possibly be... He simply awakened when he was blown up."

Neither of us responded.

"It's all lies. All bullshit. This Eastern Holy State or whatever, it's a damn cult. I'm the only one who sees it for what it is. Undertaker. Tell me, does any of this make sense? Does it?"

Inwardly, I was surprised. His rambling sounded like nonsense, yet in fact it pierced the core of the Eastern Holy State. Probably a case of a blind squirrel stumbling upon a nut, but still.

"These masses... They can't recognize a rabble-rouser, nor can they recognize a truly remarkable man. I'm going to make them come to their senses. Just watch, Undertaker. I, Seok-hwa, the most faithful disciple of Shakyamuni, will bring the East back into the Buddha's embrace."

He staggered, about to turn away. I grabbed his shoulder, holding him in place.

"Wait. What happened to your right leg?"

When he approached me earlier, he was swaying so badly from side to side. The cause lay in his right foot.

From the ankle down, Seok-hwa's foot was "gone." His toes and achilles tendon were replaced by a prosthetic device, one I found extremely familiar.

It was a device belonging to patient Shin Su-bin. Something Do-hwa had once made for him.

"Ah. My foot?" With a slow blink, Seok-hwa answered, "That happened when I crossed the 38th Parallel. You know how the area is a literal minefield, yes?"

"No, I mean how did a device belonging to Shin Su-bin end up in your possession, Venerable Monk?"

"Ah, that. Right, he gave it to me. He said he didn't mind moving around on crutches, so I should take it. Heh. It doesn't fit too well since it's old, but living without it wouldn't be so bad for a monk anyway."

He wobbled and lifted his right foot. The worn-out prosthetic squeaked like a cricket as he swayed.

"It's better than nothing, so I'm just borrowing it for now. Why? Does it bother you, Undertaker? Is there something on your mind?"

My lips parted momentarily.

...That's not just some scrap device. It's custom-built by Noh Do-hwa for Shin Su-bin. For him, that's not just a machine, it's like his actual foot.

...Giving that prosthetic to you wasn't just handing over a piece of hardware, it was practically an act of offering part of himself.

...Furthermore, it's a symbolic link that ties Su-bin to someone with real power: Commander Noh. Some people might take lifelong pride in that connection, treat it like a piece of their own identity, or at least trot it out as a good drinking story.

...But you have no clue. Probably because Su-bin never even bragged about it once, not even for a laugh.

I shut my mouth.

Did I have the right to tell him the truth? Even if I did, would it mean anything?

“Nothing at all.”

“Really?” he asked.

“...How is Su-bin these days?”

“Hm? Well, yes. He came with me to Sinuiju. Saw him this morning, as a matter of fact. He’s probably around somewhere.”

As I suspected, Seok-hwa had zero interest in someone “like” Su-bin. What could it matter that the man had literally walked across the country with him, risking his life all the way? In the game in Seok-hwa’s mind, his quest for influence, someone like Shin Su-bin was just an NPC easily replaced at any time.

“If... If Buddha helps me attain enlightenment...”

A dried foam had crusted around his lips.

“I’ll transform this land. What’s so great about being the Commander? Ruling over that tiny Busan, what’s the point of that? A man has to have a broad ambition. Busan, Daejeon, Sejong, Pyongyang, Sinuiju... Beyond that, even. That Noh Do-hwa or Mo Gwang-seo—once I’m awakened, I’ll accomplish so, so much more than them. That is the karma I must bear. Undertaker! I’m going to create a Pure Land for all the people, you hear?”

He muttered like he was chanting a sutra.

“I know full well you never liked me.”

I stayed silent.

“But just watch. Everything will be different once I awaken. Truly, wait and see.”

Glaring, Seok-hwa added one final thing.

“I’ll spend one whole night here, then tomorrow at dawn, I shall offer myself to the Buddha in flames. Please, Undertaker, bear witness…”

He looked as if he could no longer be hurt by anyone or anything.

Chapter 336

The Self-Immolator V

Sinnoa

When you've lived a long time as a regressor, you end up experiencing all sorts of bizarre things quite often. Take, for example, Seok-hwa, who was already camping out on the altar so he could burn his body at dawn the next day.

"Why were we even assigned to watch over that old man?"

"No idea. It's an order from above."

"Damn it. Must be a pretty famous monk down south, I guess."

Deep in the darkness of night, two guards tossed their chit chat onto a fire as though it were kindling. The bonfire crackled and babbled as its red flames licked at the air.

"Honestly, though, he doesn't look like a venerable monk at all. Just an old beggar..."

"Our Saintess sure is broad-minded. She's letting him do whatever he wants, no matter the religion."

"True enough."

One of the guards yawned loudly then called out, "Hey! Monk! Should we bring you anything for a late-night snack? Maybe some sweet potatoes?"[1]

Seok-hwa gave no response except the soft rattle of the prayer beads rolling in his right hand.

The guard scowled. "Whoa, hey. A person asks you a question and you don't even answer? What, you think we ordinary folk aren't worth your time or something?"

“Leave it,” his companion warned. “He’s going to die tomorrow anyway, so what’s the point?”

“True. If he eats a sweet potato now, I guess we’ll see roasted sweet potato coming out of his guts later on.” Then the guard burst into laughter.

I was seated a bit farther away, in the audience seating that had been set up in advance for the self-immolation ceremony.

‘I could never have imagined this would happen from past cycles…’

Sure, the guards might have dismissed Seok-hwa as just another “crazy old man,” but to the eyes of a regressor, he appeared in a very different light. To me, Seok-hwa was not simply a shabby old man.

‘He was once a human who stood at the pinnacle of power and luxury on the Korean Peninsula, and now look at him.’

That obsession. That madness.

‘Will Seok-hwa truly be able to Awaken?’

That was when it happened.

Someone approached the platform. Their silhouette was hidden by darkness, but I could see they were limping, leaning on a crutch under their right arm.

The silhouette spoke.

“I got ahold of some things for you, Monk.”

“What in the world?!”

Boom! Until now, Seok-hwa had been silently fiddling with his prayer beads. Suddenly, he boomed like a train engine.

“What took you so long?! Layman! How could this take all day?!”

“I’m sorry. I ran out of money, so I had to run my tail off scrounging the things up. These days, even hammers and nails are a tad rare."

"Haven't you heard of simply asking that— that Saintess or whatever who's in charge here? Why go around searching on foot?!"

"Come on, we can't do that. Right? They're already doing us a huge favor by letting us use this space at all. To shamelessly beg them for random junk..."

"Oh, you're killing me! Old folks and youngsters just don't speak the same language, I swear. Give it here!"

Seok-hwa rudely snatched the bundle from the person who'd brought it.

I got up from the audience seats and walked a bit closer. Thanks to that, I managed to get a glimpse of what was in the bundle.

A hammer. Long, thick nails. Ropes.

"Watch closely, Layman Shin Su-bin."

The monk swung the hammer.

"This is the will of me, Seok-hwa, the top disciple of the Buddha!"

Claaang!

The guards jumped in alarm. The clang of metal broke sharply through the dark around the campfire.

"Wh-what the hell?"

"No idea. Hey! Over there! What do you think you're doing?!"

Claaang!

Seok-hwa neither answered nor acknowledged them. He just kept hammering in nails one after another.

"Namu Amitabha."

Claaang!

There was no question what he was nailing. It was the “monk’s robe” he was wearing down to the “platform” floor. Why? The reason was just as obvious. Once dawn broke, he intended to self-immolate. To prevent his body from flinching or struggling even slightly during the act, he was forcibly securing himself to the floor.

“Namu Amitabha.”

Claaang!

He hammered the edges of his own robe to the platform and wound his body tightly with rope. Each time nails and rope threaded together, he muttered his mantra.

Both the guards and I were stunned into silence for a while.

‘Has there ever been a monk who carried out his self-immolation in that manner?’

Not as far as I’d heard.

Yes, in Buddhism, self-immolation was just one form of ridding oneself of all attachments. Trying too hard to succeed at the self-immolation itself, ironically, meant failing to cast off attachment.

‘It’s completely absurd…’

Kaaang!

Yet despite his withered arms, Seok-hwa managed to hammer in dozens of nails. Between heavy pants, he declared, “Now! Neither demons nor the Devil Army of 1.8 billion fiends shall ever interrupt the great nirvana of me, the Venerable Seok-hwa!”

A hoarse voice rasped out from between his dried, cracked lips.

“I, this humble monk, shall be reborn in Sakyamuni’s embrace tomorrow as the Wheel-Turning King! Children of the peninsula! You from the East! You shall bear witness to me! You shall see!”

His voice rattled through air his body could no longer sustain, leaking breath at the seams in the form of coughs. Then Seok-hwa's head dropped as though a string had been cut. His strength gave out, and he slumped, unconscious.

After a while, the guards recovered from their shock and started whispering to each other.

"What the— Holy shit, man."

"I know, right? That old monk's completely nuts. I've been stationed here for a while, and I haven't seen a weirdo like that in ages."

"Exactly. This land must be cursed. Why is it that in every town, there's a different God and a different Buddha?"

"And people like him always get possessed by Anomalies in the end."

The campfire sizzled down.

The night was passing.

Before dawn, I had a moment to speak alone with the patient, Shin Su-bin.

"Sir."

"Huh? Oh dear. Well, if it isn't our Undertaker."

A half-bloom of delight appeared on Su-bin's face.

Perhaps it was the toll that trek across the country had taken. Su-bin looked painfully thin, much like Seok-hwa. Yet—

"Yes, it's been a while, sir. This might sound odd, but you look well."

"Huh? Oh ho. Oh ho ho! Guess I did a lot of walking, so I must've gotten some exercise. When you're my age, you gotta keep walking, keep moving.”

How to put it?

If Seok-hwa looked timber stricken with pine wilt disease, then Su-bin’s body looked like a well-honed wooden spear. Even though he had to keep himself upright on crutches, you could glimpse firm triceps in his thin right arm.

“Sir, I heard.”

“Heard what?”

“About your prosthetic device. Apparently, you handed yours over to that person.”

“Ah…”

In that moment, you could see Su-bin flinch a little. His expression was a transparent one. He had the face of a model student caught doing something bad by the teacher they were friendly with.

“Don’t tell Noh Do-hwa, all right…?”

“Can you tell me why you gave it away?”

“Well, think about it. I lost my leg quite a while ago, right? So I know how to get around on a missing limb, and even before I met Noh Do-hwa, I managed fine with a crutch. It’s second nature now.”

“Hmm.”

“But that monk lost his foot crossing the 38th Parallel. If you think about it, who’s gonna have a harder time right now: someone who only recently had their foot blown off or someone who’s been missing it for ages? So I just gave it to the monk. A good item should go to whoever needs it the most.”

For a moment, I only stared. “I see. So that’s what I’ll tell Noh Do-hwa, yes?”

At once, Su-bin made a face like he was about to cry. “Oh! No, no, Undertaker! Please don't tell her, okay? That'd make her upset! We can't have that."

"That would put me in a bind."

"Come on, you just take good care of Noh Do-hwa for me. She's been through so much—I can't help but worry about her. Still, I'm glad you're by her side, Undertaker. Really glad."

"She curses at me every time she sees me, though."

"That's her way of caring, you know. Right? I've lived a long time, and I've never met anyone as warmhearted as our Do-hwa."

"Hmm." If Do-hwa herself had heard that, her face would have contorted all eighty muscles into the perfect anatomical depiction of disgust. "I'll be sure to relay your words to her."

"Okay, then."

The campfire burned out. Before dawn in Sinuiju, the only remaining flame flickering was the beacon fire set by Nenet. And so, the conversation that had briefly blossomed between Su-bin and me also slowly wilted.

After all, people started gathering, right on schedule.

(Ritual) Venerable Monk Seok-hwa's Nirvana Self-Immolation (Event)

It was still only around five or six in the morning, yet the faces of the Sinuiju citizens were full of vitality and their voices buzzing with murmurs. After the apocalypse arrived, everyone's circadian rhythm shifted to that of bright, energetic "model adults," so to speak.

"What? A monk's gonna burn himself?"

"It's not 'burn himself.' It's called self-immolation, you ignorant fool."

"I read on SG Net that he traveled from Busan all the way to Seoul, exorcising the dead on the way up. Says he's not even an Awakener.”

“Oh, so he’s a holy figure.”

“Think I’ll be late for work?”

Several knights under the Saintess of the Eastern Holy State also turned up.

“Please stand back! Stand back!”

“If a stray Anomaly clings to the fire, the flames might spread beyond our control. Please keep a safe distance!”

For the record, the knight order showed up along with Ah-ryeon, and the crowd erupted in wild cheers, which caused quite a scene—but I’ll spare you the details. Dwelling on that would only lead to Ah-ryeon boasting an unpleasant smile. The world was already overdosing on “Ah-ryeon content,” so further detailing it would be detrimental to the readers’ mental health.

“...formisnootherthanemptinessemptinessnootherthanformformisonlyemptin

Perhaps awakened where he sat on the platform by the commotion of the gathering crowd, Seok-hwa had begun chanting the Heart Sutra. The pitch, rhythm, and cadence of his chanting were surprisingly on point.

Typically, when monks realize, Oh, I’ll starve if I don’t pick up a side job as a minstrel, they start training in chanting as a matter of survival skill. A similar parallel would be a wannabe painter honing their speech and presentation skills.

“Oh dear.” With a sigh, Su-bin rose, leaning on his crutch. “Guess I’ll get going, Undertaker.”

“Why not stay here and watch?”

“Somebody’s gotta rub him down with fuel.”

I didn’t respond.

Now that I thought about it— I'd spent a whole day observing them, but aside from Su-bin, there wasn't a single other devotee or companion around Seok-hwa. The original group of the eleven Nationwide Pilgrimage for Uniting Buddhist Devotion departing Busan had either all died or deserted, leaving only one survivor.

"He's a lonely man."

I was picturing their rough journey in my mind when the knock of Su-bin's voice tapped my eardrum.

"Pardon?"

"Monk Seok-hwa, I mean." Su-bin's gaze was locked on the platform. "He doesn't have anyone to talk to. No real friends. Yesterday morning, I was the only one left to share a meal with him... I tried telling him twice not to go through with this self-immolation. He doesn't listen. He's too stubborn. There were so many good people who passed by, more than ten who said they'd walk alongside him, but I guess that wasn't enough for him."

I looked up at his eyes and realized it then. I might have been operating under a ridiculous assumption all along.

'I thought Shin Su-bin was lonely, so a sly swindler monk took advantage of him... Was I wrong?'

I figured it was an example of a standard cult tactic. Exploiting an old person's solitude was practically Lesson One in a con artist's handbook. But the tone and the look in Su-bin's eyes, directed toward the platform now, suggested a different interpretation.

If...

'He saw how lonely Seok-hwa was and decided to stay by his side as a willing companion.'

If there was never a time when Shin Su-bin got manipulated by any sly cult technique...

"He's so sure he'd Awaken that way. But I think it's all pointless. Look at Noh Do-hwa. She's an Awakener. Do you think she's any happier for having Awakened?”

“...I don’t see much connection either way.”

“Right. Enlightenment doesn’t fall from heaven just because you pray with sincerity. Isn’t Guan Seum Bosal, Avalokitesvara supposed to be in hell, not heaven?”[2]

Su-bin pushed into his crutch like a cane and limped away.

“It’s all hell. Everywhere is hell.”

I watched him go in silence.

“I’ll try talking to him one last time. Honestly, I don’t think I’ll be able to convince him. But pray for me, Undertaker. I’ve seen you, and I think you’re a true Buddha. Namu Amitabha, Guan Seum Bosal. Namu Amitabha, Guan Seum Bosal...”

Su-bin waded through the crowd with stuttering steps. Soon enough, his small figure was submerged under the throng of people. Then as quickly as he disappeared, he reappeared on the platform, guided by a holy knight. Su-bin said something or other to Seok-hwa, who was in the midst of chanting the Heart Sutra.

“... ..., ...”

“... ...!”

“... ... ...”

“... ...!”

There’s no need to record what they said. A wave remains a wave whether or not it crashes upon some shore, but words that fail to hit their mark remain noise.

Such was the noise we heard.

Sssshhhhkk!

Seok-hwa himself opened the cap of a gasoline canister and poured it over his own head. Yellowish fuel dribbled down his face. When he opened his mouth, a thin film of fuel pulled apart.

Drenched in gasoline, he shouted.

“Light the fire!”

Footnotes:

1 - Calling out a sweet potato moment is Korean slang for saying that things have started to drag and get boring.

2 - Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara (Gwaneum bosal) is the Buddhist deity of mercy and compassion who, in some traditions, transforms himself into thirty-three forms to save all beings from suffering. He also leads them to the Pure Land Paradise of the Buddha Amitabha.

Chapter 337
The Self-Immolator VI

Sinnoa

CONTENT WARNING: This chapter contains depictions of self-harm, suicide, and torture that readers may find disturbing. Reader discretion is advised.

As soon as Seok-hwa opened his mouth, the stench of gasoline spread in all directions. Oil trickled across his face, streaming from his head downward.

“Hurry! Set my body ablaze— Oooh!”

Yellow droplets burst in quick succession as the thin film of oil clinging to his parted lips kept bursting and re-forming each time he raised his voice. The spectators stirred at the eerie sight.

“Uh, uhhh...”

“He’s really going to start a fire!”

“Step back, please! It’s dangerous, move back! Everyone behind me, get back!”

“Whoooa, look at that, whoooa!”

Chaos overtook the scene. No onlooker could tear their eyes away from the monk, and Seok-hwa, as though the fluid covering him were not gasoline but the crowd’s excitement and attention made manifest, pressed his palms together with supreme confidence.

“...gategateparagateparasamgatebodhisvahagategateparagateparasamgate...

“This is it! Everyone be on guard!”

The knight in charge of the ceremony—nicknamed “the kind one” on SG Net—lit a torch with a quick puff. He stood over two meters tall, so raising the torch was in itself a show of impressive might, drawing exclamations of awe from the crowd.

The knight turned his head. There, stooped close to Seok-hwa, was the last person remaining at his side: Old Man Shin.

“Sir, you need to come out of there now!”

“Oh dear...”

“Hurry! Should I help you out?”

But before the knight could say more, the monk slick with oil snapped at them himself. “Begone!”

Normal ears likely couldn’t make out the sound drowned by the cheers and noise of the crowd, but Su-bin’s plea reached mine clearly.

“Oh no, Monk, don’t do this.”

“Get lost! You hypocrite! The Buddha awaits this humble monk!” Seok-hwa’s eyes, glistening with oil, shone like a ravenous leopard at night as he cried, “Lowly mortal, you have no place standing in my way!”

Su-bin glanced around once. Then, bowing his head to Seok-hwa—or maybe to the hundreds of onlookers, or even to the sky—he slowly retreated backward.

“Namu Amitabha, Kwan Seum Bosal...”

Once even Su-bin had stepped away, the knight who had guided Seok-hwa from Pyongyang to Sinuiju shouted, “Fire!”

“...gategateparagateparasamgatebodhisvahagate...”

He tossed the torch toward Seok-hwa. As the flaming torch traced a parabolic arc, the crowd’s uproar reached a peak.

“Fiiire—!”

To my eyes, the torch seemed to float slowly through the air.

“Young man.”

In a very distant past from the 53rd cycle, back when I first got to know the old man named Su-bin, I was working as an assistant in Do-hwa’s workshop. One evening, as the world was nearing destruction, Su-bin had gone out of his way, hobbling on his bad leg to come by the workshop.

“Aigoo, so our young assistant is still in Busan, huh? Eh? Why are you still here? Eh? And Noh Do-hwa too. How come young people like you are still here? Oh dear...”

Why?

Why did the old man remain in Busan, at the very brink of doomsday, instead of fleeing to another city like most? And why visit the workshop?

Was it loneliness?

“Young man. Let me off here.”

No.

If he’d come simply because he was consumed by loneliness, he wouldn’t have gotten out of the car halfway, refusing to let me drop him off at his home. Back then, he refused my help and went off by himself.

“This is far enough. You go on back.”

He left on his own.

Hence a hypothesis arose: What if it wasn’t because he was lonely but the opposite?

In the final moments of the world, maybe he worried that “Noh Do-hwa” or “me” would be lonely, so he came by to check on us?

“Thank you, young man. You’re worried about Noh Do-hwa, right?”

But I was there with Do-hwa in the workshop. Two of us, together, prepared to face the end.

Perhaps he was reassured by that. He saw that the two people who concerned him most were already in place, saying their final farewells as they should.

“Then this path is not yours.”

“We must each go our own way.”

And so, he departed without regrets.

A regressor is doomed to be lonely.

Do-hwa also had built her life to be like an isolated island in the corner of the world. Perhaps she caught the old man’s eye because of that.

If ever there exists someone willing to endure minor discomforts “like missing a leg,” then you can’t simply graft a piece of your heart onto them. Time is all you can lend. And maybe that old man was always ready to spend his remaining days with whomever looked loneliest in his world.

‘Ah.’

Even if someone looked like a vagrant, or a madman consumed by old, greedy desires, or perhaps someone with neither power nor fame nor many believers—maybe in that old man’s eyes, he was merely a “lonely person.”

Fwoooosh!

My train of thought blazed up like the flames.

The fire ignited the oil before the torch even made contact, and the built-in kindling—namely, Seok-hwa himself—began to consume him.

“G-aaaaargh!”

A shriek rang out.

“Uh? Uh—?”

“What the hell?”

Hundreds of onlookers recoiled.

Seok-hwa’s scream slashed through the air like a razor, grating the atmosphere around the ceremony site.

His cry...

“Ahhhhhhhhhhh!”

His cry carried the sound of unimaginable agony.

Everyone who had come at dawn had arrived with some measure of expectation in their wake. Would the monk really succeed in self-immolation? Perhaps it’d be interesting to watch. A person couldn’t possibly endure the pain of burning alive...

But a real scream always shatters your expectations with its searing edge.

“Gyaaaaaah, ahh, aaaargh! AAAAAHHH!”

Pain bled into the crowd on the back of a raw human voice, on the stench of burning flesh, the smell of oil, a crackling blaze. Every gap in the air flayed by the monk’s razor-edged scream seemed to bleed gaseous gore.

As humans can sense suffering simply by hearing it—the “Kwan Seum” principle—the entire ceremony site shook with Seok-hwa’s howl.

Clang, clang, clang!

And yet, from the onlookers’ perspective, an even stranger sound rose.

Clang, clang, clang, clang!

One might expect a person in such agony to thrash around, roll on the ground, do anything—but strangely, Seok-hwa did not budge. Even now, as his entire body burned, his seated posture remained rigid. Only his body and the platform rattled violently, as if they had been pinned together.

"Aaaaaaaaah!"

Clang, clang, clang, clang, clang!

The monk shrieked and the spectators couldn't fathom it. The only reason he could keep seated, legs folded, was that he'd spent the night hammering nails and binding himself with rope. Naturally, everyone was dumbstruck.

"Sh-should we help him?"

Just going by the screaming, it seemed they should.

"But look at his posture... He's staying so straight. Isn't that some incredible level of discipline? He's enduring the fire—it's just his voice that's breaking."

From his stance alone, that would be a reasonable assumption to make.

"Ah-ah-ah-ah-AHHHH!"

Clang, clang, clang, clang, clang, clang, clang!

The mismatch of sight and sound. No one knew if he was begging for rescue or wanting applause for managing to remain still despite the flames.

It baffled the crowd.

"Is he an Anomaly...?"

Someone muttered, "An Anomaly?"

"Look, the monk is trying to hold on, but he's screaming non-stop... Maybe some Anomaly leaped into him the moment he caught fire, copying his voice?"

"Oh."

"Well, it's a situation Anomalies would love, for sure."

"I heard he traveled from Busan, exorcising all sorts of wandering souls. Maybe they're cursing him now."

"Wow, so that means he's enduring all those wrathful spirits while still sitting there?"

"Hang in there, Monk!" another shouted through cupped hands. "Stay strong!"

"Don't lose to those Anomalies!"

"You can do it, Monk! Fight on!"

Amazingly, though it seemed absurd at a glance, they might very well have hit on a partial truth, for Seok-hwa burned for far too long.

"Aaaahhhh!"

Under normal conditions, the flames should have instantly scorched his throat and tongue to ash. At the very least, the wooden platform he was on should have turned to charcoal. Yet for some reason, his screaming and the platform's burning continued beyond five minutes, as did the crowd's heated cheers.

"Hold on, Monk! You can do it!"

Could Seok-hwa hear their voices? The cheers and support from the throng, which he had coveted so deeply, resounding across the entire ceremony ground...?

Ah—aaaah—ahhh—aaah——

After about ten minutes, the screaming ceased.

Seok-hwa had lost every organ that could produce sound—his lungs, throat, tongue, and teeth had all melted away. His muscles, which trembled spasmodically while nailed to the platform, were likewise consumed by flame.

Finally, the fire died down. On the char-blackened platform floor, the seated form remained in its meditative posture, charred into a coal-black statue.

“Heh.”

A murmur of awe drifted among the spectators.

“So he really was a venerable monk, after all.”

“Right? He kept his form flawlessly.”

“Enduring self-immolation even while some Anomaly latched on, that’s some potent spiritual power.”

“They say he was from Busan, right?”

“Will this really stop the Monster Wave…?”

“If we open that up, bet we’ll find a bucketful of relics.”

Some onlookers pressed their palms together toward the monk who had burned himself in the Eastern Holy State’s territory like admiring a performer who staged an intense show so early in the morning.

“Namu Amitabha, Kwan Seum Bosal.”

“May you be reborn in Paradise, Monk.”

“Namu Amitabha…”

People gradually dispersed.

Once the crowd’s wall dissolved, I got a better view of the remains of Seok-hwa, the blackened statue of his body. Though all of him was burned to cinders, every part of the human shape stayed intact, save for his right foot, which should have been empty.

The prosthetic made by Do-hwa was no match for the flames and had burned away completely.

I silently glanced around.

(Ritual) Venerable Monk Seok-hwa's Nirvana Self-Immolation (Event)

Under the flapping banner in the sky—

In the nearly deserted ceremony ground, after the audience had dispersed—

No matter where I looked, Shin Su-bin was nowhere to be seen.

There is an epilogue.

"So..."

A few days after I returned to the National Road Management Corps HQ, I found Do-hwa glaring at me.

"You're saying you visited for fun, basically sightseeing while some guy got roasted alive in a big cozy 'bonfire session,' and then came back...?" she asked.

"Hey now, that makes it sound like I took pleasure in someone's death, like I'm Yu Ji-won. Please be more mindful of your phrasing."

In the corner, Ji-won quietly raised her head, puzzled.

For reference, Do-hwa had dark circles under her eyes and was petting her dog as if it were some government-approved narcotic. No, some source of healing. This official "state-level dog" also had "Doctor" in its name, and maybe one day, I'll have the chance to talk more about it.

"Anyway, I wanted to find Old Man Shin and bring him back, but he vanished. So here I am, back alone."

"Hmm..."

“Oh, right. Fear not, I haven’t forgotten your gift. Here, it’s Melona.[1] A handmade ice cream recipe replicated faithfully via regressor’s knowledge.”

“Get out…”

Weird. This gift always thrilled Seo-rin. Maybe I should have tried a B.B.Big bar instead? I’d keep that in mind for next cycle.

As I left (but not before handing the Melona instead to Ji-won), Do-hwa’s voice caught me by the neck.

“Ah. Leave, fine, but come back tomorrow. I’ve got something to give you…”

“Hmm.” I looked back at Ji-won. “Ji-won, is that telling me to leave or not? As the director’s right-hand woman, I’d like your reading on this.”

“Take the words at face value, Mr. Matiz,” she replied, tearing open the Melona wrapper (perfectly reproduced, by the way) with a blank look. “She asked you to leave for today, then come again tomorrow. Just interpret it plainly, please. As for how the director’s feelings are involved, that’s best left aside.”

“Oh.”

“Damn it, now you’re double-teaming me with your nonsense…”

A day passed.

When I arrived at HQ the next day, no sooner had I opened the door than something solid came flying at my face. I reflexively caught it.

It was a long-shaped box.

“What’s this?”

Do-hwa eyed me, still hunched over in that same slouch. “It’s Old Man Shin’s prosthetic…”

“Ah.”

“Sounds like that monk—whatever his name was—burned it to a crisp, right? So you can deliver it yourself. It won’t be the same as me fitting it personally, but it’s a decent enough device…” Then she muttered, “Well, that’s all a typical prosthetic is really for, anyway. Right…?”

I didn’t need Ji-won’s help interpreting that.

She’d let me off for ditching my job and running away on the condition that I personally deliver the prosthetic to the patient. I could accept those terms. Besides, leaving Su-bin without a proper goodbye had bothered me a bit.

“All right. If you prefer, I can carry you all the way to Sinuiju, so you can see him for yourself—”

“Stop. I mean it, shut up…”

And so I did.

Su-bun had vanished from the ceremony site, but I wasn’t too worried about finding him again. At least, not until I was about to ask Ji-won to check with the Saintess’s Telepathy for a location beacon.

[Ms. Yu Ji-won says he does show up on the Mini-Map, but something’s off.]

I tilted my head. “Off how?”

[He’s located in some hill near Sinuiju, and it hasn’t moved at all. He’s completely stationary.]

“Huh? That’s definitely strange.”

[Right?]

Before the apocalypse, the world beyond one’s blanket was where danger lay. Nowadays, it’s “outside the city.” People flocked together in cities these days for a reason. Stepping outside a city’s boundaries drastically raised your odds of vanishing into the Void. Sure, traveling from one city to the next was dangerous, but to sit around on a random hillside that wasn't even on a national road, and without budging?

"All right, I'll go. Keep giving me directions, please."

[Got it.]

I hurried on. Not far beyond the roads maintained by the National Road Management Corps, the scenery grew glum. Living shadows took note of my presence, then skittered away the moment they sensed me.

'This way.'

A faint trail of footprints, a left foot and a crutch, plus wheel marks scattered like stepping stones led me on.

They were barely visible. Ordinary folks would have missed them.

'But it's enough.'

I came upon a low hill where sparse brush left the view wide open. Following the direction from the Mini-Map to the very end, I found a broad slab of rock.

There, a figure that seemed to be Shin Su-bin lay burnt to death.

I heard the Saintess's quick intake of breath as her sight took in mine.

I carefully checked the boulder's surroundings. Where...? Where had he found it? A gasoline can identical to the one used to burn Seok-hwa lay askew, giving off that same odor.

Shin Su-bin's body knelt on the rock, hands clasped as if respectfully praying to someone, or something.

'Self-immolation.'

Out here.

In a lonely hillside no one would ever see.

With no disciple, no companion, no onlookers.

Alone.

Silent.y, I set the prosthetic box on the stone. Then I dropped onto the grass with a thump.

It was by chance that I ended up directly facing him—Shin Su-bin, whose burned body was pointed at the sky in prayer.

"...Departing like this, sir? That'll sadden Miss Noh Do-hwa."

No reply.

Naturally. Where his face should have been, there was no expression, only blackened charcoal in place of wrinkled limbs and features.

And yet, why did it feel like...

'That's your job now, Undertaker.'

...a chuckle rose from the mouthless remains?

Somewhere in that hillside, a few pine warblers chirped, still not consumed by the Void. I stayed there, gazing at the old man's body that had silently given itself up to the world, until dusk fell.

Does the world brim solely with those who leave behind glowing names?

Throughout humanity's vast history, countless unnamed individuals must have blossomed like flowers, then faded away without a trace, yet they surely existed. Perhaps among them had been those who attempted feats beyond human limits that would never be recognized in the annals of fame.

A leap of faith.

They did not wish even to display their deaths for others, seeing that too as “excess baggage of the heart.”

Casting off all honor and desire. Avoiding any onlookers, choosing a quiet place. Simply praying in their hearts for the end of all sadness.

Some offered themselves in works of art.

In a cathedral whose architect was forgotten.

In a buried sculpture.

In song.

In flesh.

In silence.

And so they vanished.

Exiled from time.

You can’t meet them in any normal way. They’re lost in alleys, erased data.

Perhaps the karmic lot of a regressor is to reunite with those who disappeared from the world. To encounter the story of “Shin Su-bin,” who was overlooked by most as just an ordinary old man, only now to discover the blank space he left behind.

Thus, a regressor’s destiny is not simply to chew on loneliness. We’re only visitors who pass by every alley of this world before leaving.

“Until next time, sir.”

I rose from a respectful bow to depart.

[Mr. Undertaker.]

Then suddenly, the Saintess spoke.

“Yes?”

[Mr. Undertaker, about his foot.]

I turned. How had I missed something so obvious?

Shin Su-bin had been missing his right foot. He'd given his prosthetic to Seok-hwa, and it burned up in Sinuiju. That should have been the end of it.

So where there should have been an empty space, a missing right foot—

Even though it too was charred crisp, I could see a perfectly "intact foot" in proportion with the rest of his body.

[What do you think happened?] the Saintess murmured. [Is it someone else pretending to be Shin Su-bin? Or an Anomaly lurking in the corpse?]

I don't claim to know every secret of this world. But looking at that foot, it didn't register as some suspicious puzzle to me.

"Who knows? Maybe it's just 'excess baggage of the heart.'"

[...?]

"Seems he left a final message not to grieve for him. That's what I see, anyway."

I let out a faint laugh and turned away.

This time I'd bring a B.B.Big bar instead.

Footnotes:

1 - Melona is a popular South Korean ice pop brand, known for its creamy, gelato-like texture and diverse range of fruit flavors, including the classic honeydew, but also banana, strawberry, mango, and more.

Chapter 338

The Nurturer

Sinnoa

Today, let's keep it brief for once.

I'll skip even the epilogue and spin a short tale.

With civilization's collapse, most of humanity's beloved industries found themselves plunged into an era of "hardship marches."

The pet industry, also known as the companion-animal market, was hard-pressed to avoid being delisted.

"I'd rather starve to death myself than abandon my baby!"

"Hyung, I'm telling you, there are monsters chasing after us..."

"I'll go! If I die, I'm dying alongside my kid!"

That's what folks shouted as they fled with their pets in tow. But after three days of real hunger, their perspective got a little more flexible.

They didn't love their pets any less. It was just that people were weak.

What could they do? Most Koreans after the 1970s had lost their immunity to starvation. Suddenly resetting one's stomach to the standards of decades past and telling it to bear with it was no simple matter.

Still, a few owners somehow managed to reach their refuge without letting go of their pets, clinging to iron will. However, they soon ran into cold reality.

"That's weird. Just last night, my baby only walked on four legs, but this morning it's on two...?"

"It's just smart, that's all."

"That's weird. Last night, my baby had only one head, but this morning there are three...?"

"With three brains, so triple the IQ! I knew my baby was a genius."

"That's weird. My baby used to love your touch, but now it's biting, ripping you apart with those teeth..."

In refugee camps, cases of people meeting a gruesome death at the paws of their own pets skyrocketed. If they were lucky, owners might come to lose only a finger or two. If they were unlucky, maybe two full limbs. They had little choice but to admit the truth:

"Gaah! It's a monster!"

"Help me! My child's gone insane!"

Most animals were vulnerable to Void Poison.

No need to categorize mammals, reptiles, birds, fish. Every morning that dawned, pets took on a new "species adaptation" that was, for all intents and purposes, off.

In the end, the vast majority of owners tearfully "took care" of their pets. Those who hesitated too long were taken care of by the pets themselves.

But then...

"My baby doesn't bite."

"Sir, you do realize you could die at any moment if you keep insisting on that? We're not trying to be mean here. If one Anomaly starts rampaging within this village, everyone is done for! All of us!"

"No, I understand that. I'm not just being stubborn—I'm telling you, my baby really doesn't bite."

“Huh?”

No matter the time or place, mutations sometimes took place.

It was a phenomenon truly miniscule in number... 1%? Maybe the odds of pulling a super-rare in a cruel smartphone gacha. Every so often, one would appear: a “relatively safe from Void Poison” pet, rare beyond measure.

A normal person might rage at such savage odds, but from a seller’s perspective, it spelled big money. Sharp-nosed entrepreneurs saw the potential jackpot in these now “safe” pets, rarer than ever.

“How about it, sir? This is the scarlet macaw. Really hard to come by. You could scour all the pet shops in Busan and only find this one that still appears normal.”

“Whoa.”

“Hey, Papanya, introduce yourself.”

– Yes, hello. I’m a cute pet parrot. My name is Papanya. Sometimes I dream of flying out the window when the weather is nice, but right now I’m happy spending time in a warm house with my master. Being with my master is my favorite thing, so every day I sing and enjoy such cheerful days.

“As you can see, it speaks quite eloquently.”

“I mean, for a parrot, that’s a bit too articulate. It’s kind of creepy...”

“It’s probably blended with something like ChatGPT AI. Ask it anything you want, it’ll answer well.”

“So, it’s an Anomaly?”

“Sure, probably. But who cares if it’s so perfectly parrot-like?”

Soon, these “safe-rated” pets started commanding astronomical premiums.

Over ten high-end pet shops sprang up in Busan alone. Unlike in the old days, you couldn't find separate cat-only or dog-only shops, there simply wasn't enough supply. But that was fine because "pets" as a concept had risen to an elevated status.

"Wow, look at that dog."

"It's got two heads?"

"Yep. One side looks like a Doberman, and the other side's a spitting image of a Samoyed."

"Black and white fur patterning is crazy..."

These days, anyone who seemed fairly well off would flaunt their lifestyle by owning a pet.

The pet-shop owners of Busan formed a "Pet Association," which granted animals their own rating tiers. The lowest safety rating was "1 Day," the highest was "10 Years."

The standard was simple: If adopting that pet gave you a high probability of dying within twenty-four hours, 1 Day. If you could expect a safe, carefree pet life for ten years, 10 Years.

Of course, the shop owners didn't actually have the power of prophecy. Incidents happened. Like a gator labeled 10 Years devouring its owner within a week.

(There was debate about whether that was really the Pet Association's fault.)

Such were the times. Such was the trend.

"Commander Noh."

"Yeees...?"

"Might you be interested in joining the True Dictator Club?"

"Huh?"

I always gave Do-hwa a pet as a gift.

It's well-known that dictators love pets.

Surprisingly, Hitler established Germany's first animal protection laws and was very attached to his own dog. In fact, there's a "Law of Preserved Affection Quantity" behind this phenomenon. A person doesn't lose the ability to love simply because they've lost affection for humankind. Their total capacity for love remains unchanged, just diverted to something else.

It's akin to the Law of Equivalent Exchange discovered by the great alchemist Arakawa Hiromu.[1]

So it begged the question:

Q: How much might the ultimate misanthrope, who despises humanity—namely, Noh Do-hwa—cherish a pet?

Is that not an enthralling experiment?

Yes, indeed. Even someone whose love for people is FFF-grade might possess an EX-grade "pet-owner aptitude."

"Here, a Maltese."

Me, the Undertaker. As an avid viewer of Surprise TV, I had to solve this mystery.

"I handpicked a good-looking one, specially selected. Please care for it with all your love and attention."

The Maltese I brought faced off with Noh Do-hwa, who was sitting in her usual slouched posture.

Yes, right at eye level.

"That's odd. The Maltese I know is a small breed from the island of Malta. Yet the head in front of me is so big, it'd slap aside any Old English Sheepdog meme I've ever seen on the internet...?"

“It’s exceptionally tall, yes. But because it was originally a small dog, it’ll probably live a long time.”

– Woof!

The 112-centimeter-tall “Maltese” stuck out its tongue and rubbed cheeks with Do-hwa. It might have sounded different to each ear, likely a slurp slurp to her.

“Geez, you son of a...”

“What do you think? Pure white fur, just like the lab coat you always wear, Commander Noh. Eats barely anything. Hardly sheds.”

“Cut the crap. Dammit. It’s heavy as hell. How can a dog that big not shed...?”

“Credit the blessings of Void Poison, I suppose.”

– Woof! Woof, bark!

Just as you’d expect from a pet selected by a regressor, the giant Maltese was extremely gentle.

It poured unconditional affection (with a high H_2O content) on a master who didn’t understand human hearts at all, surpassing even Kwan Seum Bosal in benevolence.

– Bark!

“See? The Maltese seems to like you too, Commander.”

“...I’d like to return it...”

“I’ll have it recorded as accepted.”

On that day, Commander Noh joined the ranks of historically famous dictators reputed as pet lovers.

To be candid, I wanted to give Do-hwa something she might care about, if only a little.

Humans aren't invincible. Even those who seem unbeatable eventually find their mental reserves drained.

Take me, for instance, I have to take a "vacation" every ten runs or so.

"Here, a Maltese."

So from around the 100th run onward, I always brought a dog to Commander Noh.

– Woof!

On the 200th run, the 300th, the 400th, always a "white Maltese that was way too big to be called a Maltese."

Effectively, across multiple runs, Commander Noh and that dog maintained the bond of "pet owner and pet."

"Here, a Maltese."

Its name was Doctor.

It wasn't a name she chose nor I. It was a nickname the staff started using when they saw a dog appear near the Commander.

"Wow, what is that huge thing?"

"It's the commander's dog."

"It's so white..."

"Looks expensive. Where'd she even find something like that?"

"I heard from a buddy in the ops team that the Undertaker gave it to her."

"Ah, so..."

"If it's from the Undertaker, guess that makes sense."

"You could practically ride it."

Before long, the white dog's towering size and majestic looks turned it into an idol beloved by everyone in the National Road Management Corps.

"Doctor, come here!"

– Woof!

"Good morning, Doctor. Another fine day—"

– Bark!

How it picked up the nicknames "Doctor" or "Professor" was almost laughably simple:

A dog given by the Undertaker → Undertaker → "Doc" → "Professor." QED.

Hence the staff all called the white dog Doctor or Professor. The fact that Commander Noh always wore a lab coat almost certainly shaped its image too.

'I figured that when I'm not around, Do-hwa can at least find some solace in caring for Doctor.'

I felt a bit of satisfaction at that thought, yet for some reason...

Even when she sometimes fed the dog, or told the staff to look after it, or briefly stroked its head amid her duties:

Commander Noh's expression always remained utterly blank.

"Awakener Undertaker."

One day, when the Monster Wave was soon to devour the world, sometime in the future of the 511th cycle, Do-hwa said this:

"That dog you gave me... Doctor..."

"Ah, yes, what about our Professor?"

"For a dog, it sure lives a long time..."

She pointed to Doctor, lying down with his tail wagging.

– Bark.

It had already been 20 years since his adoption, yet Doctor was still as lively as day one. That alone was enough to raise Do-hwa's suspicion. A Maltese can't usually last more than 15 years, and for large breeds, the average lifespan is even shorter.

"Ah, yes. Well, guess he's just healthy? The staff play with him all the time and toss him food. He's living the dream. Probably the best-fed, happiest dog in the world right now."

She clicked her tongue.

Hearing that familiar sound, Doctor shot up (!) and ran over to her. With a well-practiced touch, she petted his head, neck, then back. Doctor panted happily.

'How heartwarming.'

It was a pure, very human display of affection, which reaffirmed that my gift was not misguided. Smiling inwardly, I kept watching.

So when those words came from her mouth...

"How many died...?"

...I was too slow to respond.

"Pardon?"

"This dog. Big enough to befit someone called 'Commander.'"

Stroke.

"Its fur is so white that anyone would marvel at it, and caring for it is easy. It's docile. Gentle. Above all, it has an incredibly long lifespan. We'll never have to bury it before the world ends. Truly an ideal dog..."

Stroke.

She ran her hand through the fur at Doctor's neck. Her gaze was half-lidded, fixed right on me.

"So I got curious. Just how many 'failures' did you discard before selecting this perfect dog to give me, Awakener Undertaker...?"

I shut my mouth. Her faint, smiling eyes were sharper than a blade from afar.

"How shall I put it?" she began. "This thought suddenly hits me..."

"Which is...?"

"Ordinarily, the old me would simply pass away without leaving a will, letting the next me in the next cycle handle everything with a big 'Screw you.' And that accumulation of petty revenge turned me into who I am now, presumably..." Then she murmured, "But if humans have one advantage over animals, it's the ability to reconsider our mistakes... is it not...?"

She pressed lightly on Doctor's throat, enough to put mild pressure on his voice box.

– Woof.

"So after hundreds of years, I'd like to do something nice for the next me..."

Doctor trembled, but didn't fight her grip. Perhaps he interpreted even this as an act of affection.

"From the next cycle onward, don't just pick any dog for me. Give me the choice to adopt it myself... Just tell me the old me left that as a final will. If I'm not a total idiot, I'll figure it out..."

An Undertaker's job is also to carry out the last wishes of the deceased. I couldn't dismiss her request.

Thus, in the next run...

"Huh. A pet, you say."

When I conveyed her older self's final message, for a while, the new Noh Do-hwa fell into thought. Her gaze flicked from open air to me and back again until, finally, she let a small grin escape.

"Ah, I see..."

"You see what it means?"

"Yes, more or less..."

She stood up with a flutter, her lab coat rumpled. Surprisingly for someone who spent 24 hours a day holed up in the HQ, it looked like she was about to go out.

"Where are you going?"

"I have work to do, now that I've received the message. I figured I'd visit a pet shop. I'm new to raising pets in this run, so I need your advice. You're coming along..."

Extremely unusual. She was the one inviting me out, not the other way around.

"W-welcome! Thank you so much for visiting the best pet shop in Busan!"

At the arrival of the National Road Management Corps Commander and the Undertaker, two of the peninsula's mightiest, the shop owner nearly fell over bowing. He rubbed his hands together as he said, "What sort of pet can I get for you? Whatever you wish, Commander! In fact, it would be our honor to present you with one, no charge!"

"Hmph..."

Normally, Do-hwa despised this sort of treatment. She rarely even went to Jagalchi Market for her favorite vin chaud except at dawn, all to avoid people.

And yet...

"I'm not looking for a specific breed. I just want to stroll around a bit…”

“O-of course, Commander! Take all the time you need! Our shop deals exclusively in pets rated at least 2 years by the Pet Association! Truly a top-quality selection! Haha!”

“Hoh…”

Strangely, she seemed in a great mood. Where typically she’d scowl at sycophants, her expression now was calm and unruffled. A rare sight indeed.

“This one? Or maybe this? Hmm, or would that be better…?”

She stopped in front of each cage: a parrot turned purple, a rainbow-aurora fish, a cat with three tails, a miniature dog with an off-kilter body ratio, a reptile with amethyst crystals sprouting from its skin. With each, she glanced my way as I remained silent.

“What do you think…?”

Then, I answered thoughtfully, “It won’t live very long.”

“Yes, I know…”

“It’ll probably die before you do, before the world collapses.”

“Yes. I’m aware of that…” Her boot tapped lightly as she looked up at me from close range. “When that happens, I want you to handle my pet’s burial, Awakener Undertaker…”

I didn’t respond.

“Oh, Shop Owner, I’ll take this little one. Not exactly pretty, but somehow it feels familiar…”

“Eh? A-ah, right! Commander, you’ve got an eye for cuteness indeed! Haha!”

She selected…

A small dog that resembled a Maltese, its forelimbs and hind legs all mismatched in both size and proportion, so that even standing still made it shuffle around.

– Woof.

She scooped up the pup, eyes and nose misaligned, into her arms.

“Awakener Undertaker.”

She smiled.

“It would be lovely if you’d pay for it... Because it’s a gift for me...”

That pup died at 4 years 7 months.

From then on, in each new run, Do-hwa adopted a different pet.

“I’ll take this one.”

“This one draws me in...”

“I want this one.”

“I’d appreciate it if you pay for me...”

Sometimes a dog, sometimes a cat, sometimes a fish, sometimes a lizard. The species always changed. Yet three constants remained:

1. She always cared for them with real devotion, determination, and patience.

2. Regardless of species, they were always called “Doctor” or “Professor.”

3. Finally, every “Professor” invariably died before she did.

“This one. It was running around by itself last night and hit the wall. Seems it broke its neck... Could I ask you to handle the funeral, Awakener Undertaker...?”

Unlike the half-hearted vibe she used to give when raising that giant white dog, from the 512th cycle onward, she genuinely loved these pets. Her grief each time they died was sincere too.

But still—even past the 550th run, 600th, 700th, 800th, and on—she always chose a life that would die before her own in a doomed world.

“I’ll take this one...”

To outsiders, it might appear a twisted hobby, but though neither she nor I had ever openly stated the reason, we both guessed it.

The Noh Do-hwa of the 511th run and the 512th cycle are different beings.

I, in each run, raise a different pet and mourn a different death.

I want you to remember that.

“This one looks good...”

In short, she demanded that the memories pertaining to her, in my mind, not be “copy + paste.” She refused to be simply “the same old Noh Do-hwa,” raising “the same old pet,” an “identical existence.” She wanted to remain this person, remembered exactly as she was now.

By that measure, it was a pretty twisted hobby. Though she raised a different pet in each run, overall, the one she was truly caring for was the space she occupied in my memories. Time after time, she nourished my mind’s recollections and scars, ensuring one truth would remain forever:

The “511” and the “512” weren’t just a trivial difference of “1.” They held a time that could never be erased, nor should it be.

Through subtle means, so very typical of her, she whispered that message.

“You’re unbelievably twisted. Seriously.”

Eventually, in some run, I couldn’t help letting that remark slip. She had just chosen a tiny puppy right then, and she turned to me to say it.

“Indeed…”

Quietly, she lifted her lips into a grin.

“In that case, you should’ve been more cautious when you picked me…”

– Woof!

In her white coat, holding the cheerful little dog, she smiled.

Footnotes:

1 - The author and artist of Fullmetal Alchemist, a popular manga that explores the study and costs of alchemy as a science.

Chapter 339

The Surrenderer I

Sinnoa

There have long been certain taboos in genre fiction, rules where we all agree, Let's all be careful not to do this*, okay?*

For example, if the protagonist has racked up over 200 chapters of sweet, devoted romance with another character, they can't suddenly end up with some other random side character.

The protagonist can't make a blunder that results in a decisive defeat for their allies, nor can the allies blunder in a way that causes the protagonist a decisive loss.

It may come as a surprise to you readers, but a plot in which a ninja appears out of nowhere and massacres all the characters is, in fact, also forbidden.

Among these is, of course, the taboo known as the once-powerful protagonist suddenly loses their power and becomes weak.

And so there is I, the Undertaker, who has entered a self-imposed Aura diet. One might say that I, too, have violated an unwritten rule of the genre-fiction world.

However, the particular taboo dealt with in this episode is of a slightly different nature from the ones mentioned above.

[...]

Today's protagonist is none other than the bearer of such illustrious titles as "The Weakest of the Four Heavenly Kings," "One-Trick Laptop," "Got-Wrecked-By-The-Mastermind Award," "Out of Every Possible Miko, They Chose Oh Dok-seo (LOL)," and so on.

[.....]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame.

This is an account of their desperate battle to somehow overcome the literary taboo binding them:

A villain who has already been defeated by the protagonist must never return stronger than before.

That account is today's story.

"Hey, mister! I brought something super amazing!"

Bang!

One day, as usual, Dok-seo made her entrance by kicking the door wide open. Because her brain still hadn't evolved beyond a simian-level, she maintained the miraculous logic of "hands = front feet ≒ hind feet."

I spoke softly, channeling the mind of a chimpanzee caretaker. "Dok-seo... I'm begging you, please just knock. You barged in right after I finished showering last time too."

"Whoops, sorry, sorry. But, like, Saintess unnie is always watching you anyway, right? Even if I see something, it's basically like a single drop in the Pacific Ocean."

[Ms. Dok-seo?] the Saintess hastily called out using her Telepathy. [I've never done anything like that, you know?]

We were both silent.

[Mr. Undertaker, it's a misunderstanding and slander. You know very well how much I respect your privacy.]

Moving on.

As you all know, Oh Dok-seo is an otaku suffering from an incurable case of chuunibyou disease. And, tragically, the concept of "super amazing" for a chuunibyou is often a far cry from what most normal people might consider as such.

Suppose there's a character who, for some tragic reason, lost an eye. An ordinary person would think, How sad... But our beloved author Dok-seo here would get all excited, going, "Wow! A magic Eye! All hail the King of the Mystic Eye!"

Dok-seo chose that moment to pipe in again. "Yeah, we can debate Saintess unnie's tastes later. For now, just look at my super-amazing creation."

[Ms. Dok-seo? Dok-seo, can you hear me?]

"Tadaaa!"

Dok-seo unfurled a newspaper with a dramatic flourish. On that newspaper, which hadn't been updated in years, there were gigantic brushstrokes:

List of Outer Gods List

Type 1: End of All Shape & Form, "Infinite Void"

Type 2: serverSHUTDOWN, "Admin of the Infinite Metagame"

Type 3: Abyss of Dreams, "Nut"

Type 4: Infinite Labyrinth, "Mastermind"

Type 5: Absolute Sike, "Leviathan"

Type 6: Army of Annihilation, "Monster Wave"

Dok-seo proudly flapped the newspaper.

"Ta-da! What do you think? I wasn't sure whether I should list them by threat ranking or just in the order they had contact with you, so I thought I'd keep it simple first! So?!"

A whole galaxy sparkled and spun in Dok-seo's eyes.

"Pretty amazing, right?"

I fell silent, struggling to work out exactly where and how to launch a rebuttal. Maybe I should start with the core issue: What the hell was up with that weird way of writing Server Shutdown? And she even spelled the word “Psyche” wrong. Did she mean something like Absolute Mind? Something like that.

“Well...”

“Uh huh?!”

“It’s... cool. Very cool.”

“Right?!”

“Yeah, you’ve really got a special flair for these things. You truly are a writer, through and through, and a great one at that.”

“Hah!”

“But, hmm... Actually, we’re not even sure if Monster Wave is truly an Outer God or just a secondary phenomenon connected to an Outer God, right?”

“Right, right, right. Yeah, that part bugged me too, buuut ‘Army of Annihilation’ just sounded sooo frickin’ awesome that I couldn’t leave it out... So I just tossed it in for now. Isn’t it epic?”

So just because it sounded cool, they got to be crowned an Outer God. Whether Monster Wave would be happy or appalled to hear that, I had no idea.

Anyway, there was still more to point out.

“Hey, Dok-seo.”

“Mhm!”

“Why did you force in all these epithets, anyway? They’re not aliases used in the standard strategy guides or anything. Don’t you think it’s unnecessary?”

“Huh? What are you talking about? If that’s the standard we’re going with, then all those fancy Three Kingdoms names, like the Five Tiger Generals or Crouching Dragon and Young Phoenix, should be treated the same way too."

"Well, those have been around from the start. It's Romance of the Three Kingdoms. They've got that classical authenticity, a rightful claim to their epithets."

"Oh, really now?" Dok-seo then said with total nonchalance, "Then since I'm writing Undertaker: The Novel, I can just assign epithets however I want, can't I?"

What.

"I mean, in the actual historical records of the Three Kingdoms, there was no such thing as the Five Tiger Generals, right? Same thing here, yeah? You go play around in the real historical accounts, mister. In my 'Romance,' these are the official epithets. Bang-bang-bang."

This indefinite-hiatus brat...

'For this arc alone, you've posted 96 separate "delayed publication" notices and 37 "resuming publication" notices, and yet you act like you're on par with the venerable Luo Guanzhong, a man who properly finished his epic!'

Regrettably, I couldn't muster any immediate counterargument to her half-baked debate on "historical records vs. a romance." Thus, I changed my angle.

"But isn't the list kind of inconsistent? Look at your list."

"Huh? Where?"

"For Type 2, you wrote serverSHUTDOWN, 'Admin of the Infinite Metagame.' All the other Outer Gods are written like normal titles, but this one is half-and-half. Don't you think that's weird?"

"Oh, that?" Dok-seo casually folded the newspaper. "It doesn't really matter, does it? After all, that one's the weakest—no—the absolute weakest Outer God."

Bzzt.

Just then, the laptop on my desk—the last “main body” that the Admin of the Infinite Metagame had left in this world—began trembling frantically.

But Dok-seo neither saw nor heard it.

“Admin of the Infinite Metagame might sound impressive, but the poor thing got beaten by you, got beaten by the Mastermind, and also got beaten by Infinite Void. Aside from handing me the draft for the novel before you even regress, what does it have left? Leviathan devours the Aura of every Awakener, but this thing? Meh. Honestly... By now, in terms of Anomaly threat level, it’s not even Outer God-class. It’s, like, village-class?”

Bzzzzzzz! Vrrrrrr!

The laptop that had quietly stayed powered off now booted up on its own, flashing a blue screen in pulses.

But Dok-seo ignored it.

Why? Because that laptop was for writing her serialization, and right now... she wasn’t writing anything.

She was on hiatus.

Today, yesterday, the day before that, the day before that one—throughout past, present, and even future eternities—she remained steadfastly on hiatus.

I couldn’t stand by and watch it silently any longer.

“Well... Still, Dok-seo.”

“Mhm?”

“The Admin of the Infinite Metagame is the Outer God that chose you to be its Miko, you know. When everyone else just saw you as a brat, it alone discovered some remarkable potential in you. In other words, it ‘scouted’ you. Couldn’t you see it that way?”

“Hmm.”

“That Absolute Defense you rely on—”

“AT-Field.”

“...Yes, your AT-Field is also proof that you remain its Miko. You can dismiss any interference in this world as mere ‘NPC struggles inside a creative work.’ That’s quite a power.”

“I mean, I guess so, but...” She furrowed her brow and tilted her head. “I became an author—something I was never meant to be—and ended up writing your life story all because it chose me as its Miko, right?”

“Uh, yes, that’s true.”

“But mister.”

Suddenly, Oh Dok-seo’s expression turned serious.

“I find writing... painful.”

I went silent again.

“Every time I face that blank laptop screen, my mind goes blank too. I’m scared of how the readers will react. I’m afraid of tomorrow’s sunrise. Ahh, I am a girl trapped in the hell of everyday life! Who is it that relegated me to a fate of being incapable of finding joy in the sunlight as sunlight? Right. The Admin of the Infinite Metagame. It is the culprit. It is the one that robbed me of life’s happiness...”

“So I don’t particularly feel any gratitude toward it. If it’s so upset, it could at least bestow upon me a body that pumps out nonstop dopamine so that I love writing every single day. I really don’t want to be on hiatus, but because of that thing, my poor readers are the ones who end up suffering.”

Bzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzzz!

The laptop trembled so violently it fell from the desk. Even on the floor, it kept shaking in anger.

Dok-seo blinked in apparent realization, then said, “Oh, right! I should ask Seo Gyu to replace all the Outer God epithets on SG Net with my versions! Heehee! This is gonna be fun! Now I’m an official Historian of the Library Society!”

Then, just as quickly as she had kicked the entrance open, she went scampering out the door like a hamster excited to see its master.

Silence fell over my private room.

After a while, the still-quivering laptop gave a small click, and its blue screen disappeared. In its place appeared a Vtuber avatar—a small girl with white hair, in 144p resolution—who began to speak in a badly compressed, low-quality voice.

[This is so—CENSORED—unbelievable—]

[I gather up everything I can muster—give it my all—like a final grudge orb—]

[Yet a so-called Miko ends up beating up her own god. Where in this—CENSORED—world is there a Pope that thrashes her believers—CENSORED—?]

[We need more devotion, more faith than ever, but all she does is trash talk her own god—CENSORED—CENSORED—]

[And then there’s the matter of me ghostwriting the so-called scripture. She just made me do that out of nowhere—]

[And she got caught, so—CENSORED—she just stopped writing the scripture for seven whole years now—]

[Whatever you think, I’m not behind this. I’d gain at least a little of my power back if she would just finish that scripture—why on earth would I sabotage its completion—?]

[She’s the—CENSORED—one who stopped writing all on her own volition. I had no hand in it and—]

[Seriously—CENSORED—just think about it for one second. If she finished that story, at least some portion of my strength might recover. Why would I prevent it?]

There was the crackle of static, the laptop overloaded, and the monitor went black.

There was no helping it. In its present state, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame was so weak that even such a small manifestation in the real world nearly used up all its power.

“Well... my condolences.”

[...]

“But, you know, it really makes me wonder.”

[...]

“It was you who chose Oh Dok-seo as your Miko in the first place, wasn’t it?”

[...]

“Your Miko, your responsibility. Tough it out, oh ‘Server Shutdown’ of the Outer Gods—The Admin of the Infinite Metagame.”

[...]

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

Like a certain ancient genre novelist who filled over two pages with just the phrase “Level up!”,[1] the Admin of the Infinite Metagame spewed out a stream of 144p-quality profanity for quite some time.

I still wonder sometimes.

If only, at that moment, I had consoled it just a little more kindly instead of mocking that Anomaly—

Maybe, just maybe, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame wouldn't have gone on to fully embrace the dark side...

"Mister! Emergency, emergency!"

Bang!

One day in the next cycle, sometime around the 925th, Dok-seo once again came kicking in the door with her hind leg and barged in.

I screamed.

"Gyaaaaah!"

Because I'd just finished showering.

Dok-seo also screamed.

"Kyaaaaaa!"

"Huaaaack!"

"Kyaaaaaaaaaa!"

"Raaaaagh! Get out! How long are you going to just stand there screaming, you brat?!"

"Oh, right. Mister, your abs are insane. I mean, just out of a, you know, like from a physics-curiosity kind of thing? Could I—?"

"Before you get to experience the crushing weight of physics, get out."

A moment later...

"Oh, right! Mister! Emergency! Emergency!"

Bang!

Dok-seo once again slammed the door and came in. Thankfully, this time I'd only just gotten my hair damp, I was fully dressed in my barista uniform.

Drained, I muttered, "Alright. What is it now?"

"A transparent dragon has appeared!"

"Sorry, a what?"

"They say a transparent dragon just showed up in Daegu! It's going all Grrrroooowl! and roaring, and it's super, super powerful! It might be Outer-God class!"

Yes.

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame.

Literally, the Anomaly that governs every creative work in existence.

It got pissed off.

Footnotes:

1 - This is possibly a reference to Nam Heesung, the author of The Legendary Moonlight Sculptor.

Chapter 340

The Surrenderer II

Sinnoa

As mentioned several times before, it is a fool's errand to expect anything like humanity or human warmth from an Anomaly. After all, Anomalies possess neither "intellect" nor "reason" nor "conscience."

(We'll table the discussion of times when human beings also sometimes lack those qualities.)

In that sense, you could also say that Anomalies have no "mind," and because they have no mind, by Aristotle's syllogism, they of course had no concept of "peace of mind" either.[1] Thus, the proposition that "an Outer God lost its mind" cannot be established in the first place.

And rightfully so. How could the Admin lose a peace it never had?

– Kwaaaaang!

And yet, when the impossible needed doing, Dok-seo delivered.

– Kraaah! Kaaaaaang!

I arrived in the Saharan plains of Africa— No, I mean, in Daegu on urgent business. The entire area had been consumed by Void Poison long before now and consequently been turned into a desert that stretched across the horizon. Thanks to that, we now had a new type of biome here on the Korean peninsula.

Today, that extraordinary visual spectacle came with an additional auditory effect.

– KWAAAAANG!

Boom! Kaboooom!

Something unseen was rampaging in the heart of the desert.

Whenever “it” thrashed about, sandstorms blew in all directions, and tremors shook the ground.

– K-kieeek!

– Geeek! Kiiiiik!

The local Anomalies that inhabited the desert were so overwhelmed by “its” power that they scattered, fleeing in all directions.

Of course, having the will to run didn’t necessarily mean you succeeded in escaping. Unfortunately for those Anomalies that hadn’t learned the Teleport skill from their ancestors, they got squashed to death with a sickening crunch under the invisible weight of “it.”

As the corpses of Anomalies were trampled underfoot, “it” let out a roar.

– Kraaaaaaaah!

Complete pandemonium ensued.

Sharing my field of vision, the Saintess murmured, [There’s… nothing visible about it at all.]

“Indeed.”

[But with so much sand flying around, we can at least make out an outline.]

“That’s right.”

[It looks like… a western dragon.][2]

It was a legend from ages past, so ancient that it had essentially gone out of circulation, making the original text hard to find.

Invisible Dragon.

A masterpiece famed for having one of the most perfect prologues seen across the literary spectrum. On the Korean peninsula alone, it stands as one of the two great pillars alongside Kim Hoon's Every Abandoned Island Blossomed.[3]

That heart-stirring prelude, towering higher the more you look up to it, reads as follows:

> "Kraaaah"
>
> even among dragons the strongest > invisible dragon roared the invisible > dragon was crazy strong so it was the > strongest among dragons it beat gods or > demons it beat them all no matter who > came the invisible dragon was the only > one in the world anyway it roared

Behold the use of plain words.

A writer's frail instinct might try to avoid repeating the same phrasing, changing "roared" to "howled" or "bellowed" or what have you. But not this text. No, this text boldly ignored such attempts, pursuing the single word "roared" without faltering, with a craftsman's dedication.

And the rhythm it found! By repeating, "I won, I won," over and over and over again, the text achieved a kind of cadence so rarely found in modern Korean poetry—a masterpiece in extreme metrics.

Can you appreciate the aesthetics woven into that prologue, dear human? It is the pinnacle of postmodernism, a challenge to the senses.

"Look at this fine piece of work," it boldly proclaims. "You feeling our art?"

No one dared complain that the text was displayed in the deeply irritating Gulim font. Back in those days, Gulim was the very foundation upon which all great amateurs stood.

The fact that this classic appeared in 2002 sent shockwaves through modern literature.

Think about it. The main body of the Admin of the Infinite Metagame is a white-haired girl. Its design has zero originality. As mentioned when we first subdued it, this white-haired girl was inspired by that stereotypical NPC who goes, Hi? I'm God. And the foundational work upon which that character is based, Fate/Stay Night, had been published in...

2003.

Yes. Just one year after Invisible Dragon was released.

"Bah...!" A tremor ran through me. The grandfather blood that coursed through my veins began to seethe wildly. "All of the puzzles... they have been solved!"

Somehow, I'd suspected it. A centuries-old Anomaly that made a habit of rummaging through ancient works, an Outer God with 1 HP. Of course it was up to something like this.

[Um, Undertaker?]

"It's all a scheme by the Admin of the Infinite Metagame!"

Why did the Invisible Dragon appear out of nowhere, despite never once showing its face in previous cycles? Even now, we couldn't see its physical form. I had no actual evidence, only the release years of Invisible Dragon and Fate/Stay Night... And yet I had exposed the truth of it:

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame was the mastermind behind this all.

My own deductive power scared me a little. If this continued for a year or so, over four hundred people around me could very well die.

After hearing my perfect reasoning, the Saintess murmured, [Mr. Undertaker... Strangely enough, whenever something is even slightly related to Ms. Dok-seo, you seem to become... a different person.]

“I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

[You act like a different person. Or should I say your mental age regresses? Wasn’t it just last Wednesday that you visited my place to discuss Kant’s pure reason? How, then—]

I cleared my throat. “That is a complete misunderstanding. Much like the baseless slander that you secretly spy on me with Clairvoyance, even while I’m in the bathroom.”

The Saintess sunk like a ship. Yet, like the captain of the Titanic, she steadfastly fulfilled her duty even as water flooded the hull.

In a breathless voice, she asked, [How do you plan to subjugate that Anomaly? Even if you know it’s the Admin of the Infinite Metagame’s doing, it doesn’t look like an easy opponent.]

“Ah, yes. Surprisingly enough, it will be simple. First, please log in to SG Net’s novel serialization board. Search for Invisible Dragon, and you’ll find some documents.”

[What? Oh, you’re right. I see them.] Then the Saintess muttered, [And the upload date is listed as 2002, before SG Net even existed...]

Surely, it was the Outer God’s handiwork.

I also had surmised why it specifically spawned the Invisible Dragon in Daefrica. The Invisible Dragon originally belonged to the genre of “fantasy,” yet even in an apocalypse, remnants of modern civilization still remained that defied the fantasy tropes. But Daegu? The city and everything in its vicinity had been cleared of anything resembling city life. With some effort, you can pass its desert landscape off as a fantasy setting.

“In the original story, the Invisible Dragon teleports to reality only after annihilating its world. Right now, it’s stuck in Daegu, but once it wipes out all the local Anomalies in the desert, it'll head outside."

[Ah... I see. We have to subjugate it before that happens.] I could practically see the Saintess tilting her head as the next thought came to her, even over Telepathy. [So you plan to use Aura, risking the chance of provoking Leviathan?]

No, there was no need.

First, I asked the Saintess to summon Dang Seo-rin. No matter which cycle we're in, Seo-rin was always deep into Constellation business, and since Busan was nearby, she arrived quickly.

"Hey, Undertaker. Haaah, it's always so hot here near Daegu."

"Indeed. We don't have much time, so let's subjugate that invisible Anomaly first."

"Oh, okay. It's been making a racket, so it's been annoying me too."

Seo-rin began to sing.

Ah——ah, ah—ah, aaaa——

Instantly, the roar that had been shaking the entire desert began to fade.

– Kraaaah! Aaaah... aaa...

It was the power of Seo-rin's Cursed Song Incantation, specifically her Anti-Resonance. By emitting sound waves in precise opposition to the enemy's, she completely negated all noise, like magic.

Keen readers may have noticed: Yes, this was her signature technique, the same skill she used to lull the Meteor Shower to sleep back when we first subjugated it.

"Okayyy, song is over! Now I'll set up a loudspeaker here to keep replaying the recording, yeah?"

"Right."

Moments ago, the Invisible Dragon had been screaming as if tearing the sky apart, but now it had fallen silent. Now, only Seo-rin's beautiful singing voice echoed across the desert.

Judging by the way it stomped its feet, maybe we should call it the Invisible Caterpillar instead of the Invisible Dragon.

I exhaled. "If the Invisible Dragon can't cry out, it's no longer the Invisible Dragon. A simple strategy, right?"

[...]

"Oh, just in case, please edit the novel that the Admin of the Infinite Metagame hid on SG Net and run a spell check."

The Saintess carried out my instructions.

Roooar!

Among all dragons, the mightiest was the roaring Invisible Dragon.

The Invisible Dragon was oh-so-strong, the strongest of dragon-kind.

It beat gods and demons. It won against all who came to challenge it.

The Invisible Dragon was the only one of its kind.

Anyway, it roared.

Ah.

I couldn't help wiping away a tear. What a savage defilement of the original text.

"Alas! The proud spirit once exuded by our dear Young-geun has vanished without a trace!"

[...]

For some reason, even the Saintess—who was far beyond the range of Seo-rin's Anti-Resonance—was also inflicted with the Silence status. But the effect was evident.

– Kieeek! Geeek, Kiiiik!

– ...! ...! ...!

From an Invisible Tyrant to an Invisible Worm, the dragon had devolved. The Anomalies that had been running away now turned back and beat on the "unseen" thing.

It was somewhat sad to watch a once-glorious being brought so low, but such was the irresistible flow of time.

Subjugation complete.

If that had solved the problem, we could've had a happy ending. Unfortunately, no such luck was to be had.

As I said, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame had lost its composure.

Why had it suddenly unleashed the Invisible Dragon? Did it believe it could defeat me, the Undertaker, that way? Think it could reverse the tide that had already turned?

No.

It just... got pissed off.

In short, objective power analysis no longer mattered to the Admin of the Infinite Metagame. It just wanted to throw a big middle finger to the Miko who disrespected it, to the Regressor who made the Miko that way, and to the entire world that had allowed the Regressor to be born in the first place.

"Hey, mister! Something huge, huge is happening! All those works from the old internet era called the Seven Forbidden Tomes are going wild! Members of the Samcheon World Guild suddenly started worshipping something called Harry & Monsters instead of Harry Potter! The great witch is going on a rampage! You're the only one who can stop this, mister!"

The momentary high I'd felt after elegantly subjugating the Invisible Dragon had been dashed. My brain temperature swiftly returned to a cool 38.5°C.

We'd known for a while that the Admin of the Infinite Metagame, an Outer God, was lying low and waiting for a chance to make its comeback. A typical vanquished-king-returns story. But now that it had decided to double, triple, quadruple down on its tantrum, the whiplash of events was leaving me dizzy.

"Wait a second. Infinite Metagame, let's talk it out. We can use words to solve this."

I rushed over to turn on the laptop, but oh? How baffling. Its avatar —a white-haired girl who always rushed over eagerly whenever I booted it up, hoping to seduce me or something—was nowhere to be seen.

Well... Actually, no, it was there. Just there about 20 meters away from the monitor screen, curled up in a ball with its back turned to me.

The white-haired girl avatar was smaller than the Recycle Bin icon on a desktop. Anyone else might not have noticed it.

"Admin? Ms. Metagame?"

[...]

"O Great Adminship, the peerless AI that can degrade the entire world into mere characters of its novel?"

[...]

"You know that using your power in these petty ways won't help you. It's only slightly annoying for me, but it poses no real threat to my forces."

Bzzzzzt.

Like a laptop that'd been on its last legs for five years, the screen fuzzed with static. Then the desktop background changed. Now, on a blank white screen (matching the avatar's white hair), there was only a single character:

Uh. Hmm.

"...If I were to say that using that character as a makeshift middle finger is an old-school touch, would that make you even angrier?"

[...]

"Oh, by the way, imagine I said that line with '(lol)' appended at the end. Just to suit your tastes."

Flick!

The laptop screen went black.

Maybe if I had stopped mocking it right then, comforted the Admin of the Infinite Metagame, shown a bit of kindness, things might have turned around. But how could I resist savoring the downfall of an Outer God that had plummeted to the bottom?

I, the Undertaker, had always lived true to my own desires. I believed that was the secret to maintaining a healthy mindset as a regressor. And every ounce of satisfaction came with a price.

"Aaaaagh, misterrrrr!"

Boom!

Dok-seo struck the door with a flying kick again. By now, the hinges were starting to break. She landed in a flashy flourish.

If you looked at her status screen, you'd see [Skill: Novel Writing] had been stuck at the same level for years, while [Skill: Kicking] had soared past level 90.

"S-something huge happened! Mega huge!"

“You always come to me saying it’s something huge, you know.”

“I’m being so for real this time, though! It’s, l-like, really, really big! Come on, hurry!”

I followed.

Dok-seo led me to Haeundae. Though civilization had collapsed and the concept of vacationing had disappeared, the outdoor gym Seo Gyu set up was still thriving. The gym members were all bustling about the beach. Even if the world ended tomorrow, they’d lift a barbell one more time.

“Huh? What’s this now?”

“They keep washing in from the sea.”

“What does it say?”

“Dunno. Something about serialization? It’s going off on some weird stuff.”

Stone tablets.

Like the Rosetta Stone from Egypt, monument slabs etched with densely packed text were floating in the sea and drifting ashore at Haeundae. Some gym members tried to approach one of these monoliths, but Dok-seo rushed at them in terror.

“Stoooop!”

“Huh? Who are you?”

“I’m the administrator here! Don’t look at them! Don’t you dare! They’re all Anomalies! If you read them, you’ll lose your mind!”

“Whoa, damn.”

“Get back! Hurry, hurry! Don’t even try to read what’s carved in these stones!”

Sure enough, though she never writes, she wanders the Void, and that made Oh Dok-seo a surprisingly seasoned Awakener.

Following her guidance, the gym members scattered.

While Dok-seo was clearing people away, I drew near to one of the dozens of monoliths stuck in Haeundae.

I read the inscription.

Resting a Little Longer (Must-Read)

I'm so sorry…

This is your author, LiteraryGirl, speaking…

As I mentioned in my last notice, I've been suffering from severe burnout, so I decided to take a break from my projects and immerse myself in various works by other authors to recharge my creative battery.

But alas, I didn't realize at the time that burnout can cast its sinister spell not only on writing but also on reading…

So although I told my readers I'd take time off to recharge, in the month or so since I stopped uploading, I haven't managed to read a single work…

And yet, at the same time, I discovered hope.

Yesterday, I noticed I was enjoying a free web game distributed on SG Net, and it startled me.

Wait, I thought to myself. I'm enjoying a work again, aren't I?

That's right.

Who says creative works have to be novels? The song of Korea's absolute top star in the Great Witch of Samcheon World, the music of the Nymphcalypse channel that plays on the radio daily, the occasional games that trend on SG Net—they are all, all of them, legitimate "works."

As soon as I realized that, it was like a door to heaven opened in my mind!

Yes. I'm not a lazy bug who's been ignoring all nourishment after telling my readers I needed a break.

The sunlight of this world that shines upon me. Like an environment that wholeheartedly bestows its moisture and light upon plants, everything around me has continued to whisper works of "recharging" to me.

I have nothing to fear anymore.

Even if my progress is slow, excruciatingly slow, I am definitely taking small steps forward, heading toward that unknown realm known as serialization.

So I ask my readers to please wait just a bit longer for my small struggles.

I'm listening to songs, listening to music, playing games. That is how I, LiteraryGirl, am gradually moving closer to you all.

Give me just this month and next month, plus or minus about 20 days, and I should truly be able to return this time.

Lately I've been really into games.

This little step from me, LiteraryGirl.

Please, watch over me.

I fell silent.

The monoliths that washed up onshore bore the same message, and it wasn't just in Korean. The message also appeared in Japanese, Chinese, Hindi, Arabic, German, French, English—dozens of languages from around the world.

Having dispersed the crowd, Dok-seo stomped over to me, fuming. "Ugh, seriously! I never wrote any notice like that! Who the heck is flinging this slander around? Seriously, if I find them, I'll dox them on SG Net so hard!"

She wasn't wrong. She'd never written such a notice. Not in this cycle.

But I, who entrusted her with the job of writing Undertaker: The Romance, the Regressor with Complete Memory, remembered it perfectly.

'This is the 13th notice Dok-seo posted on SG Net's novel serialization board in the 788th cycle...!'

I glanced at another monolith lying next to it.

'And this one... It's the legendary text she uploaded in the 813th cycle, your 39th message, where you torched not only your own readers but every lurker on the serialization board...!'

All around us, and all around that too.

Dozens of monoliths, hundreds of monoliths, all of them...

Proof of all those times Oh Dok-seo had abandoned her serialization...!

Pure disgrace incarnate!

"Ugh. Anyway, I was actually gonna build a three chapter backlog and resume uploading next month for real. I have no idea where this nonsense is coming from."

Dok-seo turned to me, the sea breeze at her back and her smile wide and cheery.

"Right, mister?"

The next day, a total of 1,131 of these monoliths landed on Busan's Haeundae shore.

Footnotes:

1 - This is likely in reference to a quote often misattributed to Aristotle but that was actually written in a treatise on anxiety and mental peace by Seneca the Younger: “No great mind has ever existed without a touch of madness.”

2 - Could be a running joke after the SSS-Clas Suicide Hunter artist mistakenly drew a western dragon in the manhwa’s martial arc instead of an eastern dragon.

3 - Invisible Dragon has been mentioned before in previous chapters, but the story would more accurately be described as “infamous” rather than “famous” for its... particular quality in both Korean and English versions alike. The other work mentioned, Every Abandoned Island Blossomed, has yet to be translated into English.

Chapter 341

The Surrenderer III

Sinnoa

After careful consideration, I reached a conclusion:

Oh Dok-seo was screwed.

Honestly, she'd been screwed from the moment she posted enough announcement notices on the SG Net novel-serialization board to reach double-digits. Now, countless stone tablets had washed ashore in Busan like a landing force, a veritable four-figure count of them.

Could there be a situation that better embodied the word "karma"?

Yesterday, we only needed to control Seo Gyu's gym members, but as of today, these tablets weren't just on Haeundae Beach, they were popping up on any Busan beach facing the sea.

Once again: Oh Dok-seo was screwed.

"C-Commander Noh! No, Do-hwa unnie! Please, just lend me 50 of your National Road Management Corps personnel! Please, I'm begging you!"

"You think I can just casually hire out 50 people from the corps...?"

As dedicated as the National Road Management Corps was to battling Anomalies, they didn't have the resources to deal with something like this. Besides, these tablets gave off no hint of Anomalous energy. What potential harm did they pose? At worst, sailors might find them annoying when navigating and... a certain author going by the handle "LiteraryGirl" had her reputation severely tarnished?

Do-hwa felt no reason to care about that second part. Indeed, she was a normie with zero interest in subculture. Astonishingly enough, among the members of the Regressors' Alliance, she was the only one who wasn't a reader of LiteraryGirl.

"P-please! Look, I've been shipping you and the Undertaker since forever! Even when everyone said I was stuck in a minor fandom, I never lost hope! Take pity on me and help me out!"

"What the heck are you talking about...?"

The golden hour had passed. Now in this hour and day, countless people in Busan encountered these mysterious monoliths. Some glanced at them on their way to work at Dream Casino, some while walking their Sapsal dog on the sand. And among them, inevitably...

– Anonymous: Lmao, wtf hahahaha

Some were LiteraryGirl's readers.

– Anonymous: I was on a morning stroll and I saw these tombstones? Stone slabs? Stuck on the beach haha. I'm a coward, but I got curious whether it was some Anomaly, so I went closer...

(Image)

– Anonymous: LitlololerlololarylololGirllololol

– Anonymous: Lmao is she posting indefinite-hiatus notices in reality now instead of on SG Net? Every day with this author is legendary lmfao Countdown.

3, 2, 1.

Ready.

– [Samcheon] MeteorIsIceMagic: This looks like Busan?

Action.

– [Samcheon] MeteorIsIceMagic: Some of our guild's scouts just got back from a night flight. The beach was jam-packed with those things.

Anonymous (OP): oh rly? did the Road Management Corps say anything?

[Samcheon] MeteorIsIceMagic: They said it's harmless, so just ignore it.

– Anonymous: lmao fk LiteraryGirl hahaha

– [Baekhwa] SixthGrader: Hoehee >_<);;

– Anonymous: Wth is this??

20 comments reached.

– [Baekhwa] SchoolNewspaper2: Weren't there rumors that a Constellation read her stuff? Guess it's true lmao

Anonymous: Ah

Anonymous (OP): O

Anonymous: So that's why these tablets suddenly appeared, huh?

50 comments reached.

Post becomes popular.

– [EasternHoly] KindlyOne: Wow, I'm zooming in on the pics and reading them. My blood is boiling from my dantian.

Anonymous (OP): Right??? I gave up a year ago, but seeing that hiatus notice again raised my blood pressure.

[NationalRoad] ForbiddenBooksDept17: Ugh, why does LiteraryGirl keep posting announcements if she's never going to return? She could be writing during that time instead.

[EasternHoly] KindlyOne: secret info our Saintess is also a reader ㅋ

[NationalRoad] ForbiddenBooksDept17: Haha, so is my squad leaderㅋ

[Baekhwa] SchoolNewspaper2: Same with our guild leaderㅇㅇ

[Samcheon] MeteorIsIceMagic: Our Great Witch too. Add her in.

[EasternHoly] KindlyOne: lolol

200 comments reached.

300 comments reached.

Dok-seo begged Seo Gyu to use his authority as the SG Net admin to remove it from the “popular posts,” but he refused. By then, more than 30 identical posts were going viral, anyway.

– OldManGoryeo: lmao these guys are hilarious. At this point it’s not the author, but the readers who have issues lmaoooo

OldManGoryeo stepped in.

1,100 comments reached.

– Anonymous: How does LiteraryGirl have the nerve to keep going on indefinite hiatus?? Wouldn’t a normal person just keep writing?

– Anonymous: I don’t get it. Someone please explain LiteraryGirl’s mental state.

dolLHoUse: Not simple

Boom.

SG Net exploded.

From Pyongyang to Seoul, Sejong, Busan, to even across the Chinese mainland and Japanese archipelago—courtesy of AOIM-GPT’s stellar translation—all these regions’ power players were now united, all reading in the same language.

We might fight each other for various reasons, but we all shared one thing: we despised authors who went on indefinite hiatus.

A grand unification of Asia. A stunning miracle.

On the old internet, folks sometimes posted that if East Asian countries ever stood united, they would “theoretically” be the strongest in the world. Of course, there were no more states in the apocalypse, yet now that national borders had fallen, East Asia had ironically decided to prove that “theory” in practice.

“Uh, hyung… It’s looking pretty rough. I’m not even sure mobilizing the Constellations will help,” Seo Gyu said. “These guys are convinced the Constellations are on their side, so if we try to suppress them, we might get hammered instead.”

We were in a corner of the room where Dok-seo was gnawing her fingernails. If you listened closely, you could hear a rapid-fire rap verse escaping her lips:

Whydidthishappen

Whydidthishappen

Why

Thissodoesn’tmakesense

Iwasreallyreallygonnacomebacknextmonth

Whycan’ttheyjustwaitonemonth

Whydotheyhavenopatience

It’scompletelynonsensical

From a reader’s perspective, her attitude was infuriating. But for my own part in it, my surprise stemmed from another source.

‘I can’t believe even her mental fortress can shake like this!’

Unlike the characters in the original anime who used the AT-Field, her mind was more like a fortress of hardened steel.[1] Usually, if an author posted a hiatus announcement and then went to play games, they’d feel guilt. I promised my readers I’d write, they’d sigh to themselves, but here I am just gaming like the trash I am. But in Dok-seo's case...

Haha! I'm taking in nutrients from other works to feed my readers better. There's no other author like me!

That was how she genuinely thought about it. It wasn't self-justification or escapism either. She sincerely believed it, 120%.

On top of that, in my hundreds of iterations, she'd never once used macros for her hiatus notices. Every notice was handmade—painstakingly typed out, letter by letter. Why? Because that was how she showed devotion and courtesy to her beloved readers!

The perfectly obvious courtesy, some might say, would have been actually writing the dang novel. But that argument never reached Dok-seo.

'Even that adamantine spirit is crumbling now!'

Truly the work of an Outer God. It might not have been able to save its Miko's rotten mind, but it could most certainly drag that mind by the hair and drown it in a well.

She looked even more unstable than in iteration 888, when she secretly had an AI ghostwrite her chapters and got caught by me.

[Mr. Undertaker. Sim Ah-ryeon finished a week's worth of tasks this morning and is rushing down to Busan now. If we don't resolve this before she arrives, Oh Dok-seo's state might deteriorate even further.]

A similar Telepathic message must have reached Dok-seo too. She snapped out of her muttering and jerked her head up.

"N-no! I can't handle Ah-ryeon unnie on top of this! My dignity! My honor! They'll die! I'll be butchered, strangled, then utterly massacred and ground to meat paste!"

I watched in silence.

"Y-yes! It's all the Admin of the Infinite Metagame's fault! I won't forgive it! Outer Gooood!”

She dashed off. Seo Gyu, who oversaw SG Net, stared after her with a baffled expression.

“Uh, hyung, aren’t you going after her?”

“...Should I?”

“Of course. You picked her up at Busan Station. Her, Ah-ryeon, me —all your responsibility.”

“I’m only human, Seo Gyu.”

“Huh...”

Ignoring Seo Gyu’s dubious look, I went after Dok-seo. Much as I didn’t want to, who else would take responsibility for that kid?

“Stop that right noooow!”

When I arrived, Dok-seo was violently shaking the precious laptop —the main body of the Admin of the Infinite Metagame—that I had stored in my room.

“I-I’m your Miko! Your agent on Earth! Why are you slandering the person most important to me? Is it... Does it make you happy? Huh? You sadist? Why frame me as an enemy of the world over something that never even happened?!”

[Heeheeheeheehee.]

A cheap speaker played giggling on loops while the character for “laughter” was displayed on-screen. The white-haired avatar was carefully retracing the letter with a brush pen.

“S-stop laughiiiiiing!”

[Kieuk-kieuk-kieuk.]

Apparently, the Admin pronounces the Korean character for “lol” as “kieuk-kieuk-kieuk.” I added that useless factoid to my mental Akashic Records and stepped into the center of the commotion.

“Name your terms.”

[Hah?]

“Surely you didn’t do all this arbitrarily. You squeezed out your already-weakened power to produce thousands of stone tablets. In martial arts terms, you spat out your last innate energy,” I analyzed calmly. “You must want something. If it’s a reasonable proposal, I’ll consider it. State your demands.”

“Y-yeah! That’s right! What do you want? What’s so important that you started all this madness?!”

On the monitor, the 144p white-haired girl smirked.

[Go—search up the Three Kingdoms tag-at the novel-serialization board—right now lmao]

I tilted my head but complied.

SG Net’s novel-serialization board had tabs sorted into Fantasy, Martial Arts, and so on, but there was one very special feature distinguishing this site from older novel platforms.

Three Kingdoms.

No need to even search the tag, the Three Kingdoms genre was boldly displayed at the top of the site in a stately style. Throughout the previous cycles—thousands of years combined—Three Kingdoms was always massively popular. SG Net was in the throes of a total Three Kingdoms obsession.

“That’s because of you, mister.”

This time, it was Dok-seo who responded calmly.

“You push the popularity of any Three Kingdoms-based story, artificially inflating their views by at least 100 to 5,000 with a macro. Then you literally pay authors royalties based on those rigged view counts, so from their perspective, they’d be stupid not to churn out these stories. They're guaranteed sales, no matter how trashy the writing is."

"Silence. What do you know about the loyalty and camaraderie contained in Three Kingdoms?"

"I'm just saying, normal readers complain about why it's always another Three Kingdoms whatever topping the charts..."

I had no interest in listening to the indefinite-hiatus demon.

With a snort, I clicked on the currently top-ranked Three Kingdoms work. I'd already purchased and read up to the latest chapter this very morning, so if the Admin had tampered with it, I would notice right away and—

Zhang Fei: Aha, Sister Liu Bei! Just rely on your lover Zhang Fei!

Liu Bei: Uh huh, sure! I trust you, little sister!

Mi Zhu: Goodness. You girls' bond amazes me more every time I see it.

"Uwoaooooooooooooook?!"

A cry straight out of Munch's The Scream escaped my mouth.

"Eek! A-are you okay, mister? Hey, mister! Snap out of it! Is this a mental attack? An Anomaly? An Outer God? Don't pass out!"

This novel, that novel!

All the stories I'd been reading—even logging in from multiple dummy accounts to give them 20 upvotes each because I sensed the author's extraordinary talent from just the first three chapters.

The warriors of Shu Han, the strategists, and Wei, Wu, even Emperor Xian... Every single one, all of them had been replaced...

With girls!

“Ogh. Ughk, huk. Kugh. Kkh, snrrk.”

[Hehehehehe.]

[Don’t you find Romance of the Three Kingdoms turned Romance of the Sisterhood quite intriguing, Regressor?]

“I-I can’t… breathe… You, you scoundrel, Admin. How can you commit such a monstrous atrocity? How…?”

[Why? Don’t you devour every genre you see anyway?]

What nonsense. It was like someone saying they loved pineapple and also mint chocolate, so a chef lumped them together on a pizza to claim they’d “used all your favorite ingredients.”

“Wh-whatever it means! Don’t torture the old man, you nasty Outer God! Take that! And that!”

[I still have 3,122 more of your hiatus announcements, if you’d like me to show them?]

“Huwaaaaaack!”

A KO.

The Regressor and the Possessor collapsed side by side.

What no other Outer God could achieve, this so-called “weakest” Outer God, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame, had managed it.

I groaned. “Let’s… talk…”

[?]

“A… A friendly negotiation. Why spill meaningless blood here? At this point, you can’t destroy the world, right? Let’s settle this nicely. Huh? Let’s both be happy…”

[Heh]

“Name your conditions, specifically. This time, I swear I’ll refrain from mockery or criticism. I’ll listen seriously...”

Bzzt.

Until now, the white-haired avatar had trudged around the desktop in an area about the size of a Recycle Bin icon, but now, the screen zoomed in.

Click.

In both hands, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame held up a text file like a signboard. Once more, the note spelled out the Outer God’s demands.

[You—must—respect—me.]

Footnotes:

1 - AT-Field is a reference to the nearly impenetrable shields called Absolute Terror (A. T.) Fields in Neon Genesis Evangelion.

Chapter 342

The Surrenderer IV

Sinnoa

[Monster Wave and Nut were nothing more than marionettes meant to hasten my own doom.]

Tap-taptap-taptap!

Text poured forth at a speed of a thousand keystrokes per minute across the laptop screen's notepad file. Along with it, a low-quality TTS voice prattled on.

[I used the descent of the Monster Wave and Nut to reimagine this Void-tainted world as a server shutdown, thereby cutting through all competition among the Outer Gods to ascend proudly as the one who would destroy the world.]

[And by reinterpreting the Awakeners' abilities as "skills" in a game, I turned every phenomenon into a "game"—an illusion.]

[In this way, I also devoured the Mastermind's simulation-cosmology. I set up a contrast between—the "inside" of the logged-in game world—and the "outside" of the logged-out real world.]

[The same goes for Infinite Void.]

[The property of Infinite Void—treating all the world's elements as mere data—was clearly a step below—my own Void, which turned this entire world into a game.]

[I—was the Outer God that made Monster Wave—Nut—the Mastermind—and Infinite Void all bow down.]

[Unlike them—I was not helpless against the regressor's time. I placed my own preparations—like demonic artifacts.]

[You must—respect—me.]

Truly, humans are creatures that learn from experience.

Which meant that mocking the Admin of the Infinite Metagame again right now would risk yet another tragedy occurring.

Even beyond all my beloved Three Kingdoms novels being forcibly turned into genderbent stories—who knew what horrendous new hybrid might be born. Imagine if Liu Bei, Guan Yu, and Zhang Fei all turned into internet streamers.

I had to endure.

I could endure.

Unlike these Anomalies that knew nothing of humanity or compassion, we humans had the capacity for introspection and repentance—

“But either way, your Miko is still Oh Dok-seo, right?”

[#$□)%(♡)@#%^?_□!]

Ah. Slip of the tongue.

In short, the Outer God the Admin of the Infinite Metagame was in despair.

– I was honestly pretty confident, you know.

Henceforth, the monologue that follows shall be acknowledged as the Admin of the Infinite Metagame’s “human-friendly version” with the background noise filtered out, resulting in a cleaner, more polished voice. The wording and tone were slightly adjusted to be something of an “edited for humans” version.

– Whether it’s Nut’s night sky, Infinite Void’s qualia, or the Mastermind’s simulation games, I could easily reinterpret them all as “games” or “works of fiction.”

– No matter how fiercely they struggled, they couldn’t deny the board I’d laid out.

Of course, the Admin wasn't truly strategizing in elaborate moves against those other Outer Gods or anything close to it. The Outer Gods altogether were more like a group of mutually incompatible viruses vying for territory, devouring or propagating at will.

Yet once again, for the sake of this "human-friendly version," we'll call it a puzzle-solution style retelling.

– Still, in order to convert this world into a "creation" for my "game," I had to accept certain shackles and chains of my own.

On-screen, the white-haired girl raised her index and middle fingers. No longer was her avatar 144p, but instead, she had become 8K HD. Even so, her skin was unnaturally flawless, betraying her inhuman nature.

– A God.

– I, who would reign as "God," was bound to remain just a typical raid boss in any piece of fiction.

– That was my first constraint.

Clank!

From the blank desktop, a pixelated chain arose and snared the white-haired girl's ankles.

– Irregulars like regressors.

– Such a typical "main character" trait, always found in a story's cast.

– That was my second constraint.

Clack.

Another chain slithered forward like a snake and cuffed the Admin's slender wrists, leaving no gap.

– But it was a manageable risk.

– From the perspective of an Outer God like me, do you know which type of irregular is the hardest to deal with?

“...Some regressor like me?”

– No.

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame smiled politely, like a well-bred noble maiden.

Come to think of it, the character design this was based on apparently had a background of German nobility too.

– Regressor types are surprisingly easy to handle. They’re mentally fragile.

“Ah.”

– It’s never easy to live the same life dozens of times over. Even if they do survive, they’re prone to Corruption. You just happen to be an exception, Regressor.

I was reminded of Old Man Scho, and of many protagonists in countless works who fell to despair under the loneliness and pain of regression.

– The real threat is... “Prophets.”

“Prophets.”

– Yes. No matter how ingenious my strategies, what good would that do? Even if I respond to their moves, they can read four or five moves ahead. If someone can see every future, the game inevitably ends in a stalemate.

– I don’t want a draw.

– So I killed them.

Like Zeus punishing Prometheus.

“...I see. That’s why in the novel you showed to Dok-seo, the prologue had all the prophets die off from the start."

– Hehe. Indeed. I'm the sort of person who devours the tastiest part of the curry first.

The Admin's voice had once degraded to series of girlish scoffs, but now she wore a more refined, old-fashioned smile.

– Six prophets, promised for humanity's future.

– I wiped them all out by letting them all simultaneously read your, the Regressor's, future. Their minds basically exploded.

– After that, I tossed in a bit more gunpowder. That is, I generously shared with them all my data—absolutely everything—about the entire cosmos.

– Unless you had a special ability, it was impossible for a human brain to handle that much data capacity. Cue poof—nice fireworks.

Firework effects filled the desktop.

– From that point on, I only had to worry about regressors. Out of the two main ones, one was no problem at all.

– As I'd predicted, after tens of cycles, that one collapsed on his own.

Swordmaster Schopenhauer, disqualified.

– Which meant only you remained.

The last irregular. Codename: Undertaker.

– As soon as you surrendered to the time of regression, it would be over for you.

And here, for the first time, the Admin realized her miscalculation.

– Unlike that other regressor, you had no real talent in martial arts or brute force.

– Nor did you have any special standout abilities compared to other

Awakeners. Complete Memory? That's bait for Anomalies at best. He's sure to die in the tutorial dungeon, anyway.

– A trash ability. An F-rank skill.

– Even Time Seal was no threat. If anything, it helped me, since you basically erased humans for me.

Yet...

– Why did you refuse to give up on this "game"?

100 cycles passed.

200 cycles passed.

300, 400 cycles passed.

To the Admin, it felt like that old song, "Air Man ga Taosenai," was playing on loop.[1]

– That's when it hit me.

By the 500th cycle, as an Outer God, she had to admit her miscalculation.

– Complete Memory. That was the culprit.

– Ordinary people internalize pain and trauma more than necessary and quickly let happiness fade.

– But... because you possessed perfect recollection, that typical phenomenon never affected you.

– No matter how many people around you died, how many killings ensued, how many fell into hell, you preserved in your memory the exact moments when they lived most happily.

– To think that this trash skill, which seemed useless, was a trump card for the Regressor...

That was the Admin's first blunder.

– But... it was still within acceptable parameters.

The Outer God soon devised her next move.

– I would degrade you, the Regressor, to a “mere character in a novel” and introduce someone with a stronger protagonist trait than yours.

Oh Dok-seo. Trait: Book Possessor. A cheat-like ability that could read the entire life story of the Undertaker in advance, in “book” form.

– Did you know? A “Book Possessor” is essentially the same as a “Prophet.” In fact, that’s the most powerful trait you can have.

– Sure, I shot a data bomb at the real Prophets, annihilating their minds. But my Miko was different.

– What the Miko read was a novel—merely text, infinitely compressed in resolution.

– And I just... added a bit of seasoning so that she would form a certain prejudice about you, that’s all. Really just a sprinkle of bias.

Suddenly, I recalled my first meeting with Dok-seo in the 555th cycle, after she’d become a “Book Possessor.” She was quite different then from how she was now.

[Oh Dok-seo: There he is.]

[Oh Dok-seo: The protagonist of this world. Codename: Undertaker.]

[Oh Dok-seo: He’s better-looking than I... Actually, maybe the cover art was better? Hmm. Is he better in person?]

[Oh Dok-seo: But I mustn’t be fooled by his looks.]

She remained alert toward me.

[Oh Dok-seo: The Undertaker is a protagonist who has multiple regressions under his belt. He’s got no tears to shed or warm blood to lose.]

[Oh Dok-seo: He's full of hatred for monsters, a typical regressor who lives only because he can't die...]

[Oh Dok-seo: Basically, he's a madman. If I slip up, he might kill me on the spot. I've got to tread carefully.]

It was hard to believe when confronted with the indefinite-hiatus-laden LiteraryGirl of today, but she was once quite sharp. Her movements were swift, her brain cunning, her approach to people proactive, and she knew how to lead. Above all, she had started at the same vantage point as the Regressor Undertaker.

– I was confident I'd chosen the perfect Miko.

A Book Possessor who was wary of the Regressor, fated to collaborate sometimes and clash at others, eventually dancing on the Admin's puppet stage to overpower him.

But then...

– Then why?!

All at once, the white-haired girl's face contorted into that of a demon, and the desktop went blood-red.

– When did you acquire Mind Reading?

– Infinite Void! Cheon Yo-hwa! That piece of trash offering! How dare they meddle with the Mastermind's powers and pull off such a cheap trick!

Yes.

The Admin never realized that she wasn't exchanging moves with me, the Regressor, across a chessboard as she thought. In reality, someone else stood off-board behind me, wearing a secretive grin as they guided my hand with "hints."

"Seriously, sunbae, you have too few strategist characters by your side... That's the problem."

My “Tactician” in Regressions.

“I’m sorry. I really wanted to save Old Man Schopenhauer for you too, but messing with the causality so drastically would’ve been too much.”

“It already took a miracle to weave together a timeline that could coexist with your footsteps up through the 688th cycle without negating them.”

An expert who knew more about Outer Gods than anyone.

“Aha-ha. Sorry for dropping out early like Grandpa Swordmaster, yeah? Good luck living the rest of your life, sunbae. Work hard for my share, okay?”

“After all, that’s the fate of a regressor.”

Unlike the hotheaded, martial-arts-loving, frontline twin who always charged into battle...

This twin was cold-blooded and cunning, hiding in the background and setting traps.

That was Cheon Yo-hwa’s doing.

In hindsight, it was strange.

Oh Dok-seo was chosen as the Miko and became a Book Possessor in the 555th cycle, yet I gained my Mind Reading in the 554th cycle. They were only one cycle apart: the Book Possessor arrived, and the regressor acquired a new skill. Wasn’t that timing a bit too perfect to be mere coincidence?

“Haaaah, Teacher, can’t you please help me...?”

Thus spoke the 554th cycle.

That day, the student council president of Baekhwa Girls’ High, Cheon Yo-hwa—the younger of the twin sisters, sporting orange ponytails—came to me.

“Help you with what?”

“Well, the house I used to live in was the main base of that cult, right? There’s negative energy piling up and ghosts keep appearing, so I decided I have to do some cleanup. It’s just... too big for me to do alone.”

“Why not ask your Baekhwa friends?”

“Eugh. That’s my old home! There are a bunch of my childhood photos and clothes in there, they’d totally swipe them if they found out.”

“...You’ve had it rough.”

“Hueeeng. Sorry! You’re the only one I can rely on in times like this, Teacher!”

So I helped my student clean out the big Cheon-family estate.

Though it was already touched by the Void, I’d been here before while investigating one thing or another, so clearing it wasn’t too hard. However...

“Exploring these Void-infested spots together reminds me of the old days. I was so scared back then, but now, it feels almost nostalgic.”

“Yeah. That coffee you brewed in the student council room was delicious. And that time we took the water-scooter to the ends of the earth, that was fun.”

“Hehe! Oh, Teacher. There’s still a place here!”

This time around, Yo-hwa knew all the secret passages in the estate. Thanks to that, we made it into places we’d missed in previous cycles, including deep into some tunnel as she led me by the arm.

“Huh? What’s that?”

A jet-black stone statue stood there.

“This thing was here all along...?”

It was a bizarre statue, one that likely represented some deity or another at some point in time, but its head had been cleaved off, making it impossible to identify. In its place was a Buddha's head on the neck stump. That Buddha's head was also strange—perfectly ordinary except for an "eye patch" carved over one eye.

I muttered it without thinking. "Gung Ye...?"

"Pardon?"

"No, nothing."

Gung Ye. A real historical figure, but on the internet more famous as a meme from the drama Taejo Wang Geon for being a mad cult leader who claimed he had the "power of clairvoyance" and shouting "Who coughed?" among other things.[2]

"Huh, weird. My family forbids anything related to Buddhism, so normally we'd just destroy a statue if we found one... If this had been around, they would've disposed of it right away," Yo-hwa mumbled.

It was unfamiliar even to the former successor of the cult. In other words, only someone on par with the "other twin successor" could have hidden such an item so thoroughly under her nose.

Who placed it here, and when?

At the time, neither I nor the younger twin could guess the truth, which was that since the 1st cycle, Yo-hwa's older twin had stored that strange statue in the estate's depths.

Why?

"All right, let's investigate, then."

"O-okay, teacher. But be careful? The head's chopped off, so you can tell it's suspicious. Don't just reach out and—" She paused, startled as I touched it anyway.

She'd arranged things so that her "sunbae" and her "sister" would discover the statue in the 554th cycle. So that in the next cycle—when the Admin played its "Book Possessor" trump card—the Regressor would already hold a sword to counter it.

“T-Teacher? Why are you spacing out? Is it cursed? Even you can’t handle something so obviously fishy?”

“Yo-hwa.”

“Yes?”

“It seems I... might have just acquired... a new ability.”

“...Huh?”

At long last, after hundreds of cycles, the Regressor unlocked the skill Mind Reading, and all thanks to a certain supreme trickster who possessed the authority of both Infinite Void and the Mastermind. She took care that the Admin of the Infinite Metagame would never notice, even making the event appear like sheer coincidence to me, her ally.

“Hey, you, mister.”

So in the 555th cycle, Dok-seo approached me.

“Come over here. That freaking fairy’s just caused a blood geyser to spout, and everyone else has gone and bailed. The ones of us left gotta stick together, don’t you think?”

Surely the Admin of the Infinite Metagame was smiling cunningly from behind her then.

The Admin felt confident that by placing the regressor and Book Possessor in close proximity, she could intervene anytime she liked and manipulate the scenario.

[Oh Dok-seo: Come on, damn it, please. Come over here. Without you, we're all dead!

Except her plan derailed at step one. Because to my Mind Reading eyes, acquired anew in the previous cycle, Oh Dok-seo was...

...not suspicious or dangerous, nor someone the Regressor must keep at arm's length.

[Oh Dok-seo: I get it, your first love and the only guild leader you served under is dead and lost to you, monsters are shit, the world is shit, I get it...]

[Oh Dok-seo: But for real, help us out!]

On the contrary, I felt curiosity.

'Following this kid around looks like it'll make this cycle a blast!'

Then goodwill. A quick glimpse into Dok-seo's psyche told me she wasn't vicious or wicked, so as the Regressor, I felt secure staying close to her.

Hence, the Regressor and the Book Possessor never clashed, never doubted each other. We trusted one another.

Brrrrkk.

From that moment on, the massive tower the Admin had built began to crumble uncontrollably.

Undone by a certain strategist who happened to fall in love with a single regressor.

Footnotes:

1 - "Air Man ga Taosenai" (lit., "I Cannot Defeat Air Man") is a song about trying to defeat Air Man, the boss of Mega Man 2, and failing over and over again.

2 - In the drama, Gung Ye beats people to death with a mace for coughing in front of him.

Chapter 343

The Surrenderer V

Sinnoa

The admin had reached her conclusion.

For a moment, my private room fell silent. On the laptop resting on the table, the screen showed the Admin of the Infinite Metagame's avatar again in 144p resolution—or even more degraded, like a dot-pixel white-haired girl perched atop the Recycle Bin icon.

[At first, I did not suspect—Infinite Void or that elder twin girl, Cheon Yo-hwa.]

Her voice had likewise weathered further. Gone was any trace of that aristocratic flair she once gave off, that sense of maybe smiling with a butterfly on her hand. No vintage elegance, just a worn-out relic. All that remained was a simple, off-beat TTS voice emerging from the laptop's tinny speaker.

[Just a worthless-loser.]

[Pathetically tried imitating—a human, clinging to the Regressor with flattery—and coquettish wiles, that pathetic insect—]

[I—took her lightly.]

Perhaps because of that, even in the 688th cycle when we subjugated the Mastermind, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame chose to cooperate with Cheon Yo-hwa. She decided that Infinite Void was a more serious threat as an Outer God, not suspecting that the real puppet master was Cheon Yo-hwa.

[You would—remember.]

[That I tried persuading Infinite Void—to form a pact with me and rise against you, the Regressor.]

But Infinite Void did not act as the Admin wanted. It used the Admin and betrayed her, leading to the Admin's ultimate conclusion.

[Cheon Yo-hwa was actually the Mastermind—]

[She was just Infinite Void at first, but then stole the Mastermind's authority—granting Mind Reading to you.]

[She's the one who toyed with me from start to finish.]

Bzzt.

The curses, fried in static, dripped like sticky black grease.

[Sly creature.]

[Treacherous creature.]

[Malicious creature.]

Indeed.

From the moment that Book Possessor, her trump card, was dismantled by Cheon Yo-hwa, the Admin's chances of victory nosedived. After that, the Admin's moves were less rebellion, more desperate flailing.

She gave Oh Dok-seo Side Story Creation, hoping it might shake the Regressor's psyche. Failure.

She pumped all the Aura she could into Oh Dok-seo while Leviathan slumbered, yet though Oh Dok-seo fell somewhat, she still wouldn't oppose the Regressor Undertaker. Failure.

She tried secretly poisoning the novel Oh Dok-seo was writing (Undertaker: The Romance) to distort the readers' perception.

And yet the more the Admin tampered, the more Oh Dok-seo felt a primal aversion to writing. The Miko's drive to avoid harming the Regressor overpowered her servitude to the Outer God.

Failure.

Failure, failure, failure. Failure.

[If at least…]

The speaker crackled in her lament.

[If you had treated your comrades as disposable pawns even a little bit.]

[If you hadn't given them your trust—I would have won—]

[And you—would have become me.]

Finally, I broke the human silence. "So? A loser can replay the chess game all she wants, but the outcome doesn't change."

[…]

"I get that scattering tablets along the shore was your way to vent your grudge against Oh Dok-seo. Now go ahead and state the real condition you want."

Squirm, squirm.

That black curse-stuff seeped over the background, forming greasy droplets as they all converged in one direction: the recycle bin. Once all the black sludge had drained into the icon, the background turned pure white again, as though bleached.

With a squelching plop, the Admin's avatar hopped out of the bin, then knelt quietly in the center of the white screen.

[I surrender.]

Like a white flag unfurling, a notepad file popped up with lines of text typing out in real time.

[Please grant—the victor's mercy.]

[At least spare—my life—if you would.]

In the 925th cycle. Autumn.

So it was the day the Outer God known as the Admin of the Infinite Metagame formally offered a complete surrender.

Faking it until you make it. Raising your price before offering terms.

That was what all this fuss amounted to for the Admin of the Infinite Metagame. Making a pathetic show of proving she wasn't dead "quite yet," so to speak.

I hummed in thought. To be honest, there was no particular urgency from my end of things. So what if my beloved Three Kingdoms stories were all transformed into bizarre gender-bent side-lore? Fine by me. I could simply re-read the same text in a new twist and enjoy it again.

Two ways to savor the meal. Men's camaraderie and maidens' friendship. Different flavors, perhaps, just as Ceylon Tea was distinct from café au lait, but if you prided yourself on being the greatest glutton in the best of times, you might declare them both delicious and gulp them straight down.

"P-please accept her surrender, mister..."

However, our illustrious literary figure clung to my arm like slime, stretching out in desperation.

"If that thing promises not to sneak any Outer God junk into my novel anymore, I can keep writing without interruption! Then our dear readers are happy, your allies are happy, and I'm happy too! A happy ending! An overwhelmingly happy ending—!"

"I-I won't be happy at all," a voice intervened.

Dok-seo and I turned to look, and there stood Sim Ah-ryeon, who had rushed to Busan so quickly she hadn't even changed out of her Saintess garb. Fidgeting, she said, "Don't accept the surrender, G-Guild Leader..."

"Huh," I huffed, somewhat intrigued. "Considering you're also part of the Regressor Alliance, I'll at least pretend to listen. Why not?"

“B-because an Oh Dok-seo who updates daily isn’t Oh Dok-seo at all. Characterization. There’s a certain personality trait that must remain protected, even if it’s h-hidden from others.”

I nodded. “I see. What’s your real reasoning?”

“Because I won’t let go of this precious gem who’s living a life even more worthless than mine…”

“What the— Ah-ryeon unnie?!”

“I— I absolutely won’t let you go. Ms. Dok-seo, taking it upon yourself to become a decent human being is a betrayal I can’t forgive…”

“Mister! Mister, I’m scared! Please accept the surrender!”

So Ah-ryeon clung to Dok-seo, and in turn, Dok-seo clung to me.

Ha-yul, who had been wandering around the guild hideout, saw this and latched onto Ah-ryeon’s waist, asking, [What’s this game, anyway?]

It was total chaos.

[Listen—to how it feels to be bested by these scoundrels.]

Anyway, it was a momentous event: an Outer God formally surrendering.

We had but one crucial question left to settle: Where would we accept this surrender? If there were some famous “capitulation hot spot” nearby, like the Palace of Versailles in France, that would be convenient, but we had nothing so thematically fitting in Korea.

When in doubt, improvise. We needed a space meeting three specific criteria:

1. It must remain intact no matter how much time passes.

2. Neither the Admin nor the Regressor can easily meddle with it.

3. The host of that space must be on par with or above an Outer God in stature.

Could such a place actually exist?

Surprisingly, yes.

“Welcome, sunbae! I’ve been waiting!”

Beam, beam.

Waving her hand was Cheon Yo-hwa, the older twin sister, dressed in a black sailor uniform.

The Divine Realm of Infinite Void. A classroom that kept the windows of four seasons sealed. The domain of a god, in which time stood still.

“And… Aha.”

When she looked at me, she had a face of pure innocent cheer, but upon noticing the laptop in my arms, her expression turned sly.

“Pop Quiz: The manga character Whitebeard and that white-haired girl inside your laptop share something in common. What do you suppose that is?”[1]

[…?]

“Three, two, one, buzz! The answer: They’re both holdover losers from the previous era!”

[…]

“Bahahah! Ehehe, ahahahahaha!”

Zzzt—zzzt—zzzt.

Static hissed violently from the laptop, but Cheon Yo-hwa just pounded on a desk, rolling from laughter.

“Wow! Remember how that Outer God once mocked me? ‘How can a god stoop to love a human or surrender to a human,’ she said.

Huh? What happened to her old adage, ‘you can’t beat them, join them’? But you wouldn’t listen! Then, oh, I heard we got a new member this season, so I came here and—and what do you know? It’s you? You also joined?!”

[CENSORED.]

“Uh oh, sorry! I can’t hear a has-been whose power got sealed by sunbae like a disobedient puppy—!”

[CENSORED.]

“Gasp! Or could this be an example of the Great Guardian of the Script? Like how the word for male genitalia can’t be spelled out directly, forced into the obscure world of bleeps. You’re physically demonstrating the content guidelines of a creation—?!”

[CENSORED.]

“Hehehe. Goodness, Admin-chan! You’re so committed to roleplay. If you had this level of RP skill in Japan, you could shoot for the top Vtuber rung! I’m laughing because you’re so into it.”

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

“Repeat after me: The Admin of the Infinite Metagame… is just an above-average laptop, that’s all!”

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

[CENSORED.]

For over fifteen minutes, Cheon Yo-hwa tormented the Admin with every variety of otaku insult, humiliating her psychologically.

‘Man, she has a nasty streak…’

Then again, from what I could recall, the older twin was always a real piece of work. While her younger twin might troll the entire world from behind a mask—she was Ah-ryeon's friend, after all—the older twin would pick one target and tear them apart until they coughed blood, curse-caster style.

Cheon Yo-hwa stretched her arms wide, looking thoroughly refreshed. "Haaah! I feel better!"

In stark contrast, the laptop across from her was spewing black smoke as if broken.

"You done venting?" I asked then.

"Mhm! I'm good now. Anyway, I guess from what I'm seeing, the Admin wants to fully surrender to you, sunbae?"

"...Yes."

"Aha, it's all going according to my plan. Ehehe, guess I really am a genius."

She giggled manically like a clown, but I couldn't bring myself to laugh along.

"There's something I'd like to ask, Yo-hwa."

"Sure, sunbae! Ask anything you want. Doesn't mean I can answer everything, though."

"The Admin suspects you of gifting me Mind Reading, specifically to sabotage the scenario she cooked up of pitting her Miko against me. Is that true?"

"Ah, yep," she confirmed briskly, as if it were no big deal. "I did. To be exact, I did it after absorbing the Mastermind's powers. Remember when I apologized because I couldn't save Old Man Schopenhauer? That time."

I swallowed hard. "I'm not accusing you of anything. Just curious. Why didn't you tell me?"

Smiling, Cheon Yo-hwa answered, “I’m sure you have an idea already, sunbae... And that guess is correct.”

Go Yuri.

That entity living not just in my mind, but in the deep unconscious of humanity.

‘I can’t forget anything once I hear it. That’s just the way I am.’

Finally, I felt certain.

All along, Cheon Yo-hwa had not only been taking the Regressor’s point of view into account when interacting with me, she had also always factored in the presence of Go Yuri, who was entwined with my memory.

Noticing my face stiffen, Cheon Yo-hwa forced a faint smile. “It’s tough, huh, sunbae? The world can collapse so easily. And to prevent that, we have to calculate variables as complicated as the Sands of the Ganges. If a mere vow to sacrifice ourselves could solve everything... it’d be simple.”

“Indeed,” I said gravely. “It’s not easy.”

“Mhm. Not easy.”

For about five seconds, we gazed at each other. Perhaps we both need the time to verify the angles and intensities of our mutual wry smiles.

“But in any case, we’ve come this far because you never gave up, sunbae.”

With a motion of her hand, Cheon Yo-hwa made chalk levitate and write on the blackboard in a nostalgic rhythm.

“People often say that strategizing is about variables. They think preparing for unknown factors demonstrates intelligence and deserves praise.” Cheon Yo-hwa curled her arms around her knees. “But for a tactician like me, the truly precious thing isn’t the variables, it’s the constants. Something that stays the same wherever, whenever. A bedrock for your calculations, a reliability that lets you plan strategies without worrying it'll shift."

In that classroom, her gentle voice and the chalk's scratchy writing formed a sort of a cappella duet.

"What was the reason the Admin lost, anyway? Because I'm the greatest genius who defies even the gods?"

[...]

"No, she was a genius too. Our calculation power is basically the same. So I myself can't be the decisive cause of her defeat."

The chalk paused against the blackboard.

Resting her face on her arm, Cheon Yo-hwa turned, letting the light of sunset frame her silhouette.

"The Admin and I were originally both far from human. But after hundreds of cycles, we each grew more human. Think about it, sunbae."

"What do you mean?"

"Simply the fact that she says 'I surrender'—that's extremely, profoundly human. And 'making promises' even more so."

A small smile tugged at her lips.

"You call humans Corrupted by Anomalies 'Fallen Ones'? 'Corrupted'? Those are nice terms. It's the same on this side, too. By now, The Admin has fallen so far from being an Outer God that she's barely an Anomaly. She genuinely got mad at her Miko, sulked, sought survival—enough to consider surrender... And it's thanks to you, sunbae. All because you've remained the same, unwavering you."

There, behind Cheon Yo-hwa.

"While the Void gazes upon humans, so too do humans gaze upon the Void. Maybe Anomalies need a saying like that."

The blackboard's "Surrender Agreement" read:

1. The Admin of the Infinite Metagame shall relinquish all authority over creative works (novels, comics, movies, games, etc.).

2. The Admin of the Infinite Metagame shall, under no circumstances, interfere with any future works authored by her Miko, Oh Dok-seo.

3. The Admin of the Infinite Metagame shall not threaten the Regressor Undertaker's physical or mental survival in any way. Nor may she communicate with other Anomalies without the Regressor's permission.

4. The Regressor Undertaker will allow the Admin of the Infinite Metagame to avoid entanglement in the flow of regression and to retain her own sense of self and memory.

5. The laptop provided by the Admin of the Infinite Metagame, and any works written on that laptop by Miko Oh Dok-seo, will remain safe from the ravages of time, recognized as an Ark that retains its own unique identity.

6. All of the above shall be guaranteed by the Admin of the Infinite Metagame, the Regressor Undertaker, and the Divine Realm's Cheon Yo-hwa. Should any party break the agreement, that violator shall face unconditional destruction.

7. The right to determine the ultimate interpretation of the words and phrases in this pact lies solely with the Regressor Undertaker.

The white-haired girl on-screen bit her fingertip, tipping away the tip of her right index finger with a static hiss.

[…If it will ensure.]

[That my life—is guaranteed.]

[Gladly.]

Thump.

She held out her hand, and—oddly—in that very moment, the laptop screen and the blackboard both displayed her fingerprint.

A blood oath. The strongest form of pledge.

Cheon Yo-hwa and I placed our own bloody seals in turn.

After wrapping her finger in a white handkerchief, Cheon Yo-hwa turned to me to say, “You know, sunbae, to me this world was always just variables. Ever since I was a kid.”

Then she smiled like a blooming flower.

“You’re my only constant, sunbae.”

There is a brief epilogue.

One day in the next cycle...

“Mister! We’ve got a problem, a huge problem!”

“Now what?”

“I-I can’t write anything!”

I stared.

“What do I do? I took Friday off because I was sick, Saturday and Sunday are always off by default, Monday I claimed I had the Flu Anomaly, so I took another day, but if I slack off today, Tuesday, everyone will start asking why I didn’t just get healed by Ah-ryeon unnie! Because the Baekhwa Girls’ High student council leader and Ji-won both know I can get treated anytime! So I need a legitimate excuse—some miraculous reason—why a literary figure like me can skip Tuesday too, so I can trick the Regressor Alliance...! Mister!”

Thus was it proven that Oh Dok-seo’s indefinite-hiatus disease wasn’t wholly the Admin’s fault. QED.

Footnotes:

1 - Whitebeard is a character from the manga One Piece.

Chapter 344

The Inviter I

Sinnoa

The Great Witch of Samcheon World.

My guild master.

Let's talk about Dang Seo-rin.

A regressor and an Undertaker. The sole survivor of the Busan Station tutorial dungeon.

That was the honor bestowed upon me in my 4th run. A bloodstained name.

It must have been raining that day.

Oh Dok-seo still needed thousands of years before she would Awaken as the Book Possessor.

Sim Ah-ryeon would later be reborn as the savior of the North.

At that point, Lee Jae-hee was still active as a frontline swordsman in the Regressor's party.

Uehara Shino personally risked her life to taste-test and concoct tonics out of the Void vegetation that grew in the tutorial dungeon.

Seo Gyu, I didn't get a chance to learn his name before his head burst open.

Lee Baek always stirred up trouble in the tutorial dungeon.

I couldn't share any genuine bonds, create any real memories, or live any real life with them. All of them died too soon, to a world fallen to ruin. In a season of drought where any harvest was slow to yield, only death ripened prematurely.

I had nothing in those days.

Nothing but anger and hatred.

Even if the sky poured down rain, the flames devouring the wick of my soul would never go out, burning on endlessly.

"Those eyes of yours are just dripping with poison, huh?"

Footsteps.

You stepped forward, trailing your shadow behind you. The boundary your black leather boots stepped upon lay at the edge of a single pyeong radius where the sound of my burning heartbeat reached.[1]

“So you're the one they talk about, right?”

I couldn’t recall your voice or expression of that moment, nor the hue of the thunderclouds raining down, nor the angle at which you offered me your umbrella.

For me, a regressor who needed to remember everything, another death was still required.

“The one who survived from Busan Station—almost the only one. Word is it had the highest difficulty among the tutorial-stage Gates. Some hellscape you made it through... Your name?”

My mouth opened, then halted. Something tried to jump out of my throat but got stuck in my vocal cords. I tried coughing out a few breaths, but my voice, having tripped once, couldn’t get back up.

I truly had nothing.

Not even a name.

“...Undertaker. It’s an alias.”

“So, someone who buries people?”

You liked to assign meaning to everything.

You called emptiness—where no crops could ever be harvested—"the open sky" and rose into that sky on a broom that only swept up dust.

You called the scrap metal that could no longer run anywhere "a train" and made it your home.

Because there wasn't enough water to wash one's hair, people stubbornly took to wearing hats all the time, and you adopted those battered hats as your guild's symbol.

Since there wasn't enough water to wash clothes, people grew accustomed to covering themselves fully, and you called those ragged coats "capes" and loved them.

You were alive.

"Not bad. A person is only as deep as the number of corpses they've buried in their heart."

Only later did I learn that the corpses buried in your heart were your parents and three younger siblings.

"So what do you say? Wanna join my guild?"

In the cold rain, your breath bloomed pale and white.

To my eyes, it looked just like a signal of smoke, drifting in the hope that some other survivor out there might see it.

If there was white smoke in this world that even rain could not wash away, it would be human breath.

"...What's your guild called?"

"Samcheon World. Samcheon for short."

I sometimes wonder what conversation passed between us then.

Now and then, I'm curious, yet not terribly lonely. At the time, my timeline hadn't been completely devoured by the whirlpool of regression. The better half of me—or perhaps just the soles of my feet—still barely stood on the same plane of time as other people.

So even the fact that I forgot you sometimes, as well as the memories I held of you, were proof that we once shared that era together.

"Undertaker. Help me... I need your strength."

You bowed at the waist and held out your hand.

Even if every word and sentence were erased, the color known as "you" still remained, and within that dark sky, we sought the feeling of one another like castaways sent adrift from each other.

Can I entrust my life to you?

Yes, I'll keep it safe.

I grasped your hand. You set aside your umbrella and helped me up.

We were too powerless to lessen the rain falling endlessly on this world, not even by a drop. But I could promise that my heart would be submerged in the same rainfall soaking you.

My last was memory this:

Two tendrils of smoke lit up in the dark sky. Two silhouettes overlapping in a rain puddle.

"Then, let's go."

"...Where?"

"Home!"

It rained.

Yesterday, today, and tomorrow.

The rain was still cold.

But not so cold as to freeze two people's worth of body heat.

Today's episode is a bit special.

"Saintess."

[Yes?]

"I have a favor to ask."

[What is it?]

In this story, I didn't go out to hunt any Anomalies or subdue any Void. I didn't observe or save anyone.

It was just a story of me heading off to meet someone. That was all.

Perhaps, this story might not strictly meet the standard narrative conventions that Infinite Metagame obsesses over. But the treaty of surrender already featured the line I wrote that says, "Sign here! The Admin of the Infinite Metagame is... just a slightly more powerful laptop." Why care about that when it's already been undone by that big distortion?

"For one day, please refrain from using your Clairvoyance on me."

[...]

"Not just on me, but please do not share the viewpoint of anyone I meet as well."

I sensed hesitation in her silence.

Given our lack of real trust, it was hardly surprising. We'd only formed our alliance right after clearing the tutorial with the Saintess, just yesterday.

[Of course, I respect your wishes, Mr. Undertaker.]

[But I'd feel better if you shared why you need to hide something from me.]

“It’s nothing serious. I’m about to meet someone from a past life, and it would be embarrassing if you were watching.”

[Ah. If it’s that sort of thing,] the Saintess replied calmly. [All right. So I just have to stop observing for 24 hours, correct?]

“That would be enough. Thank you.”

[No need to thank me.]

[See you in 24 hours, Mr. Undertaker.]

A soft click signaled the end of our transmission.

Of course, since the Saintess’s Telepathy isn’t like a walkie-talkie, there’s no real “end-call” tone.

That little click was made by the Saintess herself tapping her tongue on the roof of her mouth.

It was like a small code between us, whenever we sensed our conversation nearing an end, one of us would make that clicking sound with the tongue.

If, by any chance, you Awaken to telepathic powers someday, this tiny life tip might prove useful... but let’s move on.

“Hmm.”

I finished showering and stood before the mirror. I ran my fingers through my still-damp hair in light strokes.

“Time to begin.”

“Hey, you’re so dull.”

“What?”

“Undertaker. I’m talking about you. You’re so dull.”

“...”

“Why don’t you cut your hair? Are you trying to grow it out? Do you realize unkempt long hair is practically a capital offense?”

“True. I’m part of an organization now, so going around like this doesn’t look good. I’ll cut it. I was being short-sighted.”

“Yes, good thinking. There’s a barbershop at that intersection that our guild members often use. The owner’s pretty nice.”

…

“No!”

“…?”

“Now it’s way too short?!”

“…Is there a problem?”

“Of course there’s a problem! My gosh! That’s practically a shaved head! I never told you to cut your hair shorter just because your vision of the future is short-sighted!”

“Long hair is an issue, short hair is an issue. I have no idea which tune I’m supposed to dance to.”

“Listen, there’s something called moderation in everything. With a face like yours, you should at least keep your hair so it doesn’t get in the way!”

“Self-care… in this day and age? That’s quite extravagant to—”

“If I say do it, do it. I can’t stand seeing a guild member of mine roaming around looking like a beggar. And plus… come to think of it, you. There’s something else short about you besides your thinking and your hair, isn’t there?”

“What else could that be?”

“Your speech.”

“…”

“Formal speech.”

“…”

“Do you want to wear a pointy hat?”

“I’m sorry, Guild Leader.”

“Hmph. Next time, let’s cut your hair with moderation, okay?”

“…Yes.”

That happened once.

“Great.”

I looked into the mirror. In it stood a man with quickly trimmed hair and neatly shaped eyebrows, standing upright.

Just as a dog that watches a school for three years can recite poetry, after hundreds of regressions, I could style my own hair perfectly.

I turned my head this way, then that way.

“Mm.”

Looks good.

After finishing with my hair, I applied a light sheen of lotion all over. Basic makeup had already been finished off by washing my face earlier.

The perfume came a little later.

On to the next step.

With a rattle, I opened my closet. Inside were various barista uniforms I’d gathered from (closed-down) cafés in Seoul and Busan, all hung up by type.

I stared at roughly sixteen different barista outfits, then paused.

Barista uniforms are more diverse than you might think, unlike the more standardized butler attire. The single most crucial element is the apron.

Do I go with a style that includes an apron or something closer to a bartender's vest? And if I do pick the apron, what sort of style should it be?

This is a very important matter. You could say there's no issue more pressing than this.

If Rodin had known about barista uniforms, he would surely have put an apron on his sculptures.[2]

'But no. Today, I'll go with...'

Decision made.

I reached into the closet.

"Undertaker. What do you do?"

"..."

"I said, what do you do, huh?"

"What is it this time? More— I mean... Guild Leader? We have a meeting soon with the people from Cheong-un Guild, remember?"

"Were you about to call it nonsense— No, bullshit? Huh?"

"No, absolutely not."

"Pointy hat."

"Yes, that's correct. I'm sorry."

...

"Ugh."

"Look, all our guild members are required to wear witch hats and carry brooms, but you're the only one wandering around dressed like a Muggle."

"Yes, I am a Muggle. I can't use magic, I'm lower than a Squib. I am truly grateful that the Great Witch of Samcheon World, with a heart more cunning than Slytherin and more brilliant than Ravenclaw, would kindly look upon me."

"Heh heh."

...

"Argh, no, that's not what I meant! Honestly. Listening to your flattery can be hypnotizing, you cunning Tongue Grand Wizard!"

"...What exactly is it, then? We really do have to go soon. The meeting time is approaching."

"Undertaker. You're a guild officer, but dressing like a Muggle doesn't set a good example for the others."

"Mm."

"Just yesterday, an owl delivered a Howler."

"A Howler... you mean the wooden owl figurine containing the guild members' petition, yes?"

"Yeah. They complained about how 'Lord Undertaker' roams around freely while they have to wear witch outfits every day. My goodness! Reading that letter made me feel faint. I, Dang Seo-rin, the master of Samcheon World, shall address this matter sternly."

"..."

"..."

"Even so, witch cos— witch outfits are a bit..."

"You were about to say 'costumes,' weren't you?"

"Certainly not. It's a misunderstanding, Great Witch."

“You wanna die?”

“Yesterday, I managed to find a Ford Anglia while roaming a haunted mansion. The moment I saw it, I realized only the majestic presence of our Great Witch of Samcheon World could handle such a remarkable car. Please accept it as my tribute.”

“Undertaker. I name you an honorary witch.”

“It is an honor spanning three lifetimes—”

“No, that’s not it at all!”

“…”

“Ugh, seriously. Fine, if you can’t wear a witch hat, I’ll graciously forgive you! But at least pick some uniform that’d make the others go all approving when they see it.”

“A suit is also a uniform.”

“Guess what? A school uniform is a uniform, too.”

“…”

“Want me to just stick you in my sibling’s uniform?”

“Pardon me, but which sibling’s uniform do you mean—your younger brother’s or your younger sisters’?”

“Here.”

“…?”

“Roll the dice.”

“…”

“If it lands on one or two, my younger brother’s. Anything else is my younger sisters’ uniforms. Oh, don’t worry about sizing. I’ll hand it off to a tailor.”

“…I promise I’ll find a suitable uniform that sets a proper example.

Soon.”

“All right.”

That happened too.

Okay.

“You’ve been chosen.”

A thick, white, cotton dress shirt.

Bright white, but not too glaring, with thick cotton so the folds of the shirt crease nicely. To offset the plainness of the color with the folds, I rolled the sleeves up to my forearms.

There was another reason for this choice: It naturally showed off my arm muscles.

Let us remember, in fashion, a touch of exposed skin is a bonus.

‘And I’ll match it with simple black pants and a black apron.’

A barista apron can easily slip into tackiness, but that didn’t matter. I wanted to be seen not as a fashionably balanced passerby, but as a “barista who just stepped out of the café” for a moment. In other words, to give the impression of a man stepping out from work rather than going out to play.

Poetically, not the image of someone “lost with nowhere to go,” but rather “lost though there was somewhere he should return.”

Hence, rolling up my sleeves to bare my forearms was crucial. It relaxed the rigid impression of a uniform.

A wristwatch is enough for accessories. And not a metal watch, but one with a leather strap. Small in size.

‘She actually prefers a pocket watch much more, but…’

This was only the first meeting. If I showed up perfect from the start, it'd be off-putting.

We were both people who had lost our way, whose paths just so happened to intersect. We didn't have to be perfect.

We weren't players competing to determine a winner or loser.

We were simply an inviter and a visitor.

Hiss.

Finally, I chose a perfume and lightly spritzed some behind my ears —done.

In the mirror stood the person you used to like.

'Well.'

Were you nervous? I know I was.

Time only truly becomes life when it's accompanied by the sound of one's heartbeat—that's what you taught me.

'All right, off we go...'

Come to think of it...

I've mentioned countless stories shared with Dang Seo-rin, yet never once have I described the exact moment I first crossed paths with her.

Why hide it?

Until the distortion of Infinite Metagame was severed, I'd maintained my silence about this moment.

I, too, learned a thing or two about waiting from her.

'Time to go... get lost.'

I'm on my way to see you now.

Footnotes:

1 - Translator’s Note: 1 pyeong ≈ 3.3 square meters. A Korean unit of area.

2 - François Auguste René Rodin was a French sculptor generally considered the founder of modern sculpture.

Chapter 345

The Inviter II

Sinnoa

‘Undertaker.’

‘Hey, can I ask one favor?’

‘Don’t die before I do.’

‘No matter what happens, okay? If at all possible.’

‘Don’t die before me.’

‘You can promise me that, right?’

Summer.

June 24, midday, when the sky had slathered on far too much white-cloud foundation, right in the middle of a diagonal crosswalk in Centum City, Busan.

There you were standing all alone, looking up at the sky.

“Excuse me, are you all right?”

You did not turn your head at the first call. You had already temporarily entrusted your lost address to the sky—it was still too early for you to anchor your heart here on the ground. Only ten days had passed since you buried your parents, three siblings, two relatives, and four friends in the earth.

Funerals come in two layers: the one where you bury them in the ground and the one where you bury them in your heart. The ground always lost its heat sooner than the heart, despite the worry it caused people.

Under the summer soil lay countless cicadas not yet fully born.

Standing in the center of that crosswalk marked by white X's, you quietly speculated as to why the temperature of the earth below could not keep pace with the warmth of your heart.

On the surface of a heart that had just finished its mourning, a faint film of steam lingered.

That was why a single call was not enough to reach you.

"Hey, you over there. Are you all right?"

At last, you turned this way.

A single thread of a cicada's cry clung to the tilt of your head. The cry of a being left to emerge before all others.

You were Dang Seo-rin.

"Standing there is dangerous! But don't move either! Stay put for now!"

That was no lie. All of the traffic lights at the crosswalk where Dang Seo-rin stood were blinking red, where normally, at least one side of the four-way intersection should have been green. When looking closer, the red lights were dripping with some kind of liquid.

Blood.

Palm prints, stained with blood, trickled down from the traffic lights.

Slosh. Splat. Squish.

Those bloody handprints crawled eagerly over the crosswalk, pressing down here and there on the white stripes, almost as if they were massaging a human spinal column.

No one else was stopped at that intersection. No one else was alive there but Dang Seo-rin.

Her empty pupils stared this way.

“Please, just wait. Don’t make any sudden moves.”

I pulled a dagger from the pocket of my barista apron. Then with a gaping slice, I carefully cut across the center of my right palm. Bright red blood oozed from the wound I had opened.

For the first time, something like emotion flickered across her eyes. But it was neither shock nor horror. In the past few weeks, the world had seen far too much happen for mere human blood to be surprising.

What sparked to life there was merely mild curiosity.

I breathed out, spreading the dripping blood evenly over both my palms in a pat-pat motion. Then, holding one hand high, I began crossing the crosswalk.

One step. Two steps. Three steps.

Dang Seo-rin’s face came closer. The curiosity reflected in her eyes grew as her expression drew nearer.

“When red handprints start pouring out from a red signal like this, you have to coat your hands with the same color blood and hold them up as you cross. If you don’t do that, they consider it a rules violation, and the handprints strangle the pedestrian.”

“...What happens if the signal’s yellow or green instead of red?”

Her first words to me were polite, as anyone’s would be.

June 24. At that point, I was simply a stranger meeting her for the first time.

“You just have to stand still without budging,” I answered.

“And if you do move?”

“The green or yellow handprints will start digging into our bodies, trying to find something the same color as themselves… Maybe if your irises happen to match their color, you’d just end up blind and that’d be the end of it.”

I extended my other hand to her. It too was soaked in my blood.

“Anyway, we have to get out of here before the light changes. Come. Hurry.”

“…Ah.”

Dang Seo-rin pressed her palm against mine—firmly, like a stamp. Her hand was also stained with my blood.

We walked side by side, hands raised high, across the crosswalk.

Slosh. Splat, splat. Slosh.

The crosswalk was wide, far wider than the “original” that had once existed in this spot. The crosswalk thirty meters across and one hundred twenty meters long was lined on both sides by countless palm prints scurrying about.

“My condolences.”

A blink. Then she turned back to me at my abrupt words. “Pardon?”

“This crosswalk isn’t a place just anyone can come to,” I answered, expressionless.

“Not a place just anyone…”

“Yes. Only people who have lost their entire family are invited here… How did it happen for you?”

“…I was at home. I closed my eyes for just a moment, and when I opened them, I was standing there. I thought I was dreaming.”

I gave her a faint smile. “Is that so? Well, there’s not much meaning left in distinguishing reality from dreams, these days.”

“...Indeed.”

“Almost there. Until we’re completely past the crosswalk, please do not lower your hand for any reason. These little things will take it as you ‘belonging to their kind’ the moment your hand drops toward the ground.”

“Ah.”

Finally, the edge of the crosswalk. Our feet stepped up onto the sidewalk, and as we turned around—

Beeeep! Beeep! Hooonk! BEEEP!

“Hey! Move it! Aren’t you gonna move your car?!”

“Get outta the car, you jerk! Hey, I said get out!”

The sight of a street in the real world unveiled before our eyes as if it had been there all along.

It was still too early back then to say for certain that civilization had collapsed. In Busan, there were still families on the move somewhere with the last bit of remaining fuel, and from the looks of those people quarreling over there, some pedestrians standing by as witnesses were dialing the police on their smartphones.

Within another week, though, all of it—every bit of this fleeting season’s landscape—would vanish.

Dang Seo-rin gazed blankly at that scene.

“...That place. There. What exactly is it?”

“Not sure.”

What is emptiness?

There are far too many theories about and answers to that question.

Just as one cannot call a person to you with a single summons, a single answer cannot solve such a mystery.

“I interpret it as the spot where people who’ve lost their way end up being placed. Do you know where people most often come to a stop?” I asked, pulling bandages and a handkerchief from my apron. “In the doorway of their own home and at crosswalks.”

I wrapped my own hand first, then handed the handkerchief to Dang Seo-rin, who thanked me politely before accepting it.

“So, for those who have lost the home they used to return to, the only stop remaining is the crosswalk... Perhaps the view of that crosswalk isn’t much different from the image in our minds, in a way. There’s no point separating dreams from reality, so maybe those things simply ‘invited’ us to the place we belong.”

“It’s a bit... literary, huh?” Dang Seo-rin blinked. “This is the first time I’ve heard someone describe these Anomalies, these monsters, like that.”

“It’s merely my own interpretation.”

“Earlier, when I was suddenly summoned—invited—onto that crosswalk...”

Summer. The cicadas cried.

“Right at my feet, there was a warning painted there: Do not move under any circumstances. By any chance—”

“Yes, I wrote that. There are so many people who lose their way.”

She hesitated, looking at the bloodied handkerchief in her grasp, uncertain whether she should return it now or wash it first and give it back.

Like the half-red, half-green pedestrian signal, her heart was split in two. Likewise, half of her gaze was silently asking for my address.

For people, a “road” can exist not only for the feet but for the eyes as well.

I smiled. “Shall we grab some coffee?”

“…”

“What do you think?”

“…”

“I looked through a bunch of books because our dear guild leader told me to try making some. Oh, the beans may be a bit old, but at least we managed to get them from a nearby store.”

“…”

“Since I’m already wearing a barista uniform, I agreed it’d be nice to get more familiar to coffee in some way, just as you suggested.”

“…”

“So, how’s your very first taste of my coffee?”

“…It’s friggin’—”

“Friggin’?”

“Friggin’ awful!”

“What?”

“Good grief! How can you call this coffee?! This… This is an insult to coffee itself, you know! Are you sure it’s even safe for people to drink? Huh? Didn’t this stuff expire?”

“But I worked hard to brew it for you…”

“I just said find me any random packet of mix coffee and fix it up! Who on earth would ask you to fetch beans in this apocalyptic world and brew them like that?!”

“That’s a luxury only someone like the Great Witch of the Samcheon World is worthy of enjoying.”

“It tastes terrible… so terrible… unbelievably hellish. It’s more horrific than the mud cookies I used to eat when we were starving. I can’t believe coffee could taste worse than those sugarless mud cookies… How…?”

“Hm. That bad, huh?”

“Yeah, you taste it! You idiot!”

“Guild Leader.”

“Huh, h-huh?”

“To make up for my last failure, I’ve brought my trump card coffee this time. Please give it a try.”

“Eeek! Poison! Poisoning attempt! Everyone, the vice guild leader is trying to poison me! Save me!”

“If I succeed to the leader seat, the first thing I’ll do is standardize our uniform, so I imagine they’ll actually side with me.”

“Bah! So I raised a dog, not a tiger cub…?!”

“Isn’t that usually the other way around?”

“…”

“Well?”

“This is… surprisingly drinkable.”

“Isn’t it?”

“Yeah. But Vice Guild Leader, I’m not sure this is coffee so much as coffee-flavored liquid poured over vanilla ice cream.”

“In professional terms, that’s called an affogato, Guild Leader. And it’s definitely in the coffee family.”

“Right, sure. Except for the fact I think it would’ve tasted better without the coffee, it’s a perfectly decent affogato.”

“Well, still.”

“This is the best coffee you’ve made for me so far. Yup.”

So it happened.

“Here you are. Your affogato.”

Dang Seo-rin looked noticeably flustered as she faced the coffee cup set with a clink before her.

Which is to say, she was deliberately showing me that she was flustered. Displaying her feelings. The most basic kind of joke.

“...I can’t say I expected you to brew the coffee yourself. I just assumed you meant going to some café for a cup.”

“Mm. There were two difficulties with that.”

“What are they?”

“First, recently, the number of cafés still in business has dropped drastically. No one’s left in this area at least.”

“Ahhh,” she mused with a nod. “Well, that’s pretty much how it is nowadays.”

“But honestly, even if there were a café open, I wouldn’t have taken you there.”

“Huh? Why not?”

“Because nobody brews coffee better than I do. I am the man who makes the best coffee in the world.”

Dang Seo-rin burst into laughter then. It was a small laugh, but it was also her first laugh since we met at the crosswalk.

“I should’ve realized it from the moment I saw you in the barista uniform. Were you originally a café owner?”

“I’m just that kind of person.”

I smoothly produced a business card I'd prepared in advance. Dang Seo-rin took it in her hands. On that pearl-paper card, written in an archaic brushstroke (my penmanship surpasses any printing press), were these words:

Café Azit

~Undertaker the Barista~

World's Best · Earth's Strongest · Universe's Greatest Coffee Master

---

"Pfft." Her smile deepened. "Wh-what is this?"

"As you can see, my business card."

"Seriously? You mean you wrote it in earnest, not as a gag?"

I cleared my throat dramatically. "A true master lets the flavor do the talking. What more need be said? Please, savor it at your leisure."

Her laughter trailed off into a bemused chuckle as she lifted the spoon in her hand.

A porcelain cup, but in an East Asian style instead of European, focusing on shape rather than pattern.

The affogato within. One spoonful, ice cream soaked in coffee.

A taste upon her lips.

Dang Seo-rin's eyes lit up like traffic signals. "This is delicious!"

"Isn't it?"

"Yes! Wow, really... this is amazing! Hey, how is coffee this good?"

One spoonful, another, and another.

Chocolate stripes were drawn across the ice cream. Of course, I had a hand in making that chocolate too. And the main ingredient as well. It was real vanilla bean ice cream, not just flavored with "vanilla essence."

No wonder it was delicious.

"Waaah! Really, your business card wasn't lying—this is the real deal. At least among all the coffee I've tasted, this is absolutely the best!"

"World's Best?"

"Earth's Strongest!"

"Universe's Greatest Coffee Master, indeed. Thank you."

Her laughter was bright as she said it next.

"By the way, I'm Dang Seo-rin."

"Miss Dang Seo-rin."

"Yes. My name's a bit unusual, right?"

"I'm not that different, if you think about it. I lost my real name when I encountered these Anomalies, so I've been living under the alias Undertaker."

"Ah."

I already knew. This was her first time meeting this strange barista—and also the first time she had smiled since burying her family ten days ago.

"Forgive me for asking, but how old are you?"

"I forgot that too. All that remains in my heart, in these careful hands, is the fact that I'm the greatest coffee craftsman in the world."

A huff of laughter.

She gave me a playful once-over with her eyes. "Still, I bet we're not that far apart in age…”

“I feel the same way.”

“Huh. Well then.” She propped her chin up on her hand. “Shall we —”

“Yes.”

“—drop the honorifics?”

That was how we first met.

Chapter 346

The Inviter III

Sinnoa

“I can't walk along the same rails with you, but at least for as long as I live, my lifespan will follow you at the same pace.”

“We can’t walk together in life, but in death, we do. We are companions, you and I.”

“From now on, I’m counting on you, my companion in time.”

In the 10th cycle, Dang Seo-rin died.

Even now, when I close my eyes, it all comes back to me vividly as if it happened only moments ago.

She lay in a white bed and passed away as lightly as if she’d just nodded off for a moment.

“My condolences.”

“It must have been devastating for you. My deepest sympathies.”

Mourners gathered in crowds.

At the time, Dang Seo-rin was the great hero who led the subjugation of the Ten Legs. She was the leader of the Korean Awakener Alliance. The event was practically on the scale of a national funeral—countless people came to pay their respects.

“M-my— My deepest condolences…”

Sim Ah-ryeon was among them.

Since even Ah-ryeon herself had not yet realized her true ability at that point, I saw her as just a run-of-the-mill healer.

“Thank you for coming.”

There was no particular sense of connection between us either. A superficial connection, sure, in that we had both cleared the same tutorial dungeon, but nothing more than that.

Ah-ryeon fidgeted, trying her hardest to muster social grace that was foreign to her, and managed an awkward bow.

“N-No, it’s just... I... truly offer my condolences.”

“Thank you.”

On that day in the 10th cycle, I decided to remember each and every one of the thousands of people who came to pay their respects at Seo-rin’s funeral.

Later, even all the way in the 50th cycle when the so-called OldManGoryeo Villain was causing chaos in every which way, I was willing to hear out Ah-ryeon’s excuses after learning she was that villain. That was the reason why.

By now, no one else remembers, but those who braved the roads of the apocalypse, risking their lives on the treacherous path just to make it to the funeral hall, met with threats in every direction—I never once forgot their faces or their names.

Because Seo-rin had no family, I served as the chief mourner. Oddly enough, not one member of the Samcheon World Guild under her command objected. They merely clung to my sleeves and sobbed.

“M-Mr. Undertaker, what are we supposed to do now? Our guild leader, Dang Seo-rin... What do we do...?”

I looked after them.

No matter which cycle it was, there were always only two possible ends for Dang Seo-rin:

Dying in battle. Meeting a foe too powerful for humanity to face at that time and throwing herself against it before anyone else on the front lines.

Or dying together. Because I refused to leave you like that, I'd drag you all the way to the farthest rear line so we could perish at the same instant.

"Undertaker."

In either case, I kept my promise to you.

"There's just one favor I want to ask, if that's okay?"

"No matter what happens, okay? If you can."

"Don't die before me."

She had personally buried her parents and siblings in the cycle, so the thought of me showing up to her as a corpse terrified her.

"You can promise me that, right?"

That was our promise.

As with most encounters, mine and Dang Seo-rin's first meeting happened at an intersection. It was more an "encounter" than a formal introduction, though.

"Ah. Hello... Wait, that's right. We decided to drop the formality last time, didn't we?"

"No, see, I'm the type who's super shy around new people, so dropping formal speech is kinda tough for me."

"Eh?"

"Ms. Dang Seo-rin, my heart's pounding out of my chest. Could we put the casual speech off a little longer?"

"Pfft. Oh, whatever."

The second meeting was different.

That was a proper get-together.

You and I, after drinking coffee on June 24, agreed to meet again four days later at noon under a willow tree. So on the afternoon of June 28, there we were.

Seo-rin laughed. “You’re not even surprised by this?”

“No, believe me, I’m pretty shocked.”

The so-called “startle point” she was referring to was her outfit. When she’d lost her way on the crosswalk, she’d been wearing everyday clothes, but now she was decked out in the well-known “witch’s attire.”

Even in those early days, Seo-rin was running Samcheon World. The guild’s numbers hadn’t even hit double digits yet.

“So, I may or may not be questioning if I’m dealing with someone who’s totally off their rocker.”

“Lies. You don’t look shocked at all.”

“My mental minus is canceled out by your external plus. You’re proof that the finishing touch to fashion is the face.”

Amused by my brazen remark, Seo-rin burst out laughing. Then with narrowed eyes, she looked me up and down.

“Hey, Undertaker. Let’s be honest. You… must’ve dated a ton, right?”

“No comment.”

“Aww, come on. Tell me, I love hearing about romance stories.”

“Hmm.”

Here’s a little regressor tip:

Q: They keep asking if you’ve had a lot of relationships. How should you respond?

Answering “No, this is my first time” is the worst move. It’s tough to keep the conversation going, and there's no guarantee they'll believe you. Not to mention, there's also a good chance the same subject will come up again. Plus, you risk seeming overly serious. No good.

Answering "Just the usual amount, same as anyone else" is mediocre. Not terrible but not great. It's okay if you're ready to change the subject quickly. A good way is to shift attention to something the other person has dressed up for or cares about.

So what's the best move? According to Sun Tzu's Art of War: "The supreme art of war is to subdue the enemy without fighting."

In other words, winning without fighting is ideal.

"Okay. In that case, I'll give you two choices."

"Two choices?"

A true strategist expects in advance that such a question might arise—and comes prepared.

"Choice One: I'll answer the question you just asked. Then we'll head off to one of the few still-open restaurants in Busan for a nice lunch."

"Huh. That sounds good. What's Choice Two?"

I held up a picnic basket. "Instead of answering, we skip straight to these homemade sandwiches I prepared this morning and eat them together over on that bench. Paired with Earl Grey milk bubble tea I brought in this thermos."

You can probably guess which option she chose when faced with this visual-novel-style decision.

Shortly thereafter, Seo-rin put the thermos down with a deeply philosophical expression.

"What on earth were the sandwiches I've eaten all my life until now...?"

“I’m glad it suits your taste.”

“The word ‘delicious’ doesn’t cut it. It was sheer bliss... I mean, seriously. What’s with the bacon? How does bacon even taste like that?”

“Mm.”

Now, now! You too can achieve it!

☆The strongest chef in the human world☆

Just casually regress for a few thousand years starting now!

Note: Regression ability is non-refundable.

I swallowed that unspoken joke, giving her a soft smile.

“Shall we walk a bit, now that we’re full?”

“Oh, sure. Sounds good!”

It was summer, but the clouds visited frequently and the breeze kept knocking, as if we were in the windy corridors of New York. Busan’s wind was pleasant that day.

Perhaps eight-tenths of what fosters a poet is the wind, and likewise, eight-tenths of what swells the conversation while strolling is also the wind.

“So, I was thinking there should be a specialized board on Constellation Net for guides or tip posts that everyone, not just our guild, can reference.”

“That’s a good idea. What did the Constellation say?”

“Nothing yet. I’m going to talk more with you about it today and then suggest it to the Constellation in earnest.”

We never ran out of topics. After all, from that crosswalk meeting onward, Seo-rin saw me as someone with “extraordinarily unique yet extensive knowledge” about Anomalies.

We shared an interest in Anomalies. We also shared an anger toward Anomalies.

From Seo-rin's perspective, I must have seemed to her a fellow traveler in "losing one's family." That was the condition for being summoned to that crosswalk, after all.

"Ohh, that's a really great idea!"

"I'm glad to hear it."

"Heh heh. You're pretty smart, Undertaker. Why don't you and I go around wiping out these Anomalies together?"

She seemed all lively on the surface, but at the time, her soul was still shredded by the grief of losing her family.

In a certain past cycle, the Saintess had told me something in private.

[When you aren't around, she never laughs, Mr. Undertaker. Not even once.]

[She treats me, a Constellation, with this stiff, businesslike attitude.]

Right now, Seo-rin was desperate. If she were left alone, at any moment, she might feel the urge to kill herself or else the urge to wipe every one of those damn Anomalies off the face of the earth.

She battled that double-edged deluge, suicidal despair on one side, murderous rage on the other, fighting tooth and nail to maintain her original nature.

To remain the person who had once loved to laugh.

Who had once loved people.

She fought desperately for herself.

Under those circumstances, the arrival of "Undertaker" was an urgently needed refuge.

She wasn't sure why, but being around this man, she could briefly forget her loss.

She could laugh naturally.

She could stay human.

"So what do you say?"

"Wanna join my guild?"

Just as you did when you gave me that invitation, I silently promised that in this June summer, I would always stay by your side.

I never forgot it, not even once.

We simply needed each other to remain human and survive.

"Let's stop by there for a second."

"Huh? Where...?"

She froze.

We were strolling through a park when I pointed it out, and Seo-rin's shoulders flinched.

The botanical garden. A pathway leading to a village of trees and flowers, both outdoors and indoors.

"...Ah. Ah— Aha! So that's a greenhouse."

For the first time, Seo-rin stammered. Though I knew perfectly well why, I cocked my head.

"Hmm? You don't like flowers?"

"No... that's not it. I do like flowers."

She had no choice but to like them.

Her family used to run a flower shop. It had been big enough to be called a full-on nursery. They had three large greenhouses, growing all sorts of flowers and trees. Locals who loved flowers always purchased from the Dang family business, and there was always a truck out front delivering heavy pots and fertilizer.

Seo-rin and her younger siblings also helped out with their parents' work. Seo-rin was particularly quick at math and good at greeting customers with a smile, so she was a great asset to her family's business.

Until the greenhouse plants turned monstrous and slaughtered her family, Dang Seo-rin loved flowers.

"Then great. Let's take a look."

"...Ah."

But our relationship was not deep enough for her to confess to her trauma yet.

A swirl of emotions kept her from wanting to appear weak: her family's screams, confusion about how to talk about it, the images of her siblings' corpses entwined in vines, plus the wish not to break the pleasant mood of this breezy day, the nausea, the self-reproach for being so shaken by mere flowers, and so on.

All those feelings overlapped as she followed me.

She didn't even realize I was holding her hand, guiding her along. Too many colors of emotion, more than a human heart could handle at once, had taken over.

"...Ah..."

As we neared the flower garden, the trembling in her hand grew stronger, her breathing shallow.

I could have asked if she was okay, but I didn't. I knew all too well she wasn't.

Rather than ask if she was all right, I wanted to help her feel all right.

“Dang Seo-rin. Look carefully.”

She’d been hanging her head, but now she slowly lifted it. She blinked, then seeing the scene before her, her eyes went wide.

“This is...”

“Amazingly strange, right?”

I felt her trembling hand and labored breaths ease all at once.

It was no wonder, really. Here in this greenhouse, all the trees and flowers were “withered.” Anemones that had once been red were now shriveled petals of rotting-wine hue. Campanulas with closed buds resembled dark tea leaves, like pu’er tea.

Not a single petal was in bloom. Only debris lay scattered on the ground like trash.

The scent of them remained only in traces.

“I personally call this place the ‘Garden of Fallen Flowers.’”

“The Garden of Fallen Flowers...”

“Guess it’s under the influence of some Anomaly. In other gardens, you still see flowers in bloom, but here... they only ever wilt.”

And right now, it was the only garden in this world that you could bear to love.

Chapter 347

The Inviter IV

Sinnoa

A flower bloomed.

“Aaaaaaaah!”

Once, in some spring of the past, screams rang out in a train that had forgotten how to run.

It was the train Samcheon World had made their base of operations. And in the VIP car where the guild leader resided, screams resounded.

“Dang Seo-rin?! What happened?”

“I—I... Undertaker, I...!”

I checked on Seo-rin’s condition and shouted immediately, “Nobody come in!”

They froze. The Samcheon World guild members who’d rushed in behind me came to a startled stop.

“Until I say otherwise, nobody enters! Nobody!”

“Y-yes, understood.”

I drew the curtains over the windows, making sure no sound leaked out. All the while, Seo-rin kept trembling violently, on her knees on the floor strewn with shattered mirror shards.

“Dang Seo-rin!”

“I-I’m different now. My flesh, yeah. I felt this itch, and look... Ahaha. Look, Undertaker, I...!”

Buds and vines.

Plants were sprouting from her body.

“Ah, aaah. Aaah... ah...!”

Crunch!

Seo-rin tore the leaf emerging from her forearm with a shaking hand.

Yet it was so bizarre. Each time a leaf was ripped away, there was the sound of fingernails cracking. Each time a flower stem broke, red droplets of blood spattered. Even more unsettling was how her lacerated skin instantly regenerated within seconds, leaving smooth as if it had never been touched in the first place.

The more she tore at it, the thicker the leaves grew. The more she tried to rip them off, the tougher the stems became.

“No! Don’t tear at it! Dang Seo-rin, get ahold of yourself! The more you rip it out, the deeper it’ll breed inside you!”

“Ah, ugh...”

Udumbara. The New Buddha virus.

“But it’s... look at this, Undertaker. It’s all prickling. See, this is just what’s on the surface! My blood, my veins, my bones, they’re all flowers already. All of them... Ah, with every breath, ugh, something falls inside my throat. Leaves. There must be leaves in there. Every time my heart beats, something’s stuck. Undertaker, please. Help me. Breathing—”

Seo-rin was quarantined.

She’d always found the New Buddha Church extremely ominous to begin with. Though the Udumbara virus nullified Awakened abilities—definitely a drawback—ordinary folks considered it no disadvantage because they gained a body that was practically invincible.

Despite that, Seo-rin despised the New Buddha virus and took an extreme dislike to members of that faith, calling them “flower freaks”—unlike her usual self, who always cared about civilians while ruling over Busan.

“Seo-rin, I brought sandwiches again. Eat even just a little. If you stop eating altogether, you’ll really become someone who only needs sunlight for nourishment.”

Dang Seo-rin could not love flowers.

More specifically, she had an extreme aversion to living flowers—fresh, blooming ones.

Even after she’d done her best to move on from the tragedy with her family, the same remained true. She didn’t have a panic attack at the sight of fresh flowers, but she avoided them, not wanting to be around them herself.

Then came Udumbara’s outbreak.

The phenomenon of flowers blooming inside her own body struck directly at Seo-rin’s trauma.

“Your Excellency.”

Ji-won, who had taken on the management of Samcheon World in Seo-rin’s stead, spoke to me in the train corridor.

“How is the Great Witch faring?”

“She’s not there yet... She’s not in a state to converse normally. I need your help a bit longer, Ji-won.”

“It’s no trouble, Your Excellency the Undertaker. I’ll take good care of the guild here.”

“...Thank you. Truly.”

“Hmm.” Ji-won peered into my eyes. “Yes. Leave it to me.”

After we finished discussing various matters, I returned to the VIP room—now effectively a sick room. Seo-rin didn't even look this way where she lay slumped on the bed.

Black violets.

From the neckline of her clothes up along her throat crawled a vine, its tip bearing a flower bud so black it looked as though it might burst at any moment. Red blotches of blood bloomed across her bed, her blankets, even growing in dark stains along her clothes.

No doubt she'd exhausted herself overnight, harming her own body and then collapsing.

For several days, I too had noticed the beginnings of Udumbara infection, shoots sprouting from the back of my hand. When an Awakener was infected with the virus, their body would normally fully bloom in about two weeks. Once it reached full bloom, that was the end. The Awakener would lose their abilities.

In my case, I'd likely lose my regression power too.

"...Seo-rin."

I sat in a chair to match Seo-rin eye-to-eye, but she still wouldn't turn to look at me. Right now, for her, only the relentless growth of those plants pulsating inside her body must have felt real.

"While I was making today's lunch, I thought of something. How I want to kill them all... All those cultists who worship mere flowers as gods. And the people who believe in and rave about it. I started thinking it would solve everything if I wiped them all out."

"..."

"Yesterday, I actually tracked down the New Buddha Church monk responsible for Busan and secretly buried him. No matter how strong his regeneration is, at a hundred meters underground he'll suffer in pain forever, don't you think so?"

"..."

"I'm sorry."

I gently embraced Dang Seo-rin's body.

"Next time, I promise... Never again."

Aura wrapped around me.

There was a pop and a splattering of red.

On the pointed hat she loved. On her cloak. On her broom. On her hardcover books. On her giant globe. On her retro camera. On the artificial flowers I'd given her.

As the world reddened in my final sight, it no longer mattered what color it stained, so long as we were colored together.

That happened.

Early summer, in June.

We strolled together through the Garden of Fallen Flowers.

"How is it? Has a certain vibe, right?"

"Yeah, I guess."

Seo-rin nodded absently. Her breathing, which had been as ragged as if she'd run an intense cardio workout, was now fully calm.

Although she'd finally regained her composure, Seo-rin suddenly paused.

I noticed. "Ah... What's wrong?"

"...No, um. I just— It's strange."

She turned her head slightly, pretending to look around at the surroundings.

It was likely only then that she realized I had been holding her hand.

We silently agreed not to mention the sensation of our fingers interlaced. Nor the flow of our heartbeats passing through our palms.

“All these flowers... they’ve really all wilted. Hmm, why is it only this place? Is this an Anomaly too?”

A graceful change of subject, smoothly done.

As expected of Seo-rin. Considering she’d been briefly exposed to her trauma in a disconcerting situation, it was quite skillful.

“I don’t know. I can’t say the cause for sure.”

“Huh...”

I waited a short seven seconds.

It was on purpose. In conversations, silence can be advantageous or disadvantageous. Clearly, in this case, it was the former.

People only feel uncomfortable with silence when they’re unsure of the other person’s goodwill.

Yes, that was enough.

Around the time her trauma’s aftershocks had all but cleared, I approached a flower remnant nearby.

“Dang Seo-rin, I’ve got a confession to make.”

“Huh?”

“I brought you here, but I’m actually nearly clueless about flowers.”

“Oh. Right.”

“Do you know what this flower is?”

“That? Um...”

Seo-rin bent down and gazed quietly at the dried-up flower, or rather, the fallen bloom.

Determining the species of a dead flower, with its color entirely faded and its petals shriveled, wouldn't be easy. However, Seo-rin had worked at her family's flower shop for many years, as both mascot and clerk, and so she swiftly recognized the identity of the fallen bloom.

"I'm not entirely sure if it's ranunculus or peony... but looking at the leaves, I'd say it's peony. It's been dead a while, though."

"Peony. I've heard of it."

"Yeah. People who're a bit older like them. They often grow them."

Her voice picked up some life.

"Sometimes you get customers who are sick of rose bouquets, right? When I recommended them peonies, they loved it."

"Yeah? What color do they come in?"

"Everything from white to wine-red. They go well with roses too. Their flower meaning is 'shyness,' so it's cute. But if you bundle only white ones, it can feel too solemn, so in our shop, we'd mix in pale pink and pink."

"This flower."

"Huh?"

"What color do you think it was?"

A blink. "This one? You mean this exact one?"

"Yeah."

"Ehh, no way to know color. They're all dried-out brown. Just look at them."

"Still, guess for fun."

"Huh..." Seo-rin's gaze turned serious. "Then I should look at which flowers were planted nearby. Since it's near the entrance, they probably wouldn't start off with something too flashy... so maybe white?"

"White."

"Yes, people often confuse peonies with garden peonies because the names are so similar." Seo-rin cleared her throat for a bit of silly, smug fun. "If it were me, I'd plant white peonies right at the garden entrance to greet visitors with a broad 'flower smile.' Otherwise, I don't see much reason to start with peonies at the entrance."

"Excellent."

I let go of Seo-rin's hand. She let out a tiny sound in response, but I acted as if it was nothing, placing my two palms gently around the fallen bloom she'd identified.

"White peony. Are you sure?"

"Um... Undertaker? What are you doing—?"

"Let's check."

"Huh?"

Dark Aura trickled out from between my fingers. I needed to save my Aura usage to avoid Awakening Leviathan, but—

This much was okay.

Sssrrrk.

That jet-black Aura spread along the flower's dead stem into the soil. Moments later, that which had surely been dead turned a shade of light green.

Next to me, Seo-rin drew a breath.

"...Ah."

Light green crept upward, gradually reaching the bud of the once-wilted flower, hidden in my cupped hands. We still didn't know what color it was.

“I’ll count to three, then let go. One, two... three.”

When I released it, there it was.

A snow-white peony.

Seo-rin’s lips parted. From them came a breath, but it was nothing like her earlier ragged panting. It was somehow more delicate.

“Oh. So it really is white...” I mused. “Guess a flower shop clerk knows her stuff. How about this here? Ah, I think I can guess it too. A rose, right?”

“...Yeah, a chameleon rose. A wild variant.”

“What? That’s a thing? So what color?”

“...Peach.”

A flower bloomed.

“How about this?”

“...Moran, a tree peony. Pale pink.”

A flower bloomed.

“...It’s a patterned orchid, purple.”

A flower bloomed.

“Lipstick dodan, bell heather... White, but at the edges it’s tinted red like balsam dye.”

A flower bloomed.

“Campanula... A bluish color with a faint purple mix.”

“Moran.”

“Angel’s trumpet.”

A flower bloomed.

A flower bloomed.

A flower bloomed.

We walked quite far.

Looking back after we'd gone all around, the garden lay in full bloom beneath the early-summer sun.

Seo-rin stood and looked at the newly flourishing garden wordlessly, as if her feet were rooted to the ground.

"Ah."

Could a flower that had already withered ever bloom again?

"Agh... A-ahhh..."

Could a scorched ruin ever again yield a song?

"...Ah..."

Dang Seo-rin shed tears.

She wiped at them with her long witch's sleeve, but they overflowed no matter how hard she tried.

At last, the temperature of the soil had caught up with the heart.

"I— I... My little siblings."

"Yeah."

"My siblings kept begging me to just abandon the shop and run away with Mom and Dad, but I told them... I told them to trust their big sister, that you can definitely keep the shop open and still survive... But then, I... I... I had this thing about guilds and kept chasing after this dream of forming one... By the time I came back, no one was home. I went to the shop, and—"

"It's not your fault."

“If I just hadn’t, then—”

“It’s not because of you.”

“Why...?”

She took a long breath.

“Why, even though everything ended up like this... even though the whole world is like this... why are flowers still so beautiful...?”

That was the cry of a human voice.

Chapter 348

The Inviter V

Sinnoa

On the night when a meteor shower rained uncountable falling stars, each piece of starlight was the corpse of an Anomaly. Seven hundred Awakeners in a suicide squad clung to those handfuls of starlight, one by one plummeting to their deaths.

“Aaaaah!”

“Eleven o’clock! Another squad is covering Anomalies at eleven o’clock! This bastard, it’s getting wider and wider! We have to destroy it before it spreads!”

“Squad 12, annihilated.”

“Die! Die, die! Just die already!”

“Great Witch, thank you! We love you! Long live Samcheon World!”

“Squad 10, cleared two o’clock.”

If “humanity” is not something you are born with but something you prove by living, then without a doubt that final band of seven hundred was the last of true humanity left in this ruined world.

That day, humanity was clearly going extinct.

“Three o’clock cleared. Squad 10, decimated. Six people remain. Moving on to four o’clock. Good luck.”

“Squad 7, annihilated. But at least eleven o’clock is clear. Heading for ten o’clock... Oh. Found one remaining corpse. Can’t join you.”

The stars fell like blossoms.

I suddenly hated the night sky.

If the world's logic decreed that the most beautiful flowers must be trampled the most cruelly, I couldn't fathom what that logic served.

"I'll go on ahead, Undertaker hyung. I haven't forgotten what happened in Sejong. Thank you, always."

"Squad 4, annihilated."

I hated every single weed growing on the fields. I loathed their red and purple, the raindrops that fell on their petals, the voices that called it beautiful—and the muffled breaths of those too dulled by dawn's tremors to feel anything.

Falling blossoms.

The night sky was filled with starlight.

Descent.

My heart blazed like a flame.

If this season existed solely to kill humans, especially those who were most human, then how could I not hate every season first?

Undertaker!

———.

I love humankind!

—, ——?

And I'd like if you could refrain from hating people too much.

————.

Do you hate me too, Undertaker?

———, ——.

...I know. So, however much you like me... just that much, please love humanity more.

‘Ahhh.’

I looked up at the night sky.

‘Truly, truly. Such a beautiful sky.’

A contract.

Even if the day comes when one hates everything, someone will still find this world beautiful.

An imprint.

The night sky is not beautiful on its own. Samcheon World. All things in creation. None of these are inherently beautiful.

It is beautiful because it’s reflected in someone’s eyes.

Magic.

No matter how many times, how many tens or hundreds of summers pass, the night sky of that day will remain scorched into my heart like soot.

I was always under your spell.

Hic!

“Ugh...”

It took exactly twelve minutes and thirty-one seconds, plus four handkerchiefs, for Seo-rin to calm her tears.

She sniffled on a bench. “Ugh.”

“You can blow your nose, you know. Don’t worry about me.”

“No, come on, that’s a bit much... We’re basically flirting, aren’t we? Who on earth blows their nose on the second date? Are you crazy?”

She said that, but she couldn’t mask her ragged breathing.

Seo-rin definitely seemed more at ease when she was with me. Before entering the Garden of Fallen Flowers, she'd been carefully controlling her image.

"Haah. This feels weird."

Now it was different. Her eyes were all red from crying, and she sat on the bench swinging her legs.

"Even at my family's funeral, I didn't cry. Then here I am bawling in front of someone I basically just met... it's weird."

"That's because I'm weird."

"Who, you?"

"Both of us are. After all, anyone who shows up in a barista outfit or a witch's robe can't be normal."

Seo-rin laughed softly. Then, she said, "Undertaker. Let's be honest."

"About what?"

"You've got some mind-reading power or something, don't you? Some kind of ability connected to people's psyches? This makes no sense otherwise. I never told you how my family died, never mentioned working at a flower shop, yet you somehow picked the perfect date route for me?"

"Hm."

"If that's not due to an Awakened ability, then you're just an insane Casanova. Which is it? Why go so far to seduce me?"

Well...

Normally, I'd deflect the conversation easily, but I couldn't let that stand.

"Dang Seo-rin, that's all well and good, but let's straighten out the order of events."

“Huh?”

“I’m not the one who seduced you.”

I made a solemn declaration:

“You seduced me.”

Confusion.

“I was just minding my own business. I didn’t even know you existed. It’s you who approached me first, saying my alias was cool or whatever, openly flirting.”

Bewilderment.

“Not to mention you wore clothes and did your hair all tailored to your personal... Dear heavens, O ye Seven Outer Gods. Driving a psychologically cornered person to rely on you? A monstrous level of manipulative gaslighting.”

“...Uh, what the hell are you going on about?”

“Karma. You reap what you sow. Everything returning to you is just the consequence you must accept.”

“Ah, right. A cult. Makes sense... A good-looking sweet-talker who’s too kind must be some kind of cult fanatic.”

She tilted her head to the sky, half playfully, half in earnest. By now it was dusk. The purple sky bled like a droplet of spilled paint in a dim palette.

“This world won’t last long... Probably 20 years. 25 at most. No matter how we struggle, preventing destruction is tough. But I intend to gather people who still won’t give up and fight to live with everything we have.”

“...Huh.”

“I’ve already assembled many to my side. I’ve prepared an organization called the National Road Management Corps to function in place of a government. Dang Seo-rin, I need your help too."

"You're serious, aren't you?"

"When you're facing death, you become that way."

I gazed back at the Garden of Fallen Flowers.

The life I'd restored with Aura was fleeting. Before the sun could creep below the horizon line, those bright petals had already begun to fade again.

Yet at the very least, those petals were no longer drab browns. They fell in reds, oranges, yellows, and greens. Then they could bloom again, albeit for just one more season's respite.

Seo-rin stood silently beside me, looking out at the Garden. A few inches sunken below the horizon later, her gaze turned to me.

"Sorry for calling you weird. I guess if I had to actually put it to words... I'm fascinated. I've never met anyone like you."

"Thanks for saying so, but no need to apologize to me."

"Mm... Yeah, that is the feeling, huh? This is weird too. I feel like with you, I don't have to explain everything or think about how I word things. It's like... like you're family—"

Her head jerked.

"Mmph."

Then she rose from the bench.

A short walk away lay a crosswalk. Not as huge as the one where we first met, but the white paint was still intact, and the black asphalt wasn't broken.

No cars roamed here.

Only a few days had passed, yet this city had already grown accustomed to silence.

“Seo-rin?”

She didn’t respond, only stepped into the middle of the crosswalk and closed her eyes, raising her hand toward the sky.

A wind blew.

A strange sensation came over me.

The breeze drifting between her fingers, through her hair. It felt as though Dang Seo-rin might scatter into the wind at any moment.

I stood up.

One step, two steps, I trod the black asphalt. Each step snagged me on images of the many times I had witnessed her die.

Three, four, I crossed the white stripes. Each step pulled me into the June summer in which we’d crossed paths.

Past countless black and white surfaces, I came close to one person. Then, Dang Seo-rin opened her eyes.

A breath lingered on her lips.

“I have a confession.”

When I only gave her a puzzled look, she continued, “When we first met, I was interested in you right away. Do you know why?”

“Well…”

Because I dressed meticulously to suit her tastes. I hadn’t stopped at just my appearance either. My mannerisms, my attitude—I’d shaped it all to fit her sensibilities.

But seeing my expression, she shook her head.

“Actually, I heard a song.”

“A song?”

“Yeah. A song, or maybe a sound. Usually it’s just noise. But whenever I approach certain people or places… I hear a particular ‘sound’ they have.”

I blinked.

Not an act. I was genuinely startled.

In these hundreds of timelines, never once had Dang Seo-rin said such a thing to me before.

“Wait,” I said, “I’m not sure I follow.”

“Ah, well. As an example… look at the sunset overhead. You see red, right?”

“Yeah.”

“I don’t just see red. I hear the sunset’s distinct sound in my ears. It’s kinda like the sound of waves. But the sensation is shallower than real waves—broader than a stream, but thinner than an ocean tide.”

I’d never heard of this before.

‘Why…?’

It baffled me.

‘We’ve gone to that crosswalk. We’ve walked the Garden of Fallen Flowers. Sometimes we visited Udumbara instead. But never… not once did she mention this.’

Something had changed.

Now it was the 999th cycle.

To the casual eye, that number might seem special, but I hadn’t noticed any extraordinary differences from previous rounds. Yet the fact that “she hid it for 998 rounds, then confessed on the 999th” was bizarre in itself.

‘But why would she hide something like this? Was there a reason to hide it from me at all?’

Seo-rin giggled at my confusion.

“So earlier, I got a bit startled. When you took my hand and led me to the flower garden, all I could hear was screaming. Over and over... But when you cradled that peony and let it bloom, suddenly the flower’s screams stopped. And instead, a really pretty... it’s like piano keys being played, that kind of sound.”

She clasped her hands behind her back.

“I can hear a song from you, too... It’s very sad, but also very clear. It’s been continuous from the start, connecting seamlessly. Sometimes the key changes, but the melody never does. Like footprints. Really faint... but really strong.”

Gently, Seo-rin took my hand. Behind her, broken traffic lights flashed slowly, blinking as if half-asleep.

“None of the sounds I hear have ever lied to me. So I want to trust you too. Thank you... for giving me a reason to still like this world.”

She smiled, likely listening to a tune I could not hear—part sunset to the west, part night sky to the east, half upon this place, half upon her heart.

“If you ever need my help... whenever it is, just say so, Undertaker. Even if we have to set the whole world on fire, I’ll do it. I’ll help you no matter what.”

There is an epilogue.

Let me briefly mention another story.

When Ji-won and I decided to seal Leviathan, I’d already grown exceedingly cautious about using Aura. We needed to limit Aura usage drastically, like living with blackouts or water rationing.

‘If I use Aura right away, I can easily defeat Ten Legs or a Meteor

Shower.'

But that was a poor solution. We had to learn to fight without relying on Aura at all.

'That's the only way to completely put Leviathan to rest.'

It was a harsh path.

After the 777th cycle when I first pioneered this route, I spent hundreds more refining the approach step by step.

'We can't jump straight from 100% usage to 0%. That's too ambitious.'

'We'll do it gradually. If we used 100% before, we'll try 95%, 90%, 85%... steadily reducing bit by bit.'

It wasn't just Aura either. Ultimately, we had to rely less on other Awakened abilities as well.

'And somehow... until the 20th year, when the Monster Wave fully hits... we must endure.'

Easier said than done.

The less we relied on Aura, the more we depended on other Awakened powers. And naturally so, since humanity needed weapons to fight Anomalies that could destroy the world at any moment.

"Guild Leader."

In one cycle, Ah-ryeon fell to Corruption and blanketed the world in flowers.

Because we'd reduced our Aura mastery, to minimize casualties we leaned on Ah-ryeon's abilities... and she was Corrupted.

- Dad.

In another cycle, Ha-yul fell to Corruption, turning all living things into puppet dolls.

We'd woven puppet strings across continents to strengthen communication lines among Awakeners... which led to her Corruption.

In yet another, Yo-hwa created an entire NPC army, or Dok-seo enlarged the protective barrier too far, or Ji-won once again relied on Aura in the end.

'This...'

I bit my lip.

'This is basically just shuffling cards around.'

A deadlock.

To stop these Anomalies, we must rely on Awakened powers. But that only leads the Awakeners to become stronger, to be Corrupted, to approach the Outer Gods.

'Is there a way...?'

An ability that doesn't grow stronger the more you use it.

An ability that, the more you use it, the weaker it gets.

A power that—no matter how much you wield it—will never risk Corruption, instead returning you closer to an ordinary human.

Such a miraculous ability, if it existed...

'Is there a way to...?'

There wasn't.

"Undertaker."

But there was magic.

"Do you need my help?"

Dang Seo-rin.

Her ability, Cursed Song Incantation, was simple.

She uses up her own lifespan to cast spells.

Exactly.

Only Seo-rin did not grow stronger with the use of her power. In fact, the opposite was true. The more lifespan she saved up by not using it, the stronger she became. The more she used it, the weaker she got—completely inverse to every other Awakener's ruleset.

Burn your lifespan, and your death draws near.

She would die.

As a human.

That, indeed, was Seo-rin's magic.

She was just like me.

Like my role as a regressor, who must erase the very Aura-levels I'd built up to save the world... so too did Dang Seo-rin abandon herself.

My companion.

There existed a song to strengthen humans without Aura, a song to heal without crushing Ah-ryeon, a song to reach Ha-yul without cornering her.

Everything fit together like a miracle.

This path was destined for someone to walk with me.

"All right. Sorry. It appears I do need your magic."

"Mm. There's no need to apologize."

Thus, after that day in the 777th cycle, it became the story of how I and another gradually died.

Our string of failures.

A singular route.

Escaping the cursed formula of Awakener Corruption and the Anomalies' mockery.

A grand magic of Equivalent Exchange, balancing humanity's decline with our own demise.

From here on, the tale will fast forward.

Chapter 349

The Missing I

Sinnoa

For a moment, it might sound strange. And for now, it may look like nothing but drifting clouds.

But let us consider a single, rare piece of imagination here.

‘...’

There once was a certain girl.

No. She wasn’t a girl but an adult.

An old woman. A calculator. A planner. An explorer. A gambler. A schemer. A loser. A winner.

One who wandered. One who pursued. One who remembered. One who was forgotten.

It didn’t matter what name she was given because she could become anything. All that mattered was keeping in mind that she was solving a very difficult, extremely complicated puzzle right in the middle of the night sky.

‘...’

The puzzle was four-dimensional.

It demanded not only spatial assembly but also temporal intersections and overlaps. In other words, it wasn’t the kind of problem you could solve by simply hitting the pause button.

None of the puzzle pieces had any color.

Colorless, like a mirror.

These mirror-like fragments were scattered about, and she had no choice but to fit them together herself.

Each attempt at fitting them together cost her decades of time. There was no such thing as a skip button, nor was an auto-hunt option available to her.

The difficulty could only be described as unfathomable.

She had to endure the flow of time without beginning or end.

'...'

You might want to lament how outdated and unplayable this game was, but at some point, she no longer gave up.

She simply calculated. Plotted. Explored. Schemed. Gambled. Repeated loss and victory.

Even as she wandered, she never stopped pursuing.

She lived by dying. She died by living.

Time flowed on.

'...'

Finally, the pieces came together.

She picked up a single shard and attached yet another mirror to the night sky, where only a dizzying emptiness stretched beyond.

The Void turned into starlight.

From her perspective, it was beautiful.

The first shard of starlight.

「Oh Dok-seo is a writer.」

Surprisingly, this sentence was true.

She had more days not writing than actually writing, and she was less of a genius who delighted her readers and much more like a genius who enraged them. Nonetheless, by some miraculous principle, Oh Dok-seo was still a writer.

A fine testament to how thoroughly this world deserved to be destroyed.

「Oh Dok-seo writes historical fiction.」

Surprisingly, this was also true.

If you wonder why we'd say "historical fiction writer" instead of "fantasy writer," well—

It's probably faster to see for yourself how Dok-seo actually worked.

"Phew."

The great literary master. The once-in-a-lifetime genius who mocked not only humanity but even Anomalies. Oh Dok-seo...

...woke up at 2 PM.

With a resounding burst of motivation, she resolved to begin work at 5 PM, then spent the next three hours busying herself checking the latest trends on SG Net. After that, she devoured a hearty dinner to restore her creative stamina, lounged on the sofa for some philosophical meditation until her blood sugar returned to normal, and then, at last, at 10 PM, she murmured with the pensive eyes of a true author:

"All right, the time has come. I shall try writing something."

[You're a total bum.]

Ha-yul, who had been working hard all day and was now off duty, flipped through her sketchbook with an expressionless look.

Ever since finding out about the existence known as Oh Dok-seo, Ha-yul had acquired the skill called Quiet, Contemptuous Stare. This was also part of Dok-seo's gracious influence.

[Trash. Shut-in loser. The disgrace of the Regressor Alliance.]

“So, let’s see. Yesterday, I heard a story about the 173rd run from the old man. Whoa—he said Dang Seo-rin falls into Corruption, so I was kind of expecting a romance scene, but apparently, there’s no memory of anything past the kiss!”

Dok-seo’s eyes gleamed.

That wasn’t just some figurative literary phrase. Her eyes literally sparkled—because she had infused them with Aura. Even regressors usually saved their Aura for the gravest of situations, but every now and then, Dok-seo used hers as proof of her “sincerity.”

“Skipping a naive romance scene… Even if Anomalies might forgive it, and regressors might accept it, I, the free-spirited author Oh Dok-seo, cannot allow it!”

[?]

“I’m certain that in the 173rd cycle, the old man definitely went beyond just a kiss with Dang Seo-rin.”

[Are you nuts?]

Ha-yul’s contempt grew sharper.

If you ignore for a moment that she once killed her father and turned her mother into a doll—yes, aside from that tiny bit of history—she was actually pretty reasonable. And if you take issue with the question of whether that’s really “reasonable,” well, take a look at who’s living in the guild dorm: Oh Dok-seo, Sim Ah-ryeon, and Yu Ji-won. Three mountains that loom overhead.

“Restoration means sincerity.”

[?]

“And creation means… freedom!” Dok-seo whispered gravely. “I made a vow: never to replace the word ‘fuck’ with ‘f—k.’ Because fuck is fuck and damn is damn. If the truth is so obvious, then why would I fail to call love by its true name?”

[Wait. So right now, you want to spy on dad's love life? Are you actually insane?]

"Of course! If I have to be insane to tell the truth—!"

By the way, let me just say that in my own stories, I've always filtered out anything that wasn't agreed upon by the people involved. Naturally, there was no consent regarding "anything beyond a kiss." In fact, having explicit consent would have been problematic.

But fuck is fuck, and likewise, Oh Dok-seo is Oh Dok-seo.

"The readers have a right to know...!"

[The most urgent right for your readers is actually for you to write regularly, you know.]

"It's not only about Dang Seo-rin! Cheon Yo-hwa the student council president, Commander Noh Do-hwa, all the others! Think about it! How could hundreds—no—thousands of repeated runs go by without a single love affair between a man and a woman happening even once?!"

[You're crazy.]

"This is a trick. A lie! It's all a ruse by the Infinite Metagame! I refuse to be deceived by this fake world any longer! I will witness the truth with my own eyes! I swear it's not personal. My foolish heart beats only for the readers...!"

[I'll go get your brother.]

"Hey, hey, hey." Dok-seo's arm stretched waaaay out and clung to Ha-yul's shoulder, who flinched in alarm.

What in the world? Was this an Anomaly? It was almost identical to a monkey from some joke comic! The intelligence level might not be too different either.

"Okay, okay, you are so uptight. In that case, I won't insert an R-rated chapter in The Regressor's Epilogue that I'm serializing."

[...]

“But let’s just keep it to ourselves.”

[...?]

“I’m going to possess 173rd-run Seorin.”

They called it possession, though the official name was slightly different:

Side Story Creation.

A power that allowed Oh Dok-seo—both writer and V-tuber—to pick some far-distant run from the past and “summon” a character from it.

It took the usual writer’s tool, empathy, to the extreme. She didn’t just sympathize with the character’s feelings—she fully recreated everything that character had felt and thought.

“So while I’m playing the part of your sister from the 173rd cycle... you, Ha-yul, can ask me all sorts of questions.”

[Questions? About what?]

“Ah, geez! Don’t try to act innocent like you’re some pampered noble from a politically gifted, traitorous family background or something!”

[Should I actually kill you?] Ha-yul asked, barely suppressing her murderous intent. It took extraordinary effort to hold back.

“Ha-yul. Huh? Lady Lee Ha-yul. You’re curious too, right... what sort of romantic escapades the old man has?”

It was a whisper from the fiend who wore an author’s mask.

“And it’s not even about what he’s up to now! It’s about what Mister was doing hundreds, no, thousands of years ago. That’s basically a ‘historical’ fact, so it’s not even a privacy issue! Who’s going to criticize a romance from thousands of years ago?!”

[...]

“You can handle the rating. Just lightly—very lightly—ask about it, okay?”

[...]

“Was the kiss... sweet?!”

[...]

“And if it was sweet, did they go even further?!”

[...]

Ha-yul grabbed her half-curly hair with both hands.

She agonized. She wrestled with her desires.

[Just a little. Just a little bit, okay?]

“Deal!”

No point in hiding it.

The aristocratic lady from a traitorous political dynasty was somewhat weak to temptation.

Under normal circumstances—meaning before the 998th cycle of the scenario—this is the point at which the STOP! button would usually activate.

The reason was simple: the Saintess.

In other words, if you compared the world to a classroom, she was always the class president. Our model student.

But now it was the 999th run.

Just as she tried to put a stop to Dok-seo’s chaotic behavior (which, if we’re honest, was far beyond mere chaos from the start), the Saintess hesitated for a moment.

She pressed her own power, Time Stop, pausing the flow of time, and held her chin in thought.

“This... does make sense,” the Saintess murmured.

In a Time Stop, it was easy to lose one’s sense of self, so she intentionally spoke out loud this way to avoid forgetting her position.

It was a habit reminiscent of a certain regressor.

“Mr. Undertaker just got finished telling me about it... That Dang Seo-rin’s behavior was something we’d never seen before, in all cycles combined.”

That stuck in the Saintess’s mind.

“I discussed it with Mr. Undertaker at length, but in the end, we couldn’t find any peculiar changes in the 998th cycle. Nor in this 999th cycle. So...”

Maybe the best idea was to ask the “past” Dang Seo-rin about it—about that unknown potential even Dang Seo-rin herself didn’t realize.

Of course, if Dok-seo’s Side Story Creation were truly capable of summoning the full power of the Fallen Witch from her prime, it would be dangerous. But Side Story Creation wasn’t omnipotent. Sure, the Infinite Metagame obviously wanted its Miko to eventually reach such heights, but in accordance with that eternal law of an Outer God and its Miko, she was thwarted.

“From what I gather, it merely ‘summons’ the personality and memories that Dang Seo-rin had back in the 173rd cycle.”

Who was to say it truly originated with the Infinite Metagame, though? It was still an extremely game-like power, the Regressor’s timeless clear method was likewise inclined: forcibly dressing that ability up in a name like Side Story Creation.

“In that case... it should be safe, I think.”

It wasn't perfectly harmless. After all, it would inevitably violate some of the personal privacy of both the Regressor and the Great Witch.

Yet what a coincidence! The Saintess, flawless model student that she was, had precisely one moral principle she did not uphold: "respecting personal privacy." She single-handedly operated a 24-hour, round-the-clock CCTV that monitored every single Awakener across the Korean Peninsula and all without a single staffer to give her a break. A system so sweeping that even George Orwell would have been appalled.

If she'd cared about the words "personal privacy," she'd never have set that operation up.

Hence...

"...Yes. Looks like there's nothing wrong with letting this happen."

The one and only conscience of the Regressor Alliance lowered her hand that was about to declare STOP! Instead, after releasing Time Stop, she quietly transmitted a message to Dok-seo by Telepathy.

"Ah—"

For some reason, upon receiving the Saintess's voice, Dok-seo smiled slyly, as if she'd been expecting this all along.

"Ahhh. Sorry, Saintess unnie! Once again, I neglected your feelings."

?

"Of course you'd be super interested in Mister's romance scenes too! Gosh, I almost left you out. Don't worry. Just watch it all you like through Ha-yul's eyes! I'll keep it a secret from the old man till the day I die!"

...

A single flower bloomed in the Saintess's heart.

‘Huh. Why is my heart pounding so fast?’

The petals, however, were quite murky.

‘Could this feeling be... murderous intent?’

It was an evil flower.

Unbeknownst to anyone, Dok-seo had just given the Saintess a little shove toward the brink of Corruption. If the Saintess fell, the end of the world was certain—thus in that context, Dok-seo had unwittingly become the hidden mastermind of ruin.

In any case, the Saintess did not stop her. On the contrary, this was like a model student who stumbled into a gang of delinquents secretly playing with fire and ended up joining them for this runaway joyride.

After 998 normal runs, now on the 999th: derailment.

Thus was the second shard of starlight.

“Ahem? What are you all talking about here?”

“Ah.”

Dok-seo and Ha-yul were in the cafe hideout lobby, a public space that everyone in the Regressor Alliance used freely. That was its purpose, after all.

“J-Ji-won.”

“A good evening to you, Dok-seo.”

Among them was, of course, that pale-haired psychopath who called herself the Regressor’s one and only right hand.

Ordinarily, this specter of authority preferred the dormitory at National Road Management Corps headquarters over the guild’s quarters. After all, she was bound to the Regressor by a solid contract. No matter what sins she might commit, her final testament would always reach some future iteration of Yu Ji-won. In other words, from her perspective, the Undertaker's favor was pinned at a certain threshold.

However, it was a different story when it came to Noh Do-hwa. Commander Noh's favor rating had a maximum of 20, and reaching that 20 was unbelievably tough.

For Yu Ji-won, doing mild upkeep with the Regressor was enough for him. The rest of her time she devoted to "conquering" the commander. Efficiency at its finest.

Until the 777th cycle, that is.

When the aurora spread across the night sky, the Regressor's favor rating limit of 60 jumped straight to 100, and a seasoned gamer knows to grind faster than anyone else after a major server update.

Since the 777th cycle, Ji-won had been coiled up in the guild hideout, and she started by buddying up to Ha-yul. It was all to build a thoroughly rational formula:

Lee Ha-yul = Someone the regressor cherishes like a daughter

Yu Ji-won = Takes good care of Lee Ha-yul

Undertaker = "Ah, so my Yu Ji-won is kind after all!"

Flawless, was it not? To capture a general, you first take out his horse.

This silver-haired psychopath even had the steps down pat.

"Well, it's, like... basically, we're trying to study what happened when Dang Seo-rin turned 'Corrupt.' So, you know, my ability, Side Story Creation? We'll see what went on with her and Mister when they, you know. It's just curiosity, totally a trivial thing!"

"Aha." Ji-won made a show of marveling with a nod. "How interesting. Please allow me to join in on this academically minded observation as well."

“O-oh, sure! Of— Of course.”

Dok-seo felt a bit nervous. From reading the Regressor’s tale in “novel” form, she knew how gifted at murder this pale-haired beauty was.

She also had the worse end of the matchup, fundamentally. Even though Dok-seo herself was a Miko, the Infinite Metagame had now become a Outer God mostly by name (lol). Meanwhile, Leviathan was still in its “secretly powerful” stage. The Regressor and the psychopath were simply restraining themselves for the moment, but if they wanted, they could unleash their Aura anytime.

But that was not the end of it.

“Hey, what’s going on? Let me in too!”

“Ergh, Student Council President…”

Eternal High Schooler Cheon Yo-hwa, reporting in.

“‘Ergh’? That’s harsh. Come on, Dok-seo!”

“…But you, well, you don’t like me… r–right?”

“Eh? Why would I dislike you, Dok-seo? I don’t hate you at all.”

She wasn’t lying.

When nobody else was watching, Yo-hwa had bullied Dok-seo countless times. Again, if we imagine the world as a classroom, Yo-hwa was the vice president, center of the social circle, and the main culprit behind ostracizing Dok-seo. Like the difference between Poison-type and Psychic-type in Pokémon matchups.

“So you’re saying we’re gonna dig up Teacher’s past, right? Hehehe, I wanna join! I’m curious too!”

“Ugh…”

Why did Yo-hwa bully our dear, innocent Dok-seo?

It's not like this author took more days off from writing than writing itself, or wrote mocking 3,000-word announcements whenever she went on hiatus, or physically hit fans at a fan meet-and-greet, or constantly used Aura for her own self-indulgent whims when even regressors saved it for emergencies. It's not like she stole the sacred "Mister" title that Yo-hwa used to address her teacher before switching to "Teacher," is it?

From the viewpoint of the great literary master Oh Dok-seo, it was pure nonsense.

And that still wasn't the end!

"Wh-what is everyone doing here...?" A greenish-haired woman who embodied the very concept of absurdity poked her head in for a peek, and Dok-seo's face went sour in record time.

"Ah, shit! Sure! Ms. Ah-ryeon, come on! Let's just gather the whole neighborhood, why don't we? Sheesh... Just don't tell Mister, okay?! Got it?!"

"I-I'm not sure why you're u-upset with me, but... okay, I'll keep it s-secret..."

Ah-ryeon thought, But does keeping a secret as "Sim Ah-ryeon" differ from keeping a secret as "Old Man Goryeo"...?

For reference, in Pokémon terms, Sim Ah-ryeon was like a Digimon. Meaning matchups were meaningless.

"Oh, my head hurts. All right, everyone take a seat on the sofa! We're about to do the Side Story Creation! Hey!"

Oh Dok-seo, Miko of the Admin of Infinite Metagame. Prime era: 888th cycle. Corruption.

[...]

The Saintess, Miko of Nut. Prime era: presumably 107th cycle and 267th cycle. Corruption.

"Hm. I've only heard about it before, but this is my first time seeing an actual Side Story Creation in progress.”

Yu Ji-won, Miko of Leviathan. Prime era: after the summer when she encountered “Mr. Matiz” at age 14, in every run starting from 777th. No record of Corruption so far.

“Um. Huh, Ms. Ah-ryeon?”

“Yes?”

“Sorry, but do you use some kind of perfume? There’s a really unusual smell here...”

Cheon Yo-hwa, Miko of the Infinite Void. Prime era: after the 688th cycle in which her “split personality”—the persona of the Infinite Void—vanished. Multiple histories of world destruction. Multiple Corruptions.

“I don’t, no?”

“Huh?”

“We’re Awakeners, right? Perfume seems pointless, plus it’s expensive, and kind of a hassle. Ehehe. So I just go around comfortably!”

Sim Ah-ryeon, undecided. No recorded world destruction so far. Multiple Corruptions.

“All right, everyone pay attention! We’re starting now!”

From the 107th run, the 173rd run, the 267th run, the 688th run, the 777th run, the 888th run, and on to the 999th run.

Upon treading again on the sand of the Ganges, calling out those numbers and names, climbing the hill of nayuta, and crossing the boundless sea.

So that coincidence may become inevitability, the third shard of starlight sparkled.

Chapter 350

The Missing II

Sinnoa

“Hey, mister.”

“Sometimes, when I write down your story as a serial novel, can’t I insert ‘side stories’ as well?”

This conversation took place around the 692nd cycle, right when Oh Dok-seo began to fully Awaken to her Side Story Creation ability.

“Though I call it a side story, it’s basically just writing from the perspective of ‘someone else.’”

“But it’d be a problem if it eclipses the main storyline. So let’s say… yeah. Once I’ve stacked up about ‘100 chapters’ of the mister’s point of view,”

“I’ll write one ‘side story’ each time.”

Back then, no one thought anything of it. It was hardly unusual for a novelist—especially a certain LiteraryGirl who complained about serial stress more than anyone—to write side stories as a kind of vacation from the main story.

But wasn’t it strange? Despite having declared she’d present one side story every 100 chapters, Oh Dok-seo had never once actually written an episode that truly counted as a “side story.” Even when she fell into a crippling slump, whether caused by her own nature or the Infinite Metagame’s curse, an Infinite Hiatus Syndrome, she never used her free pass to create a side story.

“By the way.”

“It’s a side story, so do I still need you to proofread, or can I just write it and post it as I please?”

Thinking back on it now...

“Yeah. Go ahead and write whatever you like.”

“Great! Thanks, mister! You’ll be blessed!”

What Oh Dok-seo really wanted back then might have been the condition that “she could skip the Regressor’s review.”

As of the current serial timeline, we’re at Chapter 350.

Number of side-story opportunities: 3.5 times.

The shackles of the Infinite Metagame are unlocked. There’s no better chance for an Outer God to distort history.

Saying she “had been waiting for this precise moment” might be an exaggeration, but it couldn’t be denied that she had been preparing for a time just like this.

Title of the first side story: The Missing.

Selected time: 173rd cycle.

Selected viewpoint: first-person POV, Undertaker.

* And no proofreading by the Regressor required.

For the first time, Miko Oh Dok-seo manifested her power in full.

The fourth shard of starlight.

At last, the constellation was drawn.

We return to that day, the moment Dok-seo roped the other members of the Regressor Alliance into sneaking a peek at the Regressor’s romance with her. If I were to describe succinctly what happened to me, the Undertaker, I would say it went like this:

“Undertaker? What’s with you all of a sudden?”

At the time, I had been drinking with Seo-rin.

As someone who loves working out, I'm supposed to stay away from alcohol, but an alchemist from Japan, across the Korea Strait, invented a pill advertised with the tagline "Drink this, and your hangover's gone in 50 seconds—no side effects!" If you can afford the price of such a hangover cure, alcohol can indeed become humanity's savior in no time.

Needless to say, Seo-rin and I had no reason to worry about the next day and we were both fairly inebriated.

"Hey, doesn't the weather seem... kind of odd?"

"The weather?" Seo-rin echoed, looking up at the sky.

It was around 10 PM. Except for the nightlife district near the casino, the city of Busan was otherwise asleep.

"I dunno?" she continued. "I don't hear anything out of the ordinary."

"Hmm. Maybe it was my imagination."

Just a moment ago, the clouds in the night sky almost looked like they twitched and rapidly shifted to one side.

Like some gigantic dragon.

I shrugged it off and raised my glass.

'Well. If something that big had actually happened, the Saintess would have tipped me off by now—'

A sudden clang! made my hand pause. Seo-rin looked in the same direction as I did. Some distance away from the bar, one of the streetlamps that lit up the Dream Casino district had burst.

"...What's that?" Seo-rin furrowed her brow and muttered, "Is some Awakener messing around?"

"Not sure. I missed it too."

"You? Wow, you really are drunk, huh?"

I didn't respond, still wary. Something felt ominous. Seo-rin went right back to focusing on her drink, but though I felt a bit buzzed, I sharpened my senses and focused on my surroundings.

It wasn't long before I realized the source of my unease.

'...No one's coming out of the casino.'

At this hour, the main flow of foot traffic in Busan should have been right at the casino entrance—yet it was weirdly silent. And it wasn't just the casino either.

'That customer who went to the bar's restroom still hasn't come out. The waiter who went to the kitchen isn't coming back either.'

Not only were there no people in sight, but their very presence had disappeared. A textbook sign of an abnormal phenomenon.

I immediately lowered one hand beneath the table and wrote a note on my thigh.

'Saintess?'

No response.

'Saintess?'

No response.

"Hey, Undertaker. Let's just finish this and move on to the next spot," Seo-rin suggested.

My mouth went dry. Even as Seo-rin offered me another drink, I quickly took out my smartphone to try connecting to SG Net.

[Cannot connect to the site.]

Dead.

"...Undertaker? Seriously, what's wrong?"

"Listen carefully, Seo-rin."

“Huh?”

“Something’s happening and we don’t know the cause. Communication with the Constellations is down. Access to SG Net is also blocked.”

A blink.

Seo-rin tilted her head. “Out of nowhere?”

“…I’m just as shocked as you are. Anyway, we should stay close and not separate.”

“Ah, okay. Got it.”

Though I didn’t know the cause, it meant the Saintess, Seo Gyu, and maybe even more people had been taken out all at once.

To be honest, only one suspect came to mind.

‘Is this Go Yuri’s doing?’

And yet… that, too, seemed strange. No warnings whatsoever, just me having a few drinks at night—and then suddenly the world goes off the rails? In an early cycle, maybe. But in this 999th cycle, with all our contingencies prepared to face Anomalies, a sneak attack of this magnitude was highly irregular.

“Let’s take a look around.”

“Ah—”

I got up, taking Seo-rin’s hand. At first, she didn’t realize how serious things were, but as the minutes passed—5, 10, 15—her expression steadily darkened.

“There’s no one around…”

I nodded. “Right. They’re all gone.”

Literally.

All of humanity had disappeared, leaving only Seo-rin and me behind.

“Still not hearing anything from the sky?” I asked.

“Yeah. It’s silent.”

“Think about it. You said you usually hear all sorts of sounds and songs mixed together. Is it normal for the entire sky to make no sound at all?”

“Ah.” Some inscrutable emotion flashed over Seo-rin’s face. Then she let out a small sigh and took a pill from her pocket, biting down on it: one of Uehara Shino’s special anti-hangover drugs. “And I wanted to stay drunk today... Looks like I need to sober up, though. Sorry, Undertaker.”

“No need to apologize.”

“Let’s fly.”

Seo-rin hopped on her broom and rose into the sky. I climbed on behind her, and we took off together.

Didn’t change a thing.

“I sent a signal to the train, but no response. And the ones supposed to be on patrol at this hour aren’t around either... Looks like you were right. Seems like there’s absolutely no one left in Busan.”

The city looked bleak. Power was still running, so lights flickered around the casino, but I couldn’t sense a single human breath anywhere.

Not in the residential areas, not at the National Road Management Corps headquarters, not in the refugee camp, not at the cafe hideout, not at the authors’ dormitory.

Nowhere.

“Should we check another city?”

“Nah, I bet Seoul, Sejong, Pyongyang are the same. Everyone’s gone but the two of us.”

“…I see.” While steering her broom, Seo-rin snuck a glance back at me. “So where do we go now?”

We returned to the bar. In a place with no customers, no staff, no owner—just us two—we set down our now-cold side dishes and drinks to brainstorm.

“For now… in cases like this, where something inexplicable has happened, sometimes it’s surprisingly best to just stay put in the starting location.”

“Like that old movie. What was it called? Cube?”[1]

“Yeah. Since the Anomaly happened where we were, the cause probably lies here as well.”

“Huh.”

Seo-rin looked around.

The bar was shabby—a hole-in-the-wall joint at best. Still, the owner’s cooking skills were top-notch, so Seo-rin and I were frequent customers.

“But there’s nothing here,” she said then.

That was the problem.

We’d visited this exact same bar countless times, but never encountered anything like this before. Not until the 999th cycle.

I remained calm, working through the logic.

“If that’s the case…”

“Huh?”

“We might need the opposite perspective. Instead of ‘the world suddenly ended,’ or ‘everyone vanished except for us two,’ think the other way."

"What do you mean?"

"Exactly the reverse, Seo-rin. We're the ones who disappeared."

Her eyes went wide.

"Huh? You and me?"

"Right. Ask yourself: is it harder to make 'all humanity vanish except for these two,' or is it harder to make 'just these two vanish from humanity'?"

"Ohhh. Right, that does seem more likely."

An unknown Anomaly or Void had basically kidnapped us, yet Seo-rin calmly raised her glass. She fell silent for a moment, then spoke.

"Feels a bit weird."

"What does?"

"Your explanation's perfectly convincing. It explains why the world's so quiet, why the usual clamor of songs in my head suddenly stopped. And yet... somehow, this feels more comfortable to me. This feels more 'normal.'"

I stayed silent.

"Come to think of it, it was the same when we first met. Remember? That huge crosswalk? It was just the two of us."

"I remember."

Of course.

"Yeah. This time, the crosswalk's just a bit bigger, right? Not that different, is it? Thinking of it that way, I feel much more at ease. You'll figure something out, anyway."

I opened my mouth, wanting to argue that it wasn't that simple, then closed it again, opting instead to comb through my mental archives for a key to solve our predicament. Whatever else may have happened, the Saintess's existence being erased was more concerning than anything.

While I was distracted, Seo-rin suddenly plopped down next to me.

"...Dang Seo-rin?"

"I think I might know how to clear it."

"Seriously?!"

"Yeah."

Quietly...

"...But can I ask why, if you supposedly know how to solve this, your hand is now pressed against my cheek?"

"Ahaha. You're clueless, huh?" Seo-rin said with a giggle. Thanks to that top-grade hangover cure, her intoxication should have dissipated almost instantly, but her laughter still carried a night-air drunkenness to it. "In a world where suddenly only two people remain—wouldn't the most 'plausible' explanation be that it's all a dream?"

"A dream."

"Right. Whether it's your dream or mine, if we just say, 'It was all a dream,' the mystery is neatly solved. But..."

Softly...

She placed her other hand on my cheek as well.

"And we both know the easiest way to wake up from a dream, don't we, Mr. Self-Proclaimed World's Greatest Expert on Anomalies?"

"...The correct answer: an alarm clock."

"Shut up. You fool."

Seo-rin's breath brushed my lips.

I squeezed my eyes shut, knowing that if this didn't dissolve the Void, we'd be in serious trouble.

The hush that had submerged the entire world flowed like transparent currents, circling quietly between the two of us.

And then

「Foolish man.」

for some reason,

「Was that your first kiss?」

behind my tightly closed eyelids, I suddenly heard a nostalgic voice.

「Undertaker. Put all your memories of kissing onto the scales, if you have any—across all cycles, not just this one.」

Memories of when I revealed to Dang Seo-rin that I was a regressor.

Memories of the 173rd cycle, when she fell into Corruption but I swore to remain by her side until the very end.

「There. Now then.」

「Close your eyes.」

A remembrance of utopia.

Sensing that a great deal of time had passed, I opened my eyes again—

And my eyes went wide in shock.

Seo-rin was right in front of me.

That in itself was normal enough. We'd been alone in a bar just moments ago. But beyond her, the Busan night sky was bursting with fireworks in red and blue, brilliant colors lighting up the air.

Between the explosions, witches from the Samcheon World soared on brooms, laughing and whooping as they flew.

That was not normal. It made no sense.

Just moments ago, Busan had been silent as the grave. Forget fireworks—Seo-rin couldn't hear a single noise anywhere.

Now, above Seo-rin's head, a golden set of scales shimmered like a Constellation.

No denying it. It looked far too much like the scene imprinted in my memory long ago. No, it matched it exactly.

The Dang Seo-rin in front of me...

That Dang Seo-rin, smiling softly...

"Now this is our very first kiss."

...was not the Dang Seo-rin of the 999th cycle.

She was the Dang Seo-rin of the 173rd cycle, the Fallen Great Witch.

What in the world was going on?

To this neverland of a missing space—this utopia—where witches' laughter and bursts of fireworks echoed without end...

I, the Undertaker, had been brought along.

Footnotes:

1 - The 1997 sci-fi horror film Cube features an escape-room premise wherein the characters are tasked with escaping a series of deadly trap-rooms shaped together in a giant cube to get to a room on the outer edge where they can escape. Toward the end of the film, it is revealed that all of the rooms move over time, so the safest way out would have been to stay in the room they originally found themselves in.

Chapter 351

The Missing III

Sinnoa

Originally, my memories were supposed to end right here. In the 173rd cycle, after the “Undertaker” shared a kiss with Dang Seo-rin, the story jumped into the next regression without delay. Yet for some reason...

“Still... Yes, that’s right.”

Before my eyes, Dang Seo-rin was casually living on into the time beyond the kiss.

She was smiling, tilting her head.

She was alive.

Like a sequel to a novel that had once been left unfinished.

“Well, I know I’m being a bit unreasonable. But, as the master of Utopia, the commander of the National Road Management Corps, and the supreme Great Witch, I might be able to grant one single wish, you know? By the way, that’s a really big deal, yeah? The moment you told me I was an Anomaly, it felt like some mental shackle snapped off in my head.”

Seo-rin puffed out her chest with a self-satisfied harrumph.

“Right now, I could probably grant any wish, like a genuine god,” she continued.

“...A wish, is it.”

Finally, the “Undertaker” opened his mouth.

It was certainly not my own will. My tongue was automatically, instinctively moving on its own. I felt like I was a customer in a movie theater, left only to watch the “Undertaker” speak these lines right in front of me.

‘No,’ I thought to myself. ‘Perhaps… while I still don’t know why, I might be witnessing the epilogue of the 173rd cycle. If so, it’s only natural I can’t intervene. In this moment, the one who kissed Dang Seo-rin is the Undertaker of the 173rd cycle. And the person conversing with her now is also my past self.’

My spirit quivered.

‘Am I finally going to learn what happened?’

What actually went down in the 173rd cycle?

Until now, I’d simply assumed that right after we kissed, Seo-rin had killed me. It was the simplest and most persuasive explanation.

And yet…

“…When I think about it, you’re right.”

The epilogue now playing out before my eyes showed me that my original assumption was wrong.

“It’s true that in the past, you’ve never fallen into Corruption exactly like this before. I doubt it’ll happen again.”

“Because you’d stop me?”

“Yes.”

Seo-rin had not killed me. Nor had we perished together. Amazingly, after we shared a kiss, the two of us were still talking to each other in a perfectly normal way.

Having apparently been abducted from the 999th cycle back into this past scene, I held my breath, secretly eavesdropping on the epilogue.

“In the end, you’d have to say this cycle failed. And yet, that doesn’t change the fact that it’s a rare opportunity,” the Undertaker said, stroking his chin. “Just let me confirm one thing. Seo-rin, that golden set of scales of yours... that Equivalent Exchange scale can extract greater rewards the more you sacrifice. Am I correct?”

Seo-rin nodded. “Yeah. When we kissed earlier, I tried it for the first time. Right now, I can probably put ‘pretty much anything’ on the scales. My own lifespan. Your memories. Anything at all, as long as it matches the price.”

Indeed. When you consider it carefully, it’s a horrifying power, isn’t it?

‘My Complete Memory ability is practically absolute. Excluding the handful fo blank slates from the 1st to the 4th cycle—the ones Cheon Yo-hwa mentioned—I remember basically everything else.’

And yet, Dang Seo-rin had just placed even that flawless ability onto her golden scales. She erased all my memories related to that kiss so that the kiss we just shared could be “my first kiss.”

‘Right, that explains why Infinite Void— Why Cheon Yo-hwa once demanded something so absurd, claiming we’d shared a kiss way back when!’

Realization struck heavy, true, yet totally unexpected.

Still, if here in the 173rd cycle, Seo-rin had wiped out all my memories of my first kiss, it did fit. She had deleted a chunk of memories that Cheon Yo-hwa once possessed. Later on, once Cheon Yo-hwa absorbed all the powers of the Void and the Hidden Mastermind, she reclaimed the memories that had been snatched away.

‘Unbelievable, so it was actually...? No, wait, that’s the 1st cycle, so... This is getting way too complicated. And besides, the kiss isn’t even the main point here!’

There was really only one vital point: Right here in the 173rd cycle, the Corrupted Dang Seo-rin before me had risen to a nearly omnipotent state capable of tampering with the Regressor’s Complete Memory. According to her, she could place absolutely anything on her golden scales, and in exchange, she could gain any corresponding wish.

If that was the case, then what would the Undertaker of the 173rd cycle—my past self—do when faced with such a one-of-a-kind chance?

'Maybe he borrows Dang Seo-rin's power to hunt down an Outer God? No, that would be pointless. Even if we defeated an Outer God with the Fallen Dang Seo-rin's help, there's no guarantee we could replicate it in a later cycle.'

My thoughts were running a mental race against each other.

'Besides, the fact that it's specifically the 173rd cycle is way too conspicuous. We don't have enough intel! At this point in time, we've barely even taken down the Outer God called Infinite Void. We haven't found any way to tackle the Infinite Metagame, and as for the Mastermind or Leviathan, I might not even know they exist!'

I felt my throat going dry. Or maybe I really was parched.

The faster I thought about the perfect way to utilize this priceless opportunity, the closer I felt to the 173rd-cycle me.

'Any wish I might make now could end up wasted by hindsight. I lack crucial knowledge, experience. I still need to figure out how to conquer this world, this Void! For instance, what if I used this chance to wish for enough power to defeat the Admin of the Infinite Metagame? That'd be a catastrophic mistake!'

I understood.

Logically speaking, I knew.

In the 173rd cycle, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame seemed like an unbeatable entity. A towering mountain. We had no practical way to conquer it. It wasn't until the 593rd cycle that we managed to subdue the Infinite Metagame, and even then it took Dok-seo's cooperation.

'Meanwhile, my 173rd-cycle self has no clue how crucial Oh Dokseo is...'

I wanted to warn him, to tell my past self that the 173rd cycle is still early in the entire regressor's journey.

There's no need to worry about the Infinite Metagame right now. You should consult Dang Seo-rin about an even worse giant evil that's coming!

In that instant—

'Ah.'

my heart—

Thump!

I felt a sort of resonance, past with present, now with the future, two layers of melody that should never overlap somehow crossing through the miraculous magic of my heartbeat.

The "Undertaker" spoke.

"...Dang Seo-rin."

"Hm?"

"I've made up my mind."

"Oh, really? What's your wish? Now I'm curious too."

"I doubt I can just figure out an optimal wish right now. So—"

Thump.

"I'll ask my future self."

Thump.

"Huh? Your future self?"

"Right."

Thump. Thump.

“Let’s say the me from the 10th cycle asked you how to defeat the Ten Legs. Wouldn’t that be pitiful?”

“Pfft. Hahaha, true! Makes sense!”

“Maybe we’re in the same boat right now. So the wish I want to place upon your golden scales of Equivalent Exchange is—”

Thump!

And—

“Summon the future me to this very place.”

My heart pounded.

“Ohhh, your future self, huh? That even piques my interest.”

“Really?”

“Yeah! Sounds fun. Dunno if it’ll work. Besides, how far in the future are we talking? Right now we’re in... Sorry, which cycle was this?”

“The 173rd cycle.”

“Got it, 173. Let’s see. So if we say... the 300th cycle? The 400th? You want me to bring your future self from around then?”

“No.” The Undertaker shook his head as a hint of amusement crept into his voice. “If we’re going to make a wish, let’s go all in. Summon the me of the 1,000th cycle.”

“What the heck? 1,000th? If you haven’t saved the world by then, doesn’t that mean something’s seriously wrong with you?”

“That’s exactly why I’m trying this,” the Undertaker said with a chuckle. “Think about it. If I put a wish on the scales to bring the me of the 1,000th cycle—and nothing happens—that means I must have already saved the world by then, right?”

“Oh?”

“On the other hand, if it actually succeeds in summoning me from the 1,000th cycle… well, we’ll find out plenty of things. Either way, there’s no downside.”

“Wow, that’s our Utopia’s Guardian for you, when it comes to this, your brain’s in top gear.”

“All thanks to having such a wise Great Witch as the leader of the National Road Management Corps.”

“Oh hush, flattery will get you nowhere.”

Seo-rin smiled.

“Cool, got it,” I affirmed. “Then I, Dang Seo-rin, the Great Witch of the Samcheon World, also known by some as the Corrupted ‘Great Anomaly,’ command you now.”

“Are you sulking?”

“Onto the right side of the scales, I place the 1,000th-cycle Undertaker, bringing him into this place.”

Fwoooosh!

The golden scales projected into the night sky began tilting violently to the right, as though the chain might snap.

“Huh?”

“Uh— Um. For now…”

“…Looks like it went up.”

“Y-yeah.”

The Undertaker and Dang Seo-rin spoke at once, both sounding flustered. “Maybe?”

“But this is… wow. Way too heavy,” the Great Witch continued. “The heaviest I’ve ever felt on these scales was Yu Ji-won’s feelings, but…”

“And?”

“…Compared to that, this is ten times heavier. No, even heavier than that. I mean, I’m wondering if there’s any price in the entire world that can match this weight.”

Silence.

After about twenty seconds…

THUD!

Seo-rin slammed the table with her fist and stood up.

“Hey, Undertaker! Isn’t this just ridiculous?! How can you fail to save the world even after 1,000 cycles?!”

“Look, don’t shout at me about that.”

“Who else can I shout at?!”

“This is… it’s the Anomalies’ fault, Seo-rin. There’s no way I could be that incompetent!”

“Seriously! It was all so romantic until we kissed!”

“You started it!”

“Huh? Are you for real? You were basically begging me for a kiss—like, ‘Even if the world burns. Even if you turn into an Anomaly. I’ll always be by your side forever!’ Everyone could see you were craving a kiss!”

“I never dealt with you out of that kind of selfish desire! Not once!”

“That’s even worse, you idiot!”

Hmm.

I wished I could plug my ears, but “I” wasn’t free to do so.

It was depressing.

The two of them bickered for quite a while. At length, after this petty fight that dragged both human and Anomaly down to a cringe level, they finally pressed their foreheads together in all seriousness.

“My remaining lifespan... Yep,not enough. Ugh, maybe we’re not offering the right sort of price...”

“What if we add my lifespan?”

“Still nowhere near enough. And it feels like the ‘type’ is mismatched. I tried throwing in the entire lifespans of Busan’s citizens just as a test, and the scale didn’t even budge.”

“Wow.”

“Feels like it’s too much of a cheat code or something. So what do we do?”

They tried various experiments, but that golden scale, which had tilted violently to one side, didn’t so much as twitch.

Then—

The Undertaker parted his lips.

“Dang Seo-rin, I need to confess something.”

“A confession? About what?”

“To be honest, even if you had killed me a moment ago, I would have accepted it without any regrets.”

She looked at me. Facing her gaze, dark as the night sky, the Undertaker continued.

“If our life ended there, I would have been able to accept it... Mind if I ask if you feel the same?”

“Yeah.”

Her answer came immediately.

“I do… I feel just like you do.”

“Then—” The Undertaker inhaled. “I’ll offer up my memories as the price.”

Ah.

“Your memories?”

“Yes. The biggest problem with summoning my future self is that I’d acquire far too much knowledge in the present. But even if I do acquire knowledge, if I wipe out my memory of having acquired it —”

“Ah.”

“Then maybe it won’t be seen as such a cheat code. We’ll just forget we ever summoned the me of the 1,000th cycle.”

“Wait, so…” Seo-rin trailed off, scrunching her brow. “Let’s see if I’ve got this right: We bring in your future self and ask him a bunch of questions. But then we treat it like none of that ever happened, erasing the fact we asked him in the first place?”

The Undertaker nodded. “Exactly. To me, the 173rd cycle ends here. Actually, it ended the moment we kissed… I’ll erase all memory that we had this conversation. And anything that happens after we summon the me of the 1,000th cycle, any actions or discussion, all of it goes away from my memory.”

“Even if you do… what good does it do for you? Without memories, it’s basically the same as death. No different from dying. Even if you go to the trouble of summoning your future self, it’s pointless.”

“Pointless for me, sure.”

His quiet murmur.

“But it might matter to the Undertaker of the 1,000th cycle… And to the Dang Seo-rin of the 1,000th cycle. And to all of us, and all of humanity.”

Gently, the Undertaker reached out and clasped Seo-rin's hand.

"Dang Seo-rin, watch over my death."

There was a brief silence. Then a sorrowful smile.

"Gladly."

Seo-rin's palm blanketed over the back of my hand, her whisper drifting over our interlaced fingers.

"I, Dang Seo-rin, hereby declare. On the left side of the scales, I place the body, mind, and consciousness of the Undertaker now before me."

With each word—body, mind, consciousness—the scale shifted slightly. Even then, the scales had yet to balance.

"And also, every single event that will happen from now on, in this so-called 173rd cycle... Undertaker forfeits his right to remember them."

The left scale rose a little higher. But balance had still not been achieved.

The master of Utopia whispered.

"And even his time spent together with me... He forgets it all."

At that, the two sides of that golden scale, which seemed like they'd never even out, finally reached equilibrium.

Equivalent Exchange. A power that only a Fallen Dang Seo-rin at the pinnacle could wield.

Beneath the night sky, the witch's scales shone golden like a constellation.

The weight was balanced.

Chapter 352

The Missing IV

Sinnoa

“Undertaker. Even now, you could still back out,” Seo-rin said.

At this point, the golden scales were pouring light onto her shoulder. Her face, turned halfway toward me, was partly hidden in shadow.

“We could just laugh, chat...”

“Travel together?”

“Yeah. We could spend the rest of this world—this 173rd cycle—together until it ends in destruction.” When I didn’t respond, she continued, “And that’s not all. If you don’t lose your memories here, at least you’d walk away with the knowledge that you fail all the way up to the 1000th cycle, right?”

She made a valid point. And yet when I looked into her eyes, I sensed a pitch-black current swirling in the well of her logic.

She was afraid.

Of what, you might ask? Afraid that the feelings we had managed to share here in the 173rd cycle would vanish so quickly and pointlessly.

It was a good instinct. In the next cycle, I’d be extra cautious to protect the National Road Management Corps so its commander wouldn’t meet a tragic end, and I’d set up all sorts of guardrails so Dang Seo-rin wouldn’t fall into Corruption.

This life is only for this cycle.

The 173rd-cycle Undertaker squeezed Seo-rin’s hand. Perhaps he felt the same.

“Don’t think of it that way, Great Witch. You’re not parting ways with me—just the opposite. You get to meet the Undertaker of the 1000th cycle. Isn’t that lucky?”

She blinked. “What?”

“No person is eternal. Our personalities, habits, humanity—they can all change. In other words, this is an opportunity. You get to see what the man you gave your heart to becomes after a few thousand years. That’s like a special event... So there’s no reason to be sad. If anything, you should be excited. Even in this vast world, who else but you would get invited to an adventure like this?”

A bemused huff escaped Seo-rin. “You call that a farewell line? There’s no trace of romance in it at all!”

“But it made you laugh, right?”

“I only laughed ’cause it was so ridiculous! You’re really something when it comes to ruining the mood. You go on about Three Kingdoms all the time just to sound old and keep people from getting too friendly, don’t you?”

“Ah, you’ve caught me.”

“...Idiot.” She waved her hand. “Just get going, already.”

At that, threads of gold poured out from the Undertaker’s chest and were sucked into the scales. His life in the 173rd cycle, his mind, the rights to his memories—they absorbed it all until his eyes lost their playful sparkle and grew vacant in a sort of suspended-animation state. Seo-rin’s expression fell into sorrow as she watched.

‘Ah.’

Simultaneously, the same change occurred in me—I went from floating around like a ghostly observer, separate from “Undertaker,” to suddenly feeling a violent pull. The golden light from the magical scales flared, illuminating the entire night sky and pouring into the empty shell of “the Undertaker.”

And then, my head was spinning. It felt like I'd broken the surface after diving in deep water. The next instant, I was looking at Seo-rin not from the perspective of a spirit but directly, with my very own eyes.

My self from the 999th cycle had truly "possessed" the 173rd-cycle Undertaker's body.

A tense silence settled over the terrace atop the Tower of Babel.

It was a truly strange encounter. On one side was the Great Witch, still thinking and acting human yet controlling this Utopia city as if it were her limbs—a thoroughly Corrupted being. On the other side was the Regressor of the 999th cycle: a being who might be even closer to an Anomaly than the Great Witch, depending on how you looked at it. Both were doing their best to mimic humans, and in that sense, they were alike.

'She's on guard.'

I didn't feel offended. From Seo-rin's perspective, the me of the 999th cycle was an unknown entity. Depending on how things went, she might need to use all her powers to confront me.

The stillness of silence broke as my lips abruptly parted.

"Sometimes, those shallow Wippa or dimwitted brother—"

A blink.

"—slur the governor's name and call him a hypocrite, but that's downright blasphemous. The governor was imperfect, just like any other human, yet he pressed forward, worrying about everyone's morality. And in the end, he admitted even his own mistakes! How dare those brats like Aman compare themselves to him?"

Another.

"Anyone who disses the Governor is either a child who hasn't lived long enough to realize human imperfection, or a narcissist who'll never become truly human no matter how long they live!"

Then one more.

Dang Seo-rin's expression shifted from wariness to confusion, then realization and scorn, and finally, she breathed out a sigh—one of relief.

She lowered her broom with a slow, casual motion. "Welcome, Undertaker."

"Mm."

"Even after tens of thousands of years, you're still going on about that?"

My sincerity had been proven.

Dang Seo-rin and I—two problem children but the strongest in the world—joined forces. No one in the 173rd-cycle world could stand against us.

"But why is it you from the 999th cycle, not the 1000th cycle?"

"I have a theory."

We spent the whole night on the terrace—it wasn't like any of us actually needed sleep, anyway—holding a strategy meeting.

"A theory?" she echoed. "Let's hear it."

"I think that the moment I got summoned and possessed this body, that might've turned this world into what we'll call my '1000th cycle.'"

"Huh?"

I called it a theory, but I was nearly certain. "Think about it, Seo-rin. The 'Undertaker of the 173rd cycle' just died. And the 'Undertaker of the 999th cycle' left his own world behind to come back into this other past timeline. You could say it's a bonus stage or maybe a 1000th stage."

“Heh. That does make sense.”

“But strictly speaking, it isn’t a proper 1000th cycle so much as a bonus stage. We’ve distorted the timeline.”

A hidden history, not the official record. A side story rather than the main story.

Still, I had no clue why we ended up alone in a world empty of everyone else right before I was pulled here. But in this messy Void, mysteries are never in short supply. Maybe we’d find clues later.

“So? You sacrificed your soul to summon your future self, so this must be a pretty big plan. What devious scheme is the Undertaker of the 1000th cycle plotting?”

“Like I said, this is a bonus stage.”

I petted Blackie.

Oh, right. Blackie was the cat that Seo-rin was raising in this cycle. It looked like a normal cat, one befitting the commander of the National Road Management Corps.

“I can pull off strategies here that would be impossible in the real 1000th cycle, like using Aura infinitely,” I offered by way of example.

“Huh? Aura? What about it?”

“Well, Ji-won actually...”

After hearing the truth about the silver-haired psychopath and the nature of Aura, Seo-rin’s face contorted in shock.

“N-no way! Yu Ji-won? Our operations officer is the one who controls all the Aura in this world?!”

“Not ‘controls’ exactly. She more acts as the caretaker. Anyway, that’s the gist of it.”

“You’re kidding! But she... she once got caught killing cats, and we forced her to get personality readjustment via the golden scales…”

“She planned it, obviously—to avoid letting either of us suspect her real identity. She got her ‘safe’ status certified, so to speak.”

“This is crazy…”

Blackie meowed on my lap. Thanks to my regressor’s mastery of cat-petting (I’d memorized all the sweet spots through countless cycles), it had long since hit 100 favorability toward me.

“And that’s not the end of it. Yo-hwa, well… Actually, there’s a being with the same name who’s both a human and an Anomaly.”

Seo-rin tilted her head. “Huh? I know Lieutenant Cheon Yo-hwa quite well.”

“They’re homonyms in Korean, but the hanja are different.[1] Anyway, that person is both the ‘Infinite Void’ and a shrine maiden to the Hidden Mastermind—”

I was cut off as a commotion broke somewhere beneath the Tower of Babel.

“Hey, come on! Let me through!”

“Even if you’re from the National Road Management Corps, you still can’t just barge onto the terrace!”

“But I really have urgent news for Commander Dang!”

“We still have regulations—”

“Ugh! Would I come all the way here during a festival if it weren’t critical?! If I don’t report this now, our city is doomed! Doomed, you hear me?! If we’re late reporting this and everything goes to hell, are you gonna take responsibility?!”

“W-well…”

The rowdy atmosphere from the Utopia fireworks festival below seemed to be rising to our floor. Seo-rin furrowed her pale brow.

“What is this?” she wondered. “I specifically told everyone not to come up here until after tomorrow afternoon.”

“Uh…”

She looked pretty annoyed, but I could only blink in like a dazed frog.

The voice drifting up the stairs was awfully, painfully, infuriatingly familiar.

“That’s…”

The real question was “why” and “how” did that person appear here now?

An unbearable curiosity filled my chest.

“Sorry, Seo-rin. I think that’s an acquaintance of mine.”

“What? An acquaintance? Of yours?” The expression on her face translated loosely to “no way” in human language. “The only person you’re close with these days is OldManGoryeo. You two have basically set up a whole private corner on SG Net.”

Ah, right… In the 173rd cycle, practically everyone in Utopia had completed Dang Seo-rin’s Personality Correction program. They sincerely believed that participating in “community stuff” was just a waste of life, time that could be spent reading intellectual books instead.

Truly fitting for a Fallen One—a veritable Anomaly.

Feeling oddly nostalgic, I said, “Let them in. She must have something urgent to say.”

“…If you say so.”

Seo-rin waved a hand, and the magic activated shockingly easily. The locked iron door opened, and the troublemaker below was pulled in by some invisible force.

“Wah, huh?! Hiyaaaaaah!”

Dangling in midair, the person who was magically summoned sported short red hair and exuded a certain Aura of “utter newbie” from head to toe.

There was no hiding it.

“O-oh, mister!”

She flailed about in the air but somehow managed to meet my gaze with desperate eyes.

We’d collectively agreed to call this hopeless being “Oh Dok-seo.”

Dok-seo was thrashing around, but her eyes brimmed with genuine relief when she saw me.

“Mister, it’s you, right? Right?! I’m so scared! I opened my eyes and found myself in this weird-ass place and—! And—! I looked all over Busan, and everything was totally different except for the Tower of Babel! What the hell is going on?!”

Seo-rin’s scowl deepened at the word “mister.”

“You…” she began warily. “Aren’t you a librarian under the Forbidden Books Department of the National Road Management Corps? I don’t remember your name. Is that right?”

“Uh, y-yeah! Yeah! Seo-rin unnie, it’s me! Me!”

“Unnie…?”

Seo-rin looked perplexed—a perfectly natural response. Dok-seo wouldn’t formally join the Regressor Alliance until after the 555th cycle. It was only the 173rd cycle now.

So to “the Undertaker” and “Dang Seo-rin” of this time, Oh Dok-seo was no more than a total extra.

‘Though the fact she remembers Dok-seo’s affiliation is so like Seo-rin,’ I mused inwardly.

Back in her days as Guild Leader of the Samcheon World, Dang Seo-rin memorized every guild member's name and family situation. By the 173rd cycle, in which she also held the commander post, she couldn't pull off quite that same feat, but it seemed she remembered the basics.

Anyway.

"Since we're basically strangers, calling me unnie at first sight is a gutsy move. You've got nerve, kid—I'll grant you that much."

"No, no. Wait, Seo-rin," I rushed out.

"Huh?"

"That kid... That little newbie is definitely not the 173rd-cycle staffer from the Forbidden Books Department. She probably got dragged here from the 999th cycle, just like me."

Seo-rin's eyes went wide. "What? You're telling me that in the 999th cycle, she calls me unnie?"

"Well, among our members, she's basically the youngest in spirit..."

"Uwaaah! M-mister, you're still normal—hic! I'm so, so glad! If you were all weird too, then I— I... "

For the record, the actual youngest is Lee Ha-yul in terms of physical age. Naturally, in no cycle did Ha-yul ever treat Dok-seo like a big sister. Whether she considered her even human was questionable.

"What is going on...?"

Confusion rippled through me.

I understood why I got pulled back to the past. The Undertaker of the 173rd cycle made countless sacrifices and used Dang Seo-rin's powers as a Fallen One to summon me and my "future knowledge" for a time. But there was no reason to drag Oh Dok-seo along. None at all.

So why?

Seo-rin let out a long breath. “Looks like this isn’t the right time for you and me to relax over drinks. I’ll summon Ji-won and the other deputy directors from the National Road Management Corps. Sure, it’s late at night, but they don’t sleep much, anyway. There’s no threat of a Monster Wave attack, so…”

“Huh?” I tilted my head. “Deputy directors—plural? In this cycle, didn’t Yo-hwa alone serve as Deputy Director?”

“Um? Oh, yeah, that’s correct. Cheon Yo-hwa.”

I looked at her in confusion, and she mirrored that confusion right back at me. We’d exchanged the same line, but our interpretations differed somehow.

I repeated my question. “So there’s only one deputy director named Cheon Yo-hwa, right? Did you appoint another one without me noticing?”

“…What are you talking about?” Seo-rin frowned, clearly puzzled. “To win over Baekhwa Girls’ High Guild, you proposed we recruit their two top members into the National Road Management Corps. That was your idea, Undertaker.”

Thump—my heart gave a jolt.

“Two top members? But from what I remember, Baekhwa Girls’ High was basically a dictatorship under Student Council President Cheon Yo-hwa.”

“…You’ve been saying weird stuff all night when it comes to the Cheon Yo-hwa business.”

Seo-rin’s lips seemed to part very slowly.

“Student Council President Cheon Yo-hwa and Secretary Cheon Yo-hwa. Those two governed Baekhwa Girls’ High together as twin sisters. Right now, they both serve as deputy directors for us.”

That’s right.

It wasn’t until the 688th cycle that Cheon Yo-hwa sealed away the Mastermind and erased herself in the process.

For the present time, the older twin sister was still alive.

Footnotes:

1 - In other words, they’re spelled the same way in Korean and sound the same, but the Chinese characters that define their meaning differ.

Chapter 353

The Missing V

Sinnoa

“Hey there, Teacher! Huh? What’s with the gloomy face? Oh—don’t tell me you finally got sick of our great witchly leader, the commander of the National Road Management Corps?”

“Aww, unnie, come on, like that’s possible! Teacher’s such a magnanimous soul that he embraces even the lowliest of dropouts. You can tell from how he let those people, who literally go around cosplaying as witches every single day, all year round, acting like it’s always Halloween, join the National Road Management Corps. That’s all the proof you need of his generosity.”

“Ah—chaa. I guess I wasn’t thinking straight. No matter how ugly or vile the vermin are, Teacher still won’t cast them out. It’s a level of magnanimity beyond any normal imagination!”

“Mhm. Don’t beat yourself up, unnie... Actually, I have a little confession to make.”

“Huh? What is it, little sister?”

“Well, every time I climb the Tower of Babel and see all those pointy witch hats bustling around, I completely lose faith in humanity... so today while going up the stairs, I snagged three witch hats and chucked them out the window.”

“Good grief! We still have a lot of spiritual training to do, little sister!”

“Mm. We just can’t keep up with the speed of this world...”

“Indeed, pitiful dropouts like us can only rely on Teacher to guide us!”

“Teacher. I’m ready to endure 500 times more reading of the Romance of the Three Kingdoms in its original classical Chinese. Please watch over me!”

I went blank.

It was almost impossible to believe these two were people who’d been summoned at 2 AM. Their tension level was somewhere in another dimension. And those two in question...

A pair of twins.

Old-fashioned as it sounds, they really looked like a “perfectly symmetrical butterfly’s wings,” a classic decalcomania.

Bright orange hair. Red eyes. Aside from one wearing a pure white uniform and the other wearing solid black, there was no telling them apart by appearance alone.

“Yo-hwa...?”

I choked out their name through my tight throat.

The already high-energy twins grabbed each other’s hands with a flourish and struck a pose.

“Yayyy!”

“The two sisters are problem kids but the strongest!”

“Who would have guessed that of the tens of millions of cults on the Korean Peninsula, the final surviving sect would belong not to Christianity or Buddhism, but to Taoism? Who could have imagined?”

“The Yo-hwa–Yo-hwa ☆ Sisters have arrived!”

“Yayyy!”

They high-fived each other.

Then silence.

Again, note that it was 2 AM.

Even though it was technically festival night, in Utopia—a city of upright, well-regulated citizens—most people were fast asleep. Thus, our surroundings were dead quiet.

Beside me, Seo-rin let out a sigh as long as an anaconda.

“Ugh, that’s exactly why I didn’t want to call these lunatic sisters...”

Truthfully, I was even more flustered. “What’s up with them, anyway?”

It was bizarre.

The younger Cheon Yo-hwa sister was famous for always smiling no matter where or when, but she’d never been quite this hyper. She was more the type to stab someone with a smile on her face. And the same went for the elder sister Cheon Yo-hwa. Even back when she was the Infinite Void, and later sealed in that four-season classroom by Time Seal, she was always sly and inscrutable, not this openly frenetic.

They really were shrine maidens from a suspicious cult, so their attitude seemed fittingly shady.

But... well. Seeing them together for the first time, side by side, gave off a whole different vibe. It was like an RPG: If the two appear as bosses, one is only vulnerable to magic attacks, the other only to physical, and if you don’t knock them out on the same turn, they resurrect infinitely. That sort of vibe.

“Hey, Teacher, Teacher.”

One sister linked arms with me on the left.

“Hey, Teacher, Teacher.”

The other sister latched onto my right arm.

“Which one of us do you think is Yo-hwa?”

“Wait! That naive idea of identifying us by uniform color... Mm, that’s not good. Not good at all...”

“How do you know we didn’t swap outfits in preparation for exactly this scenario?”

“Even if you factor in our manner of speech, perfume, all that, you’d be underestimating our intellect if you tried pegging us down that way, Teacher.”

“What are you saying, unnie? You can’t call him ‘Teacher!’ I’m the older one!”

“Huh? Why are you saying that, little sister? My memory of hearing your first cry the moment after I was born is still perfectly vivid—are you committing some betrayal now?”

“Waaah, boohoo, waaa...”

“Oh gosh, how adorable! You’re still my little sister! You look exactly like me, how cute, how precious! I want to nibble you up...”

“Let’s not cross any lines.”

“Yes, unnie.”

Someone began to lilt out a sigh.

Ah... ahhh... aah.

“My energy... my energy is draining away!”

I looked to my side to see Seo-rin—and immediately felt her feelings resonated with mine in pitch-perfect tune. She wore the face of someone forced to endure tedium beyond measure.

No doubt about it. These twin sisters must have secretly installed nuclear power plants in their throats, evading the supervision of the IAEA. If left unchecked, they’d chatter on forever.

“Hmm.” Ji-won, also summoned here at an ungodly hour, stroked her chin. “How fascinating.”

Her bluish-purple eyes seemed to quietly, carefully watch my every move. Maybe because this 173rd cycle’s Yu Ji-won had undergone “personality correction” from Dang Seo-rin, her expression gave off a strangely human vibe.

“It’s peculiar,” she remarked. “Under normal circumstances, Your Excellency the Undertaker would chime in with them, but now he’s just silent.”

“What...? You think I’d jump into this crazy mess?”

“Huh? Yes, of course. If I may use a metaphor you’d understand, the two sisters were Rosa and Roy, and you were their cat, Nyaong.”

Seriously? Wasn’t the 173rd cycle supposed to be a constant “serious route?” Just who was my past self, anyway?

Moving on, they weren’t the only ones summoned to the Tower of Babel main building.

Ha-yul’s eyes were drooping closed out of drowsiness, her head nodding as if playing seesaw, while Ah-ryeon stood there in her normal (filthy) everyday clothes, staring intently at me until she at last opened her mouth to say...

“Wh-who are you?”

Everyone on the terrace turned to look at Ah-ryeon. Even the twin sisters, still clinging to either side of my arms, fell silent.

“Huh? Who is he? He’s Teacher.”

“Wellllll... He looks like the guild leader, but, um, he feels a bit different... Huh-hum. Very, very different.” Ah-ryeon shook her head violently. “S— so... wh-who are you?”

“Wait, I said he’s Teacher—”

“Stop. That’s irritating... Would you please shut up?”

The night air grew chilly.

Someone sucked in a breath: Dok-seo, crouched anxiously in the corner of the terrace. Even Ha-yul, who’d been napping against a cushion, was blinking awake and staring at Ah-ryeon.

The twins' transformation was dramatic as well. Where they'd been all smiles a moment ago, now their faces went blank. Quietly, those four red eyes with fuzzy boundaries between iris and pupil gazed at Ah-ryeon, wordlessly.

Like insect eyes.

Ah-ryeon, normally the most sensitive to others' gazes, was behaving differently right now. She didn't respond at all to the collective stares, only keeping her focus on me.

Suddenly, it hit me. That abnormally high tension from the twins might have been their flailing attempt to stir up a little warmth among the members, each of whom harbored a piece of the Void, so to speak.

'In the days before Dok-seo joined us...'

After the 555th cycle, things changed.

Dok-seo always roomed with Ah-ryeon, who was perpetually drifting on the outskirts of the group. She even got mild scolding from the ever-serious Saintess. She chatted frequently with the perpetually stoic Ha-yul. She also made a point of following after Seo Gyu when he withdrew from the others to keep them safe from his personal issues.

She got along awkwardly with Yo-hwa, but she never avoided talking to her—she just got verbally smacked around for her trouble.

She even clung to Do-hwa and teased, "Wow, Old Undertaker x Commander pairing! The black-and-black couple is the best!" The type of reckless remark that only LiteraryGirl could make.

All told, the relationships between the current group members were precarious. They were all cursed souls, each just one step from slipping into Corruption. And in that group, Oh Dok-seo was like a clown—a jester among the Regressor Alliance.

After all, weren't writers historically once called minstrels in the earliest days—a sort of clown in a way?

'I see.'

It cast new light on why my 173rd-cycle self might have played along with the twins' antics.

I broke the silence. "Here's a question. My dear members of the Regressor Alliance. You mostly remember that it's the 173rd cycle right now. In your opinion, how many cycles do you think it'll take to save the world without error?"

"Ah... Teacher, you're quite talented, so even if it takes a while... maybe around the 300th cycle?"

"Hey, unnie, think about Teacher's mental health. Let's be generous and say 350 cycles! By the way, let me come along on vacation next time, Teacher!"

[Monster Wave has been wiped out. All that's left is the Admin of the Infinite Metagame. We figure 200 cycles total.]

"I also side with Ha-yul's opinion. It shouldn't be much longer before Undertaker becomes our true savior."

Hmm. Putting on a resolute face, I said, "Here comes the correct answer."

I took a deep breath.

"It failed. It failed, failed, failed, failed, failed, failed, failed, failed, failed, failed."

...

...?

???

The question marks floating above their heads gradually evolved and grow in number, a bold challenge to Korean spelling conventions.

“We achieved absolutely nothing!”

????????

Silence.

All of them clammed up. Dok-seo, who’d been quiet as a mouse the entire time, suddenly relaxed and got chatty.

“Wow, mister... You just did that coming out thing from Attack on Titan, right? After all, Steins;Gate was a time-loop story, and Attack on Titan once had fan theories that it was a loop story too! So it’s a kind of self-referential metaphor for our current predicament, yeah? Haha. That’s quite impressive... but you’re dealing with a grand literary mind like me, so let’s keep it moderate!”

Exactly 12 seconds earlier, the terrace at Babel Tower headquarters had been abuzz in uproar.

“Um, Teacher. Let me see if I’m understanding this right.”

“Go ahead, Yo-hwa. It’s still a bit weird for me to see you and your sister together, but I’ll try my best to ignore that.”

“Ugh, that only complicates things more, so let’s set that aside! Anyway!” Cheon Yo-hwa spun around. “So, Oh Dok-seo? Ms. Dok-seo? You have a power called Side Story Creation. Because you used it in front of all of us in the future, you ended up coming here to the 173rd cycle from the 999th. Is that correct?”

“Uh, y-yeah... that’s right.”

“And Teacher used the Great Witch’s golden scales of Equivalent Exchange, sacrificing ‘his current life and memories’ to bring in ‘future knowledge.’”

“Precisely.”

Cheon Yo-hwa sighed and pressed her hand to her forehead. “What on earth is going on...?"

The members of the Regressor Alliance each sank into their own thoughts, trying to process all this. They were likely struggling to digest these impossible events.

[That was quite a wise decision.]

The one with the most free time, the Saintess, finished collecting her thoughts first. Apparently, she'd been quiet so far because she'd promised Seo-rin she wouldn't use Clairvoyance at all today. But seeing the entire Alliance gather like this, she'd gone back on that and was now speaking via Telepathy.

[According to Mr. Undertaker's explanation, the more cycles we go through, the harder the clear condition becomes. The usage of Aura is eventually restricted as well.]

Though not physically present, everyone listened to her Telepathic voice.

[And if the older Ms. Cheon Yo-hwa falls out...]

The group's gaze fell on the twins. They'd been sitting on a bench, hands tightly clasped together.

[That would be a serious blow, indeed. In essence, we'd lose the brains of our central strike force in the Korean Peninsula. Though from what we've heard about the Outer God known as the Mastermind, her sacrifice is definitely worth it.]

"...Unnie."

The younger twin looked worried, but the older one had no answer. Strictly speaking, she seemed lost in very deep thought and pointedly kept her gaze fixed on empty air to ponder to herself silently.

"Hmm."

The next one to gather her wits was Ji-won.

“I have a question. Ms. Dok-seo, does Side Story Creation usually allow you to hop between past cycles like this?”

“Uh— Oh, no way! All it ever did was let me ‘download’ someone else’s personality. Like, tbh, I have no idea what’s going on or how it happened...”

“I see.”

For a fleeting moment, I caught a glimpse of disappointment in Ji-won’s eyes.

An unstoppable desire surged up from my stomach.

“So, Ji-won... You might not have told us yet that you’re the Leviathan’s Miko, but eventually you open up to everyone, so no need to fret.”

“What do you mean, exactly? I was planning to inform everyone in due course.”

“Oh, so it wasn’t just a matter of being content to let Awakeners keep training Aura, thus strengthening Leviathan and your powers, like some sort of ‘auto-hunt is sweet’ approach?”

“Good heavens, of course not. Your Excellency, I wasn’t aware of the Outer God’s identity either. Leviathan? That’s horrifying.”

“Right? By the way, I’m Mr. Matiz.”

“...Excuse me?”

“You remember that spot wasn’t actually Dobongsan, right? Took me a while to recall.”

I diverted the conversation by saying, “The Saintess is correct. This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. We can figure out exactly how this miracle happened later.”

“Excuse me, Your Excellency the Undertaker, sir? ‘Mr. Matiz?’ What exactly—”

“I’ll be forgetting everything that happens from now on, anyway. The summoning was premised on my forgetting. That’s how it works.”

“Your Excellency the Undertaker? Are you listening, sir?”

“But that doesn’t mean my actions from here on are meaningless. I want to seize this chance to muster our maximum fighting force and hunt down the Outer God we can only defeat right now.”

“Sir, please listen to me!”

I glanced around. Seo-rin, who’d been quietly waiting for everyone to catch up, finally spoke. “So which Outer God is it that we can only defeat now, Undertaker?”

“The Goddess of Night.” I bit down on my anger as it bubbled up from my heart. “Nut.”

Looking around, I explained, “Mirror realms. The geocentric worldview. The Eye of Horus. An Anomaly so powerful it treats regression like a mere virus, capable of distributing it across existence. It has so many titles, but we still haven’t pinned down its true nature. And…”

I looked up at the night sky. As always, the moon shone brightly, a pristine sphere untainted by the messy chaos below.

“Just like Cheon Yo-hwa sacrificed herself to seal the Hidden Mastermind, and how the Saintess once gave herself to freeze time —”

[…]

“I’m convinced that here, in this ephemeral bonus stage, this short-lived vantage point, we have to launch a surprise strike against that one.”

A small hush fell.

Seo-rin nodded. “Sure. If it’s that formidable of an enemy, you’re wise to strike it early, now that I’ve gone Corrupt.”

“Thanks for understanding.”

“Mm. By the way, you might want to answer Ji-won soon. She’s giving off an Aura that’s… Well, it seems quite concerning…”

“Oh.”

Breaking news: Yu Ji-won had narrowly avoided Corruption by a hair.

Chapter 354

The Missing VI

Sinnoa

The readers' fiery wrath that once set SG Net ablaze had faded. The stone tablets announcing the hiatus lay forgotten beneath the East Sea. In an era where no one cared about such things, Corruption had become nothing more than a cheap joke.

Such was the world we lived in.

An author was strolling through the city.

"You know what, mister? When I think about it, I had absolutely no reason to panic."

"Yeah?"

"I mean, this is before the 555th cycle! Before the SG-Net Novel-Serialization Board even existed! We're in the prehistoric, primitive days before I ever debuted under the pen name LiteraryGirl. Which means... can you guess what?"

Dok-seo laughed.

Considering we'd just pulled an all-night marathon meeting with the Regressor Alliance—partly to stop Ji-won from Falling—Dok-seo's smile was almost unnaturally fresh.

Under the clear dawn sky, she tipped her forehead toward the light slowly brightening Utopia's horizon and declared, "I... I am totally, utterly free from serialization now! Ahhh, this air! The sweet nostalgia of Utopia! Mmmm, sooo delicious. Is this what the air of a world without readers smells like? Ooooh! Positively scrumptious!"

"...Right."

"Wait, no, no. mister! Let's just dig up the entire Novel Serialization Board. Then, come the 999th cycle, I'll steal all the chapters Ah-ryeon unnie was publishing and dump them online in one shot! Ka-yaaah. She'll see them, right? She'll probably leave nasty comments without even realizing they were her own words. Then... I'll capture every last hate post! And reveal, 'Surprise, that was actually your future manuscript!' Ka-hyaaaa! Pure, soda-pop justice! I can't wait to see the look on her face!"

I honestly had no idea what kind of face I should be making. Sadly, no abused kid beside me would murmur, "Just smile." Only a chuunibyou with a lethal case who was busy abusing the whole world.

It was never easy.

The takeaway from last night's meeting was simple:

『Attack Nut.』

Nut, the Night Goddess—an Outer-God-class Anomaly.

Her compatibility with a regressor like me was the worst. The Saintess had to Fall and even sacrifice herself just to barely seal her away, and even that was only a seal, nothing more. A method for a complete kill was still nowhere in sight.

"Sorry, sunbae. None of us have ever faced Nut directly, so it's hard to wrap our heads around it," said Cheon Yo-hwa, the older of the twin sisters.

A few days ago, she'd looked lost in deep thought throughout the meeting, but maybe she'd finally sorted it out in her head.

"Haha, honestly, it's a little overwhelming. You dumped so much future intel on us that my brain's about to fry."

"Mhm."

"Still, overwhelming doesn't mean bad. From humanity's point of view, I'd say we've never had a more decisive opportunity." Cheon Yo-hwa raised her ballpoint pen and clicked. "So, tell me about Nut, sunbae. Like always, let's craft the op together."

We talked for a long time, enjoying the whole sunny café we'd rented out to avoid prying ears. Soon enough, I realized something.

'This kid not only knows the Anomalies inside out, she's got a deep grasp of my regressor abilities too. Smart.'

I already knew that, of course, but sitting here face-to-face hashing out strategies made it crystal clear: the elder Cheon Yo-hwa was sharp.

"The simplest route is to smack Saintess unnie with Time Seal. Nut would get sealed automatically."

"...Losing Clairvoyance, Telepathy, and the Constellations would hurt too much."

"True. But right before you save the world, and after you've wiped out every other Outer God except Nut, you could pop Time Seal, right? That'd be the final cycle, the very last moment. We wouldn't need Saintess unnie anymore."

She was also resolute. Not a flicker of hesitation, even while discussing a scenario where our comrades might vanish forever.

Did she read the look in my eyes?

Leaning her chin on her pen, Yo-hwa giggled awkwardly. "Mmm, I've been thinking about it for a while. This system that links Outer Gods to their Mikos, maybe it's tilted way, waaay in your favor, sunbae."

"...Pick a Miko, Corrupt her, fuse her with the Outer God, then fire off Time Seal."

"Yup." She smiled, then continued, "And that's not all. So far every Miko we know of happens to be clustered in Korea, right? Why? Sure, this land's always been catnip for cults, but isn't this a bit much? I've got my own theory, but let's stick to Nut for now. So, sunbae—no chance you'll seal Nut and Saintess unnie in the final cycle?"

“No chance.”

“Hmm.” Her red eyes narrowed. “Because you’re afraid she’ll get hurt? That’s harsh. You forget e-ver-y-thing about your adorable private student, even call her an Anomaly, but you can’t do the same to Saintess unnie? How’s that not favoritism?”

“...Sorry. It’s not feelings that make me reject that plan.”

“Then what?”

“Just a hunch, but Time Seal isn’t omnipotent.”

I laced my fingers together.

We were broaching a topic I’d discussed with no one, not even with Kim Ji-soo, Yu Ji-won’s adopted daughter, who’d later become the psychological counselor for the Regressor Alliance. Maybe the only person I could confess it to was the girl sitting across from me, the one destined to be hit by Time Seal.

“For starters, Yo-hwa, you yourself proved that Time Seal isn’t absolute.”

“Huh? Me?”

“Yeah. Using my quirk of remembering almost nothing from the 1st to the 4th cycles, you managed to regain a good chunk of your identity even inside the sealed realm. Suppose I seal every Miko and Outer God,” I proposed next. “Yo-hwa, what happens to me after that?”

“You’d become the god of the new world, of course.”

I sprang to my feet and, without a moment’s delay, launched into the Light Bakayaroid Dance.[1]

Yo-hwa exploded, powerless to resist. She spewed her coffee, hacking and coughing, tears streaming as she laughed her head off.

“Why, ah, pft, ugh, seriously! Gah! So unfair! How old even is that gag?! Why do I have to laugh at something so dumb?! You crazy, geriatric regressor!”

“You’re the one who cracked a joke during a serious discussion. Choose your words carefully if you don’t want this happening again,” I offered in solemn warning.

“Oh. Ohhh, wow. Seriously… Wow, sunbae. You’re a total nutcase. Fine, I, Cheon Yo-hwa—heir of the House of Cheon—admit it…”

TMI: this heir’s favorite work of all time is Death Note. She’s watched the musical not only in Korea but even on a pilgrimage to Japan. Her best boy is Ryuk, runner-up is Misa (reason: she looks easy to exploit like a little sister).

“I don’t want all our efforts to end with a single Outer God called ‘The Undertaker.’”

“Oh, come on. Quit it with the serious face—I can’t focus…”

“In the end, it wouldn’t be just Saintess unnie but me too. I’d have to lose my powers. But could we really cherry-pick so that only Time Seal stays while everything else disappears?”

I had no response to that.

“Even if I disappear, everything about me would vanish. A scenario where only Time Seal remains seems awfully unlikely. So we shouldn’t lean on it too heavily.” Yo-hwa put down her tear-soaked tissue.

“Like with Aura?”

“Exactly, like Aura.”

“Hmmm…”

With a click, the cap of her pen snapped shut.

“Then, sunbae, how about flipping it completely on its head?”

“Completely on its head?”

“Yup. You called this cycle your bonus stage, right? Then let’s Corrupt not just the Great Witch but the entire Regressor Alliance.”

What?

“Wait… Yo-hwa, what are you even saying?”

At last, Yo-hwa turned fully serious.

“From where I’m standing, you’re kinda scared of using your powers right now. Almost like trauma. The revelation that Aura was part of Leviathan hit you so hard that you’re holding back on your other abilities too… I’m not saying your strategy’s wrong. Just that you should be aware your thinking’s gotten stuck in a rut.”

Yo-hwa opened her notebook and scribbled a phrase.

Overwhelming power.

I found myself mouthing the words.

“Right,” she confirmed.

“With overwhelming power—”

“Absolutely everything—strategy, tactics, martial arts—becomes meaningless before true overwhelming power,” Yo-hwa coolly cut off my gag—proof that her learning capacity was intact. “That used to be your specialty. Grind Aura through endless regressions, then steamroll the enemy with that cheat code. Maybe it won’t work in the 999th cycle, but right now it’s still viable.”

“…Because right now, we’re in the special stage that’s both the 173rd cycle and the 1000th cycle.”

Yo-hwa grinned mischievously. “Exactly. Nut? Unknown, mysterious Anomaly? Scary? Yeah, who cares? Is she stronger than the Great Witch? Maybe. Is she stronger than Oh Dok-seo, who’s soaking in the Great Witch + Infinite Metagame buffs? Stronger than my sister, who drags out the Great Witch + Oh Dok-seo + Infinite Void’s authority? Stronger than me, the puppeteer pulling the strings? Stronger than Team Leader Yu Ji-won, who squeezes Leviathan's potential to the limit? Stronger than Saintess unnie, who freezes the entire world's time?"

Her crimson pupils met mine.

"And stronger than the Regressor who commands all those Fallen? Do we really think this mystery Outer God tops our full might?"

The answer was obvious.

"Not a chance."

A daring smile stole across her face. Instead of cowering before the Anomaly, she faced it with boundless confidence and rock-solid self-belief.

Such was the strategist sitting across from me.

"Crush it with brute force, sunbae. Only you can do it. And only in the destined-to-be-forgotten 173rd cycle can we pull off such reckless insanity. Let's show those Outer-God bastards—who fancy themselves masters of the universe—what happens when they mess with us."

My heart pounded.

It wasn't love. It wasn't fear.

It was closer to a child's sense of adventure—pure playfulness.

"...You're out of your mind."

Yet the corners of my mouth were already curling up.

"Maybe even truly insane. There's never been a cycle where that many Fallen emerged all at once."

"Yep," she chirped. "We might totally get wiped."

"Even if I call this a 'bonus stage,' the ripple effects on past and future events remain unknown. And you want to create the Fallen on purpose, unsealing Anomalies we've already defeated or locked away?"

"Yep. Dangerous, huh? One slip and our fallen Regressor Alliance members could start a civil war for control of the timeline. Worse than Rome."

"And the cleanup?"

"The almighty Regressor will figure it out somehow, right?"

"You're pitching this as an operation?"

"Yup." Yo-hwa's smile deepened. "But it's exciting, isn't it?"

Yeah.

Only now did I truly grasp the core of the girl before me. Calling her a strategist wasn't wrong, but it wasn't enough. Schemer fit a bit better, yet still missed the mark.

Gambler.

The elder Cheon Yo-hwa was simply addicted to gambling. Drop her into Romance of the Three Kingdoms, and she'd choose post-Liu Bei Shu just because "the win-rate's lowest and the dopamine's tastiest." Thanks to a lucky combo of sisterly love and a brilliant brain, that dopamine addict managed to pass for human.

"Let's do it, sunbae."

And who am I to hide it?

"The world's already doomed. Let's make it even messier!"

Like teacher, like student.

I'd been sitting at the cosmic poker table called destiny for a long, long time.

The simultaneous Fall of the entire Regressor Alliance.

Project Collapse — COMMENCE.

Footnotes:

1 - A meme of the final episode of Death Note, wherein the protagonist's final, unhinged rant is turned into a dance beat.

Chapter 355

The Missing VII

Sinnoa

In most works, regression is treated like a lopsided playing field that overwhelmingly favors the protagonist's side. Naturally, everyone except the regressor fails to notice the loop and just keeps treading water, which means only the regressor's allies get to monopolize every lucky break.

However, is regression truly advantageous to the protagonist alone?

"Truth is, regression benefits the enemy as well."

[Why is that?]

"Every time the cycle resets, the Anomalies we've already slain spring back to life. That's virtually immortality."

My counselor this time was the Saintess.

Noh Do-hwa was the one who always slammed on the brakes whenever the Regressor Alliance tried to barrel forward, so with her now gone, the Saintess had the final say on our plan in this 173rd cycle.

Project Collapse.

Since the scheme asked every member of the Alliance to fall into Corruption on purpose, we obviously had to win the Saintess over.

[I-I never thought of it that way.]

"It's a hardship only someone who has actually regressed can understand, Saintess."

After parting with Cheon Yo-hwa, I strolled through midday Utopia. Lively laughter echoed through the streets as children darted past with high-pitched giggles.

In that surprisingly peaceful post-apocalyptic afternoon, I traded Telepathic messages with the Saintess.

“Each cycle I have to infiltrate Baekhwa Girls’ High to catch Infinite Void, spending what feels like a year—sometimes ten—inside its prison of time.”

[Ah… You suffer so much.]

“The same goes for Ten Legs and Meteor Shower. I get infinite tries, and the Anomalies get infinite life-coins.”

And yet…

“Outer Gods like Infinite Metagame or Nut are different. Their partial immunity to regression… makes them vulnerable.”

The immunity they cultivated against me could be turned into a new opening. A weakness.

“If we wound Nut this time, it’ll carry that scar forever, cycles be damned.” I shrugged. “Just like I carry mine.”

[…]

“By sharing my heart with my comrades, I’ve secured spare hearts. An Outer God hasn’t—it’s fundamentally alone. Saintess, we won’t be the ones who collapse. They will.”

There was a small sigh.

[…If it’s to save the future me, it’s hard to refuse.]

“Then you consent?”

[Yes, provided we have safeguards so the Corrupted don’t end the world.]

“I already have a strategy for that.”

The first runner of Project Collapse was the silver-haired former psychopath. Now, thanks to the Golden Scales, she was a member who'd had humanity and emotions forcibly injected into her.

Yu Ji-won.

Even when I looked her way, Ji-won turned her head without a word. She'd stayed like that ever since my "regression coming-out" that night.

"C'mon, Ji-won, I said I'm sorry."

"Sorry? Please be more mindful of what you say, Your Excellency. How could a lowly, ignorant soldier like me deserve a personal apology for failing to recognise a regressor?"

In short, Lady Yu Ji-won was sulking.

I couldn't hide my dismay.

"Wow... I can't get used to this side of you. I know it was unromantic to blurt out I was Mr. Matiz on the spot, but—"

"It's fine. My birth parents never adapted to me either. Adding one more maladjusted person to my life changes nothing."

I, the Undertaker, warrior of 999 cycles, could handle Dang Seo-rin's tantrums or the Saintess's sulking any day.

Been there, done that.

But Yu Ji-won sulking? This was my first! After all, a humane Ji-won only exists in the 173rd cycle—a limited edition!

"What does our Ji-won like...?"

"Forgive me, Your Excellency. Even if we met in childhood, you can't keep treating me like a kid. Letting go of the past is something adults must learn."

"I said I'm sorry!"

“Are you shouting at me now?” Ji-won blinked. “My apologies. I’ve incurred Your Excellency’s wrath—why live any longer? I should die.”

“Ji-won! Please! I swear I’ll never spill the Matiz secret without romance again!”

“...Adding another disgrace to your dignity—why live any longer? I should die.”

“Ji-won, where is the pure, innocent girl from that summer...?”

“She’s dead. I should die too.”

“Please, just spare me...”

“Also, use that old perfume for the rest of your life.”

I froze. “Um... for life? Just this cycle?”

“Oh? So you plan to die after this cycle, Your Excellency? If you’ll abandon the world, why live any longer? I should die.”

“All right! All right! I’ll use that perfume until my regression ends. Will that appease you?”

“Excuse me? Are you suggesting I’m angry?”

Someone kill me...

Who would’ve thought that the comrade I assumed easiest to persuade—and easiest to Corrupt—turned out to be the trickiest.

So I quietly brewed the perfume.

“Hmm.” Ji-won inspected the seven-note fragrance like a picky civil servant approving paperwork, then nodded. “This suits you.”

“Right... Thanks.”

“Is that sincere—”

“Thank you, Ji-won! I’ll wear this forever! I’m thrilled!”

A nod. Approval earned.

Sometimes, a person without psychopathy is scarier than someone with it.

After learning that brutal truth, Project Collapse truly began.

Execution date: June 6, midnight.

That night, Ji-won climbed up onto the rooftop of the Tower of Babel, in an odd outfit: a school uniform.

For Dang Seo-rin's Operations Team Leader to wear a uniform of all things was sacrilege. Not only that, she'd even graduated long ago. How embarrassing.

"Whoa, team leader! Transferring to Baekhwa Girls' High?"

"Must... photograph! And archive on SG Net forever!"

The others teased her, but I kept silent.

It was the uniform of Shinseo Middle School, practically Miko robes to Ji-won. She'd first received Leviathan's possession in that attire.

Ji-won ignored the jokes and draped a white blanket over the uniform like a cape, then knelt quietly on the rooftop. I watched with the others, then it hit me:

I'd never seen Ji-won Fall before.

We observed from afar as her lips moved, her hands clasped in prayer.

"Thank you."

I tilted my head. Who was she talking to?

"Thank you for watching over me."

Ah.

To Leviathan.

She prayed to the colorless, odorless sea-dragon that had chosen her as priestess.

That, too, was a never-before-seen event. I'd never seen a Miko harbor gratitude for an Outer God.

"Thank you for letting me distinguish between people. For letting me see colors. For letting me smell."

Clearly, evenly, the silver-haired priestess offered her lone worship to the midnight sky.

"Thanks to you, someone like me could live among humans... The human heart was an unknowable well to me. Thank you for turning that nameless transparency into Aura I could see... But now, that's enough."

Ribbit.

Somewhere, a frog's cry rang out.

"I don't need to see them anymore."

Ribbit, ribbit.

I looked down. Citizens were gathering in the plaza, gazing up.

Ribbit.

The sound came from their mouths.

Though they should be asleep, more and more people flocked beneath the tower. Their mouths were gaping and their eyes were hollow, like wells whose rims had collapsed into darkness.

"I no longer wish to separate people by color, scent, or spirit."

Ribbit. Ribbit. Ribbit.

They did not move their tongues—only their uvulas bobbed. Even newborns stood upright, croaking ribbit with their throats alone.

“But if I may, my god.” Ji-won bowed her head. “Please leave me the color and scent of the single person precious to me…”

Ribbitribbitribbitribbitribbit.

“…and of the people precious to that person.”

At that instant, rain began to flow in streams—but not downward.

Upward.

“Eiyaaaah!” Ah-ryeon shrieked, clinging to my arm. “Their m-mouths— Look!”

No. With my sharper sight, I saw where the water truly took form.

It was their hair.

Drops seeped from every strand, from Unawakened and Awakened alike, looping around necks like nooses and then shooting skyward like ropes.

Ribbitribbitribbitribbit.

Color drained.

Black, brown, blond, red, blue—every vivid shade of post-apocalypse humanity melted into the water.

Desaturation.

[…My word,] muttered the Saintess. [It isn’t limited to Utopia. The few survivors across the peninsula are experiencing the same. The colors, Mr. Undertaker. Everyone’s hair is turning white.]

Humanity’s colors were being stripped away. Instead, the night sky, now soaked in their pigments, blazed with an aurora brighter than mankind.

As though saying we no longer need to look at humans, only at the sky.

Oddly, the aurora spilled scents as well as light. It was as if people’s bodily odors had also been stolen.

And yet...

“Uh... Huh?” Ah-ryeon peeked out from behind me. “I-I think... we’re fine?”

Yes.

Members of the Regression Alliance were exempt. While the aurora reaped every hue and fragrance from humanity, only we on the rooftop remained untouched.

I stared at the aurora above us for another moment, then spoke. “Ji-won’s prayer got through.”

“Ehhh.”

“Come to think of it, she has never once defied Leviathan. Unlike some, she’s been a devoted Miko. Leviathan must cherish her.”

Though she’d weaken the dragon by abstaining from Aura usage in the distant future, even that tactic was gentle. It lulled Leviathan, not killed it.

‘...Lulling a god to sleep is within a Miko’s role.’

When the rain ceased, I glanced at Seo-rin, who nodded. This city—the “Divine Realm that Shouldn’t Exist”—was hers, giving her a keen sense of just what had been sacrificed.

“The people of Utopia feel... devoid of individuality. Humanity excised—almost like AI. Their hair is all white, their scents gone.”

“Has your power suffered?”

“No. It’s annoying, but the sacrifices themselves are still recognised as mine. The god only took what it could claim.”

Ji-won rose, and the blanket slipped, revealing her true form. She’d shrunk—no—returned to the girl I met that summer.

She scanned us, nostrils twitching—an old habit of a girl born with prosopagnosia. Then she raised her hand.

“Dang Seo-rin… Sim Ah-ryeon… Cheon Yo-hwa. Cheon Yo-hwa. Lee Ha-yul. Oh Dok-seo. Seo Gyu.”

Like tracing the contours of existence, she named each person, then her finger halted at me.

“Mr. Matiz… Mr. Matiz.”

Those mirror-clear eyes held only me.

“Yes. My world needs nothing more.”

She clenched her fist, and the night sky rippled, curling with the soft curve of her fingers, and I knew it then:

The galaxy of Aura dyeing that sky, the palette of that virtually limitless aurora, had gathered into Ji-won’s grasp.

“Who’s next?”

Awakener: Yu Ji-won

Corrupted alias: Despot

Has joined the party.

Chapter 356

The Missing VIII

Sinnoa

Project Collapse.

Next up: the second, commemorative contender.

Ah-ryeon fussed with her fingers, her weed-colored hair hanging like willow branches. “Um, Guild Leader... isn’t the o-order here all wrong?”

“What’s wrong with it?”

“Well... my power only grows when I feed on people’s negative emotions, but... the t-team leader fell to Corruption first, so now there’s literally no one left who can hate me...”

“That doesn’t matter.”

The one who cut her off wasn’t me. It was Seo-rin.

The four of us—Ah-ryeon, Seo-rin, Dok-seo, and I—sat in a circle in a nearly pitch-black safe room, the single candle our only light, like middle-schoolers sneaking into a classroom for a séance.

“In my city, citizens gullible enough to chase low-rent villains like OldManGoryeo disappeared ages ago. Everyone’s living their best real life now.”

“Y-you devil! H-how can you say something so evil so casually? Those citizens of yours have all had their souls pawned away, they’re the Great Witch’s slaves! This place is hell!”

“If a place where kids like you run free is heaven, I’ll take hell any day.”

They traded barbs, but I honestly felt conflicted. On SG Net, Seo-rin was no less a villain than OldManGoryeo. In every cycle, Samcheon guild members passed around unwritten rules like “The moment the Great Witch posts, hit Like and rocket her to the front page!” and “Leave a comment on her posts!” and “If too many comments have the [Samcheon] tag, log out and comment as Anonymous!”

I remembered it all, clear as day. Even the girl in the corner nibbling her sandwich, Dok-seo, was an SG Net superstar.

So I was the only wholesome celebrity in this room—me, ZeroSugar…

The dark side of internet culture hit me anew.

“Hold on, Undertaker? Could you please explain why you’re looking at me like that?”

“Just worried I might be wasting too much of the city ruler’s precious time.” Before Seo-rin could fire back, I switched targets. “Ah-ryeon, like Seo-rin said, the moment Utopia was complete, emotions like resentment, contempt, or jealousy all but vanished from this place. The order doesn’t matter.”

“Th-then isn’t that even worse?” Ah-ryeon asked with quivering lips. “I’m already the outcast… I-I’ll get left behind. The Ops Team Leader, the Baekhwa High Sisters, even that chuuni kid suddenly acting all chummy—”

Dok-seo, who’d caught a stray for no reason, chomped her sandwich with a big question mark over her head.

“They’ll all Fall and their power level will be crazy high! I’ll be the only low-level left. Even you’ll ignore me, Guild Leader!”

I sent her a wry smile. “Don’t worry, Ah-ryeon. You’ve got me.”

“Huh…? And what does your existence have to do with my perfectly rational prediction?”

Everything.

Let’s pull up some quotes from Ah-ryeon in other cycles:

Cycle 133: “D-delicious! So tasty! A delicacy I’ve never once tasted in my life...! Who could be giving me such delectable resentment...?!”

Cycle 134: “Eek?! I did nothing and all this aggro spawns on its own...?! It’s tasty but terrifying! G-Guild Leader! Someone I don’t even know is hating me for no reason—live, in real time!”

Cycle 267: “Ahh! As expected of the guild leader. S-so delicious. Your aggro’s the tastiest in the world...”

It was a veritable anthology of great lines.

When I calmed my spinning head, the conclusion was simple: For the villain Ah-ryeon, who finds other people’s aggro “tasty,” the sweetest gourmet hatred was none other than my own malice.

Ah-ryeon jolted at that. “Eek! W-what are you saying, Guild Leader? You mean... you’re going to resent me now?! The one abandoned by the world, shunned even by my forum friends, arguably the most pitiful being in the universe... even you, Guild Leader? Even you’ll curse me?!”

“Wow,” Dok-seo muttered under her breath. “Ah-ryeon unni’s fangirling is off the charts this cycle. Is this what happens when you quit the internet?”

“S-see? Even this kid who’s clearly younger than me looks down on me! Ahh. Let the world just end already...”

I sighed. “Fine. For the next few hours—maybe days, maybe weeks—in this room, I’ll resent you, Ah-ryeon.”

“Hiiieeek!”

“But with a dash of illusion.”

“Hee-hee... huh?”

I turned to the side. “Seo-rin. I want a contract.”

“What kind?”

“I, the Undertaker, until I leave this room, will believe any illusion shown to me is the absolute truth.”

With a flourish, a golden scale appeared in the darkness.

“And I will not recall that I made this contract. Moreover, if I never realize it’s an illusion, I can’t affect reality in any way.”

“Hmm, that restriction’s not hard.” Seo-rin weighed it, then glanced my way. “Okay. What’ll you put on the other pan?”

“When I wake, I want to remember nothing of what happened inside the illusion.”

“Huh? That’s not exactly to your advantage— Wait, the scale is balanced?” She tilted her head, hesitating at the sight. “Strange… but fine. Shall I cast the spell?”

“Yes. Oh, and Dok-seo.”

Dok-seo stared at me. She’d been watching my every move.

“You know what’s coming. Remember, it’s only an illusion. I’m about to dive in—you’re the anchor. I’m counting on you.”

She wiped sandwich sauce from her lip and gave a solemn nod. “Got it, mister. Leave it to me.”

Seo-rin breathed a sigh as Ah-Ryeon whined, “I’m used to being the hated role.”

I closed my eyes.

The candle barely clung to life. When my eyelids fell, the world returned me to darkness. From there, I faintly heard Dok-seo asking Seo-rin, “Huh? No… Wait… I can manage that… You…”

A peculiar silence settled over the room.

“The Miko of Infinite Metagame proclaims…”

Dok-seo’s voice, uncharacteristically grave, rippled through the dark.

“…this is the 5th cycle. Undertaker, you staged a final defense line in Busan. Yet Dang Seo-rin, fighting beside you, was impaled and killed by Ten Legs. And now, what you see before you is not Sim Ah-ryeon but that very Ten Legs—”

At that instant, my memory cut out.

“You failed to stop the Meteor Shower. You dragged the half-dead Seo-rin away in retreat, but in the end, both of you turned to white dust.”

…

“Dying together was your only solace, your escape. Yet even solace has a hint of falsehood. In truth, you died after Seo-rin. One second—perhaps a millisecond, a mere instant. Enough to watch her scatter like dust…”

…

“It went unspoken, but death’s simplicity spares no one. Even comrades met it. In the 173rd cycle, you brought her Pu'er tea as usual, yet found Noh Do-hwa bleeding out in a rehab ward hallway.”

“She was killed by marauders, a gang that would’ve vanished if you’d purged Butterfly Effect sooner.”

“A marauder stands before you.”

…

“You favor the good. You indulged Yu Ji-won because in no timeline does an ‘accident’ or ‘mistake’ kill her.”

“You’ve watched too many loved ones die to uncontrollable variables.”

“So you relied on her survival.”

“On the Outer God’s servant. On the Anomaly’s power. Because of them, you were being saved.”

“When you learned that very same Yu Ji-won had tortured an innocent girl named Kim Ji-soo and dozens of drifters—”

…

“Dang Seo-rin is” “dead” “The Saintess” “killed her” “Cheon Yo-hwa” “your disciple” “Lee Ha-yul” “your sister” “Noh Do-hwa” “Jeong Seo-ah” “everyone” “you love” “because of you” “Had they become Anomalies, hundreds of deaths if not more might have been averted” “Your obstinacy” “Pride” “Failure” “Murderer” “Bystander” “The mirror” “is before you.”

…

…

…

“—Sorry, mister—”

“Cutting the feed.”

I opened my eyes.

A gasp.

My body, why was it in this position? I didn’t see an unfamiliar ceiling but, instead, an unfamiliar floor.

The breaths rattled through the lung’s rib cage.

Yes, I was face-down. And yet, most of my vision wasn’t gray concrete—it was a washed-out green.

Gasping breaths, a breath huffed, “G-Guild… Leader…”

Ah-ryeon.

She was pinned beneath me, her two hands clamped tightly around my throat.

“Mm...”

A pained breath.

And yes, she was suffering.

Even after having lost my Aura control, my grip strength remained. It crushed her windpipe mercilessly.

Crack—her neck snapped. Grind—her trachea and esophagus splintered, over and over.

Red handprints bloomed.

Yet her breathing didn’t stop. A faint thread of air still slid between the breaks.

Like a survivor’s groan beneath earthquake rubble.

“I-it’s... o-okay.”

Heal. Mend. Regrow. Restore.

She didn’t die. My hands severed life, but her power re-knit bone the instant it broke, racing by me by several steps, stitching the lifeline back together in a crescent-thin razor of possibility.

And she smiled.

“I... mm, I—”

Drip.

The bruises and handprints were not the only things covering her, but also water that couldn’t evaporate fast enough. Her face was soaked.

Drip, drop—again and again.

“...It’s okay.”

She reached out like a child walking home in the rain, stretching a hand beyond her umbrella to feel the sky. Her fingers traced the wet path, then pressed a palm to my cheek.

“It’s okay…”

I let go. My palms still burned with the heat of her newly-won breath.

Only then did the room come into focus.

What had been immaculate before I blacked out was a wreckage now. Chairs were overturned, the table flipped, the door swung wide. Ah-ryeon and I lay slumped on the threshold, cans and food wrappers littering the floor around us.

Someone was breathing heavily at the door—Dok-seo. She gripped the doorknob, panting hard.

Her hoodie and cap were filthy.

She straightened, cracking her back. “Whoa, that was seriously crazy close! Took an author of my caliber to keep control. Whew. Ask me to do that twice? Yeah, no thanks. Priestess duties? I’m half-quit already, anyway.”

“Dok-seo…” I began, but she cut me off.

“Let’s skip the apologies. We both knew what we were doing, you and me… Seo-rin unnie’s more shaken than she thought she’d be. She stepped out—I forced her to rest.” She dusted off her hoodie and straightened her crooked cap, then looked straight at me. “We are going to save her, the Saintess stuck in the 267th cycle, captured by Nut.”

No hint of wavering existed in that gaze.

“Up you get, mister. Steel yourself. The world’s already broken, but you came because even one life is worth saving. The enemy’s the worst match-up for you. A regressor’s natural predator. Scratches and tears are expected. And none of us—not me, not Seo-rin, not Ah-ryeon—are weak.”

Dok-seo held out her left hand to me, her right to Ah-ryeon.

“So don’t bother with sorrys. Save it for if we fail.”

“...How long was I under?”

“A week.” Then she sighed. “Yeah, it was rough.”

Seven days and nights. She hadn’t left this room once, orchestrating the illusion for our sake.

I turned. “Ah-ryeon... Thank you.”

“Ah. Uh-heh-heh. R-really, it wasn’t bad at all! Totally fine!”

“Still... Thank you.”

“Of course.” She beamed, the bruises on her neck were already erased. “I know, Guild Leader. I’ve known for ages.”

We took Dok-seo’s hands, rose together, and stepped outside.

“Haah.”

“B-beautiful...”

From the widest boulevard to the narrowest alley, the city called Utopia was steeped in the flower field of A Hundred Blooming Blossoms that Ah-ryeon had summoned.

Awakener: Sim Ah-ryeon

Corrupted Alias: The Victim

Has joined the party.

Chapter 357

The Missing IX

Sinnoa

Spring came.

Summer came.

Autumn too. Winter as well.

In a city that shouldn't exist, on a timeline of cycles that shouldn't exist, flowers that shouldn't bloom were in full bloom.

For Dang Seo-rin, the Lord of Utopia, it could only have been a harsh season.

If you analogized it to the Cthulhu TRPG, her character sheet proudly listed [Flower Phobia] and [Plant Phobia].

'Ahh! On that window! On that window! Flowers!'

'Daangkiiiiyaaaah!'

A sanity check might have been triggered in other circumstances, but surprisingly enough, Seo-rin remained silent. Even as her companions fell into Corruption one by one, the Lost One of Time and Space, the Great Witch, sat quietly.

Perhaps a bit too quietly.

There on a bench on the beach, she seemed to be enjoying the flower viewing—watching the city, where the vegetation of spring, summer, autumn, and winter had mixed, losing any sense of seasonality.

She sat as if entranced by the flowers.

"Dang Seo-rin."

“...Ah, Undertaker. On a walk?”

“Something like that.”

Only when the breath drew near did Seo-rin turn toward me.

Her gaze was somehow lost.

Even if a person was lost, they could still sit. In silence, she shifted her hips to make room, and I, in turn, silently sat beside her on the bench. After entrusting a moment of silence to the summer cherry blossoms falling at three centimeters per second, I softly drew in a breath of spring with my lips.

“I heard from Dok-seo. Your heart took quite the blow during the week Ah-ryeon was Corrupted.”

“What hardship? I just clicked my magic at the right times— No... Hmm.” Seo-rin shook her head. “You’re right. There’s no need to put on a brave face in front of me. I did go through a lot. More specifically, I was a bit shocked.”

“Could you tell me what kind of shock?”

She pursed her lips. It was not a sign of refusal or rejection, but her choosing her words carefully so that she would neither lie to me nor to herself.

“Until now...” she began slowly. “I believed I was the only one, the special one to you. Somehow.” When I didn’t respond, she continued, “I mean, doesn’t that make sense? Even after turning into a monster wearing human skin like this, you still told me you’d stay by my side.”

Seo-rin flicked her hand in a wave, and the citizens strolling through Utopia’s gardens all turned their backs and vanished. They had acted in obedience to their Lord of the Realm’s command.

Before Yu Ji-won received the divine possession as a Miko, those citizens had barely maintained their humanity, now they revealed their true natures completely.

The aurora shot up by the silver-haired Miko rippled in endless waves above us, dyeing the night sky of the failed worldline.

Once again, it told me that this was objectively nothing more than the aftermath of a bad ending.

“But Dok-seo… that brat who dragged you through agony and back made me realize something. Ah.” Seo-rin forced a bitter smile. “What it means that you’ve suffered nine hundred ninety-nine failures… I was just one failure among those nine hundred ninety-nine failures.”

“Dang Seo-rin.”

“No, it’s not self-pity. I’m not blaming you. Quite the opposite. I should have foreseen from the start how cruel the suggestion to bring you back for the 1,000th time would be—but I didn’t. I’m just reproaching myself is all.”

She looked down at her hand. As guided by winds of fate, the wind carried a blue hydrangea, a white petunia, baby’s breath, a sunflower petal, and a scarlet spider lily, placing each gently into her palm.

“I hoped I wouldn’t become a burden to you.”

“…I’ve never once considered you a burden.”

“I didn’t want to see you cry.”

I had no answer to that.

“When I died by the Ten Legs, when I got caught in the Meteor Shower, when I screamed away on the frontline, I didn’t want to know what expression you’d have.” Seo-rin looked up at the sky and said, “You know what? When I locked myself in a sealed room for about four days, the Student Council President busted in. She actually tried to kill Dok-seo.”

…Did she actually? Yo-hwa was one of the most emotional personalities in the Regressor Alliance. It was entirely plausible.

“But Dok-seo, that child, deployed a transparent barrier and just blocked the whole building.”

“Absolute Barrier. It’s Dok-seo’s power.”

“Yeah. It looked like Dok-seo had already Fallen. Damn, the Student Council President struck with all their might, but it didn’t budge.”

I grimaced. “That brat. She’s a troublemaker who surrendered her Outer God to humanity. She must’ve already reached the peak of her Miko powers by the time she was pulled into the 173rd cycle.”

“Is the Saintess precious to you?”

It was an ambush.

Seo-rin wasn’t looking at me. After all, the city of Utopia was like her eyes, ears, even her innards.

I nodded. “Yes… She’s precious.”

“From the moment you realized this was a bonus stage, your first thought was about saving the Saintess in the 267th cycle?”

“Yes.”

“You’ve been thinking about her all along. You’ve always wanted to save her. So you made your decision without hesitation. Right?”

“…Yes.”

I took something from my pocket. It tinkled, quiet and cheap.

It was a silver bell, one from the lobby of Busan Station. This 9,900-won silver bell stayed by my side in any given cycle.

Only then did Seo-rin turn and gaze at the bell. Her violet eyes seemed to feel its warmth. A moment later, she murmured, “It’s hard… I want you not to be hurt. I want you not to suffer because of me. But at the same time… I want you to think of me, always. Yet if you always think of me… you’ll think of my death too. It’s all contradictions.”

“I don’t blame anyone for falling into contradictions,” I said firmly. “I’m the weak one, after all.”

“You idiot. No one thinks that.”

“To hide contradictions for oneself, or reveal them for others. I believe only that matters.”

Seo-rin was silent for a moments, then rose from the bench. “Yeah, you’re right.”

On the Great Witch’s head sat a pointed hat; in her hand hung a well-worn broom.

“You’re right,” she muttered again. “You haven’t forgotten how to fly yet, my guardian?”

She smiled.

“Today, we’ll fly.”

Of course, I’d long since withdrawn from the Samcheon World, so I was a poor mage without a dedicated broom.

Yet it mattered not.

“Ready, Undertaker?”

“Always am, Seo-rin.”

With a tap of Seo-rin’s foot gracing the ground, the broom shot up and I gently wrapped my arms around her waist from behind.

If it were a bicycle or motorcycle, helmets would be required for the passenger, but alas, the muggles on the Korean peninsula hadn’t applied traffic laws to brooms. Thanks to that, though, I could watch the world’s greatest witch-pilot’s flight skills with my bare face.

“How far are we going?”

“That’s a secret,” Seo-rin said with a giggle. “I’ll give you one hint: a place stuffed with the world’s tastiest cheese.”

The altitude climbed endlessly higher.

In the mid-atmosphere, we even collided with a curtain of auroras. Each hue in the aurora hissed as if a living snake.

Just as they discovered us and swerved to attack, the bands of aurora paused. Then, clearing a path for our passage, they formed a hole in the empty sky.

Seo-rin huffed in interest. “Looks like even the Void Poison covering the Earth is free-passing for you, my guardian. Charming existence from long before the world was doomed?”

I remained silent.

I didn’t proclaim that if I hadn’t stopped that girl Yu Ji-won back then, the whole world would’ve drowned under Leviathan’s rain and perished ages ago. The ENFJ Dang Seo-rin would’ve called me a son of a bitch, plucked out my eyes, and sent me free-diving from the stratosphere to the Pacific.

“Be careful. From here on, it’s space.”

“Mm.”

After passing through the troposphere, stratosphere, mesosphere, thermosphere, and the “aurorasphere,” darkness enveloped us.

Fortunately, Leviathan honored its Miko’s request and granted me the right to use Aura, which I summoned to shield my body.

I frowned as I looked down. In the middle of space unfolded what “used to be Earth.”

“Like I thought... The surface has flattened out.”

“Mm. Conspiracy theorists would freak.”

Flat Earth theory. Geocentrism.

The “sun,” now greatly diminished, orbited around what remained of Earth alongside the moon. In no uncertain terms, they had been Corrupted by Anomalies.

“That’s said to be the work of the Night Goddess Nut’s contamination, right?”

“Ah. It used to be treated as a variant of Masterming or Monster Wave. But it’s officially classified as an Outer God.”

“Outer God… I suppose. It’s not content with Earth or the Sun alone.”

The broom sped up a bit. Eventually, when we landed at our apparent destination, I couldn’t hide my astonishment.

“My goodness. Cheese? Dang Seo-rin, how many people these days even know Wallace and Gromit?”

“Why not? A sequel came out in 2024—the latest one too.”

Seo-rin’s chosen nighttime travel spot was none other than Earth’s only… no, now sole remaining satellite.

We were on the moon.

‘But…’

The moon’s appearance felt a bit off. Well, compared to the completely flattened Earth, it was small potatoes, yet there was a stark gulf between the moon I remembered and this universe’s moon.

“This place is… smooth.”

“Yes. Like a silver platter.”

Originally, the moon should’ve been pockmarked by meteor impacts, a lumpy bread roll texture, but this moon was unnaturally pristine.

No bumps—not a single scratch.

A pure white world.

“A silver platter, you might say. It’s almost...”

I tried to think back, feeling an odd sort of dissonance. I’d seen a similar scene somewhere, but strangely, it wouldn’t come to mind.

I looked around and spoke my honest impression. “It’s like a mirror.”

“Heh heh. Exactly.”

Seo-rin folded her arms behind her back.

In the silence of space, except for our breathing and footsteps, nothing else could be heard. Her voice, humming as if singing a tune, seeped through.

“You know, Undertaker.”

“Mm?”

“No one can eavesdrop here.”

I tilted my head. “What do you mean?”

“Because it’s the moon. Your sole observer. Even the Saintess’s Clairvoyance can’t reach here.”

Silence enveloped us on all sides. In this vast space, only our gazes met—like waves crashing against each other’s pupils and shattering into nothing.

Carried by that current, my heart pounded.

How much had Dang Seo-rin uncovered?

How much...

“Nut, you know.”

She spoke softly.

“You confidently explained and detailed out every other Outer God, yet somehow, when it came to Nut, you trailed off—saying you still don’t really understand her, that her true nature remains a mystery.”

“...Because I truly don’t know her. It’s only natural.”

“Mm-mm.” Seo-rin shook her head. “I told you earlier, you’ve been agonizing over how to rescue the Saintess all this time. But surely, you must have endlessly researched and probed Nut as well. You’re just that kind of person.”

Thump.

“Hey, you know,” he said again, “it’s strange, isn’t it?”

“...What is?”

“Why doesn’t Nut envelop the world in this cycle?”

“...Because Nut is the quintessential Last-Hit Parasite. In this cycle, the Monster Wave didn’t destroy Utopia. That’s why.”

Seo-rin smiled wryly. “Liar. You know? When Dok-seo showed you that illusion, I was right beside you. When Do-hwa died... even before the Monster Wave arrived, Nut appeared first and killed both you and her, right? Monster Wave and Nut aren’t the same. Sure, they might be related, but fundamentally, they’re separate. Even if the Monster Wave hadn’t swept through Utopia, it’s odd that Nut would behave so quietly.”

I...

I regretted it.

I had underestimated Dang Seo-rin.

I never expected her to piece together the full picture from such small clues. I’d let my guard down.

“The more you repeat cycles, the stronger Nut, the Outer God, grows.”

“…”

“No one else can enter your sealed territory—Time Seal—yet somehow only Nut can visit. Right? As if you unconsciously permitted only her entry.”

“…”

“Nut creates ‘a paradise nowhere in this world.’ She abducts people, and those people find happiness in her divine realm.”

“…”

“And Leviathan, who’s always been so docile… the moment you and I traveled across the Pacific, it convulsed as if its territory had been invaded.”

“…”

“Hey.”

She spoke, a sorrowful smile flickering on her lips.

“It’s such a coincidence, don’t you think?”

“…”

“Undertaker.”

She said, turning to me.

“I know. You dressed it up with fancy words like ‘bonus stage,’ but this world—this cycle—was one you vowed to live for me, and no one else.”

“…Ah.”

“But you, without a moment’s hesitation, would never devote everything to someone else—no matter if it were the Saintess—right in front of me.”

“…”

“You’re not that kind of person. No, absolutely not.”

“…”

“The Night Goddess—an entity that feeds on the Regressor’s time, that grows stronger for the one you allow to visit even in dreams, that you keep letting slip away with half-spoken words.”

She spoke.

“She’s just like… me, right?”

Chapter 358

The Missing X

Sinnoa

Aura is an energy that appears in works of fiction as a natural phenomenon of sorts, serving as an all-purpose power. But in reality, nothing comes for free.

By now, you well know that even Aura actually originates from an Outer God, that it is no more than another Anomaly.

And so, here is a question naturally follows:

Then what of Magic?*

Originally, Awakeners could be classified as either Aura-type or Magic-type. Although Aura had developed to a monstrous degree on the Korean peninsula—thanks to the influence of a certain regressor—the same could not be said of the situation just across the sea in the Japanese archipelago.

The Great Priestess. Manyo Neko. Phantom Blade. Obsidian Qin.

Among those acquainted with the Regressor, every one of them possessed a magic-based ability. From the outset, they were even known as Awakener “Magical Girls” here.

Thus, the Regressor formed a hypothesis.

If so, might not Magic share a similar origin with Aura?

A premonition triggered only after confirming Yu Ji-won’s case. A reasoned conviction.

The Regressor immediately began to investigate.

If there is an Outer God of magic, then a Magic Miko must also exist. And if current circumstances are anything to go by, that Magic Miko is likely among those around me.

Why were Mikos so plentiful only on the Korean peninsula, of all places? It could not be that the Outer Gods were infused with national pride. Otherwise, the protagonist of this story would have been Jung Sang-guk.

The answer was simple.

To grow strong enough to become a Miko, one must survive to the very end and level up. And the world's best environment for leveling up is none other than being within the Regressor's vicinity.

It was a form of natural selection.

In theory, countless people had the potential to become Mikos of the Infinite Metagame. Yet most fell out early, unable to overcome Anomalies and the Void. But the Miko apprentice, Oh Dok-seo, the one who dwelled near the Regressor, continued to survive.

She acquired elixirs. She mastered the Aura Heart Method. Riding the optimal tech tree arranged by the Regressor, she grew powerful with overwhelming efficiency compared to other competitors.

Thus, it was she who was chosen.

Of course, this alone could not explain the unique case of Yu Ji-won, but that would be a topic for another discussion.

If I can identify the Magic Miko in my midst... I can ambush and capture her before the Outer God reveals its claws.

The decision was swift in its making, and the action as a result even more swift.

The Regressor questioned those around him quickly yet cautiously.

"Hmm? Infinite Void? Well... I've heard she uses Black Magic, unlike the Great Witch of the Samcheon World, but it's not really magic, is it?"

First candidate: the younger Cheon Yo-hwa.

“Strictly speaking, I seize corpses or people, overwrite their data, and then command them like familiars. It only looks like magic. In reality, I handle the data of all things. The question of whether Infinite Void is an Outer God of magic… it just doesn’t feel right, you know? Ehehe. Sorry, sunbae, I’m not much help!”

Candidate rejected. Next.

“Come on, sunbae. It’s not Mastermind—it’s the one running the simulated universe. Doesn’t it look more like a scientist than a wizard?”

Second candidate: the elder Cheon Yo-hwa.

“In terms of imagery, Mastermind is more strategist than mage. Calculating optimal routes by weighing every possibility. If magic is a miracle, Mastermind’s power is strategy—or AI. It’s entirely contrary to the idea of miracles.”

Candidate rejected. Next.

“Hmm… Probably not, right? Also, Cheon Yo-hwa’s a notorious loser.”

Third candidate: Oh Dok-seo.

“Aura and magic are both common tropes in fiction, so at first glance, one might think it’s within the Infinite Metagame’s domain… But Aura’s always belonged to Ji-won. I see that the Infinite Metagame cannot create something from nothing. Its specialty is overlaying ‘fictional elements’ onto pre-existing things, distorting them. Mister, you can make something look like magic, but you can’t truly create magic itself.”

Candidate rejected. Next.

Next.

There should be a next.

[Oppa?]

It wasn't Lee Ha-yul.

"Hmm? Guild Leader, what is it?"

It wasn't Sim Ah-ryeon either.

[Mr. Undertaker?]

Nor the Saintess.

No. At that point, the Regressor was already in considerable confusion, for beyond the mystery of just who this Miko was, the bigger problem was who the Outer God of Magic could be.

It isn't Infinite Void. It isn't Mastermind. Not Cheon Yo-hwa, not Monster Wave, naturally not Leviathan.

The Regressor hesitated.

Then which Outer God governs magic?

It was understandable that the Regressor spiraled into a rut of rumination. From his knowledge, only one candidate remained.

The Night Goddess, Nut.

But Nut was sealed by the Saintess of the 267th cycle. Phenomena related to Nut should have, for all intents and purposes, "disappeared." Yet magic still continued to exist.

Why?

Perhaps the culprit was not Nut.

Perhaps there was an enigmatic Outer God even the Regressor did not know.

And yet...

"No."

Cheon Yo-hwa, the Miko who had reached into the simulated universe and temporarily harnessed the power of Mastermind, affirmed it.

“All the Anomalies that you’ve deemed Outer God-level have surfaced already, sunbae. There are no additional external factors here. Even if there were, I would stop them.”

[It does not exist.]

Once the Infinite Metagame, the one who came closer to the throne of Anomalies than any—Infinite Void, Mastermind, Monster Wave—fully surrendered, its very existence diminished and it could no longer lie.

[The number of Outer Gods is seven. This is an already established fact.]

[Of course, an effective “overlap” in which two Outer Gods are in practice “one” remains possible.]

[“One-Seven” is the number of sorcery. The absolute boundary. Even if you need not understand it, please believe it.]

[On the name of Oh Dok-seo.]

Even if the reliability of that testimony abruptly plummeted at the end, Infinite Metagame had long utterly surrendered. It dared not utter lies.

Then.

Then…

The worst possibility.

Suppose for a second…

Though he dared not think it.

He was the Regressor, a superhuman who had resolved to bear the weight of the world. No matter how uncomfortable the truth, he had to confront it.

Suppose the Saintess's seal was imperfect?

A hypothesis.

The Regressor muttered, as if vomiting the words rather than thinking.

Suppose that Nut's presence, bound by the Saintess's Time Stop, was only half a seal.

The silver bell jingled.

Then what would happen?

It was simple when one thought it through. Affection for the Saintess, dependence, guilt, gratitude—all had merely clouded the Regressor's sight for a moment.

Ah.

Looking back to the 267th cycle, at the moment the world nearly perished under Nut's power, a contradiction was still at play.

Before the Saintess could be reborn as Nut's Miko, Nut had already descended and brought hell to the world. The Saintess Fell only afterward.

It was a temporal contradiction.

For Nut to be powerful enough to turn the world into hell, the Miko sharing Nut's power must have been equally strong. After all, a Miko was the conduit for an Outer God to manifest on Earth. If the conduit were not solid, the Outer God could not cross over.

And yet, Nut... Even before the Saintess Fell, Nut's power was more than sufficient—overflowing, even.

That was it.

The Saintess Fell only later, too late.

When did the Saintess stop time and resolve to Fall herself? At the brink of unredeemable despair, when the world's destruction seemed irreversible.

"I will now prove that hypothesis wrong."

"Farewell, Undertaker."

"I'll see you soon."

At that desperate moment when the Regressor was driven to despair, the Saintess stopped time.

In reverse.

Time itself reversed.

It was not that the Miko Saintess grew so strong that the Outer God Nut fully manifested. It was only after the Outer God Nut manifested that the latecomer Miko Saintess Awakened.

The green light went out.

The red light began blinking.

The Saintess was never Nut's Miko to begin with.

There was only one conclusion.

The Saintess forcibly connected with Nut. Despite not being destined to be a Miko, she stole that position, defying the natural order.

In other words, a rebellion. No, a usurpation.

Only one conclusion.

The one truly bound to Nut was not the Saintess, but someone else.

Only one.

She hated flowers.

If she touched the Udumbara, the world's most splendid bloom, it felt as if everything she had built would vanish.

Instinctively, unconsciously, she recoiled.

She was more suited for magic than anyone.

When the Japanese Magical Girls developed the Word Magic system to fight Anomalies, only she pioneered her own magic, Cursed Song Incantation. Strangely, it was a miracle that only she could perform on this Earth.

She was a being who, upon receiving something as an offering, would return something of equal value. If she gathered lives on Earth to create hell, she would build heaven in the Otherworld for the same price.

It didn't matter whether it was "hell" or "heaven." One should have noted that this entity, unlike other Anomalies, was most strict about exchange.

One must not be ensnared by the appearance of a flattened Earth.

If one had recalled that "flatness" could also be interpreted as "equality" or "fairness."

○

〓〓〓

●

She...

If it was to make this world equal...

II

● II ○

II

She even created a single sun to balance the weight on the scales.

She was the owner of the golden scales.

She was the greatest witch.

She was the judge who first established justice in this ruined world.

She was the Lord of Utopia, who placed paradise nowhere to be found opposite the broken world on the scales.

In the middle of an intersection where green and red lights blinked, she who said she had lost her entire family stared up at the sky as if alone in the world.

In truth, the name “Nut” did not suit her. A name more fitting must exist.

“...Ah.”

The Night Goddess.

The deity governing sorcery and magic.

The one who presides over the moon and night, crossroads, souls, good and evil, and the threefold Samcheon World of sky, earth, and sea.

Ἑκάτη.

Hecate.

“Hello? Did you lose your way too?”

She was Dang Seo-rin.

Where breath and voice were far from all and only two were allowed to be, the universe was unbearably quiet.

There, on the moon’s surface, which had long since become something other than a planet, its surface unnaturally pristine.

I struggled to pry my lips open to speak. “...It’s still too early to conclude that you are Nut, Dang Seo-rin. You might simply be a Miko.”

“Well.”

Whether she sensed my anxious heart or not, her voice was calm, as it was when she viewed Utopia’s flower garden earlier.

“Actually, I’m still curious. That ‘Miko’ you mention—what exactly is that? Can you really draw a sharp line between Outer Gods and Mikos? ‘All the damage done to the world is the Anomaly’s fault. Humans were only ever randomly destined to be Mikos.’ It’s a rather gentle distinction, but… Undertaker, perhaps that classification you created is actually a projection of your own hopes —or even your own greed.”

Seo-rin waved her finger.

“Shall I play devil’s advocate for a moment? What if it’s the exact opposite—entrusting the desire to reshape the world, to paint it in one’s own colors, to the Anomalies, while Mikos live as ordinary humans, pretending to be innocent victims?”

“…That’s not true.”

“Mm. Sorry. I was just entertaining the idea. But I wanted to point out that your dichotomy of Outer God versus Miko is actually pretty blurry.”

Her mutterings drifted on. If this were a normal universe, that voice would never have reached me.

“Actually, I’ve been uncertain of what I am… ever since that night, after I heard a shard of truth from you.”

“You are human.”

“Perhaps.”

Then she said it.

“Perhaps I’m both.”

And I had no reply.

“Hey, you know, Undertaker. I want to ask you one more thing.”

Déjà vu.

Memories of the past and impressions of the present intertwined.

A crossroads of time, not space.

“You promised you would never harm me no matter what. Even if I became an Anomaly, even if I stained every corner of the world in the Void, even if I razed everything to the ground, you told me you would still stand by my side.”

Dang Seo-rin lips lifted in a smile split half by light and half by shadow.

“Even now, will you still be on my side?”

Chapter 359

The Missing XI

Sinnoa

“Hmm? Why the long face, sunbae? Did something good happen while I wasn’t looking—?”

I still hadn’t answered Seo-rin since our midnight stroll to the moon and back. I doubted she ever expected an instant reply.

I needed time to think.

I began spending more and more time alone, even going so far as to ask the Saintess not to keep watch on me with her Clairvoyance for a while. That was how four days passed with my door firmly shut… until my unruly pupil—dressed in a black sailor uniform and carrying her school bag—popped in without warning.

I stared at her for a beat, then greeted, “Cheon Yo-hwa.”

“Geez, using my full name is embarrassing.” The elder twin beamed. “Call me like you always do. ‘My adorable protégé.’ ‘The very meaning of that brief season when you tutored for pocket money.’”

“That’s even longer than your full name…”

“There’s an old saying: Like father and child, lie teacher and student. In other words, we’re basically already family, you know. I’ve wanted to call you this for ages—Daddy!”

I let a wry smile slip out. If Ha-yul were here, she’d probably explode, complaining that Yo-hwa was stealing her form of address. “How did you know I was here? Did the Saintess tell you?”

“Nah. She respects your wishes too much. She kept quiet, so I just followed my intuition.”

We were in a café inside the abandoned Baekje Hospital. The very place where Emit Schopenhauer chose to die.

Whenever I need to lose myself in thought, I end up here because—

"This is the graveyard that keeps a Regressor's End. The other regressor who left this world before you, your sunbae. He kept nagging you for clinging so stubbornly to something you'll abandon, anyway. So you use him as a mirror to look back at yourself, right?"

"Yeah," I said after a pause. "It really is hard to fool you."

"Ehehe, I am your star pupil."

I looked down at the floor at the exact spot where Old Man Scho's body had lain, minus the head. The corpse had already been burned away by my Aura, but the keepsake he clutched to the end still rested there all alone: a smartphone, carrying the voice of the woman he loved.

"I've been wondering what makes me any different from that old geezer."

Yo-hwa gazed at my face, silent as I spoke.

"His death was clean. He wasn't tainted by Void poison, and he didn't resurrect his wife with some inhuman art. While she was still alive, he simply talked with the love of his life, over and over—a remarkably gentle way to live and die... And then, there's me. The path I might tumble down is nowhere near that quiet. I've already come too far, already paid too much."

"Udumbara is always there, sunbae," Yo-hwa whispered. "If that tender world-tree infects you, your Regression, Complete Memory, even the Time Seal—all of it will vanish."

"...Udumbara is Sim Ah-ryeon."

Blink. "Huh?"

"More precisely, it's Ah-ryeon's Grudge Orb. The Bird That Drinks Poison and Udumbara are the same at their core. You know every Awakener's power blooms from their own scars and resentment."

"R-right, I'd kinda guessed..."

"Instead of drinking someone's grudges, she gives that person life-force. Sound familiar?"

Yo-hwa's ruby red eyes widened in shock. "Why didn't I see it? That's right, when Ah-ryeon fell, all of Utopia turned into a garden..."

"Udumbara isn't a cursed tree that steals an Awakener's power; it simply gathers up their scars."

A life without wounds and scars. The manifestation of that ideal would be a Huayen world where people transform into their own flowers—into plants.

[Maybe I always wanted to become a plant.]

Long ago, someone who'd been hurt more than anyone confessed that wish.

[I wanted to have no choice but to accept everything, to run away from everything that angered me or hurt me. It was my deepest, darkest desire.]

[So, I guess I just became a plant.]

That was the Saintess's self-revelation after she turned into a potato.

Ah-ryeon cherished the Saintess fiercely, even dragging the Eastern Holy State's elite troops under her banner. Perhaps she felt an instinctive— No, an essential kinship.

"So infection by Udumbara isn't an exit. Not in any sense of the word," I told Yo-hwa. "And who knows what it would do to Ah-ryeon, who shares the same root. The more I treat Regression like a curse—like shackles I want to break—the harder Udumbara will cling to me."

"Oh no..."

“If it ever blooms inside me, I might lose all the memories I’ve kept from hundreds of cycles in a single instant.”

Silence settled over the café. After staring at the blossoming four-season garden outside, Yo-hwa finally spoke.

“When I heard you came from the 1,000th—no—the 999th cycle, I honestly felt nothing. It was just some far-off future. But just now, I realized for the first time that you really are a man of the future. The info gap is insane.”

“Is it? You’ve been looking like you’re lost in your own thoughts the whole time, Yo-hwa.”

She lowered her eyes. “Anyway… Our allies are scary strong when you think about it. They’re all Mikos or soon-to-be Corrupted. Feels like someone planned the whole scenario. Sunbae… Why did you deliberately Corrupt the children you cherish so much? What made you agree to Project Collapse?”

I couldn’t say it aloud.

‘The moment Dang Seo-rin completed Utopia, everyone here became her limbs.’

Yo-hwa, too, was no exception. No matter how independently she moved, how self-aware she seemed, she was still ensnared in the Great Witch’s Divine Realm.

Enchanted.

‘But once someone Awakens as a Miko, the story changes.’

Yu Ji-won proved that when she summoned Leviathan. She broke free of Utopia and reclaimed her individuality—barely escaping the Witch’s half-hypnotic cradle. Sim Ah-ryeon as well.

‘In short…’

I’d hidden it from my comrades.

‘This is rebellion against Utopia—an uprising from within.’

In the one-in-a-million chance that Seo-rin would lose control and truly become an Outer God... In the truly, wholly unlikely event that that happened, at the very least, my friends and I had to keep our sanity and fight.

'We have to save the Saintess. This is our only window. But then, what about Seo-rin...?'

On and on, the thoughts spiralled in an endless swamp, the punishment for humanity that bit the fruit of good and evil.

The café floor, once soaked in a regressor's blood, now seemed to beg for my gaze as well.

"Sunbae."

How long had I been lost in that void? Her voice reached my ears like a muffled cry from above the water.

"Hold on, don't turn this way yet."

Before I could answer or look away, Yo-hwa turned her back, and the soft rustle of clothes fell quiet.

Startled, I jerked my head aside, my heart lurching. "Yo-hwa! I've told you a thousand times, stop using my heartbreak as an opening and quit that sisterly seduction tactic!"

"Ahaha. So this happened in other cycles too? I'd love the juicy details."

"You two are going to be the death of me! I must've been an idiot, moving to Sejong for a job that paid this much, yelling about the jackpot I'd landed all the way!"

"But the money was sweet, right?"

"It was extorting cultists! I still want to refund it!"

"Ahaha!" Yo-hwa giggled. "All right, you can look now, sunbae."

I frowned and lifted my head— And my eyes went wide.

“No, I guess I should call you ‘Teacher.’”

Gone was the black uniform sliding to the floor. Standing there in a snow-white school uniform was Cheon Yo-hwa, the little sister of that twin pair, grinning ear to ear.

“How’s my impression of my sister? Pretty good, right?”

I couldn’t respond, my eyes still wide with surprise.

“I don’t know what exactly you’re struggling with, Teacher. I mean, I know it’s about the line between Anomaly and human, but I can’t tell how deeply that line cuts for you. Unlike me, whose life ends with this one, you have so many factors to weigh.” Hands clasped behind her back, Yo-hwa continued, “But just as the border between my sister and me depends on what you believe, I trust you more than anyone to see the other person as they truly are.”

“...Yo-hwa.”

“Who I am doesn’t matter. I decided to entrust my self to whoever watches over me.” A shy smile danced across her lips as she said, “Whether someone counts as Anomaly or human is up to you, just like it was for me and just like it was for my sister... Well, okay, I don’t really like her, but for Ji-won too. And Dok-seo, I haven’t known her long—no clue about her at all. Let’s call her an Anomaly, okay?”

That made me laugh out loud. “Offend Dok-seo and you’re dead. She’s ghost-writing my story and if she’s in a mood, she’ll cut anyone’s screen time. Her grudges last.”

“No worries. I live in the here-and-now, faithful only to the person in front of me.”

“Thank you.” I patted Yo-hwa’s shoulder, just like that winter day inside the student-council room when we shared the white season alone. She chuckled, puffs of breath misting. “Right. Nothing to hesitate over. The scale’s bigger, but I’ll keep doing what I’ve always done.”

“Yes, Teacher.”

“Speaking of Dok-seo... Yo-hwa, I hear you tried to kill her?”

“Ah—”

“Let’s dig just a bit deeper into that bottomless hole, shall we?”

“L-language is amazing, huh? How can you do a little deep dive into a chat hole without an end, and do it all at once too?”

“Yo-hwa.”

“S-sorry, sunbae! Actually, I am Cheon Yo-hwa pretending to be the other Cheon Yo-hwa pretending to be me! How was my little-sister act? Great, huh?!”

I gave her a good scolding.

Before that summer was over...

[Dad.]

Even Ha-yul managed to Fall, freeing herself from Utopia’s brainwashing. Her condition for Corruption was simple: I, the Undertaker, had to be assassinated or die an unjust death at the hands of ordinary people—no one special.

So, just like with Ah-ryeon, all I had to do was screen an “illusion” for Ha-yul.

Since the pattern was the same, there was no need to re-enact the exact scene with someone else’s pain.

Yes, I skipped the timeline. The process of Falling was erased, and only the result remained. All that was left was the fact that Lee Ha-yul Fell.

Everything in between is gone.

[I feel so light.]

Ha-yul straightened her back, emotionless, and raised her fingers in a peace sign.

[I’ve never been this happy.]

[I’m not alone anymore, Dad.]

[Now, nothing scares me.]

“...You don’t have to pile up the defeat flags that neatly, kiddo.”

Awakener: Lee Ha-yul

Corrupted Alias: The Tuner

Has joined the party.

Night-Goddess Raid Team—COMPLETE.

Chapter 360

The Missing XII

Sinnoa

The Regressor Alliance hatched an audacious plan of Collapse: every one of us would willingly fall into Corruption, yet three members had to be left out.

“Saintess, please help us from the non-Corrupted side.”

[Why? I’m sure I could be a huge help to you.]

“Of course. But our final goal is to rescue the Saintess of the 267th cycle.”

First, the Saintess.

“After we beat the Night Goddess Nut—no, Hecate—we somehow have to break into the 267th cycle, a world where time has frozen forever. But if, at that moment, the current Saintess also exists...”

[...There will be two identical versions of one person in the same frame of time—basically a doppelganger. It would practically be a well-crafted, open invitation for Void-tainting...]

“Thank you for understanding.”

The Saintess exhaled softly. [Mr. Undertaker, you know this. Even if I let myself Fall, there’s still a way I can help you.]

“That option is off the table. Asking the Saintess to sacrifice herself to save the Saintess is nonsense.”

What she had suggested was simple: fall into Corruption first, then pick the right moment and die by suicide.

No doppelgänger, no problem—so she said.

Even through the Telepathic silence, I could feel her dissatisfaction. I allowed myself a wry smile. It was so like her to consider her own life trivial.

“Even setting aside the sacrifice,” I said gently, “we have no idea what could happen if we tried it.”

[You’re worried about a time paradox?]

“Yes. It’s only a hunch, but… if the paradox actually fires, I have a very bad feeling about what the fallout might be.”

At that, the Saintess finally relinquished, and I sensed her nod of acceptance. [If Mr. Undertaker’s intuition says so, I trust it. Very well. I’ll help you from the safest line I can hold.]

Next person off the list.

“Ah— Sorry, sunbae. I’m sitting this one out!”

The older twin, Cheon Yo-hwa, flashed me a sun-bright grin. Amazingly, the very woman who had proposed Project Collapse was asking to be excused. Her face was so smug that I treated her skull to a good old knuckle-grind.

“Kyah! C-corporal punishment is wrong!”

“Hey. Hey. You’ve got some nerve. Ah-ryeon and Ha-yul went through hell to Corrupt themselves, and you just bow out? Huh?”

“A-ah-haha…” Yo-hwa rubbed her own head as an awkward smile broke free on her face. “Um, yeah. People say I have no shame, which is fair enough. But I do have a solid reason!”

“And that is?”

“Nut— Uh, her real name’s Hecate, right? Anyway. We can’t predict exactly how we’ll fight the Night Goddess, but… once the battle begins, anyone who’s Corrupted and fails to break free of the Great Witch’s grip will be turned into her minion.”

I nodded. “Which is why we have to weaponize Corruption. If we leave you as you are, you'll end up a brain-washed doll for Dang Seo-rin."

"Exactly, sunbae!"

"What?"

Her face hardened, deadly serious. "I'm... going to become a parasite inside an Outer God!"

I stared back at her, entirely silent.

"No, no! Don't make that face! Eh? Eh?" she whined, poking my waist with her elbow. "I've thought it through from every angle, so trust me, sunbae. Please? I have to slip inside Hecate and turn into a lion-hearted—no—a lion heartworm."[1]

"Trust begins with details. Explain the stunt so I can agree."

"Sometimes you can't explain a plan! Honestly! You hide bad news from us all the time!"

She hit me with facts so hard that I lost my words for a beat there. So that was what the others felt with me. Still under mirror-therapy, I watched her slide a thermos my way.

"And this is?" I prompted.

"My blood. I drew it little by little. Drink it before we start."

I stared at her.

She stared back.

"...Yo-hwa."

"I know what you're thinking," she protested. "Handing someone a syringe of your own blood and saying, 'Drink up!' looks insane. It feels like some creepy prank and could easily be misinterpreted. But there is a real, real ritual meaning behind it."

"What are you plotting?"

“Obviously, I’m plotting the brilliant scheme that will save the world under your command, as always.”

“So slamming your blood like a shot is somehow linked to saving the world?”

Yo-hwa flopped to the ground, prostrating herself on the spot as if worshipping Buddha. The technical term for this is, of course, dogeza.

“Please, sunbae. Don’t ask, just do it… Do it.”

Then she raised her legs while staying face-down, balancing only on her arms and head. Behold, the evolved dogeza: a “grand-bow.”

She popped her finisher like it was nothing.

“Sunbae, if you refuse the one request of my life, I’ll follow you around in this pose. Forever.”

“You little monster.”

The world was already doomed; birthing a grand-bow monster on top of that was too much. And so, with a deep and suffering sigh, I granted her wish.

Moving on, why no talk of our superstar Oh Dok-seo, you might ask?

Simple: she didn’t need to Fall. She was effectively in permanent Corruption already.

“Oh, yeah. It’s because Infinite Metagame surrendered, I guess? I’m pretty much in ‘always Corrupted’ mode.”

“Excuse me?”

“I’ve already fused completely with an Outer God. Basically, there’s no point switching between normal and Corrupted versions. And yep, it’s still me—the first shrine-maiden ever to swallow an Outer God. No one left who can rival me…”

Dok-seo sipped cola and stared blankly at the sky.

“When I was yanked into a past cycle, I panicked, but... I’m good now. I actually did wonder why everyone else stayed put and only I warped after you, mister,” she admitted, then shrugged. “I kinda figure Metagame got totally absorbed by me.”

“What do you mean?”

“You’re the axis of all regression. When you rewind, others can’t chase that timeline. But Metagame’s different. You know this, mister. It sensed your rewinds and kept inching after you.”

Right. Maybe regression itself was a cliché of fiction. As the overseer of all stories, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame had tools to answer whatever questions the existence of a regressor could pose.

“So from Metagame’s perspective, this isn’t the 173rd cycle. It’s just the extension of the 999th world where the Regressor called ‘mister’ lives.”

“Huh,” I mused.

“Even in the 999th cycle, there’s no ‘laptop’ here. Normally, Metagame would split half-and-half between the notebook and me. But for this stage, everything that it was and is—all of its power—was absorbed entirely by me.”

Was it my imagination? Dok-seo’s eyes looked harder than ever.

“Once this stage ends, you’ll forget everything—golden scales, contract, and all. But I won’t. Someday, mister, I’ll remember the world after this doom.”

“...Because you’re the slowest prophet.”

“Yep.” She flipped her cap backwards. “Sure, I still haven’t recalled the 555th cycle, let alone started chasing the 1000th. But that’s future me’s problem. Present me’s got work to do.”

“Like handing tomorrow’s you your daily upload schedule?”

“Exactly, exactly.” The self-proclaimed great author grinned and offered up her right hand. “Let’s go, mister. Let’s crystal-punch that bratty girl who thinks she’s the Outer God of this universe.”

I took her hand and mine, and we shook on it—which could have been a stirring moment until someone beside us timidly raised a hand.

“Uh, hyung-nim?”

It was Seo Gyu.

“Sorry to butt in, but is there nothing for me? Like, Corruption or something? Or am I just supposed to stay mind-fogged in this utopia?”

“Ah, Seo Gyu, sorry. For you to rampage, SG Net would have to explode in user count.”

“Oh.”

“But as you know, right now SG Net is a ghost community with only Ah-ryeon logged in. So there’s no chance.”

“Ah...”

The apocalypse’s last muscle-man drooped his deltoids in gloom.

Let us have a moment of silence.

Myself, Yu Ji-won, Sim Ah-ryeon, Cheon Yo-hwa, Lee Ha-yul, and Oh Dok-seo. Six people in the strike team.

‘A party for the ages.’

All of them except me were Corrupted, though not to the point of total nihilism. Ji-won, for example, still treated me as an equal. Corruption has wild-caught and farm-raised grades, perhaps, like martial arts power gained by demonic techniques versus the pure internal energy of the orthodox schools.

‘Even so, they’re indisputably the strongest this world has to offer.’

With this team, we could probably wipe out a Monster Wave in one sweep.

“Mr. Matiz,” Ji-won said, drawing close. She was shorter than usual —strangely unfamiliar yet familiar. “Where is Hecate? I haven’t been able to see Her Excellency Dang Seo-rin lately.”

“On the moon.”

“Pardon?”

“Literally, Dang Seo-rin is on the moon.”

Ever since our last talk she had stayed up there, never returning to Earth.

“She must have steeled herself for our fight,” I explained. “Knowing she can’t fully control herself as an Outer God, she exiled herself as far from Earth as possible.”

“...Whatever verdict you reach, perhaps she has already decided to lose.”

“Possibly.”

Another reading existed, though.

Since ancient times, the moon acted as the wellspring of sorcery. It was a mirror hung in the sky, a hole to the Otherworld. The philosopher Parmenides once said the moon shines because it “always looks upon the sun,” likening it to the universe’s eye. Just as a human blinks, the cosmos’ eye blinks between crescent and full. In other words...

“Hecate may have chosen the battlefield that most favors herself. Is it Dang Seo-rin’s heart that refuses to wreck Earth, or the Outer God’s instinct to repaint the world in her color? I can’t say which will win.”

Right now, Seo-rin stood too close to Hecate. Unless you possess

Complete Memory like I do, a mere human ego can hardly survive inside an Outer God. It was a miracle she still even looked like "Dang Seo-rin." And that miracle existed only because of me. I could recognize that much, at least.

I turned to my comrades and said, "The Outer God named Nut, now called Hecate, never shows herself carelessly."

The strike team looked back—all of them still Yu Ji-won, Sim Ah-ryeon, Cheon Yo-hwa, Lee Ha-yul, and Oh Dok-seo, even under the thrall of Anomalous power. They were the last humans standing in the 173rd—no—the 1000th world.

"Hecate used to cloak the universe in night at the very instant that the world perished. I once thought she was like Infinite Metagame, sniping the last hit... but surely, it tied into Seo-rin's condition."

Ha-yul tilted her head. [So if Dang Seo-rin dies, Hecate descends?]

"Probably. I'm not certain."

Questions remained about their link. Was Dang Seo-rin truly an Outer God or merely a priestess? Either hypothesis left unexplained shadows, a fog of omen around my heart. Yet fog or not, this operation demanded everything.

"To Hecate, this world is post-apocalypse already. Humanity is fused to her Utopia, hence she can appear freely here... But for us, an impossible chance—the epilogue after the ending—has been handed down."

It had been a chain of coincidences.

Dang Seo-rin's power reached Outer-God class, so the golden scales worked near-omnipotence.

She granted my wish to call my future self.

Oh Dok-seo tamed Infinite Metagame. Even if I were to forget this step forever, someday, she alone will recall so that no one—no god—can erase it as having "never happened."

So many “once-in-a-lifetimes” stacked into inevitability. If I was a miracle to Dang Seo-rin, then my miracle stood before me now.

“Our one objective: sever the Outer God from Dang Seo-rin and rescue our ridiculous yet lovable pointy-hat devotee.”

Their gazes were of different colors and different passions, yet each and every one of them was already resolved. As well they should be. After all, this 173rd cycle had fought Monster Waves in endless war. Theirs was a world of veterans.

“If it’s the moon, the trip alone takes ages. I’ll clear a path,” Ji-won said first. She spread her hand, then closed it. The aurora that flowed across the night sky suddenly dropped like a net.

“Wh-whoa!”

“Oh.”

Startled yet compliant, the party let the auroral mesh wrap them, then ascend like a silent elevator.

Dok-seo muttered, “Wow, busted-tier. Ji-won unnie may be pint-sized now, but when she embraces Corruption, she’s the strongest human alive…”

“Thank you.”

“No, I’m the one thanking you! Free cruise into space!”

“Indeed.” Ji-won dipped her chin. “If you truly are grateful, then when you chronicle Mr. Matiz’s life later, please allocate me exceptional page-time.”

“Uh, wha—?”

“I felt goodwill the instant I saw you, Ms. Dok-seo. As befits a self-styled prophet at Mr. Matiz’s side, you radiate an uncommon Aura. I haven’t read your work yet, but I am sure it is superb.”

“Uh, uh! Yeah? Hmm. Well. That’s true. Ji-won unnie’s face is a national treasure! I’ll write you a special feature!”

“Thank you.”

Ji-won, you’re unchanging as ever. Corrupted or not, you sniff out power like a bloodhound and milk it for all it’s worth...

“We’ll soon arrive.”

Even beyond Earth’s atmosphere, we felt no discomfort. The aurora kept weaving, shielding us from harm. Under Ji-won’s command, Leviathan guarded us flawlessly, its auroral net even doubling as a mental barrier. The dragon did, after all, excel at brainwashing and hallucination.

A hopeless foe when an enemy yet so reassuring as an ally, these Outer Gods.

‘Wait. Infinite Metagame never felt reassuring, even as an ally.’

Let’s just file that cosmic horror under the umbrella term of “a big misunderstanding.”

As Ji-won said, the moon—Hecate’s sanctuary—drew closer by the second.

“Wow!” Yo-hwa exclaimed. “Beautiful. Spotless. A perfect mirror hanging in the middle of space...”

The others felt much the same, though they left their thoughts to the silence.

However, I could not be moved by the moon’s beauty. My eyes locked on its surface, on a lone figure still wearing a cone hat and cape.

My eyesight outstripped the team’s. I could zoom in further, clearer.

Far away, Dang Seo-rin seemed to notice my stare, and I sucked in a breath. Across the gulf of a whole universe, she shaped words with her lips, crisp and slow.

You’re here, Undertaker.

Maybe a bit late.

Or perhaps still early…

A chill ran down my spine. She still looked human—gentle smile, calm eyes—and no different from the Dang Seo-rin I knew…

Except for her left hand.

Hm? Oh,

This bothers you?

In her left hand…

There lay something that must not exist.

By every rule of common sense, an impossible sight condensed there.

Got bored waiting for you.

I was looking over Earth,

And it just caught my eye.

Go Yuri.

It annoyed me.

There it was, cleanly severed with pink hair and all. Go Yuri's head was clenched in Dang Seo-rin's left hand as if it belonged there.

The Great Witch smiled.

So I tidied it up.

Footnotes:

1 - Lions, like other carnivores, are susceptible to heartworm infection, although they are not the primary host like dogs. Mosquitoes transmit the parasite, and heartworms can cause serious health problems in lions, including heart failure and death. Basically, a parasite. It should also be noted that Hecate is associated with lions.

Chapter 361

The Missing XIII

Sinnoa

Go Yuri is dead.

“Hey, mister? Why are you spacing out all of a sudden?”

Go Yuri is dead.

Perhaps this was the ending I had spent a thousand turns of regression praying for. In run after run, I wandered, hunting for some way to handle the “pink entity.” And yet... Seeing Go Yuri’s severed head dangling vacantly from Seo-rin’s hand sent my heart thumping at an ominous tempo.

“Your Excellency? Your complexion...”

Maybe that was inevitable. All this punny regressor had managed so far was to keep Ji-won glued to Go Yuri, and even that only shooed her away. If you asked whether we ever truly stopped her, a question mark was all we could offer.

And now, Go Yuri was dead.

Killed by Dang Seo-rin, as casually as breathing.

Splat. Crack.

Fresh blood dotted the mirror-bright lunar surface.

Seo-rin opened her hand, and in an unhurried arc, slow enough to mistake for a drifting balloon, Go Yuri’s head fell. Her face was just as serene.

「Hmm... Looks like you’ve got a lot of company over there too.」

Lilac eyes, bored to the point of drowsiness, swept across the Void.

She wasn't staring at me but staring past me—at my comrades, glancing back with worried faces.

「It's hard to talk in peace with them hanging around, right?」

Her lips whispered.

「Shall I clear them out?」

"Everyone! Scatter!" I instantly shouted, flinging Aura and the transmission of sound alike.

A rookie might have blinked in confusion, but my party—the last elites of this world, who had even accepted Corruption—were different. Of course, even among raiders, there were differences in reflexes.

Yu Ji-won was the fastest. "I'll handle it."

Then with no forewarning, Seo-rin flicked her hand, and the vast emptiness of the Void itself was cleaved in violet. It was a ridiculous fissure, a slash big enough to bisect the whole team. We could have been annihilated in one blow.

Ji-won charged straight at it without a heartbeat's hesitation, a spectrum of auroras slamming into the attack.

Screeeech...

Sound shouldn't carry in the middle of space, yet a warped static howled like a monster's scream—an ugly shriek stabbing our eardrums.

Impact.

The authority of Hecate collided with Leviathan, and the slash never reached us.

But not without a price.

"Hmm."

Half of Ji-won's body was gone.

The silver-haired girl glanced down and murmured, "So that's why she chose the moon, an environment where she can cast any spell at any time."

Even with half her body missing, Ji-won stayed calm.

"But how strange. The Great Witch's specialty is the Cursed Song Incantation. Melodies layered in advance should be the core of her magic. How can she fire off a grand spell this large on the spot without chanting...?"

"Heal."

Petals sprouted and scattered over Ji-won's wounds, as Ah-ryeon was already beside me, praying without expression. Where the petals passed, Ji-won's body—and even her clothing—were restored.

"Dok-seo!" I shouted. "Hold the rear with Ah-ryeon! If a spell that we absolutely can't stop comes, that's when you pop Absolute Defense!"

"R-right, mister!"

"Ha-yul, take center! Watch ahead and behind, and adjust on your own!"

[Okay.]

"Ji-won! Yo-hwa! You're with me!"

No reply was needed.

The moment her treatment concluded, Ji-won rode her Aura and shot toward the moon.

Fighting in the air—well, in space—put us at a disadvantage. On a battlefield without ground beneath our feet, Seo-rin held the upper hand. She always flew on her broom and so commanded the field. All of our experience, by contrast, was earned on solid earth.

「Hmm-hmm.」

Humming as if amused, she swept her arm through space again. This time I didn't need to shout; the whole raid was already tracking her every twitch.

"I'll block this one, Teacher!"

The same casual blow that had torn off Ji-won's limbs sliced silently between us again—

Between us.

She had aimed for Ji-won and Yo-hwa's throats, but the moment Yo-hwa snapped her fingers, the slashes corkscrewed away. By rewriting the target's perceived data, Infinite Void had made their strikes veer off as though ensnared by illusion.

Yo-hwa laughed. "Ahaha! What an idiot! Has eyes but doesn't know what you use them for!"

Kuuuu-oom!

With her razor-edged laughter, we slammed into the moon.

The boom and tremor were seismic. Any NASA tech would have fainted. Yet that mirror-smooth surface showed not a single crater or scratch.

Astronomers and physicists alike would be out of work.

"Ji-won."

Ji-won knelt the instant she landed and pressed her palms together. "Yes. I know, Mr. Matiz."

Her whole body flashed with aurora. The light ran down her legs—down, ever down. Within moments, a full-spectrum light swallowed the moon. Terraforming— No, Auraforming was the word. Ji-won's Aura rolled across a moon already twisted into Dang Seo-rin's divine realm, making a battlefield perfectly suited for us.

Gwooooo…

Behind the praying Ji-won, a sea dragon of water reared up.

Dok-seo yelped, “Eek!” and slipped. With gravity now Earth-normal, she splashed on her backside.

“Dang Seo-rin.” I stepped forward. Splash—water fanned beneath my shoe. “I’m here to return your question.”

Splash. Slosh.

The raiders followed at my back—Ji-won on my left, Yo-hwa on my right, Ha-yul behind, Dok-seo and Ah-ryeon at the rear—forming a triangular wedge aimed straight at Seo-rin.

「Ah. At last…」

「You’ll stay with me, right—forever?」

She smiled wide, yet it seemed I alone understood her. My comrades only tilted their heads.

Yo-hwa frowned. “What’d she say just now?”

[It sounded like someone dragging a crowbar across a car hood. Weird.]

“M-me too, sir. Like a TV full of static.”

Only I’d caught her words.

Odd. Ji-won could lip-read, yet even she was puzzled.

Something was fundamentally off. In this universe, somehow only she and I…

I swallowed my questions and spoke what had to be said. “Yes… I’ll stay with you.”

Her smile brightened.

「Wise decision! If you’re by my side, everything will be fine.」

She leaned against her broom.

「Saving the world is foolish. Think back to the world before it died. Was it worth saving?」

Behind her, the planets spun—Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn all circling a flattened Earth, not a shrunken Sun.

「You can't remember the worlds before cycle four, Undertaker, so you cling to a fantasy of "the world" you must save.」

Uranus and Neptune no longer existed here. Only the ancient sky of magic remained, the planets' shadows sliding over the mirror-moon.

「No one takes responsibility. They think they suffer, yet dump their pain on others without a thought.

Rather than that filthy surface, the utopia we'll build will be far more beautiful. Without fail.」

Light and shadow striped the ground beneath her like a shifting crosswalk.

At the crossroads of the cosmos, she stood.

「And if you stay with me now, you'll never have to suffer hundreds more times.」

I remained silent.

「You fear a time paradox? But why treat time's order as sacred? I can re-assemble space this beautifully, so with you, I can rebuild time as well. That is an Outer God. A miracle granted to humanity! A god truly watching over us has given us a chance to redesign the flawed human race!」

She rejoiced like a child.

「Let's rebuild humans. Let's redesign the world. Again and again, until every being is happy—even if it takes eternity! That is why you exist. You and I share a single destiny—we exist for this!」

Her words painted a vivid vision. One witch and one swordsman, forever piecing together the perfect human. We would tweak intellect, compassion, memory. Lament each failure yet never despair. Because together, even hardship became play.

But every playtime ends.

「Once the world we want is complete, we'll slip away quietly. There'll be no need for a god to meddle with a perfected world. This is better—definitely.」

Indeed. The world she dreamed of echoed the Saintess's wish and Ji-won's hope.

And yet...

"I have a question, Dang Seo-rin."

「Hmm? Ask anything.」

"The children you tried to kill, the people around me. What do they look like to you now?"

She blinked. Memories flashed.

"I love humanity!"

"I hate people. They tick me off."

"The day we first defeated the Meteor Shower, wrapped in endless sunset..."

"Humans are amazing!"

A thread of that tune still flowed in my heart.

The witch who looked just like you swept her eyes over my comrades and said lightly,

「Yeah. They're noisy, aren't they? Honestly, they've been grating on me—so noisy, noisy, noisy. Can't we talk after I wipe them away? Don't worry. I'll remake them later, and they'll be much prettier.」

...I see.

I listened to my heartbeat, then opened my eyes.

“They each have their reasons, but they chose to come here and fight. They’re a suicide squad.”

「...?」

“Dang Seo-rin would never call such people ugly. What you see and hear right now aren’t through her eyes or ears.”

「...」

“My witch... No.”

I drew my cane-sword. When the walking stick’s sheath fell away, Do-hwa gleamed.

Faced with that bright tip, Dang Seo-rin’s smile froze.

“I have come to reclaim my princess, Outer God Hecate.”

Chapter 362

The Missing XIV

Sinnoa

Dang Seo-rin's—

No.

Hecate's violet eyes faded to ash.

「So that's how it is.」

「The "Dang Seo-rin" you picture and the "me" in front of you are separate beings. Someone I can't even recall is lodged in your heart like a splinter.」

「Come to think of it, you've never really looked at me—only at the shadow of somebody else.」

The kaleidoscopic eyes that once gleamed like amethyst lost the line between pupil and iris as the planets soundlessly lined up behind Hecate stopped dead in their orbits.

"Uwaaahhh!"

But to everyone except me, the scene was different.

Dok-seo clutched her ears and writhed. "S-so loud! It's disgusting! What is this noise?! Where's it coming from?!"

Even now Hecate's voice reached me, and only me, clearly. There was no time to ponder why.

Hecate raised her broom and—crack—drove it into the mirror-smooth lunar surface.

「Then I'll kill them for you.」

「Everything stuck in your heart like thorns.」

「The ragged pieces of “Dang Seo-rin” that never made it this far. They’re useless, anyway.」

In that instant, innumerable magic circles blossomed in the dark void of space. Tens of thousands of gaping holes were etched at once without so much as a chant.

“Eek—”

Dok-seo’s squawk of panic lasted only a moment. From millions of holes, pitch-black hands shot out and lunged at the raiding party like writhing tentacles.

Ji-won and I moved at exactly the same time. I swung Do-hwa left while Ji-won drew her hand-axe right. Parry, cleave—within heartbeats, dozens of slashes severed the black hands.

“Ah.”

There were simply too many.

Clomp! One hand Ji-won missed clamped around her wrist, and the stench of rotting flesh stung our noses. Decay raced outward from the punctured skin.

“Mmph!”

“I-I’ll fix it!”

Ah-ryeon was already in position. She flung healing forth in a panic, and purple globe-amaranths and pure white lilies blossomed where flesh had rotted away. However, the spot the black hand had touched kept rotting all the same.

Before Ah-ryeon could even gasp, Ji-won swung her axe with a blank face, and with a splut, a heavy chunk of flesh went flying away—Ji-won’s forearm.

“It’s a curse,” she said evenly. Red and white petals burst from the stump, regrowing the arm at once. “I don’t yet know how it bypasses Ah-ryeon's healing. President."

Cheon Yo-hwa snapped her leg out in a kick as she shouted, "Leave it to me!"

She went about cleaning up the attacks Ji-won and I had missed while deliberately left an opening for a black hand to grab her ankle. The skin there rotted in a heartbeat. As calmly as Ji-won had, Yo-hwa severed her own foot, then snatched up the decomposed left foot.

"It isn't a simple curse, Teacher! These black hands are perfect clones built from our own biological data!" Her red eyes, able to read the fabric of creation, flashed as she explained, "The trait is Infection! Because each hand shares our exact body, when Ah-ryeon heals us the hands get healed at the same time!"

"I see."

Every comrade here had once been registered as a citizen of Utopia before escaping Hecate's realm through Corruption. Naturally, Hecate had stockpiled their data.

"Th-then guard your heads, everyone!" Ah-ryeon cried out. "Arms and legs are fine, but regrowing a neck is a pain—!"

"Gyaaa! T-too many! Way too many!"

Dok-seo swung her bat like mad, fouling off the hands coming for her.

"There've gotta be millions! Mister! I-I'm using it, okay?! Absolute Defense—I can pop it, right?!"

I tried to answer no. Hecate was throwing numbers at us precisely to burn Dok-seo's Absolute Defense early.

[No need.]

But someone beat my warning.

Ha-yul.

[Ready.]

Her voice came not from her throat but from the puppet strings. Threads as thin as piano wire, already webbed across the lunar surface, vibrated and carried Ha-yul's words.

[Ji-won unnie. Now, please.]

"Of course."

Now similar in build to Corrupted Ha-yul, Ji-won reached out. A few strands of string looped around her palm. Light welled from the spot as the Aura flooding the moon clung to the threads until hundreds of thousands of strands unfurled like an aurora. From every angle around us came a slicing sound as Ha-yul's web, charged with Ji-won's Aura, harvested millions upon millions of black hands in a single flash.

Ha-yul flicked her hand, staying expressionless.

[Easy.]

Perfect native pronunciation. As expected of a scion of that infamous collaborator clan.

[I advise nobody move carelessly.]

[Heads removed are not my fault. Probably.]

"Hah! Behold the 'Collaborator Princess's Killing Field'!"

[Whoever coined that line can be the first to lose their head.]

A gap opened. I had no intention of wasting it.

I downed the "blood" that the elder twin insisted I drink, ditched the thermos, and sprang forward with a splash. Ha-yul warned me not to act rashly, but I trusted her and pounded the ground.

One step. Two. The water of Leviathan underfoot gave my soles a gentle push. Looking closer, I was only skimming the surface—my ankles never got wet.

Water-Lily Step.

Hecate's face, so far away, rushed toward me.

Flick! Flick-flick!

Ha-yul's wires blanked out wherever I charged, instead swarming toward Hecate's position.

The moon goddess clicked her tongue.

「Cheap grappling tricks.」

She waved her hand, and slash-marks scored the void. The very slash that had taken half of Ji-won at the start sheared through Ha-yul's careful web in an instant. Freed to maneuver, Hecate tried to stop my rush by casting another circle, but...

"Pardon me."

At some point, Ji-won had already positioned herself behind her.

For the first time, dismay colored Hecate's eyes.

Seeing my head-long dash, she assumed "the Undertaker is fastest," but it was actually a feint. While she focused on me and the wires, Ji-won dove under the surface and swam the opposite way. Ha-yul's converging strings had both assaulted Hecate and hidden Ji-won's movement.

It was flawless teamwork.

"My apologies, Director."

Craaaack!

From behind, Ji-won wrestled Dang Seo-rin tight—arms, legs, and Aura binding her like perfect pro-wrestling holds.

「You—」

"Obviously this side has better odds. Blame your win-rate, not my betrayal."

Hecate fought back too late; I was already on top of her.

「 Ah. 」

Without warning I swung Do-hwa in a single arc.

First Flash.

The blade forged by a prosthetic-knight-turned-smith who died screaming in this universe cleaved both Hecate and Ji-won without discrimination.

「 ————! 」

God-Slayer.

The title once belonged to a certain pistol, yet the artifact that came closest in my books was none other than my famed sword, Do-hwa. With every loop of the world, "Infinite Void" revived, and so early in each run, I slew it at Baekhwa High with this very blade. In other words, except in vacation runs, the more my returns piled up, the more layers of "killed an Outer God" painted themselves onto Do-hwa.

Hundreds of divine deaths lacquered onto one edge.

That cursed steel pierced the Goddess of Night.

She did not escape unscathed. By holding Hecate to the bitter end, she paid with her own body, carved to pieces.

She coughed, spitting blood—blue, not red. Taking a God-Slayer hit head-on put even her near erasure, and yet...

"H-heal."

We had Ah-ryeon.

Though everything below Ji-won's waist was gone, lilies flowered to life in boundless blossoms, and her lower half regrew whole. It was a suicidal tactic, possible only because a Saintess of the North bloomed among us and because the team's trust was absolute.

“Teacher!”

Cheon Yo-hwa dashed over with Ah-ryeon and Dok-seo carried piggy-back, then set them down—Splash! Blagh! Ack! Ow!—and pressed close to me.

“Did we win?!”

“H-hey! You idiot!”

Dok-seo jerked up from where she’d landed face-down in a puddle. Even her trademark cap slid off her soaked head.

She knew Yo-hwa bears grudges forever, yet she hadn’t even faked formal speech. She must have really panicked.

Wilting under Yo-hwa’s glare, Dok-seo stammered, “N-no, that’s a flag! Say that and the boss never dies... sir!”

I approached Hecate with a splashing step. While the two ran their comedy skit, I’d kept my eyes on her.

‘It doesn’t matter if she dies now or revives whole—both are bad. We need her in suspended animation.’

Only then can we dive into her subconscious and pry the human Seo-rin free.

My collar tightened as someone came up beside me and grabbed my shirt—Ah-ryeon.

“Sh-should I heal her, Guild Leader?”

“Just keep her breathing. Let’s watch a bit longer.”

Hecate floated in the puddle, half of her body missing. However, relaxing would be fatal.

‘She’s the one who beat Go Yuri.’

For some reason, every voice but mine reached her as raw static. The same went for Go Yuri, no doubt. Her supreme brain-washing could charm anyone, anywhere, but to Hecate, it might have sounded like sheer noise. She herself had admitted she tossed Yuri's head aside because it "irritated" her.

'All living things on Earth felt filthy to her, so paradoxically enough, Go Yuri's hypnosis was sealed.'

Thus, Go Yuri's strongest weapon—Distortion—had been nullified.

'Even so, Hecate's magic feels bizarre. There was no trace of her Cursed Song Incantation lead-in, yet she fires off grand spells chantless... How?'

I stared down at her half-dead face. Then in a blink, a memory flashed before my eyes like lightning.

"Actually..."

Not that long ago...

"I heard a song."

It was back in the 999th run. Given that this is the epilogue extending from the 999th, you could call it the 1000th run.

"A song?"

"Yeah. A song, or maybe a sound. Usually it's just noise. But whenever I approach certain people or places... I hear a particular 'sound' they have."

At the intersection before the fallen-flower park, Dang Seo-rin had confessed.

"Look at the sunset overhead. You see red, right? But I don't just see red. I hear the sunset's distinct sound in my ears. It's kinda like the sound of waves."

The confession puzzled me. I knew she wove magic through song, but only in the 1000th cycle did she reveal that the entire world dissolved into "sounds" for her. The idea that she'd hidden it till then made no sense. She had no reason to.

“I can hear a song from you too. It’s very sad, but also very clear. Really faint... but really strong.”

A hypothesis crystallized.

‘What if when Seo-rin was fully devoured by the Outer God, those “sounds” warped?’

Then it hit me. Humans couldn’t perceive infra- or ultrasonic. Our hearing range was narrow. So what would happen if this universe held sounds only Seo-rin—only Hecate—could hear? To her, they’d be unbearably “loud,” “irritating,” and “grating” noise for any human ear.

‘The premise that no sound exists here is wrong. It’s the opposite—we just can’t hear it. This Void is already crammed with silent choruses she laid down in advance.’

A chill down my spine. Time seemed to drift slowly before my eyes—evidence my mind was racing.

‘Hecate isn’t spamming grand spells chantless! She’s triggering songs she prerecorded all over space! Songs we can’t hear!’

So even now her cursed chorus was singing with the volume turned to zero.

“Everyone!” The party looked over at me as I shouted, “Hecate is not defeated! Her magic is still active! Full defensive formation!”

With no questions or complaints, they snapped into place behind me. Our lines of sight combined to scan in every direction.

Ha-yul’s strings webbed anew. Ji-won’s Leviathan curled around us like a sea dragon. Ah-ryeon’s petals scattered over the water.

The moon lay in utter silence.

‘Think, Undertaker. A hint must be in my memories. My ears hear no song, and neither do the others. Yet somewhere a chorus is playing. Where? Where did Seo-rin—did Hecate—hide her song?’

The now-flat Earth below was nothing but clamorous static to her, my allies—her old allies—included. Everyone but me must have become “unbearable noise.” And so she fled to the moon, away from the din.

‘In other words…’

For Seo-rin, this Void was safe from that hellish racket. As if a gentle lullaby filled that empty space.

I sucked in a breath as another flashback washed over me. The scene coloring my mind now was, in one sense, older than the 1000th cycle yet in another, painfully present.

“Mr. Undertaker.”

Same setting.

“This world is hell.”

The moon.

“The world is hell, yet no one takes responsibility for it. They take no effort to change it, or say it’s too slow.”

Each time I slew Infinite Void at Baekhwa High, Infinite Void planted hallucinations in me: dreams of rail-travel with Seo-rin alone, of tea-time with the Saintess. And in those dreams, the setting was a silver, gleaming moon like this one.

“Just one layer.”

“Just one layer below the surface of that planet… it’s all hell.”

The Pythagoreans said the cosmos were made of ten bodies, and those ten bodies sang a “music unheard by men.”

‘In short…’

The Saintess on the moon, whom Infinite Void showed me, might have been speaking to me inside the universe Hecate had already warped.

If every clue had been foretold since then...

‘The Pythagoreans were more mystics than mathematicians. They believed the ten celestial bodies make sound as they orbit.’

Like heartbeats, like harmonies.

‘Thus, the universe is forever filled with that cosmic music, or so those ancient heretic magi believed.’

Ten bodies, a symphony in ten layers.

‘We humans grow so used to the song that we no longer notice it.’

I looked around.

‘Uranus and Neptune... They’re missing.’

First layer, Earth.

Second, the moon.

Third, Mercury.

Fourth, Venus.

Fifth, Sun.

Sixth, Mars.

Seventh, Jupiter.

Eighth, Saturn.

Unsure where the missing two layers lay, I still shouted to my comrades, “It’s the celestial bodies!”

Dok-seo blinked. “Huh?”

“The planets are singing! Each celestial body in this Void is taking part in a chorus we can’t hear! Until we destroy every last one, the magic won’t stop—Sun, Mercury, all of them! Every planet is an empty shell polluted by the Goddess of Night!”

The moment my words rang out, countless boulders blinked into being from the planets' shadows. Meteoroids packed the Void.

Blink.

Each rock bore an eye.

Blink, blink.

Millions of eyes opened and fixed on us.

One comrade managed a gasp. "Everyone, look out!"

Archmagic—the aspiration of all magicians. The ultimate sorcery.

"A meteor shower!"

A meteor descended.

Chapter 363

The Missing XV

Sinnoa

The meteors did not drift down at a relaxed tempo. Though honestly, given the giant eyes staring down from each of them, it was hard to say they should be called “meteors” at all.

Shrrrraaaaa!

The sky, already cramped by the millions of streaks making up the Meteor Shower, grew even more crowded as tentacles began to sprout from the surface of each meteor.

“Eeeek! M-m-monsters!” Dok-seo shrieked.

I couldn’t blame her. First, there were huge, bloodshot eyeballs glaring right at us, and now, several layers of thrashing tentacles had joined the show—hardly a pleasing sight.

Swaaaaah!

The meteors flared their tentacles like wings and dove in sync. Neighboring stones tangled together, weaving whole swarms in mid-air.

Ha-yul cast out her Puppet Strings. [I’ll block them. Wait, no—Abort—]

She had taken one stylish step forward, only to retreat again two seconds later and announce her surrender. The chunk she had sliced away from one meteor re-formed into “baby meteors,” each with freshly opened eyes and wings.

“Teacher! They’re not just rocks!” Yo-hwa shouted as the Meteor Shower closed in on us as if by divine punishment. “They’re more like clumps of magic! I’m seeing every buff and debuff you can name: Sever, Pierce, Replicate, Repeat, Brainwash, Sleep—”

“Ji-won, conserve your Aura.” I gave the order at once, causing Ji-won’s emotionless eyes to flick toward me. “If they share the traits of the Meteor Shower we know, they’ll try to knock us out or meddle with our heads. Aura has to serve as our last-ditch mental shield until the very end.”

“Understood.”

I turned back to the rest of the team. “All units, gather up around Dok-seo! Dok-seo, you’re on!”

Tears brimming, Dok-seo flung her arms wide and let out a keening cry. Three… two… one second before the grand-spell Meteor made of millions of boulders washed over us—

“Absolute Defence!”

Well, she could have activated the power without screaming its name, but Dok-seo would sooner die than betray her own aesthetics.

Maybe that stubbornness paid off. The subsequent effect was phenomenal.

Wham! Thud! KWA-RA-RA-RA-RUMBLE!

The meteors shattered, ricocheted, and splintered against the barrier the Miko of the Infinite Metagame had raised until dust swallowed everything in sight.

Not a single strand of hair on us had been touched.

[Wow,] Ha-yul blurted out in awe. Even if they didn’t speak up, Ji-won, Cheon Yo-hwa, and the others were all clearly impressed as well. To them, Dok-seo was merely a “mercenary we hired not long ago” and “hardly reliable.”

Only I knew her true worth.

“Dok-seo, how long can you hold?” I asked.

“N-no idea. Ugh. It’s eating a lot of stamina, but Ah-ryeon keeps spamming heals, so I guess I'm fine... Uh, at least ten minutes! Fifteen if we're lucky!"

I narrowed my eyes.

'In the original tutorial dungeon, Absolute Defence barely lasted a minute. She's managing this because she's fully Awakened as the Miko of the Outer Gods.'

Rumble! Boom!

Meteors kept raining on the translucent shield without pause. I watched as some stones didn't shatter but instead stuck to the barrier.

'The others might be relieved, but this is bad. We just traded away one of our joker cards.'

After a closer look, every tentacle from the meteors was a mass of fingers. Those fingers crawled forward and etched their nails into the shield.

"Kyaaaaa!"

[Too noisy,] Ha-yul scolded both the tentacles and Dok-seo.

"N-noisy?" the latter stammered. "This barrier is basically an extension of my own skin! It feels freaky as hell. I'm gonna hurl..."

"Ji-won, support her."

"Okay." Ji-won spread Aura over the barrier at my command, and color rushed back into Dok-seo's face.

"Huh? Oh, that's better."

"Mr. Matiz's prediction was right—it's psychic interference. If I'd burned Aura first, we'd have been battling at a huge loss now."

Ji-won launched into her usual praise of me, but I had no room to reply. The scratching—what Ha-yul and Dok-seo called "noise"—was, to me, both nails on glass and a warped lullaby:

Twinkle, twinkle, little star.

How I wonder what you are.

It wasn't only noise. It was music only I could hear.

Up above the world so high,

Like a diamond in the sky.

Nails scraped the shield in a clumsy yet recognizable rhythm and pitch, mimicking the famous lullaby.

I turned away to ask, "Yo-hwa, do you hear any singing?"

"Huh? Singing? No, nothing at all, Teacher."

The others were the same. It seemed I alone could catch the "song."

'Come to think of it, I was the only one who heard Dang Seo-rin's voice too. I'm the only person who can understand this Meteor Shower's hymn.'

Old habit drove my mind to analyze the phenomenon, even in the middle of battle.

'Every country has its own verse for that lullaby.'

The fourth verse in English describes the star as "never shutting its eye." In Japanese, the star "blinks and blinks" like an eyelid. Chinese lyrics compare it to "countless tiny eyes." Combine all that, and blinking eyes falling from the sky didn't seem odd at all.

'And what does a mother or teacher do while singing a lullaby? She strokes the child to sleep.'

So fingers sprouting wasn't strange either.

'If I expand this line of thought a little more, I might figure out how to break this meteor strike—'

"Teacher!"

Yo-hwa's call snapped me out of it. Barely seven seconds had passed, yet on a battlefield, seven seconds was an eternity.

My disciple stared at me, worried. "The number of meteors isn't dropping. If we just cower here and defend while she keeps summoning showers, we'll lose eventually."

I nodded. "Right. To break this grand spell, we have to destroy the celestial bodies that are singing out there."

"Do we... have a way to do that?" Yo-hwa glanced outside as the Meteor Shower assaulted the shield even harder than before in screeching wails. "W-we'd have to step outside first..."

That was the problem.

'The clock is ticking.'

Could we really obliterate all those orbiting planets in ten minutes? Borrowing Leviathan's power might help, but the psychic assault from millions of stones would crush anyone who spent too much Aura.

'Dok-seo can move the barrier, but not fast enough. If I dash out alone, I'll have to deal with every trap Hecate laid out there.'

One false step and we'd—

Knock, knock.

A cheery, entirely unfitting knock sounded nearby. I turned on pure instinct—and froze.

"Hiya, sunbae."

There stood the elder twin, Cheon Yo-hwa.

There she was outside the shield, standing in her black sailor uniform right in the middle of the lunar surface, smiling like nothing was wrong as meteors stabbed down all around her.

"I'm late, but I came to help. This thing's in my way, though. Could you open up for just a—”

Before I could react, one of my comrades swung a kick and blew her head clean off.

Her sister Yo-hwa had done the deed.

“Phew. That scared me half to death!”

Everyone—except Ji-won—stared at Yo-hwa in horror. The one in question sighed lightly and frowned as if wondering why we were glaring. “Huh? What? My sister’s Corrupted. That makes her an enemy.”

“B-but she’s still your sister…” Dok-seo protested meekly, earning her a snort in response.

“She got here on foot with no Aura and while dodging meteors. Does that sound human? Obviously she’s a Hecate puppet.”

“I mean, usually you’d hesitate or cry, ‘Sis! Let her in!’ or something…”

“Eh?” Yo-hwa tilted her head. “My sister’s smart. Once she decided not to Fall, she must’ve accepted death. Why hesitate now? If anything, she’d prefer that I finished her myself.”

Ah-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha…

The headless elder twin’s shoulders shook with laughter. Her body flipped onto its back and scuttled away like a spider, giggling madly as it vanished.

Silence filled the shield while meteors continued to crash and shatter above us.

[Dad. What now?] Ha-yul plucked her Puppet Strings like cello wires to say, [Hecate’s penned us in with the shower and dumped every Anomaly she can outside. Can we really smash the planets?]

I bit my lip.

‘If only I could hear the planets’ song. Maybe then, I could cancel it with counter-frequencies…’

I’d realized it too late. Had I recognized the silent chorus the moment we entered space, the tides of this battle would have swayed much more in our favor. With even the ground-side Cheon Yo-hwa turning coat, rushing out there would likely get me killed in seconds—

I blinked. “Wait. Where’s the Saintess?”

Right beside me, Ah-ryeon cocked her head. “H-huh?”

“The Saintess. Yo-hwa’s sister is down for the count, so why would the Saintess be untouched?”

Unlike the strategist sister, the Saintess had terrifying powers. Time Stop went without saying, of course, and her Telepathy alone could torment us endlessly. Had she joined Hecate, we wouldn’t be standing here, getting this chance to recuperate.

Enlightenment settled in quietly as I slowly parted my lips. “Ji-won.”

“Yes, Mr. Matiz.”

“New order. When I count one, two, three—remove all Aura restrictions.”

Ji-won studied me. “Confirming: Currently, Aura usage is locked to our strike team only. You want that lock completely released?”

“Exactly.”

“Hecate may hijack Aura. Her core, Dang Seo-rin, is a mage but hardly ignorant of its existence.”

“I know.”

Ji-won nodded, trusting me so deeply she’d follow even if I switched sides right now. “Understood. When should I free it?”

“Now. One, two… Three.”

In that instant, a miracle greater than magic unfolded.

“Eh?”

Someone gasped. Actually, all of us did, myself included.

The Meteor Shower shattered. The stones that had never once paused fell apart at once, without preamble, until shards of glass-like debris were left to drift through space. The miracle didn’t end there either. Far away, across the Void that had seemed impossible to reach—

Saturn cracked.

Jupiter split.

Mars broke.

The sun fractured.

Venus, Mercury, Earth—

A slash scored the universe.

Every celestial body arrayed in this sky collapsed in a single heartbeat, save for the pale surface beneath our feet: the moon.

Ji-won collapsed beside me, without a hint of warning.

“Wh-whoa?”

Yo-hwa hurried to catch her, but Ji-won’s eyes stayed shut. She was out cold.

Our strike team was just starting to panic when—

“Don’t worry about Ji-won.”

A calm voice and measured footfalls echoed out.

“I drained too much Aura, so she merely fainted.”

The speaker turned to me. Behind her swirled millions of shattered meteors and seven ruined planets.

The corpse of the universe cast its shadow squarely across her face.

“I’m sorry, Mr. Undertaker, ” she said. “You asked me not to Fall, but this raid needed my power. I’ll take responsibility later. For now, let us save Dang Seo-rin together.”

Awakener: Saintess

Corrupted Alias: The Executioner

Strongest member of the Regressor’s Alliance.

Has joined the party.

Chapter 364

The Missing XVI

Sinnoa

Let me digress for a bit.

Once, on SG Net, someone posted a complaint that went something like this:

- Anonymous: Damn. I finally ascended into the Awakener rank of my dreams, and life is still absolute trash...

- Anonymous: Some folks Awaken to be heroes of the battlefield for clicking “heal” once while others only get to have their fingers treated like cheap cigarette lighters...

This is the so-called Awakened Spoon Theory, based on the caste system that once ravaged the Korean Peninsula. The system had simply changed its skin and updated itself, and now, even Awakeners are divided into gold-, silver-, bronze-, and dirt-spoon tiers—or so the theory claimed.

The Spoon-Theory OP fired that shot, and a fair number of comments nodded along.

- Anonymous: Being an Awakener doesn’t automatically make you OP. If anything, Awakeners look down on weak Awakeners way more than normies do. Being a dirt-spoon makes me so miserable I could die...

□dolLHoUse: lighter bro hey o/

□Anonymous: Fact: Even a “human lighter” like that still sits in the top 0.01 % of humanity if you count normies.

□[Oriental Star]TheKindOne: Uh, sorry, but that “heal clicker” isn’t our northern Saintess, right??

LiteraryGirl: Spoons exist for those who cannot live unless they cling to spoons.

Anonymous: Ma’am, how about finishing your serial instead of philosophizing?

OldManGoryeo: Healers stand at the back with their arms folded yet get pampered. If that bugs you, smash that like button lolol

Hmm.

I watched the back-and-forth like an angler watching his float, then typed a casual reply.

- ZERO_SUGAR: Mr. Seo-Gyu.

- ZERO_SUGAR: Please don’t play anonymous here.

Seconds later, the thread disappeared.

Anyway, even though the post was nuked, that didn’t change reality—the Awakeners just had some tact when admitting to it. The gap between ordinary humans and Awakeners is nothing compared to the gulf between low-grade and high-grade Awakeners. True, the members of the Regressor’s Alliance that I recruited mostly boasted gold-spoon shine or better, but...

[Wow.]

Above any gold-spoon there is always a diamond-spoon, and ours was the Saintess. And I’m not talking about the knock-off with the “Made in North Korea” label, but the original masterpiece. Before her brand-name splendor, every other Awakener’s spoon looked one grade cheaper.

[What in the world is even happening up there?] Ha-yul muttered.

It wasn’t just her either. Every strike-team member stared upward, struck utterly dumb. Up there raged an air battle... No, a war in space. Planets that had once been split in two writhed like living amoebas, trying to fuse back together. The millions of “holes” that had turned the universe into a trypophobic nightmare were still intact. The trembling fissures were summoning Meteors again.

And every single attempt was massacred before it could sprout.

“We can’t keep this up forever.”

Such was the Saintess’s grand feat. Whenever Hecate’s night-sky spell—or the night sky itself—thrashed, the Saintess stomped it flat with Time Stop. One second, one more, and then another. With each passing instant, shards of planets and countless meteors were pulverized.

A witch who governs space versus a saintess who overpowers time. In that very moment, the cosmos was no more than a Go board where black and white stones collided.

“Even as we speak, the burden on Ji-won keeps increasing,” the Saintess noted. “Leviathan’s Aura isn’t infinite.”

“How long can she hold?” I questioned.

“Twenty-three thou... Sorry. One more hour.”

I gritted my teeth. Sorrow sang through me for making the Saintess relive her purgatory within a frozen world, but ultimately, it just meant that I had absolutely no time to hesitate. The only way to fix it was to shave whatever seconds I could off her season in that wasteland.

The Saintess looked at me. “Mr. Undertaker, are you truly sure that Hecate and Dang Seo-rin can be separated?”

I paused, then said, “Yes. I’ll be the one to do it.”

“I believed you would.” Her crystalline eyes seemed to stand alone in the universe. “The method?”

A storm of thoughts flashed through me. Some were plans drawn up before the fight. Others were insights struck during the battle. Yet even then, one knot remained untied in this operation: Cheon Yo-hwa. The elder of the twin sisters, and the architect of Project Collapse. And yet absurdly, when her turn finally came, she dropped herself from the candidate list.

‘Yo-hwa may be playful, but she’s not shameless enough to bail on an op. If anything, she’s the sort who gets addicted to risk and goes all-in. And yet… she stepped out. The only thing she left behind was that bizarre request for me to drink her blood, then she walked away from the gambling table.’

The realization was quick to hit home.

‘Impossible.’

The conclusion came even faster.

‘If she sees a shortcake, that girl saves the strawberry for last—always.’

So why fold her hand now?

‘Because only by folding can she eat the final strawberry at peak sweetness.’

And when would that final moment come?

‘Right now.’

Even with Dok-seo and the Saintess deployed, we were basically stalling. The chorus from all four cosmic walls was drawing ever closer. This lethal tension was precisely the stage that that dopamine-junkie tactician had lusted for.

‘There’s only one question remaining.’

Could I trust Cheon Yo-hwa?

Doubt painted the edge of my mind for the briefest instant, but no more.

“Find the elder Yo-hwa.”

I made my decision. I would trust myself, and I chose to trust that mischievous, orange-haired gambler.

“Even a corpse is fine. Bring her here—”

“Okay.”

The next instant the elder Yo-hwa’s body was lying there between the Saintess and me, still headless.

“Here she is.” When I stared down at the body without a word, the Saintess continued, “Oddly enough, I sense none of the Mastermind’s power. Aside from Void Poison, she’s practically ordinary—just bewitched by Hecate.”

I nodded and turned to Sim Ah-ryeon. The fight was a race against time now.

“Ah-ryeon.”

“Yeeep?”

“Check on how Yo-hwa is doing.”

“Ah... Just a sec. Mmm.” Ah-ryeon floated a four-leaf clover over her nail and studied it. “N-not dead, at least.”

“And?”

“Hard to say she’s alive either. Part human, part Anomaly, see? Kind of a suspended-animation state... Literally just entranced.”

“Like she’s dreaming?”

“Eh? Oh, yeah. And the missing head isn’t a big deal. I could regrow it anytime...”

“Then regenerate it, but don’t heal her fully awake.”

“’Kay.”

Ah-ryeon knelt before the half-corpse as I looked across to the almost-corpse’s sole relative. The younger twin was gazing down at her sister’s remains with an unreadable face.

“Yo-hwa.”

She was slow to respond. “Yes, Teacher?”

“The Tutorial fairy. Can you summon one here?”

“Y-yeah. I can!” she exclaimed, blinking in surprise. “But the fairies draw from my resource pool, so combat power won’t really go up—might even drop, since they’re all criminals...”

“That’s fine. Call one.”

“Hm-hm, okay! I’ll bring the one closest to you, Teacher.”

Pyonk!

With a comically cheap sound effect, a baku popped out of thin air: the Tutorial Fairy No. 264, red armband and all.

“Hoeeeek! At last, freedom! Freedom! What is a lord, a master? We march from the colony of scorn and oppression to the bright dawn of liberation—”

A meteor whooshed past.

The fairy spun around to find the titanic space duel of Witch and Saintess still in full swing.

“A-ahem. Truly, I was perfectly content under His Imperial Majesty’s benevolent rule. Upon reflection, living my life as a high-school security guard sounds lovely, so I’ll just head back—”

“Shut it.”

“Eeep! S-save the children from bullying!”

One curt phrase from the student council president reduced the fairy to tears.

I grabbed No. 264’s hand.

“Hoek? Comrade Secretary-General?”

“The situation is urgent. Nazi dogs press on Moscow’s doorstep. You’ve got questions—I’ve got no time. Obey orders without a word.”

The fairy’s eyes went round. “Hoeeek! The Great Patriotic War! For the eternal liberation of the working class, I’ll gladly lay this duckweed life beneath the red flag!”

“See this corpse?”

“Yes, sir! Turns out she’s the final-final boss—the elder sister of the student council president!”

“We’re entering her dream. You lead.”

“At your command!”

“Seriously…” Yo-hwa muttered. “Did they all inhale something? Why are they RPing like that?”

“They’re beings swayed by dreams—humanity’s harshest scarlet sever, you could say. Yo-hwa, assist us in entering your sister’s dream.”

“Ahh. Of course, Teacher.”

The fairy took my left hand, and Yo-hwa gripped my right. The three-link circuit enclosed the half-corpse.

I cast one last glance around, then looked at the Saintess.

“We’ll be back.”

She simply stared at me, quiet for a moment, before she mused, “You’ve thought of a method.”

“Yes. Whether it’s even possible is a gamble, though.”

“That’s nothing new for us.” A faint smile touched her lips. “Go ahead, Mr. Undertaker. I’ll guard the Mr. Undertaker who enters the dream.”

“…I’m off.”

We ended our brief farewell with a nod. The dream-demon master and minion nodded back.

This time we needed no lullaby to enter the unconscious realm.

Twinkle, twinkle, little star.

See how beautifully you shine.

Shards of endless, crumbling meteors clawed at the universe's curtain with delicate fingers, singing the nursery rhyme for us.

Yo-hwa parted her lips. "One."

The fairy chirped. "Twoooo."

"Three."

In that moment, a veil darker than the night sky and deeper than the universe fell across my awareness. It was a single curtain at first, then an instant later, it layered twofold, fourfold, eightfold—

I sank.

Plunged. Fell.

Collapsed.

Just as the sea is made of uncountable waves, I fell into a dream composed of uncountable times.

A crossroads of black and white stretching on forever.

.

.

.

.

.

.

Step.

The footsteps reached me first before my eyes even opened, while the world was still wrapped in darkness.

“It was a gamble—I won’t deny it.”

The tread carried a faint hum and a clear thrill.

“If you’re right, sunbae, then I, Cheon Yo-hwa, can’t determine on my own whether I’m Anomalous or human. Hahaha! Schrödinger’s cat? More like Schrödinger’s Anomaly.”

Step.

“So, gamble one: Will sunbae, a dead-serious hater of Anomalies, trust someone who may be nothing but an Anomaly?”

Step.

“Gamble two: Will Hecate, who is devolving into an estranged god, actually absorb me? Considering Dang Seo-rin always saw me as a thorn, the odds existed—but that’s no guarantee.”

Step.

“If that one pays off, my mind and body become a ‘passage’ leading straight into the estranged god Hecate. Naturally, I myself degrade into part of her.”

Step.

“Gamble three, the final of them: How deeply does sunbae understand me?”

...

“Will he brand me irresponsible for proposing the plan, then backing out? Or will he guess that I’m a conscious offender with my own agenda?”

…

“Will he acknowledge that not only am I human, not only am I his comrade and student, but that I—Cheon Yo-hwa, the human—am highly competent?”

Step.

“A fifty-fifty shot. If Sim Ah-ryeon drops early, or Saintess unnie can’t pull the trigger, or the younger twin fails—then the pathway into my dream gets blocked.”

Step.

“I laid every stone I could, but in the end, the only move left was ‘to put my trust in someone.’”

…

“That was the method you taught me, sunbae. Thanks for trusting me.”

Something covered my face.

Five ridges. Fingers. A palm.

Cheon Yo-hwa gently cupped her hand over my eyes.

“Mmm. To be fair, it’s not just you. The other comrades performed splendidly, each in their role.”

…

“So now, it’s my turn.”

I opened my eyes. Even then, my vision was still partly blocked by those black lines—her fingers.

The world I saw came in broken crosswalk stripes.

“One.”

Beneath the little finger, a night sky.

Meteors shattered by the thousands. While I slept, the Saintess kept dueling the Goddess of Night.

“Two.”

Beneath the ring finger, a frozen world.

Oh Dok-seo with Absolute Defence. Sim Ah-ryeon kneeling quietly beside me. Lee Ha-yul casting Puppet Strings. Yu Ji-won lying unconscious. Cheon Yo-hwa intercepting. Everyone motionless—except for the Saintess striding across the field of debris.

“Three.”

Beneath the middle finger, Noh Do-hwa’s corpse.

The tombstone drifted among earthly fragments splintered by the war of the Great Witch and the Saintess. If even one person who makes me “me” was lost, this would be the fate we were all destined to meet.

“Four.”

Beneath the index finger, static.

No form, no color—just the hiss of signals beyond human recognition. The Void always lives between our eyelids.

And under the thumb... lips.

“It might feel a bit stifling.”

At the closest crossroads in this universe, those lips whispered softly.

“But could you leave my hand where it is, sunbae?”

A tiny giggle.

“Kind of embarrassing, but to me, this place is sacred ground—the last four seasons.”

...

“After losing all black, only this curtain remains, draped solely for you. My long curtain call.”

Yo-hwa smiled.

“Well then. Shall we go, sunbae? Let’s lift the curtain and see whether only oblivion still waits there.”

Awakener: Cheon Yo-hwa (天寥化)

Corrupted Alias: Shadow Schemer

Strategist of the Regressor’s Alliance.

Has joined the party.

Chapter 365

The Missing XVII

Sinnoa

Allow me a moment to pose you a question.

Let's say you thought the story was galloping toward a happy ending. But then out of nowhere, somebody channels a shaman and proclaims, "Guys, we're doomed! Even if we hammer away at this trash game a couple hundred more times, we'll never clear it! Anyway, have fun!" Cue them dumping spoilers all over the place.

So, how do you react?

Naturally, the answer will vary from person to person. Some will despair at having to grind that already-rage-inducing game hundreds of times more. On the other hand, if you're the depraved type—names withheld to protect the guilty—you might actually grin at the fragrant stench of a forever-broken game and truthfully claim to love it.

As for the student council president's elder sister, AKA the reigning champ of the Regressor Alliance's yearly poll for "Most Sinister Personality" and the person famous for the face that screams "betrayal incoming", Miss Cheon Yo-hwa...

'I come from the 999th cycle, and from a certain angle, you could even call it the 1000th.'

To her, a spoiler from a returner merely marked the level's difficulty.

Yes, that's right. Difficulty.

It was something altogether different from embarrassment, which carried with it the necessity of emotion. Yo-hwa felt no frustration, irritation, anger, despair, sadness, hurt, or puzzlement. Her reaction was not embarrassment but acknowledgement of a conundrum. Like a gamer facing a puzzle that must be solved, she sensed only the raw difficulty level.

“Those innate blank spots you have, sunbae. The amnesia cut-off at the 4th cycle. We’ll paint causality on that empty canvas in ways that favor us. I love it—it’s very me. Smells of tricky and deviousness, which is right up my alley. But it’s a razor-thin line,” said Yo-hwa.

Was it because her five fingers blocked my sight? It went beyond her face. Even her voice rang out from different places, from and through the tiny worlds cut by those fingers, all at once.

With one hand still covering my eyes—how, I cannot guess—she was guiding me somewhere step by step.

“As you said, this is both the 173rd and the 1000th cycle. The others may be able to bear the consequences, but I walk the razor’s edge. As a human, I—Cheon Yo-hwa, your beloved student—must exist in the 173rd cycle. Conversely, in the 1000th cycle, I cannot exist.”

Exactly. Her fate is to swallow the Mastermind and be hit with a Time Seal. So by the 1000th cycle, the human Cheon Yo-hwa can no longer appear.

“Yet as an estranged god fused with the Mastermind, my position flips. In the 1000th cycle, it’s fine for me to meet you. However small the space, I’ll be in that divine realm sealed by Time Seal. But in the 173rd cycle, I mustn’t appear.”

That was the dilemma Cheon Yo-hwa faced. Human or Fallen Outer God, one side of herself must commit a temporal contradiction.

Ah-ha, Yo-hwa laughed. “Of course I could just say, ‘Screw the time paradox,’ but I feel it too.”

Finally, I asked back, “Feel what?”

“Your gut telling you that we mustn’t casually commit a Time Paradox. If we toy with the cosmic order called ‘time,’ the debts we defer will someday crash down at once. I feel that too.”

Hence the conundrum.

The first thought she had upon hearing the Regressor's confession was simply that this would be hard. Yet from birth, she has solved every problem, no matter how hard—love's puzzle aside.

"I brooded a bit and saw the answer."

This time was no different.

"'Oh? So I just have to die, right?'"

The solution was simple.

"As a human, I exist fully in the 173rd cycle. I'm a weak Awakener, yes, but I am also a non-romantic who lives by brain and strategy. And as the Mastermind—"

I need only exist in a dream.

"Specifically, your dream, sunbae." Her lips curved. "Right? The original Time Seal is no different from a dream only you can experience."

After a long pause, I said, "I see... So you waited until I entered the dream via a Dream Demon."

"Yep!" she exclaimed, her smile deepening. "And sorry, but I evicted my sister and the fairy. If they perceive the current me, it'll be trouble."

So that was why the two who'd dived with me were gone. She'd hidden this from them.

Truly, she commits the outrageous with a straight face.

"Well, someone had to serve as the corridor to Hecate. Now, sunbae, please trample my corpse and go!"

I chose not to grace that with a response.

"Aw, don't make that face. By the way, how did I die? My memory ends with the night sky falling on Utopia."

"Your sister kicked your head off."

"Eh? Ah-ha? Ahahaha!" Her palm shook the planes of my vision as she remarked, "Wow. I did tell her, you know. 'If sis goes bad, kill her.' Still, to die by her foot! Born earlier, die earlier, I guess."

"Did you egg on the Saintess too?"

"Yep. Told her, 'Fall if you must.'" She noticed my silence then. "I know the frozen world of Time Stop is hell to you. Sorry. But your feelings don't matter much." That faint smile stayed put, its edge dipping into shadow as she concluded, "Mine don't matter either."

"You..."

"I'm weak, unlike our gifted comrades. So all I know is how to pay with my life." I tried to scold her, but her next words stopped me. "Same as you. That's what a regressor is."

I had no response to that.

"Ah. We're close. Brace yourself."

A solemn footstep sounded out.

My limited view made judging distance hard—each gap between her fingers showed a different scene.

Focusing under her thumb, I inferred that we were descending stairs.

"Where are we headed?"

"The Void. The Abyss."

Step. Step. Step.

Down into darkness we sank.

"A dream deeper than dream. The realm you named Dream-within-Dream, the Unconscious World. Heh heh. Each flight down wears me out a bit... but I'll try my best."

"You okay?"

"I'm fine. But may I ask one favor?"

Step. Step. Step. Step.

Footfalls clicked in varying pitches within the fragmented view.

"Please don't move my hand until the very end."

Many sounds overlapped the steps—her breathing, a small grunt, a giggle.

"Sunbae."

The sounds echoed.

Downward, further, still deeper.

The deeper we went, the thinner Yo-hwa's breaths became.

"When I died, what face did my sister make?"

Step. Step. Step. Step.

"Aha. Figures. She would think that we weren't parting forever. What'd be the point of feeling sad? She's always been like that... She believes our twin souls are linked. Too much of a romantic, honestly."

Step. Step. Step. Step.

"I wonder. When I have the Mastermind in my grasp and vanish, what face will she make? She likely won't be able to even conceive of the reality of it, yet she'll still believe our souls connect. That girl..."

Step. Step. Step. Step.

"I'll confess only to you, sunbae. When the Void first dawned... I almost went mad when I heard my sister was trapped at school. But after you saved her, I was glad.”

Step. Step. Step.

“See, I’m always bored. It’s dull. Successor to a cult—an exotic title, perhaps, but one that’s dull to me. Too many sights too young. My dopamine system’s fried. Maybe it’s just childish bravado.”

Step. Step.

“Would you close your eyes for a moment? Yes, just like that. Just a moment… There.”

Step.

“Sunbae… Sunbae. I trust you.”

“Yo-hwa?”

Silence.

“Cheon Yo-hwa?”

I opened my eyes.

The darkness was gone.

The fingers that had gently shielded my sight, the Final Curtain rather than the Mastermind, were gone.

Yo-hwa was nowhere.

Silently, I looked down. In my palm lay a lone black hair tie.

She said she trusted me. In that last instant, what exactly did she trust? Even disappearing, how did my disciple conclude it was pure faith, not resignation?

“Been a while since I came here,” I muttered.

The Unconscious World. A place you reach only after dreaming within dreams, when time melted away like candle wax. The drain. The Void all humanity shares—the very first Void.

The guide who led me safely here was gone.

“Don’t worry.” I squeezed the black hair tie she left me. Whether driven by instinct or impulse, I didn’t know, but I deliberately spoke to keep my own continuity. “I fully grasp why you brought me here.”

And so, I took a step.

In the Void of Dreams-within-Dreams, space and time lack coherence. Chaos was the Void’s nature, and this realm jumbled even loops. Next to Haeundae’s beach unfurled a snowy field—the Nenet tundra, an impossible sight in the 173rd cycle. Under rubble lay the shadows of Old Man Scho and Adele flickered, visions unseen even by the me of the 1000th cycle. In a desert, Ha-yul played with a doll of me while Ah-ryeon sprouted from a fruit and melted like slime.

“Not now.”

They were residues of time, echoes eroded from piled-up residues. Phantoms no longer real.

“Now’s not the time to think about them.”

White sand crunched underfoot. Not sand ground by the Water of Life but sand vomited by the Void, called White Night. In it, many things were half-buried.

A broken pole. A traffic light frozen forever on red. Petals. Glass shards. Big Ben’s hands.

Beyond them lay the Beginning: the Busan Station concourse, nicknamed “the starting village” by Dok-seo.

If the world truly blooms and withers with each loop, that joke can’t be laughed off.

One step I went into the half-ruined shell. I walked into the wreckage where the shapes of loops I recalled and loops I forgot overlapped. The concourse roof gaped open like Rome’s Pantheon as light and shadow mosaicked the space through broken beams.

And beneath them sat Go Yuri.

“Welcome, Guild Leader.”

She wasn’t looking at me. Her eyes were closed, her face tilted to trace the contours of shattered sky and shadow.

She spoke.

“Sit beside me? It's a bit cramped...”

I sat.

“The sunlight here feels wonderful. You can zone out, empty your thoughts... I’ve loved this spot for ages.”

White dust motes drifted in the ruins, buoyed by the silence. So it was between us. Specks that could never become seeds glimmered in the sun then vanished into the shadows.

“It took exactly one year,” Go Yuri said.

“One year?”

“Yes. Three hundred sixty-five days.”

“...Doesn’t feel like a small time.”

“From your viewpoint, Guild Leader.”

Her eyes were still closed.

“You know well how time’s sensibility varies from person to person... Imagine erasing every scrap of time in a life that leaves no trace in memory.”

Her voice sounded somehow light.

“The breath you took yesterday. The Tuesday you played with a friend whose name and face you’ve lost. Erase it all—and fill time only with scenes truly remembered.”

“...”

“Then, looking back at death’s door, how much of eighty years remains?”

“...It’s hard to fill up even one full day’s worth of time.”

“Yes. That’s normal for humans.”

She raised the back of her hand. A mote brushed her nail.

“To live a lifetime yet collect only a single moment, clutching mayfly-length memories, and still lose even that blink.”

“...”

“I filled all three hundred sixty-five days.”

A breeze blew.

The mote vanished beyond shadow as Go Yori turned toward me.

Our eyes met.

“So for me, this moment is number three hundred sixty-five, Guild Leader.”

Chapter 366

The Missing XVIII

Sinnoa

Go Yuri had always been an unfathomable riddle to me. Her demure way of speaking, her whisper-soft voice, the scent of freshly rinsed apples, even the faint smile that lingered on her face—all of it.

"...So, what is it you'd like to talk about?"

"Oh my, were you really listening to me that attentively just now?"

As I watched her—pink hair framing a masked chuckle behind her hand—I felt it.

Something was different. Indescribably so.

"I'm sorry, Guild Leader. I was just teasing you a little."

"Teasing...? You, teasing me?"

"Yes."

The difference became clear in an instant.

'There's no impulse.'

Whenever that crisp apple scent hit my nose, a tingling electric shock would normally race from the frail edges of my brain all the way to its most vulgar core. The smell was not sliding down my throat, soaking my stomach in fruit stench. No invisible jam was being slathered along the inside of my skull with a butter knife. The ground was not falling away, the sky was not reeling, and Go Yuri's body-heat was not closing in on me with suffocating intimacy. The sudden urge to hug her, to stroke her hair, to comfort her—every impulse was sinking quietly beneath the surface.

‘It’s calm.’

Everything was serene. Go Yuri’s profile, bathed in sunlight pouring through the ceiling, was serene. The half-shadowed throb of my own heart was serene.

All of it.

How long had it been since I’d felt such peace in Go Yuri’s presence?

“The thing in your hand,” she said. “Is that Cheon Yo-hwa’s hair tie?”

“...It is.”

“Wow. Looking closely, it’s the very ribbon she wore the first day she met you, isn’t it? Do you remember?”

I had no idea how Go Yuri could know a memory I myself could not recall. Whether she was spinning a plausible lie was impossible to judge.

She smiled brightly. “It’s a treasure. A gui-mul. You would call it a ghostly relic, but take that same word and put it in a different context, and you get a precious object. I think this gui-mul is the latter.”

“This hair tie?”

“Yes. Something left behind by someone who kept believing in herself until the absolute end. How truly strong of will. Even in this place where every object is slipping into chaos... it stands out so clearly.” When I didn’t respond, she continued, “People devote an entire lifetime to coloring in an hour’s worth of memories, yet to some, that single hour can be as beautiful as a piece of music.”

Maybe so.

I couldn’t explain the logic behind it, but this thing Cheon Yo-hwa had prepared was somehow letting me keep this mirror-calm, even in front of Go Yuri. In exchange, Yo-hwa had vanished.

True to her word, she only knew how to pay with her life.

“To be honest, I don’t dislike Cheon-hwa at all.”

The confession came out of nowhere. “Cheon-hwa?” I asked reflexively.

“Yes. The elder sister is Cheon-hwa, the younger is Yo-hwa. That’s how I distinguish them.” I had never heard anyone separate their names like that, but Go Yuri carried on as if it were obvious. “If I had to judge, the comrade who resembles me most is Cheon-hwa.”

“Sometimes, you say the most absurd things.”

“Oh, I’m not talking about personality. Our personalities couldn’t be more different. I mean our way of thinking has similar twists and turns.” Then a short little laugh tinkled out of her. “Dang Seo-rin killed the ‘me’ outside. Thanks to her, even if only for a short while, I can act a little more freely.”

Go Yuri rose to her feet. Hands folded neatly before her, she slowly turned toward me.

“Will you come with me?”

I kept silent, simply looking up at her, when she suddenly struck an awkward pose. “Rawr!” she mock-growled—a childish tiger noise.

“And that is supposed to be…?” I questioned warily.

“Ahh. You were staring as if I might swallow you whole. Don’t worry, Guild Leader, I won’t eat you. Mmm… Although, that sort of unexpected event could be fun. But asking me to loop another 365 days just for entertainment would be far too cruel a future for me.”

I had no idea what she meant. The unnatural impulses had vanished, but Go Yuri’s unpredictable behavior remained. Still, I stood up to follow.

“By the way,” she began, “you have to step where I step and nowhere else, all right? If you don’t, even Cheon Yo-hwa won’t be able to protect you.”

“You should’ve led with that. Are you stupid?”

“Ahaha!” Go Yuri smiled softly. Being called stupid by me seemed to put her in the highest spirits.

“Fine,” I grumbled. “I don’t mind following. This place is practically your own divine realm, anyway. But at least tell me where we’re going.”

“To Dang Seo-rin’s house.”

I froze, caught mid-crouch just as I was about to stand. My eyes found Go Yuri’s, creased into twin crescent moons.

“Have you ever been there?”

I hesitated for a long moment before admitting, “Seo-rin’s house was a flower shop in Busan. It closed after her family was massacred.”

“Yes. Have you been inside?”

“When I regressed, it was already destroyed. Seo-rin never considered those ruins a home.”

“Yes.” Go Yuri’s gaze narrowed, and she insisted, “Have you been there?”

I had not. “Of course not… Anyway, it’s impossible now. The place no longer exists.”

“Dang Seo-rin was born at home.”

“What?”

She began to walk ahead of me, leaving me behind. I almost stopped her but immediately remembered her warning.

Follow my footsteps.

I placed my feet exactly where hers had tred.

One step. Two steps.

She never looked back, certain I would keep pace—or perhaps signaling that if I slipped even once, that would be the end of that.

“You’re telling me she was born at home... not at a hospital?” I mused. “That’s rare nowadays. Was that what her parents wanted?”

“Who knows? You should know, all of her younger siblings were born in hospitals.”

With each stride she took, the scenery shifted. If I’d had any mischief left in me, I would have joked that her footwork was some advanced technique.

“If Seo-rin was born at home, and if the ‘home’ you speak of is not merely a physical location but a space imbued with ritual meaning, then it too must be part of Hecate’s divine realm,” I realized.

“A sound deduction.”

“Even if this is a dream-within-dream and even if you’re irregular beyond all comprehension, can you really trespass on another Outer God’s territory at will? The mirror in Ji-won’s room can at least—”

“No need for that,” came her matter-of-fact answer over her shoulder. “That Magic Mirror is nothing more than a degraded copy of the moon.”

“What?”

“You thought Hecate descended on the moon’s surface and decided it looked like a mirror, didn’t you? It’s the other way around: The moon resembles the mirror. Ancient people believed another world existed up there in one way or another. The world in a mirror seems to exist yet not exist. A place that is nowhere. All of them, every one of them: utopias.”

Her explanation was easy to follow. Perhaps because, voice and tone aside, the logic she used to discuss Anomalies was almost identical to mine.

As though she were mimicking me.

As though she had learned from me.

Talking to her felt like standing before a mirror.

“I understand your logic,” I granted after a pause. “But then why has the Magic Mirror always appeared near Ji-won instead of Seo-rin? Ji-won has nothing to do with it.”

“Ahaha. Mmm... Guild Leader, you’re usually brilliant, yet sometimes you overlook the simplest points. How troublesome.”

“I don’t follow.”

“Yu Ji-won is beautiful.”

I almost replied, As beautiful as you, and would have if not for Cheon Yo-hwa’s hair tie. While I kept my mouth shut, her voice flowed on.

“Guild Leader. To a breathtaking, moonlit beauty like her, it is only natural to bestow a replica of the moon.”

“What? No, uh...”

“You really should look more honestly at the faces around you. I know you feel as if you’ve lived for tens of thousands of years, but if you let basic human senses dull, things get complicated.”

That almost sounded like she was scolding me.

“Did you know? Whenever your other comrades have to wedge themselves between you and Princess Kaguya, they get incredibly tense. Yu Ji-won won’t consider feelings like those, so you have to be the one to step up, Guild Leader.”

Yep. Whatever the reason, it sure seemed like I was being lectured by Go Yuri.

– Undertaker.

I jolted, startled to find Dang Seo-rin standing just beyond Go Yuri’s shoulder.

– Do not be fooled by that thing.

It was unmistakably Dang Seo-rin. Black cloak laundered clean, witch's hat perched—the Great Witch of Samcheon World was staring straight at me.

– If you follow it, you're finished. You know this, right? Cheon Yo-hwa is an Anomaly and so is that thing. The very fact it brought you here is the trap.

"Please don't listen, Guild Leader," said my pink-haired guide, cutting off my silence at Seo-rin's whisper. "Ahh. Well, actually, you can listen if you like... Hmm, no, actually it does matter. But even that's part of your choice... Will you listen?"

– Don't be deceived.

Buildings of sand-laced concrete. Rust-stained signs pointing to a traditional market. Traffic lights flickering red.

Everything behind Seo-rin was collapsing.

– You're misunderstanding something. You think no temptation is reaching you? That this version of it is different? Since when did you trust your own senses so completely in front of this thing?

"Time is short. I'll go ahead, Guild Leader."

Ignoring it all, Go Yuri's heels stepped over the street ruins. Her back receded one pace at a time.

Seo-rin looked at me.

– Even that act is part of the play.

– It's pretending it doesn't care whether you follow, because that indifference works on you.

I...

– Trust me, Undertaker.

– Do not follow it.

I followed Go Yuri's footprints.

– ...Why?

– Why? Why? Why?

Every time I stepped, Seo-rin appeared—by a moss-covered wall, beside a bent storm drain, under a rusted sign.

– Liar.

– You said you liked me. You told me you'd stay with me. Liar, liar, liar, liar—

Her voice became a blood-slick blade carving into my heart.

I could have answered in many ways. This Seo-rin wasn't the real one. If she saw the pink entity, it would mirror my face, so how could she tell us apart? If she used the presence or absence of static as a clue, then all creation still sounded like noise to her—that was Hecate's mark.

– Don't go.

– Please don't, Undertaker.

Seo-rin sank to her knees.

– No. No. Don't go. No...

Yet Go Yuri kept walking and so did I. She glanced back, eyebrow twitching in surprise that I was indeed following. Then a smile touched her lips and she faced forward again, treading across the ruined city.

"A sanctuary—no, a divine realm—always has an outer ring and an inner core," she exposited. "Picture an onion made of countless growth rings. The lower an Anomaly's rank, the thinner its layers. The higher, the thicker. There's a Kafka short story called 'An Imperial Message.' Have you read it?"

“I have.”

“Read it again. It helps with the imagery. Like the emperor’s palace, an Anomaly’s realm is itself a nine-fold palace. To cross a wall, you either march through the gate or clamber over by brute force.”

Something was off. I’d said I’d read it, yet she’d spoken as if I hadn’t, reciting her lecture calmly—as though addressing not only me but another unseen listener.

“In the past, Guild Leader, you slipped into Hecate’s realm through what you might call a dog-hole.”

“A… dog-hole?”

“But shortcuts seal quickly. That’s why you never reached Hecate’s realm again.”

She must have been referring to the 267th cycle, when that cycle’s Saintess sacrificed herself to seal Hecate’s domain.

“You’ve realized patchwork fixes can’t sink the world. A direct assault is the answer. Hecate is the goddess on the far side of mirrors, the Mistress of Utopias. To approach her essence, we must keep stepping onto one nowhere after another.”

We exited the market into an intersection that opened before us. There was a potato stew joint, a café, an auto-repair shop. Ruined yet recognizable buildings dotted the street.

I now knew exactly where we were. It was the town where Dang Seo-rin once lived.

“Hecate’s perfect city in Busan—first step.”

– Undertaker.

“This stage that you agreed to forget entirely once it’s over—second step.”

– Don’t go there.

“The moon itself, remade from Earth’s satellite into a planet-sized mirror—third step.”

– Why are you choosing to be fooled?

“The dream of a corpse whose personality has flown away—fourth step.”

Go Yuri crossed a crosswalk littered with scrapped cars. I followed.

Ahead stood a flower shop.

– Please.

The shop was strangely intact. That was both bizarre and natural at once. Bizarre because when I visited this town with Seo-rin, the greenhouse had already been cinders. Natural because in a dream-within-dream, anything could happen.

“It’s no coincidence.”

She read my mind with a voice colder than any since our reunion.

“This is the product of chance that isn’t chance. Cheon-hwa overlaid a simulation of this universe onto the dream-within-dream using the Mastermind’s power.”

“...Yo-hwa.”

“The Mastermind can run simulations beyond time. The dream-within-dream only supplied the material. This greenhouse isn’t an accident—it’s Cheon Yo-hwa’s inevitability.”

“...”

“Listen carefully. Remember it. Don’t miss a single piece.

Without Yu Ji-won, we lack combat strength.

Without Sim Ah-ryeon, we can’t replenish that strength.

Without Lee Ha-yul, Ji-won’s power drains too early.

Without Oh Dok-seo, Undertaker has no time to think.

If Undertaker can't think, the Saintess can't stand.

Without Yo-hwa, there's no passage into dreams.

Without Cheon-hwa, the dream-within-dream loses its shape."

"…"

"Do you understand? You have one chance only. If even one shard —just one—is lost, we can't reach this place."

She looked at me, or perhaps through me to someone else.

Under that multilayered gaze, I asked without thinking, "And you?"

For the first time, she paused. "Pardon?"

"If countless inevitabilities are required to come here, you must be one step yourself. What role are you playing?"

She blinked, entirely unprepared to hear that from me. "Oh dear. Am I, perhaps, counted among your comrades, Guild Leader?"

She giggled, and for some reason I couldn't answer. After studying me, she parted her lips.

"The dream-within-dream, the so-called unconscious world. Its Void that exists yet scoffs at reality is the fifth step."

– No no no no no

"And me." She touched her chest. "As you know, I'm the sixth step, Guild Leader."

My heart pounded with no cause.

"I'm the nonexistent human, the ideal form strolling among you, utopia stuffed and mounted while still alive."

She turned her back to me to gaze at the sign that read Dang Sect Flower Garden. Seo-rin once complained that her father's obsessed with wuxia had led to said name.

“Only the last step remains.”

She reached out, fingers closing on the greenhouse’s steel latch.

Once the door opened, that would be the end.

Go Yuri drew a long breath. “Ahaha. Sorry, I’m a little nervous too… Truth is, climbing to the seventh step is a first for me. It was a massive gamble, and honestly? Even now, I can’t guarantee the door will—”

Her eyes widened, taking in the sight of my hand covering the back of hers.

“Let’s open it together. I’ve guessed who you’ve been talking to all this time. Oh Dok-seo, right?”

Her gaze lingered on me. She breathed, smiled, and spoke. “It has to be the 366th.”

Each word, crystal clear.

“365 days make one year—sun and moon and night sky ruled by Hecate’s symbols. But 365 isn’t enough.”

Not to my present self nor my future self, but straight toward the slowest prophet who would one day spy on this moment. Epimetheus.

“A leap year.”

Go Yuri said:

“The surplus day calendars can’t capture, the empty day, the gateway Hecate’s magic must leave ajar… This door opens only in that instant.”

A strange déjà vu seized me. When I’d declared I would fight Hecate, these words had slipped from my mouth:

“My witch… No. I have come to reclaim my princess, Outer God Hecate.”

Never once had I thought of Dang Seo-rin as a princess, yet in that moment, the title came as naturally as breath. Why?

‘The leap year. The character 윤(閏) meaning intercalary.’[1]

A king (王) behind the door (門). In other words…

‘Open this door and the princess awaits.’

I was certain I’d stood here once before, though no memory contained it.

“Well then, Guild Leader. Shall we see if we’ve succeeded?”

Who had been beside me then?

“One. Two… Three.”

With her palm under mine, we pushed the greenhouse door. Perhaps because no one had come for ages, the flimsy vinyl door refused to budge. As the hinge squealed, Seo-rin’s silhouette screamed within the plastic.

– Aaaaaaaaaaaah!

– No, don’t, no, Undertaker, stop, don’t look, don’t, die, die— No! Undertaker, ah, no…

My hand faltered, but Go Yuri’s other hand covered it. Palm over palm.

We exchanged a silent glance, nodded once, and together pressed on the thinnest vinyl door.

For a heartbeat, the hinge’s groan and Seo-rin’s shriek ceased. Then —

The door opened.

Footnotes:

1 - Intercalary: (of a day or a month) inserted in the calendar to harmonize it with the solar year, e.g., February 29 in leap years.

Chapter 367

The Missing XIX

Sinnoa

Death makes everything disappear.

Take him, for instance. He was born not of the lawful wife but of a concubine.

“We’re all family.”

So said his father, the clan head who once wore a national assemblyman’s gold badge.

“We are one house. One. All of you must grow up to be pillars of this country, so no fighting. Understood?”

While his father lived, he had power enough to define what “family” meant. He never cast out his illegitimate son, nor did he let the boy’s mother drift between rented rooms.

That power endured only so long as his father’s heart kept beating.

“Son, we’re moving again.”

Not long after his father’s death, he helped his mother pack, yet something was strange about it. Yes, how strange indeed for a family “moving house,” that none of his other siblings were to be seen.

‘How odd,’ he thought. Why did only Mother and I have to tip-toe around gathering boxes?

Perhaps the luggage was simply too heavy. Maybe the two of them were the advance unit, carrying the burden ahead of the others.

It took him three full years to realise that he himself was that heavy “luggage.”

“My son, clever like your father.”

He understood many things. Why the new home was smaller than the old, why the neighborhood felt darker, why he would never ask Mother to confirm what he already knew, why silence tasted of guilt, and how guilt was laced with love.

“Clever like your father, but promise me one thing... Never join the army... Never.”

He wanted to know the world.

Sometimes, while rifling through the newspaper, he spotted his “brothers’” names in print. On pages that claimed to weave a net wide enough to catch the world in letters, it seemed the world itself was nowhere to be found.

‘How very strange.’

Death makes everything disappear.

Take her, for instance. She was born the daughter of a prosperous orchard owner.

“Oh, that man! Honestly, oh dear...”

Her father was a womanizer. One day, he brought home a younger half-brother from the orchard, and for some reason, her mother bullied the child mercilessly.

“I can’t live like this! Oh, honestly...”

She hated the sound of her mother’s sighs, so she ran from them. She felt she could only breathe in a place where sighs couldn’t reach. She told her parents she was off to play with friends, but the truth was so very slightly different. Every day was a small escape from home.

In exchange for abandoning the house, she received the world outside: the scent of acacia blooming along the orchard lane, the rattle of a red bicycle her father had bought in secret, the smell of water and wet soil in the ditch between spring and summer.

‘Beautiful,’ she thought each time she returned, carrying all those outside things in her young breath.

The world was lovable.

“Really! Your father will be the death of me!”

In all the world, only human beings seemed to live half a handspan away from that love.

Her eldest and second-eldest sisters both went to study in Seoul. She, on the other hand, chose another city. Mother lamented that her grades were too good to waste, but Father backed her.

“Someone has to stay close to home. You can’t turn them all into Seoul snobs.”

She entered Busan National University. During a campus exhibition, she saw the shadow of a male student dragging fallen leaves along the edge of the quad, and the thought came to her quite unconsciously.

‘How beautiful.’

She loved him, and he loved her.

Love is fearless.

“What shall we name the baby?”

“I’ve been thinking. Help me decide.”

They spoke to each other in polite form. To them, it was a token of respect and affection, but in truth, it was a scar each had inherited from their respective parents. They did not yet know that marriage meant exchanging even the wounds you never knew existed.

“How about this?”

“If it’s a boy, it’s my choice.”

“If it’s a girl, it’s yours.”

There was so much they did not know, and so much yet to learn.

Their hearts pounded. The young couple visited fortune-tellers, leafed through name dictionaries, feeling out their own ignorance one careful fingertip at a time.

“If it’s a boy, San. A single-syllable name.”

“If it’s a girl, Seo-rin.”

A child was born. Her name was Dang Seo-rin.

How strange, how beautiful.

“…”

Death makes everything disappear.

Around the time their second child came into the world, his mother died. Not long after, her father and mother also passed. There were suddenly far fewer people left who could testify about their parents.

No one remembered how his father became an assemblyman, what hardships he had endured, or why he insisted on being “one family” while keeping both a wife and a concubine. No one remembered why, after bearing three daughters in a row, his mother could not accept the son her husband suddenly brought home, or why she pushed her daughters so hard toward good universities.

Death makes everything disappear.

“…”

Dang Seo-rin first learned that death existed when she was seven.

“Seo-rin seems to like flowers.”

“Let’s hope she grows out of eating them.”

“…”

Little Seo-rin could often be found squatting in the flower shop her parents ran. Surrounded by plants taller than she was, she would gaze up at the suncast shadows falling through the greenhouse film.

‘How strange.’

Sunlight glinted off the glossy green peony leaves in ephemeral sheens.

‘Beautiful…’

Everything was like sunlight. It shone for only a moment, yet it was beautiful. If beauty was that great, why not stay a bit longer? It was strange that it existed only briefly.

The world was strange and beautiful.

So beautiful, yet strange.

“Sis-ter!”

“Da-a-ad.”

Little brothers and sisters. Dad. Mom.

Her family.

From the day the suncast shadow rusted on a peony leaf, Dang Seo-rin decided to accept this “strange yet beautiful something.” She thought that must be the original form of life. In truth, it was the shape that her parents, and their parents before them, had gnawed into the apple-core of life over their own lifetimes—a shape still too large to swallow, now handed down to her.

For millions of years, through hundreds of billions of branches.

‘Live,’ she told herself.

Dang Seo-rin, too, was prepared.

‘Live on.’

Being hurt by people. Hurting people. Fighting. Fearing. Protecting. Abandoning. Forgetting. Remembering.

Just like Mother. Just like Father.

‘Live on.’

Who would she meet?

Would that luck come?

Would she bear a child? What was love? Was love for a partner different from love for a child? Where would she live? How? Would she be wounded? Would she wound? Where would they meet? What songs would she like?

‘I will leave proof that I was here.’

‘The world is so wide.’

As billions of humans before her have done, from ages and millennia past.

Her heart, shaped like an apple, beat fast.

‘Just watch me.’

‘See what I despised, see what I loved.’

‘I am Father and Mother’s beloved daughter, my siblings’ proud elder sister.’

‘My name is Dang Seo—’

And then the Void arrived.

Creeeeeeak!

When we pushed open the greenhouse’s semi-opaque door, a garden drenched in blood opened up to us.

There she was, right there at the entrance. As though she had tried to flee and failed, a child net yet old enough to have passed into high school was skewered on a plant stem.

“This is...”

“Seo-rin’s little sister,” Go Yuri said, half a step ahead of my own thoughts. “You’ve seen her, haven’t you, Guild Leader?”

I had. While purging Infinite Void, I’d wandered through the barrier it cast and glimpsed a vision of Seo-rin with her siblings. This, too, was a vision—yet the mangled corpse before me was brutally real.

“So it really happened.”

“I believe so... Honestly, I’m amazed the door opened at all. Thank goodness LiteraryGirl didn’t betray us.”

Bang!

Something slammed behind us. Turning, I saw a black handprint splattered on the vinyl wall.

Slap! Slap, splat!

Handprints multiplied, clutching the handle, shaking the door, clawing ragged furrows through the film.

“Ah. Mhm.” Go Yuri wore a troubled smile. “They don’t know the meaning of giving up... though with a vow binding them, they probably can’t even if they want to.”

“A vow?”

“Pardon me, Guild Leader, but I’ll stay back to be on guard.” She planted herself politely in front of the entrance, her body blocking the door. “Hogging all your time to the very end wouldn’t be so bad, but you’re going to forget everything that happens in this realm and in this cycle, anyway.”

“...I still have many questions for you.”

“I know. But as I said, you won’t remember this moment.”

Thud! Bang, splat!

Black handprints papered the greenhouse behind her, staining it pitch-dark.

“Repeating the same conversation over and over... I dislike that, Guild Leader. It wears the heart thin. Unless... Would you rather become one with me?”

Splat.

A palm of darkness grabbed Yuri’s ankle, yet she remained unruffled.

“That, too, would be a kind of ending. I wouldn’t mind.”

“Whatever ending you mean, if it’s not a happy one, my own death is already booked,” I flatly refused.

“Aha? Ahaha.” Her lips curved to reveal a crescent moon of white. “Noh Do-hwa. Yes, indeed... How fascinating. The being farthest from Anomalies lays a spell on the being closest to them.”

Slap. Slosh, splatter.

Countless hands engulfed her shoes and ankles but advanced no higher, as though an invisible barrier blocked their climb.

“I understand, Guild Leader.” She pinched the hem of her skirt between finger and thumb and dipped in an elegant curtsey. “Farewell. Let’s meet again somewhere you will not remember.”

“...Thank you for guiding me this far.”

“Not at all.”

Yuri did not lift her head.

“On the contrary, I thank you. Always.”

I turned and took a step deeper into the greenhouse, toward Hecate’s innermost sanctum. After several more paces, I glanced back.

Only darkness remained.

Somehow, I could sense it. With that single step, a whole timeline had split clean away. In an Undertaker-style choice box, I must have seen two options until a moment ago:

[1. Walk to Dang Seo-rin]

[2. Stay with Go Yuri]

Had I not escaped brainwashing and temptation, the game would surely have forced Option 2 on me.

Gripping Cheon Yo-hwa's black hair tie, her final relic, a precious object or a ghostly relic, I hurried on. Beyond lies the secret Seo-rin wanted most to hide, the truth veiled by Hecate's night sky.

'Go.'

Every few steps, another body littered the garden. A boy about high-school age... Seo-rin's second sibling. The child at the entrance had been the youngest brother; she'd tried to save him. Each corpse had been sliced by mutated leaves or impaled on stems—

It was the scene that had branded Seo-rin's life, her lifelong trauma now laid bare.

'Layered bodies.'

Her siblings... and there, on the mother's side. They hadn't run far.

The vision overlayed the corpses. Plants once lovingly tended had been infected with Void-poison en masse. Perhaps they'd been contaminated long ago and the incubation simply ended in this moment.

"Run!"

Who had shouted?

The family lived at the shop. Schools were closed due to the emergency situation, so the youngest and the second youngest were home.

“Dad!”

“Sani, go! Go call for help!”

“O-o-okay!”

“Big sister is inside!”

Their struggle meant nothing. In those early days, there was too little information about Anomalies. Who would have guessed that plants might turn into monsters?

The father, the mother, the second, the third, the youngest. All slain in moments, within meters of each other. An ordeal beyond what ordinary people could bear—

No, I correct myself. The Anomaly Garden was simply too powerful. Most Awakeners of the time could not even hope to handle it.

My heart pounded as I stepped onto the garden where present illusion and past remnant intermingled, passing by Seo-rin’s father’s corpse with memories linked to every sight.

“My little siblings…”

It wasn’t a distant memory.

“My siblings kept begging me to just abandon the shop and run away with Mom and Dad, but I told them… I told them to trust their big sister, but then I… I had this thing about guilds…”

In the 999th cycle, Seo-rin herself had made a confession in the Garden of Fallen Flowers.

“I kept chasing after this dream of forming one… By the time I came back, no one was home. I went to the shop, and… If I just hadn’t, then…”

When the tragedy struck, Seo-rin had not been at the scene, according to her own testimony. That means that after her family died, she returned to this place. Thus, the plant Anomaly that had drunk her family's blood was still alive at the time, and for Seo-rin to survive, she'd had to slay it. Obviously, without killing it, she too would have died before she could avenge anyone. So now—

'Could she have done it?'

Could she, an Awakener who was still low-level, with no experience, who'd been ambushed without time even to chant her Cursed Song...

My heart hammered. Thoughts may stop, but heartbeats never do. It pumped blood into my legs, urging the next step and the next.

'If Seo-rin had somehow taken revenge, burning the whole garden, then why did the sight of flowers still drive her into panic? Something's missing.'

Revenge never restores what is lost, but it does make you stronger than your loss. Flowers alone shouldn't break her. She ought to be furious, burning every bloom on sight.

'Yet after successfully taking her revenge, at least supposedly, she still collapsed at the sight of flowers. Why?'

No.

My heart skipped.

No, my premise was wrong. It was the reverse. It wasn't strange that she broke down despite getting her revenge. She broke down because her revenge had failed.

Seo-rin did not avenge them. She must have fled. She'd opened the greenhouse and immediately realized how dire the situation was. Her youngest brother was already dead at the entrance, after all. She raged and she despaired, and yet she was clever. Even in chaos, she accurately judged that she couldn't beat this Anomaly now.

So she ran, vowing to come back. A reasonable conclusion to make.

'But then why didn't she tell me the truth?'

If that hypothesis was right, someone else must have destroyed the garden later. When I visited with Seo-rin, it was ash.

‘Another Awakener, perhaps, while Seo-rin was in shock?’

Yet the Saintess was observing all major Awakeners with her Clairvoyance by then. Had another been present, she would have noticed.

‘And the Saintess never mentioned it.’

She wouldn’t hide a secret of this magnitude.

‘Therefore… she didn’t see the tragedy at all?’

I had never asked the Saintess about Seo-rin’s past. In fact, I’d asked her not to watch during my private meetings with Seo-rin, and she respected that.

Thump, step.

Heartbeat and footsteps resonated until, at some point, I reached the garden’s abyss.

There lay Dang Seo-rin, dead.

My breath seized in my throat. It was a scene of slaughter. Leaves sharp as knives, stems thick as skewers, had shredded her.

Death makes everything disappear.

No one remembered that he, who fought a monster for the first time to protect his family, was an assemblyman’s illegitimate son who, without a speck of help from the main house, had succeeded in running a flower shop in Busan.

No one remembered that she, who shielded her children, once loved the breath that rose off country roads and smiled when she bit into a peach her father had picked at dawn.

Between that man and that woman stood Dang Seo-rin.

She was quick-witted from childhood and keener still as she grew. When half of Seoul's citizens vanished in an instant and the masses fled Busan for Japan, Seo-rin argued that Busan would prove safer. History had shown that Busan would be Korea's last bastion. Secure a foothold now, fortify it with land and connections, and it would be a far safer stronghold than a Japanese city where they had no ties.

It was the right call, yet no one would remain to remember that rightness.

Death makes everything disappear—lives, loves, futures.

As half of Seoul ended in one blink, the massacre in this Busan garden was merely another day in the Void's routine.

The father. The mother. The second. The third. The youngest.

And the eldest—born for brilliance.

'Ah.'

Dang Seo-rin was dead.

"Ru...n..."

When the garden turned butcher, Seo-rin was struck first. The father could not abandon the child he loved beyond all else. Neither could the mother. They merely tried to save the remaining children, but the stems were too swift. She'd turned her back, shielding the child, and the spike pierced them both.

"Ah... ah... Mom..."

Yet even then, Seo-rin had not died but instead lay dying.

The father fell. The mother fell. The siblings toppled one by one.

Red flooded her sight.

"Dad..."

Death drew near.

Was she afraid? She seemed afraid.

Everything disappears.

Had even one family member survived, she would not fear so much.

Someone would remember.

Someone would remember our family.

“Ah...”

But all of them were dead.

Mother’s lovely smile, Father’s face when he puzzled over pots, their voices, the clothes that suited the youngest, how much she loved her family.

All of it, for a ridiculous reason like this, sank into the Void forever.

...

Seo-rin’s lips moved soundlessly.

No voice emerged. A scream that could not become sound trembled in silence.

No.

‘How unfair.’

O God.

Facing absurdity, she did what humans often do at the last: She called upon the most absurd being humanity ever conceived.

Please, O God. Just once more.

Her empty eyes, already stained with death, looked up through the torn greenhouse roof to see moonlight spilling down.

Give me a next time...

The vinyl quivered, but there was no wind. Perhaps it shook with her own ragged breath.

Everything I have, I will give it all away.

It was a sincere vow yet a contradictory wish. If she gave truly "everything," then even if time was granted, it would no longer be hers.

My name, my life, all my future, every memory... take them all.

Let me live... as a human being.

She meant it. To live as human, she would gladly surrender humanity.

She prayed for the paradox.

Present yet impossible.

I refuse.

I refuse this ending.

The garden fell silent. There was no breathing, no groans. Only plants squirmed, feasting on what remained of humans.

Dang Seo-rin was dead.

"..."

Moonlight tilted.

Moonlight is only sunlight reflected, yet people insist on calling it moonlight, as though a separate world lies beyond the mirror.

A shadow, not the real.

A being known only by an alias, not its true name.

Moonlight poured onto Seo-rin's corpse.

To the moon, it was natural: All things on earth are mere shadows momentarily reflected somewhere else.

Human yet not human.

Alive yet not alive.

Possessed yet bereft.

The light of the night sky at last found an anchor to exist upon the earth.

And in that instant—

"..."

—Dang Seo-rin opened her eyes.

Chapter 368

The Missing XX

Sinnoa

The flower garden went up in flames, incinerating with it the Anomaly that had drunk deep the family's blood as it turned into a billow of white-black ash that scattered on the wind.

In the very heart of the infernal blaze stood Dang Seo-rin, stunned. With hollow eyes, she looked around. Her gaze snagged briefly on the bodies of her family, then reached my face and waned into a half-lidded stare.

She smiled. "You saw it, didn't you?"

The flames raged, framing the greenhouse in scorching flames that embroidered shifting shadows across Dang Seo-rin's face. Even that smile, worn only because she had no other expression at hand, was stained in shadow.

"Yeah, that's right. I already died once... Granted, I only recalled that fact a little while ago. Up until then, I thought I'd simply lost my mind when the Anomaly killed my family at our shop, and that I'd beaten the thing to death in that frenzy."

It was memory distortion. Hecate had answered Dang Seo-rin's wish —"I want to keep living as a human"—by gifting her a new life, one created by rewritting the memories so that Seo-rin had survived the conflagration in the garden.

No, calling it "memory distortion" might itself be imprecise.

"I... was born in that moment."

Just as Go Yuri had hinted with that strange testimony of hers: that unlike her younger siblings, Seo-rin alone had been born at home.

"A child who lived until then and died then. I took the memories of the human called ‘Dang Seo-rin’ and was born here, in the midst of these flames.”

“Hecate...”

“Mhm.” Dang Seo-rin removed her witch’s hat. “Moonlight is nothing but sunlight reflected once. I’m the same, an Anomaly merely reflecting the light of the girl named Dang Seo-rin.”

She was an Outer God. This forsaken god, devoid of intellect or reason, had granted someone’s wish of “I want to live on as a human.” The price for fulfilling that wish was the entirety of said person’s being.

Seo-rin’s life. Seo-rin’s memories. Her recollections and love for her family. Her optimism toward the future. Her faint misanthropy. Her hate. Her fear. Her smile. Her voice.

Even the sixty years of life that should have remained.

The god of the night sky took every last bit.

“You know it’s true, don’t you, Undertaker? The Dang Seo-rin you loved... she never actually existed.”

I had no answer to that.

“I realized it just before you told me you’d stay with me even after I’d Fallen. I was truly happy.”

A spark leapt and lodged in Seo-rin’s cloak, then began to fizzle. The cloak, dark as the night sky, was being eaten away little by little as though by insects.

“Of course I’d be happy, I’m well aware of how much you hate Anomalies. To think that your care for me weighed more than all that hatred. Yes, that made me glad... But if I weren’t a human who later became an Anomaly, if I had been an Anomaly from the very, very beginning right to the end?”

The half-burned cloak lost its hold and slid off her with a whisper, like the torn wings of a swallowtail.

“Then it can’t be helped, can it? Even if that means I can’t stay with you, there’s nothing anyone can do.” Seo-rin let out a small laugh. “In the end, you will wipe out every Anomaly alive. That’s what you’re living for, after all.”

In the silence hanging over us, all I could manage was a quiet beginning: “Seo-rin.”

“This is the end now.” Seo-rin looked down at her own palm. The witch’s broom had already been let go and was rolling across the floor. “That child’s wish was simply to go on living as a human. To keep that wish alive, I even altered memories and lived while believing myself to be Dang Seo-rin, yes. But now… the contract is broken.”

Clink.

Moonlight that had reflected the flames cracked across the mirror of the night sky that held it.

Crack, crack!

The fissures spread like a spiderweb.

“They’ve found out I’m not human. That everything was a lie from the start. So Dang Seo-rin no longer exists. Not even the first contract can be kept, this is where the tale of an incompetent, contract-breaking Outer God ends.”

Seo-rin smiled.

“Listen.”

The corners of her lips trembled.

“Why… did we meet only now?”

“…”

“I fell in love. I came to adore all of it—the human life, living among humans. There were lots and lots of things I hated, sure, but still, because you were here, I grew to love this place.”

The moonlight shattered, again and again, and even the flames that had licked up to devour everything broke apart like moonlight and were trapped between the shards of mirror.

Thud.

Seo-rin pressed a hand to her chest.

“It hurts. Right here.”

“…”

“It hurts. It hurts so much I could die. It’s strange, I shouldn’t even be able to die. I’m not truly alive at all, Undertaker. It hurts too much.”

“…”

“I’m sorry.”

At last even the sound of moonlight breaking broke apart on itself, spawning more sound that rippled outward like waves.

——Sorry for taking Dang Seo-rin away.

The shattering moonlight faintly mimicked someone’s voice.

Like that first mirror in this world that stole the sun and produced a counterfeit.

“I’m sorry for sullying your precious memories. Sorry that the one you loved turned out not to be human at all.”

——I couldn’t keep my promise. I’m sorry I couldn’t stay Dang Seo-rin until the end. Sorry that I’m not human.

“For being born this way.”

——Because there was no other way for me to come into this world.

“I’m sorry.”

Dang Seo-rin fades away.

There was never a happy ending for her.

The regressor's world began on June 17. Seo-rin's world was born on June 15.

The two timelines would never intersect.

Like the white crosswalk lines and the black asphalt passing by each other forever.

Going back and using a "blank canvas" to change Seo-rin's past was impossible too.

The Seo-rin the regressor had built memories with up to now was none other than the Seo-rin born on June 15.

Even if the massacre of the Seo-rin family were somehow prevented, the witch the regressor had wanted to stay with would not return.

'No, in fact, coloring that blank canvas was an impossibility from the start.'

It was different from the elder twin sister or Yu Ji-won. At least their stories were painted atop "facts that might actually have happened in the past."

'But Seo-rin?'

The moment you try to stop the family's tragedy, countless contradictions arise. All the causality accumulated over a thousand runs collapses.

In the end, it's a simple story.

There are beings in this world who are denied a happy ending from the very start.

——Huh?

And so Seo-rin's eyes went wide.

The eyes that had calmly accepted extinction both as Seo-rin and as Hecate now opened in disbelief.

The regressor was holding her in an embrace.

“Undertaker? Why…?”

“I’ve finally figured it out.”

He held Seo-rin’s shoulders a little tighter.

“Why the road had to be so hard, why the door leading here was so narrow and the stairs so steep, I’ve understood it all now.”

“What are you talking about…?”

“It was so I could be with you.”

The world was scorching. He shielded her from the flames that were consuming the garden.

The world was deafening. He took on the moonlight that warped sound in her stead.

“The contract isn’t broken, Seo-rin. You haven’t forgotten already, have you? Tonight, beneath this night sky, everything between us will be forgotten.”

“…”

“I will forget your past.”

It didn’t matter if he cast out all the world’s heat and silenced all its noise.

The petals and songs he needed no longer existed there anyway.

“If there’s a past you don’t wish to revisit, I won’t look back either.”

“Ah.”

“I won’t dig into the reason for your silence. Whether you were an Outer God or whatever, it doesn’t matter. You are Dang Seo-rin.”

“But, I... if I don’t disappear—no matter how hard you try, in the end, like this...”

“Then we’ll disappear together.”

I said.

“We couldn’t be born together, couldn’t share a childhood. You’re right. Maybe we met far too late.”

“...”

“But we can still stay together until we die.”

Moonlight slid down.

“From now on I’ll begin a journey of discarding my own pieces one by one, settling all the over-flowing Voids of the world—completely, in a human way.”

“...”

“For a while—just until that day comes—I want you to stay by my side.”

Seo-rin’s shoulders trembled.

“Stay beside me and give it everything you have to remain human. If you try your hardest, I can keep from giving up, forever.”

“Nngh...”

“Not only the sixty years that were originally Seo-rin’s, Hecate, everything that still remains to you, discard them one by one while you walk with me.”

“If... if I do that.”

“We can die together.”

I took Seo-rin’s shoulders.

Then, gently, I pressed my forehead against hers.

“Seo-rin.”

“…”

“Will you die with me?”

There was no applause, no hymn. Only the deferred flames of hell and the clamor of moonlight adorning the Void filled the air.

‘…Yes.’

That was enough.

“Yes…, gladly.”

We had long known we were born into such a world.

“Gladly.”

The night sky collapsed.

The glittering jewels beyond—Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus, Mercury—celestial bodies of the universe.

The planets that symbolized the Outer God’s power were shattering one after another.

Neither the moonlight nor the earth beneath were exceptions.

The last frame still burning finally collapsed.

With that collapse, even the ground beneath our feet began to crack apart, slowly.

A place of birth and of death, the holy ground of magic.

This place, at once a flower garden and a fire garden, was meeting its final season.

Now that I think of it.

Add up Earth, the Moon, and Saturn and all the rest, and the count still barely reached eight.

Two of the ten notes that should have rung through Pythagoras's cosmos had gone missing somewhere.

"On the scale's right pan, I place my everything."

The secret behind that disappearance was revealing itself before our eyes.

Firmly, Seo-rin laid her right palm over her own heart.

"On the left... your heart."

Then her left hand covered my chest.

A golden light blossomed.

The light formed a circle, sketching an unbroken golden ring that revolved around my heart.

Each time a planet shattered in the night sky, the golden ring embracing my heart widened.

One. Two. Three. Four. Five. Six. Seven. Eight.

A golden revolution. The vow of a ring.

Circle Magic.

"..."

"Actually, I'd already cast one on you in secret."

And I realized.

"Thanks to this spell... I alone was able to hear your voice."

"Yes. And I could hear yours."

A faint golden loop revealed itself between my heart and Seo-rin's.

Yes.

The remaining two notes missing from the night sky were flowing,

none other than, within our hearts.

Together we made ten.

Constellations were inscribed upon our hearts.

As many celestial bodies as that night sky were singing a silent song inside our chests.

'...Please.'

Caressing the ten strands of heartbeat with both hands.

Seo-rin whispered quietly.

A song for one person alone in this universe.

Melody One.

"May you not grieve too deeply."

Melody Two.

"When you do grieve, may I sense your loneliness."

Melody Three.

"When you feel like dying, may I be at your side at that very moment."

Melody Four.

"May you not... despise people too much."

Melody Five.

"After you dream, may everything feel okay again."

Melody Six.

"Yet someday, may you still find the world beautiful."

Melody Seven.

“Sometimes, let everything go. When you’re exhausted, may you truly rest.”

Melody Eight.

“If the day comes when I hurt you, may the wound heal, and may I always be able to say I’m sorry.”

Melody Nine.

“I love you.”

Melody Ten.

“Together with you, until the day we die.”

“…”

As a regressor, I possessed several abilities.

One of them was called [Resume].

It was the vaguest of the powers I held.

All it really did was let the strength and effort I’d accumulated in a previous run persist into the next.

I unlocked that ability in my tenth cycle.

How I awoke [Resume], though such a trivial power, I had kept to myself until now.

The reason was simple.

In the tenth cycle, after defeating the Ten Legs, the day Seo-rin reached the end of her lifespan and I served as chief mourner at her funeral.

It was before her portrait that I Awakened [Resume].

However.

Looking back now, [Resume] may have been more than that.

Perhaps faint melodies that not even a regressor could hear had been singing inside my heart.

Like the song of Mars.

Like when we soared into Hecate's night sky and none of us could catch the voices of the planets.

The reason I could keep from abandoning the world may have been the few threads of song you planted in my heart.

"My name is Dang Seo-rin."

Not Resume, but—

"[A Spell Laid Upon You]."

A covenant of ten rings.

A grand spell of the tenth circle.

Beneath the crumbling garden, the moonlight, and the night sky—everything breaking save for that golden ring—at the end of the world, at the curtain call of the stage.

The witch who had once been the goddess of magic drew my heart toward her.

"Thank you, Undertaker."

"…"

"That I was able to meet you——"

Sound collapsed, and memory with it.

But it didn't matter.

– Your name?

– Undertaker. It's an alias.

– Someone who goes around burying people, huh? Not bad. The depth of a person depends on how many corpses they've buried inside their own heart.

From tens of thousands of years before I met you.

– I'll be in your care from now on.

– Companion of my time.

Your voice had always been ringing inside my heart.

Chapter 369

The Missing XXI

Sinnoa

There is an epilogue.

As I have already stressed, this is nothing more than a side story, merely a manuscript that the regressor has never edited.

To confess, had I, like any ordinary scribe, been able to move my brush strictly in chronological order, in fact this would not have been the proper place to speak of an after-story.

The Saintess of the Frozen World.

Was she not still waiting in the regressor's sickroom?

The stretch that was the 999th cycle and the 1,000th stage had yet to draw to a close.

Yet a side story is a privilege granted to only a single chapter. To speak of the Saintess I would need one more side story.

Therefore.

"…"

For the moment let us turn to someone else.

Across the time that has flowed since millions of years ago, across the lives that diverged into hundreds of billions of branches, let us speak of someone who, by chance, brushed against hers for the briefest instant.

"…Huh?"

He was a man without a birth.

He had no father. He had no mother.

Surely parents must have existed, but he could not recall them. He could not even verify their existence.

Because, as a regressor, the price he paid for an infinite future was a finite past.

It is not only death that makes everything go missing. There are things one lets go of simply in order to go on living.

‘Busan Station concourse? Out of nowhere?’

Thus it was only natural that he had forgotten something.

‘What the— I was just drinking with Dang Seo-rin and the world ended?’

He could not remember.

What moonlight had poured over the night sky of a city that existed nowhere. How earnestly his comrades had fought, ready to die, on a satellite as beautiful as a mirror. What kind of life had been there.

Who had worn what sort of smile.

‘…I can’t make heads or tails of this.’

That was the contract required for him to live on.

“You piece of shit! What kind of bullshit is that?!”

‘Well then. First things first, let’s save Seo-gyu.’

Life continued.

Perhaps the regressor had settled all the deferred payments in one lump sum.

There are things every human being is forced to pay as they live.

This universe collects memories at the price of life from every human equally.

Even a regressor endowed with [Complete Memory] could not be an exception, so long as he remained human.

— Still haven't given up, my friend?

That day too he dropped by a café, took a sip of the café au lait that had been placed beforehand on the table, and found a note hidden beneath the cup.

Reading it, the regressor let out a small snort.

"The one who doesn't know how to give up is you, you geezer."

Once, he had had a friend.

A fellow regressor.

Curiously, the two were very different.

Where he had resolved to keep on living in order to remain human, his friend had chosen endless deaths for the same purpose.

Thanks to that, the friend never forgot whom he loved most—and in return forever abandoned the chance to save that love.

He, on the other hand, saved his own love without realizing it—and the price was to forget whom he loved.

Which is the greater pain?

Pain belongs solely to the one who feels it, so its depth is hard to compare.

A person can only choose the kind of sorrow they will shoulder.

Even forgetting is a choice.

From the fact that no one remembers the pain of being born, it follows that every human sets foot in this world having chosen a single, common wound.

He was a man without a birth.

He was human.

“The Constellations don’t exist. The Saintess of National Salvation, the Conqueror of the Alps… they’re all characters I created.”

He lived the life he had chosen. He carried out the flow of time he had decided.

“I awakened about twenty days ago. From that day my hair changed color, and I began having nightmares full of monsters.”

“So you created the Constellations.”

“That’s right.”

He recruited a Observer. He persuaded a Sovereign.

One by one he drew in the humans who would walk beside him.

And so, before he knew it, it was June 24.

“…”

It was time to go meet someone. That whole day had been set aside for a single person.

‘Strange. My heart’s pounding more than usual.’

He tilted his head.

In truth, to a regressor like him, feelings such as ‘freshness,’ ‘novelty,’ or ‘excitement’ were terribly faint.

Of course, they had trodden the same timeline hundreds upon hundreds of times.

No matter how dear the person he was about to meet, there was a limit, no moment could feel like a first meeting.

And yet.

‘…It feels exactly like I’m setting out on a journey.’

For some reason today was different.

Was it because the weather was mild? No, the weather on June 24 was always the same.

Had he processed a different schedule than in previous cycles? Again, no, the regressor's timetable had long been perfected for maximum efficiency.

True, starting with the 1,000th cycle he had awakened a new ability.

I had planned to discuss that difference later, but it had not altered his itinerary.

Everything was the same.

Even so, for some reason, it felt different.

"Hm."

At the mirror he finished straightening his clothes, sprayed on cologne, and allowed himself a faint, elusive smile.

'Such a curious thing.'

Now then.

Let us speak about her.

"…"

She was a woman without a birth.

She had no father. She had no mother.

"Ah…."

Yet she believed she did have a father and a mother.

The moment she opened her eyes—no, the moment she was born—she took the corpses strewn before her eyes to be her family.

“Ah… ahhh… Mom… Dad… it’s… a mountain….”

To be born, and from the moment of birth to carry an eternal wound—that was the price she had to pay in order to live as a human being.

The flower garden was burned to the ground.

She believed it was because she had lost her reason in anger and incinerated the anomaly.

Swept up in her own flames, even the traces of her family had been reduced to carbonized fragments by her magic.

“Nh.”

Staggering, she rose to her feet.

The first temperature she felt upon opening her eyes was the heat of her tears, the second was the chill of corpses.

The very first thing she experienced after birth was, of all things, the funeral of her family.

“Uh—nnh. Ugh… uuh….”

Unable to cast magic, unable even to muster the will to cast it, she dug the soft earth with a shovel.

She was used to digging soil.

But digging not to plant flowers but to bury family was something one could never grow accustomed to.

She was doing the same thing for the one-thousandth time.

Even so, it could never become familiar.

“…”

After four days spent barely managing to lay her family to rest, she collapsed beside the graves, almost fainting outright.

After a full day unconscious, she opened her eyes in a haze.

A night sky stretched overhead.

‘What… am I doing?’

Pale moonlight settled over her.

Her hair, her mouth, her whole body felt brittle. Ants crawled across her palms, but she could not care.

There are tears that evaporate in moonlight, not sunlight.

‘Why should I keep on living?’

She was the human who considered suicide the earliest in her life.

‘It hurts….’

It was agony.

Though they called her an anomaly, the void, the night sky, or an outcast deity, the very first thing she felt as a human was pain.

Should she just close her eyes like this.

“…”

At that moment.

Flames flowed across her skin—formless, soundless fire.

“I can’t die.”

She muttered.

“If I die… everything disappears.”

Father was dead. Mother was dead. Even her siblings had been brutally murdered.

Accepting their deaths was impossible. How could one possibly accept such absurd, senseless deaths?

Much less—

She could not allow even the traces of their deaths to vanish as well.

‘I will remember.’

She stood up.

Her arms trembled. Her legs shook.

Sleeping a single day had not restored the strength she had lost.

Nor had it erased four days of digging earth with the feeling she might die at any moment.

‘Only I can remember.’

Even so, she rose.

‘Let’s live.’

Because she had wished not to end with such a conclusion.

‘Let’s keep living.’

She washed her hair. She washed her body. She washed away her tears. She laundered her soiled clothes. She folded them. She retched up her tears. She put away baggage. She cleaned the room. She wiped away more tears.

‘Live, Dang Seo-rin. Survive.’

How wonderful it would be if she could not only survive but bring them back to life.

‘You must live.’

Why is it that, for human beings, not only death but even bare life requires resolve.

Armed with resolve and another layer of resolve, she chewed through each second that followed the next.

Perhaps because her mind was consumed by that.

"…?"

One day she came to herself to find she was standing alone in the middle of a desolate crosswalk.

"…Huh?"

Strange.

Only a moment ago she had been buried in guild paperwork.

She had just formed a small group called the Samcheon World, and its leader had been absent for more than five days owing to a family death.

Naturally, the guild members understood her absence. It was an age in which family or friends were lost with terrifying ease.

That, however, did not make the backlog disappear.

"Hmm? Uh, so… where is this?"

In the middle of working she had thought,

Ah, when I finish all this, I really will have no home left to return to, forever.

"…"

She looked up at the sky.

'Where should I live?'

Released suddenly from work, the vaguely postponed worry stepped close.

She wore a vacant expression.

Since the funeral she seemed to have forgotten how to craft precise expressions.

What grand meaning could there be in moving the muscles of one's face.

'I need another place to stay… no, I hate that.'

She would never be able to call a new house home again.

Because when she returned, she would never forget the sight of her family, who had smiled at her only the day before, and her siblings, who had answered her as though annoyed, lying dead.

'…Ah. How about a train?'

An idea flickered.

'Mm, good. A train doesn't look like a house at all, and I can outfit it like a VIP suite if I want.'

Though impulsive, the more she chewed it over, the sweeter it became.

'I'll secure an entire train and turn it into a guild dorm. In this era commuting separately is a luxury.'

'In an emergency we need to muster our fighting power at once, and still keep at least a minimum of privacy…'

'Then maybe I should just occupy an entire station? Divide the guild among multiple trains. If the guild grows later, that certainly…'

It was then.

"Excuse me, are you all right—?"

A voice came from somewhere.

"Hello— over there—"

"…?"

"Are you all right—?"

Goodness.

She had reacted to the voice a touch too late.

She must have been lost too deep in thought without noticing.

She turned her head.

“If you stay there it’s dangerous! No, don’t move either! Please wait right there!”

Far away,

beyond the vast crosswalk, at the far end of the crossing, a man was waving his arm.

“Just a moment, please don’t move carelessly!”

He was yelling something.

But to be honest, she paid no attention to his words.

‘…A song.’

She was listening to a certain sound.

It seemed to be coming from that man.

The closer he came across the crosswalk, the clearer the sound grew, allowing her to locate the source of the song.

‘A heart.’

The song was beating quietly in his heart.

Ever since she awakened—no, since the moment she was born—she had heard sounds from every object in the world.

For some reason nothing could be heard from the night sky, yet the ground was always full of all kinds of noise and clamor.

“Please wait.”

“…”

The man was different.

A slightly different song was spreading from his heart.

It sounded like a human voice. Like a machine. Like a piano, like a violin, like a cello, as though every melody were layered together.

She found herself thinking,

'…Beautiful.'

For the first time in her life.

'So very beautiful.'

She—

found something in this world beautiful.

He came closer and said something, she too said something to him.

There at the intersection.

He had no past to tell her, no way to say where he had been born or what childhood he had lived.

But she did not need it.

She could not speak her past to him; even if she did, all of it was fated to be a lie.

But that did not matter to him.

He had no birth.

She had no birth.

And yet between him and her, there was life.

A very strange, very beautiful thing.

"I'm called the Undertaker."

“I… I’m Dang Seo-rin.”

This is a tale for such an intersection.

“My name’s a bit odd, isn’t it?”

“No.”

Just as it is not strange for there to be one human who devotes himself to an outcast deity, it is not strange for there to be one outcast deity devoted solely to a human.

“I think it’s a lovely name.”

Chapter 370

The Receiver I

Sinnoa

Blink. I opened my eyes.

There was no unfamiliar ceiling.

Instead, there was an unfamiliar Go Yuri.

“Did you sleep well, Guild Leader?”

“…….”

“Forgive me, but I happened to peek at the scene of you confessing so fervently to Dang Seo-rin. Whew—just watching had my own heart racing. Really now, do you perhaps possess a hidden skill, something like [S-rank Silver Tongue]?”

It was the worst prologue in history.

For the record, my head was resting on Go Yuri’s lap. Someone out there might envy me, but I have never joined that sort of suicide-wish society.

Naturally, I straightened my back.

And was met by scenery just as unfamiliar as Go Yuri herself.

“Where… exactly are we?”

“As you can see, a deserted island.”

Swaaah.

Lazy waves rolled in.

A sand islet with nothing but a single palm tree, not even an animal in sight.

A stretch of beach in the middle of the boundless sea, the kind Captain Jack Sparrow might have used for a steam bath, spread out before us.

I'd believed that escaping the lap pillow would help me get a handle on the situation—but no.

My faith and expectations are famous for betraying me.

"I'll ask again. How did I—how did the two of us—end up waking on a deserted island when moments ago I was with Dang Seo-rin?"

"Well, because Dang Seo-rin died, of course."

"…"

My heart lurched downward.

Go Yuri, meanwhile, spoke as if it were nothing remarkable.

"I had to push myself hard to save you, Guild Leader. When Hecate collapsed, the universe of the 173rd cycle collapsed with her. You and Dang Seo-rin's remains were both about to fall into a black-hole-like pit, so I—hiya, hiya!"

Go Yuri struck a pose like a mountaineer rescuing someone dangling off a cliff.

"Haaah, I barely pulled it off. I'm not trying to brag, but it was honestly exhausting."

"…I could have just died there."

"Yes. You'd like me to say it wouldn't have mattered, right?"

She smiled brightly.

"But, Guild Leader, doesn't it seem a little sad if the hero who saved the world receives no praise and is forgotten besides?"

"…"

"I think it's sad."

Pat.

She ran her fingers through my hair.

I tried to lean away, but she pulled my shoulder closer, shrinking the distance instead.

“I’m not a child—”

“No.”

“The human heart isn’t like the body. The heart you had at one, at five, at ten—those rings stack up as you grow.”

“…”

“Even if you don’t remember them, the marks remain. Being praised feels good, being patted feels pleasant. Being honest about those feelings is very important for humans. Children are all ill-tempered. If they feel they were denied care, they’ll surely take revenge someday.”

She giggled.

“Normally one of your other comrades would be next to you, but now there’s no one. So I figured I should handle the praise in their stead.”

“…”

“You really did splendidly. My goodness, sinking mighty Hecate! Amazing! I always believed you could do it.”

It was odd.

I couldn’t resist her grip.

Strange as it sounds, by letting her embrace me I felt not consoled but rather that I was the one consoling Go Yuri.

“…I’m not sure defeating Hecate deserves that much praise. I only laid my own heart over Dang Seo-rin’s.”

“Ah-haha.”

The hand stroking my hair stopped.

And then—

“What on earth are you saying?”

Suddenly her eyes filled my vision. They were barely ten centimeters away.

Those pupils that always smiled were now staring at me from an unreadably close gap.

“Did Hecate look easy to you?”

“…”

“In case you didn’t know, Guild Leader, Hecate is the Outer God of Paradox. She put her fingertips on every contradictory way voids and anomalies exist in this world.”

Clamp.

The hands that had held my head and shoulder now pinned my skull between them.

“You purified that Outer God. No matter what strategy anyone devised, her magical shadow slipped away through absurd contradiction. You used every trick and barely, truly barely, caught her. Do you still not grasp the magnitude of that feat? Troublesome—very troublesome.”

“…Right. Sorry. I spoke too quickly.”

Slowly her eyes receded.

Far enough to see her full face, still smiling as always.

“No, I’m the one who’s sorry. I guess starting the three-hundred-sixty-sixth day got me excited.”

“Try to understand my side, I can’t take your words at face value. I once let you trick me and ended up dead.”

“Oh dear. Mmm, yes, I’ll apologize for that too. But it’s strange.”

Her look asked, Strange how?

“Noh Do-hwa strangled you five times, yet you trust her fine. Isn’t that discrimination?”

“No. With Director Noh Do-hwa it was karma. But you… wait.”

My head whipped around.

“Five times? I’m certain Director Noh Do-hwa strangled me four times.”

“Ah.” She covered her mouth demurely.

“Oh dear, my mistake. You died only four times. Saying five was merely my foolish slip.”

“…Are you telling the truth?”

“Absolutely! I swear on the honor of the Infinite Metagame.”

Ah, so I am going to be strangled again.

Setting aside the factual violence against Infinite Metagame.

Only one task remained in this stage.

『Rescue the Saintess.』

In that respect Go Yuri’s deed in saving me while the universe collapsed was enormous.

Had I died with Dang Seo-rin—

That momentary relief would have diverted me from helping the Saintess of the 267th cycle.

“I’m a bit late, but thank you.”

“No problem, I wanted it too.”

“Even so, several things puzzle me.”

I looked around. The sea was a clear emerald.

Since civilization’s fall the Yellow Sea and East Sea have remembered they’re children of the Pacific, one shouldn’t judge by the old standards.

“Where is this? The Unconscious Realm? Or the world of the 173rd cycle? Then where are my comrades?”

“It isn’t the Unconscious Realm.”

“And to match your sense of time, it isn’t the 173rd cycle either.”

“What? Another riddle—”

“Strictly speaking, this is the world of the 999th cycle, Guild Leader.”

I froze.

“The 999th cycle? The one where I was drinking with Dang Seo-rin and suddenly everyone disappeared?”

“That’s right.”

She smiled sweetly.

“Strictly speaking, they didn’t disappear. They all went pop—wiped out in an instant by Hecate’s grand magic.”

“…Wiped out.”

“It was a paradox.”

Shhh—clear waves lapped.

“A world that is the 173th cycle and not the 173th, the 999th cycle and not the 999th—two runs overlapping. How could it stay intact?”

"…."

"While Hecate still held her Authority, it was fine. Sustaining paradox is exactly an Outer God's magic. But now her magic—"

Tap. She poked my chest.

"—remains only here."

"…Could the whole human race vanish so easily just for being paradoxical? My comrades aren't weak."

"Oh my, are you suspecting me?"

"A little."

She chuckled softly.

"Really, did Hecate look easy? The only reason we managed was that she was confined inside the vessel called 'Dang Seo-rin.'"

"…"

"By the way, the sea around this island? That's Leviathan's corpse, the blood that spilled when it went boom."

That meant Yu Ji-won was dead as well. So it really was the 999th cycle.

"…?"

A faint sense of wrongness pricked me, though I couldn't name it. Talking so calmly with Go Yuri felt odd.

Pushing that aside, I voiced the next question.

"Then what about the Saintess of the 267th cycle? She froze time in Hecate's sanctuary—'Nowhere'—right?"

"Yes. Thanks to that shaky seal she kept Hecate from griefing you with unfair endings."

"And now that Hecate has fallen, shouldn't the Saintess be free?"

“Ummm, about that.”

For the first time since our crash landing, trouble showed on her face.

“As you know, the Saintess forcibly linked herself to Hecate, the Outer God of Paradox.”

“So?”

“In other words, she inevitably became something close to a paradox herself. Oh, freezing time minimized the damage, but still.”

“…”

Watching her skirt the point filled my neck with coiling dread.

“Sigh. With Hecate gone, there’s no one left to govern paradox except the Saintess.”

She pressed a hand to her cheek and sighed again.

“Call her Hecate’s remnants, like how Yellow Turban rebels lingered after the uprising.”

“Don’t throw my own analogies at me. What exactly do you mean the Saintess became paradoxical? Explain so I—”

“U-ha-ha-ha-ha!”

A hearty laugh burst out behind me.

On what I thought was a two-person island, another presence—of course I spun round.

“At last! Finally! Liberation is here!”

And I saw it.

A slightly shorter figure, if the Saintess were younger, maybe a second-year middle-schooler, she would look like this, identical features, but a ‘kid’ standing proud, hands on hips, roaring with laughter.

“Behold!”

Tchakk! The kid struck a flamboyant pose.

“Absolute Spirit Leviathan is dead! Gone! The Form-Terminating Infinite Void shows not a hint of presence! Ahh! And that detestable foe—the Nightmare Abyss Nut—has vanished!”

“…”

“Now only I—only the rightful Leader of every void, I, the [Monarch of the Crimson Horse], shall rule this world! Ah-hahaha! Wahahahaha!”

“…”

Crrreak. My neck turned like a steampunk gear.

Pointing at the aqua-haired kid, I looked at Go Yuri.

“Don’t tell me… that’s…”

She gave a dazzling smile.

“Yes!”

“No, right?”

“It is!”

“Tell me it’s not.”

“Shall I swear on the Infinite Metagame?”

“See! I really am going to be strangled a fifth time! No, focus. Seriously?”

“Seriously-seriously.”

She beamed.

“When the paradox struck, the void toxin of ‘Saintess and yet not Saintess’ occured—what do you think happened first?”

"Oh, please—"

“It’s something you’re already familiar with.”

Potato. Potato sprout. Potato statue. That potato.

“Exactly! The Saintess split into separate personalities, each a [Constellation].”

"……."

“Wahaha-haha! Hrk—cough, cough! Bwah-ha-ha!”

Now beside me, the kid was slapping my backside.

She even wore an eye-patch, the classic chuunibyou accessory.

Anyone could guess whose influence made the Saintess manifest the [Monarch of the Crimson Horse] like this.

“And of course it’s not just Mr. [Monarch of the Crimson Horse]. Ms. [Collector of All Anomalies], Ms. [Librarian of the Great Library], Ms.[Succubus of the Grand Arcade], Mr. [Morning Star of the Second Coming], Ms. [Understanding of Anguish]—they’re all here, every one of them at least ocean-class! Congratulations!”

“…”

“Not that it’s surprising, the Saintess was absurdly strong to begin with, and she spent practically an eternity linked to Hecate. Truly the strongest Awakener.”

“…”

“So, Guild Leader?”

Her eyes sparkled.

“Isn’t it fascinating?”

Shit.

Chapter 371

The Receiver II

Sinnoa

Constellation.

The word that originally meant “zodiac sign” has, in modern fiction, evolved into labels such as “voyeur,” “hard-core KakaoTalk addict,” “age-gap fetishist,” or “shut-in NEET.”

The Saintess eagerly adopted this Constellation concept. The instant the Apocalypse broke out, a deluge of messages was pushed to every Awakener on the Korean Peninsula.

Naturally, among them were Awakeners whose hobbies were web novels and webtoons.

They shouted at once, “Wow! You know about Constellations? For anyone who doesn’t, let me explain— in the series <The Tutorial Is Too Hard> the idea is formally established—” and so on.

In short, they shared their knowledge with everyone else without the slightest filter.

Please, try not to blame them too much. When would life ever again grant a chance to prove that web-novel reading is a loftier pastime than studying Spanish?

Thanks to their devoted efforts, the word Constellation became common sense in the post-Apocalypse world.

Even so, one question kept nagging at me.

“Bwahahahahahaha!”

The author of the Constellations, a lead actress juggling multiple roles, and the Saintess who had probably read no more than a couple of web novels in her life—

How well-versed could the woman herself really be in Constellation stories?

“Hah, kek, keugh. Gup! Puhahahah, ha. Hoo-ah-ah… ah, whatever. I’m exhausted.”

Flop—

The eyepatch-wearing chuunibyou kid collapsed onto the sand. Even her bob cut, brushing her jawline, differed from the original.

I inched toward [The Monarch of the Crimson Horse].

“Excuse me, but are you perhaps the General of the Left?”

“Ung? General of the Left? What’s that?”

“…Then have you heard of a pig named Dong Zhuo1?”

“Ah?! Dong Zhuo?! I personally slit that mangy cur’s throat! What, are you another nobody who worships this hero that is I? Aiyaah, how troublesome. Shall I graciously make you my servant?”

“…”

A sigh welled up from the bottom of my heart.

‘This is no Lü Bu!’

The character sheet—

The character sheet was an utter mess!

Strictly speaking, [The Monarch of the Crimson Horse] refers to Lü Bu Fengxian2, history’s greatest unfilial son.

And Lü Bu’s rank was precisely General of the Left.

Yet the Saintess, for all she built a Lü Bu-based Constellation, had never been a Three Kingdoms buff!

‘My lady Saintess, you who know so much… how could you neglect the Romance of the Three Kingdoms!’

It was like a VTuber whose lore says she's a high elf yet whose hobby is pruning bonsai World Trees.

At that level of lore-collapse you're practically begging the viewers not to get immersed.

Thus, even though Lü Bu had materialized in real life, the Three-Kingdoms flame in my heart could only grow colder and colder…

"Hey, you self-styled general."

My eyes were as dead as an otaku staring at a defective figure with the paint job half-finished.

"Aaang? Self-styled?"

"Right. What do you think of the 'Saintess'? For reference, I am her one and only close friend."

"Ah! The Saintess! Ooooh! She is the parent who gave birth to me—my Mother!"

…Was that a vow to decorate my severed neck in the name of filial piety?

"It so happened all us sisters got split apart. Hmph. We must re-fuse to restore Mother Saintess."

The delusional chuunibyou kid who thought she was Lü Bu rattled on cheerfully.

"So this hero was busy fighting other fools, when suddenly a tremendous aura was felt here. I dropped everything and came running."

"I-I see."

"Aah! Huhuhut! I wondered what kind of weasel Mother's lover would be, but seeing you in person—those muscles are nicely firm, not bad at all!"

Pow, pow.

The Monarch of the Crimson Horse—calling this brat Lü Bu was an insult to the Han-era rank—leapt up and smacked my butt.

“Her lover, is it? More importantly, why do you keep slapping people’s behinds? That’s harassment.”

“Ah? Sorry, sorry. Your glutes are outstanding! I acted on impulse. It’s my first time seeing such a specimen up close, and I just had to give it a whack. Wahaha. Next time I’ll restrain myself and settle for your vastus lateralis!”

Is “don’t hit me” not on the menu?

‘Wait a second.’

Watching Go Yuri quietly unfold a bright smile across from me, a sinister thought dawned.

‘In short… this kid’s a personality spun off from the Constellations the Saintess role-plays.’

Meaning she’s the Saintess at her core.

If this Sword Marquess + Oh Dok-seo chimera had certain impulses, there was a very high chance the ‘original’ shared them as well—

“Gyaaaah! Begone, fiend!”

“W-What! Fiend?!”

[The Monarch of the Crimson Horse] jumped in fright.

“Have our sisters already found this place? Where are they! Show yourselves!”

“N-No, that’s not it. A theory I desperately need to launder from my brain just popped up…”

That was when it happened.

A voice made me freeze.

[The Collector of All Anomalies marvels at your insight.]

Huh?

[The Collector of All Anomalies pays you respect and reveals herself.]

A wave rolled up the empty beach and ebbed away, leaving a human shadow where nothing had been.

She, too, was the Saintess's spitting image.

But unlike the usually blank original, she somehow looked gloomy, somehow seemed as though she'd keep smiling forever.

"My, my. Hoho. Caught me, did you?"

For some reason she rubbed me the wrong way.

The self-proclaimed Lü Bu pointed at her at once.

"Aaaaagh?! You there! Collector!"

"Hoho, yes. How do you do, my beloved sis. It delights me to see you so full of energy."

"How dare you call me sis without permission! I've never had a sour-tempered little sister like you!"

"My, how sad. Fengxian sis, weren't we all loving siblings?"

[The Collector of All Anomalies] shrugged theatrically.

Using such words about someone who looked like the Saintess felt rude, but just watching her made my stomach acid bubble up.

"If Mother, now asleep, were to see us she would be heartbroken. Sigh. Are we truly incapable of being filial even once? You and I?"

"..."

Frankly, if Lady Saintess saw this live she might acquire an urgent desire to die.

“To insult this hero! Hey, Mother’s lover! Don’t be fooled! That snake gobbled up both the ‘Saintess of National Salvation’ and ‘The Chancellor of the Red Cape’ alone! She’s the most vicious of all us sisters!”

“Ufufu. Yet Fengxian sis, did you not cleave ‘The Conqueror of the Alps’ in a single stroke?”

“Ha! That was an honorable duel! Unlike you, pretending to ally with someone only to stab them!”

“Please say I merely used humanity’s weapons—intellect and strategy. Now, let the idiot sister be. What do you say, Mr. Undertaker?”

[The Collector of All Anomalies] offered me her hand.

“Me? Why me?”

“A foolish question, hoho. Obviously, whichever Constellation you side with is highly likely to become ‘Mother.’”

The Collector fluttered her lashes in a deadly wink. Her mystic eyes practically compelled one to answer with a critical hit.

“That idiot sister is a brainless spearman… utterly unfit to be your partner.”

“What?!”

“I, on the other hand… hoho. As you know, Mr. Undertaker, I’m a veteran who has collected countless anomalies. I’m sure I can help you along your way.”

Arms spread, the Collector declared,

“I am your destined guide! Take my hand, Undertaker! Together we shall conquer every anomaly in this world!”

I nodded.

“Go Yuri.”

“Yes.”

“Sic ’em.”

“Yessir ♪～”

Chomp!

A mouth of living shadow gaped open on the sea’s surface and swallowed [The Collector of All Anomalies] whole.

“Mwooooo?!”

The Collector thrashed, to no avail.

Crunch!

Crackle!

A few ominous noises later, the shadow devoured its prey without leaving a trace.

Another wave foamed over and the shadow vanished. The beach returned to normal.

“Uh. Uhh? Uh…?”

The self-styled Lü Bu’s gaze wavered.

Go Yuri produced a napkin, dabbed her lips, and bowed gracefully with a bright smile.

“Yes, that hit the spot.”

“…”

“A delicacy, really. Ah, the Collector’s soul can be retrieved any time, so don’t worry. Still, it would be better if you, Guild Leader, disposed of her yourself. Miss Saintess’s mental health might suffer otherwise.”

“I’ll keep that in mind.”

When I turned, my eyes met those of the self-styled Lü Bu. The brat was still gaping at the slasher flick that had just played out before her.

Then something astonishing happened.

“B-Brother…!”

Thud.

Without hesitation the pseudo-Lü Bu dropped to her knees in the sand.

With a grave face the kid wailed,

“No! Father!”

“…”

“If you’re Mother’s lover, then of course you’re this Fengxian’s father! U-Until now this fool failed to recognize the heavens and dared to act up!”

Thwack—sand sprayed onto my cheek. Thunk! Thwack! Her forehead strikes threatened to rename the place Samjeondo.

“Please spare this unworthy child’s life! Though I am but a slow-witted bear of a girl, this Lü Fengxian will become your unbeatable warhorse in your grand design!”

“Here you go, Guild Leader.”

“Thanks.”

I wiped my cheek with the napkin Go Yuri handed me.

Then I squatted, bringing myself eye-to-eye with the kid who now had at least three fathers.

“Hey, General.”

“Y-Yes-heh? I’m not really—”

“No. You are the General of the Left. I’ll ask some very important questions—answer them. Understood?”

“Y-Yes, sir!”

“What do you think of Cao Cao[3]?”

“Eh-heh? Mengde? That fellow—born a eunuch’s whelp without even a— and forever wallowing in inferiority toward noble Yuan Shao, then butchering innocent civilians so history would call him the paragon of filial piety because Yuan Shao beat him to it… He’s history’s biggest piece of trash! If people want a model of filial devotion they should look at me first. Huhut! Never have I seen such a twisted lump of inferiority.”

“Hm.”

I nodded.

First test passed.

“Then what about Liu Bei[4]?”

“Ha? Xuande? That guy came from dirt and got a little success; people like that insist only their own words are right, then lose their base. Wahaha! With ears as long as a donkey’s, pampering only his own circle—”

“Go Yuri. Sic ’em.”

“—is what some blind fools claim, but they’re idiots! The moment I met Xuande I knew no wiser, more virtuous lord exists! Ooh! This unworthy servant merely got lucky and took Dong Zhuo’s head, while Xuande is the true hero of this chaotic age! Ah! I betrayed him for a moment’s greed—this, this! You worthless Fengxian! Hup! I must smash my forehead and apologize to Xuande’s very soul!”

“Mm.”

I nodded.

Second test passed.

I clasped the shoulders of this genuine [Monarch of the Crimson Horse]—the one and only Lü Bu Fengxian across all parallel worlds—and hauled her up.

“From this moment on, you are Lü Bu!”

“Eh? Uh, but I was already Lü Bu…”

“I have zero desire to be your father, but you’re still a shard of the Saintess, so how could I treat you coldly? From now on you may call me hyung.”

“Ah. Uh, yes, respected Brother…?”

Though this remote desert island lacked a peach tree, a lone palm would suffice for a brotherhood.

My ambition was grand indeed.

‘If I forge Lü Bu into the mightiest Constellation and return her to the Saintess, the Saintess will surely grow to love the Three Kingdoms!’

I shivered at my own stratagem.

Come to think of it, the 1,000th run had been slated as a vacation.

Somehow Hecate got involved and now I was fighting Constellations, but the more perilous the situation, the more one should enjoy it.

Look, Go Yuri over there has been grinning from ear to ear for ages.

“Brother Fengxian! No matter what happens I’ll see you restored as the Saintess’s main body—just trust this hyung!”

“Aah. Um, yes! Wahaha! Of course I’ll only trust brother!”

“Good.”

I slapped the shoulder of the sworn brother I welcomed after Seo Gyu with hearty gusto.

“Now then, little brother, to clear the third test let’s start by memorizing the Official Histories of the Three Kingdoms, shall we?”

“…Yep?”

Shards of Constellation left to rescue the Saintess:

Four more to go.

Footnotes:

1 - Dong Zhuo (died 192 ce, China) was a general whose seizure of power and tyrannical rule ended the Han dynasty (206 bce–220 ce) and divided the Chinese empire. In 190 ce Dong Zhuo burned Luoyang, the capital, and removed himself and the emperor to the ancient capital of Chang'an (now Xi'an).

2 - Lü Bu, courtesy name Fengxian, was a Chinese military general and warlord who lived during the late Eastern Han dynasty of Imperial China.

3 - Cao Cao, courtesy name Mengde, was a Chinese statesman, warlord, and poet who rose to power during the end of the Han dynasty, ultimately taking effective control of the Han central government.

4 - Liu Bei, courtesy name Xuande, was a Chinese warlord in the late Eastern Han dynasty who later became the founding emperor of Shu Han, one of the Three Kingdoms of China.

Chapter 372

The Receiver III

Sinnoa

It was truly a beautiful day.

The birds were chirping, and the flowers were blooming.

On a day like this—

"…Xu Shu[1] said to Liu Bei, 'There is a man called Zhuge Kongming[2], truly a Crouching Dragon. General, you really ought to visit him.' And Liu Bei replied, 'Then you bring him here….'"

A brat styling herself Lü Bu really ought to be rattling off Pei Songzhi's[3] unabridged, fully annotated Records of the Three Kingdoms by heart.

"Hup!"

Streeetch—

She flung both arms high and gave a huge stretch; the crisp air felt as though it seeped right down to every muscle cell.

Where, exactly, was this freshness coming from?

Without doubt, from listening to a masterpiece of the century in Saintess-nim's ASMR voice.

"Go Yuri, our destination still isn't in sight?"

"No, Guild Lead— I mean, Captain! There's nothing but sea on every side."

"Hmm. We set the course exactly this way, so why is our progress so meagre?"

“Ahaha, sorry, Captain. I think you’ll have to push the engine a little harder.”

Just now we were travelling by boat.

Calling it a “boat,” though, was generous, it was really only a dinghy.

The materials were a single palm tree, the lone bit of vegetation listed on the desert island, and the scrap metal the tide had coughed up.

I threw the dinghy together, painted it scarlet, and, as humanity’s last invention, christened it “Red Hare.”[4]

So we set out across the boundless ocean astride Red Hare.

Crossing the sea of a ruined world in a single craft, surely a fatal dose of romance.

“Good. Engine! Give us still more speed!”

“Eek!”

My part aboard was Captain.

Go Yuri, as navigator, was in charge of tracking the other Constellations’ positions.

[The Monarch of the Crimson Horse sheds tears.]

For reference, Lü Bu was back there rowing like a fiend, serving as both ASMR and engine.

Thanks to her, Red Hare boasted tremendous speed. Never had Koei’s Romance of the Three Kingdoms naval stat of “C” for Lü Bu looked more mistaken.

“By the way, Yuri—”

“Yes?”

“If we skip killing the Constellations this run and just move on to the next cycle, what happens?"

"Mm. It would make conquering Hecate feel pointless. We went to the trouble of sinking an Outer God, only to leave the fragments that took her influence untouched."

"A leftover-embers job, eh?"

"Ah. Nice metaphor."

Embryos of flame left alone soon grow as big as the original inferno.

"And… mm. This is only my guess, but if we're careless the Constellations might really come to exist."

"The Constellations come to exist for real?"

"Until now they were just parts Miss Saintess acted. But if we let the next cycle start like this—tada! Look, star-sign monsters actually peering down at the world have appeared."

"Mm."

My brow furrowed.

"That would be bad."

"Yes, decidedly bad—"

In the past I might have answered, "Eh? Constellations just help Awakeners level, so isn't that a gain?"—but not now.

If the world's genre turns into "Constellation-fic," the side-effects follow inevitably:

Why Constellations help Awakeners, how Awakeners can fall and become Constellations, the premise of beings watching this world like a livestream, and so forth…

In other words, the very cosmology of the universe warps.

Exactly as Go Yuri had warned—ignore it and we'd just breed a fresh Outer-God-class monster.

“Not to mention—”

“…Guan Yu[5] and Zhang Fei[6] sulked—hic—some bookworm pops out of nowhere—hng! Acting familiar with the Lord…so Lord Liu Bei soothed them, saying gasping ‘Gaining Kongming is fish finding water….’”

Mutter mutter mutter.

A glance back showed the Hulao Pass grasshopper panting as she rowed Red Hare.

Her eyes were starting to look like dead fish, turning more water-type than earth-type.

‘I can’t let such half-baked Constellations run the world.’

A little while later—

“Ah! Captain! I can finally see it!”

Go Yuri waved both arms.

Beyond the horizon lay a vessel so huge Red Hare looked like an ant.

An enormous cruise ship floated there.

Humanity of the 999th cycle was extinct. A healthy cruise ship was itself a ghost story.

There was no need to wonder long who captained it.

As we drew near, a familiar telepathic message arrived.

[The Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace invites you.]

[Welcome to Earth’s final paradise.]

A confession of ancient shame: once, I was deeply, hopelessly into Constellations.

Back before the 35th cycle.

Until then no Awakener worshipped them more ardently than I did… Old Man Scho watching me was aghast.

– Hey! Brat! I told you to stop hanging around those spirits or whatever and you're muttering to yourself again! That's addiction, do you hear? Addiction!

– Oh, come on, old man. You just don't realise there's really a Constellation watching over us. Ms. Saintess of National Salvation genuinely exists.

– Pah. Rubbish! If transcendents guarding humanity existed the world wouldn't have gone to hell!

Scho, in the end, was right.

After swallowing the red pill that Constellations were only humans, an unspoken pact arose between the Saintess and me.

1. Whatever the other Awakeners thought, in front of Undertaker she would never pretend to be a Constellation.

2. Conversely, I would never nit-pick or mock the Constellations' settings and acting.

A gentleman's agreement, in short—

A pledge so the regressor and the Saintess could preserve each other's dignity.

Hence…I actually didn't know in detail what sort of appearance or speech Constellations like [Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace] or [Collector of All Anomalies] used when performing for other Awakeners.

Naturally: nothing compelled the Saintess to endure mortifying embarrassment by showing me her master-class in Constellation roleplay.

She wore a blank face around me every day. Still, the Saintess was human. She possessed that profoundly human emotion, “shame.”

And then—

“Myo-ooong! Welcome-nya! Nice-to-meet-nya!”

Today, I witnessed the ghastly truth the Saintess had hidden with all her might from the regressor.

“First time seeing you face-to-face-nya! Undertaker-nya! I’m the Dream Demon-of-the-Grand-Pleasure-Palace-nya!”

“……”

“Ah, that look is scary-nya! Myo myo myo. By the way-nya, unless you defeat me with the concept called ‘fun’ I’ll just keep reviving, so please refrain from pointless killing-nya!”

Boing, boing.

A mint-haired girl, a few years older than [The Monarch of the Crimson Horse] and strongly resembling the Saintess, had rabbit ears flopping atop her head.

I raised a hand.

“Time-out.”

“Myoo?”

“I’ll be back shortly. Wait right there.”

I jumped off the liner and returned to the dinghy. On deck, Go Yuri and Lü Bu were boiling cup-ramen.

“Huh? Brother, back already? G-gasp, did you drop the enemy in a single instant?!”

“Since when was she like that.”

“Eh?”

“Her. Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace… that crazy speech pattern. Since when?”

“Uh… always?”

Slurp. Devouring the last spicy beef bowl noodle on Earth, [The Monarch of the Crimson Horse] tilted her head.

“Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace, among us sisters she’s ‘Myomon.’”

“nya… mon…?”

“Yep. We sisters are concept-mad nut-cases, but she’s the worst. Wahaha! Brother, do you see now why I want the rest dead?”

said Lü Bu Feng-xian.

I turned my gaze. Go Yuri was elegantly eating Earth’s final Bean Paste Noodles (cup version) with chopsticks.

“This is a lie.”

“Oh my.”

“Myomon? If she’d been talking like that, no way I’d have missed it. SG Net would be buried in posts: ‘Why does that Dream Demon talk like this?’”

“Ufufu.”

Even while eating she never got a drop of black sauce on her lips; Yuri smiled demurely.

“Guild Leader, aren’t you underestimating Miss Saintess?”

“What?”

“Whenever Miss Saintess talks to someone, she always first casts [Time Stop] and rehearses her lines.”

“I know that.”

“Right. That’s how serious she is about her dignity.”

Go Yuri’s smile brightened.

“In other words…while you surf SG Net she can pop [Time Stop] and hide any posts she doesn’t want you to see.”

“What?!”

A shockwave burst in my brain.

What on earth was this pink monster spouting?

“Your IP and account name carry special restrictions. Mr. Seo Gyu or the Saintess can freely ‘edit’ every post or comment that shows up on your phone.”

“Wh-wh-WHAT?!”

A second impact rocked me.

“F-from when?!”

“From the start.”

Go Yuri drained even the broth, pressed her hands together and said, “Thanks for the food.”

“There are 171 banned words on your account, starting with ‘myo.’ Mr. Seo Gyu couldn’t refuse the Saintess’s request, so you’ve always been looking at a censored SG-Net.”

“……?!?!”

“And if anyone looked about to mention a Constellation trait around Mr. Undertaker, she just zapped them with telepathy and smoothed it over.”

Impossible. Absurd.

I was certain my ID had admin powers, yet that too had been Seo-gyu’s trick?

“Want one more bombshell?”

“T-there’s worse? Don’t. My sanity won’t hold.”

“Even though you finally learnt all this in the 999th cycle, once the run ends you’ll lose the memories under Miss Dang Seorin’s contract, and fall right back into eternal ignorance ♪~”

“Gyaaaaa!”

I screamed.

“Gyaaaaaaa!”

I kept screaming as I bounded from Red Hare onto the cruise ship.

“Gyaaaaaaaaaaa!”

“Myo-ong?! Eep—why scream in my face-nya? In Mother’s memories you were more serious and dandy, like Tom Ford Oud Wood—unexpected-nya…”

“I’m the surprised one! ‘Unexpected’ doesn’t begin to cover it!”

“I don’t understand-nya…”

I crumpled to my knees.

“A lie. A lie. Yes. That treacherous pink thing brain-washed me to slander the Saintess…”

“Ah, that-nya!”

Flap. The Dream Demon’s rabbit ears twitched, alive.

“The being near you-nya. Why travel with something so terrifying-nya?”

“…Terrifying? Lü Bu—your sister—follows her fine, doesn’t she?”

“That’s what’s strange-nya!”

The Dream Demon darted her eyes around, then lowered her voice.

“Originally [The Monarch of the Crimson Horse] went out precisely to intercept that being-nya. [The Collector of All Anomalies] planned to back her if needed nya. Yet they both lost all hostility so naturally nya.”

“Mm.”

That was Go Yuri’s nature.

One was compelled to feel unconditional goodwill toward her.

Across the regressor’s long life only two people broke the rule: Yu Ji-won, whose face no-one could recognise, and Hecate, whose voice sounded like static.

“Yuri herself probably can’t control the power. Anyway she’s cooperative now, so no need to worry too—”

“Really nya?”

Blink—Dream Demon’s eyelids and rabbit ears leaned toward me.

“Undertaker-nya, how can you be so sure-nya?”

“Ah. Explaining it all is long, but I picked up a limited-time artefact. While I have it, Yuri’s brain-washing can’t touch me.”

“Let me see it nya?”

“Of course.”

I slipped a hand into my pocket.

The black hair-tie—Cheon Yo-hwa’s keepsake, left when she sacrificed herself, descending the stairs of the unconscious world—

“Hmm?”

The hair-tie.

“…?”

It should be here.

I remembered tucking it in my inner pocket so I wouldn't lose it.

"…"

It wasn't.

I rifled every pocket. Apart from the silver bell my fingers touched nothing.

A chill sliced through my brain.

'Wait. Come to think…'

Cheon Yo-hwa's memento was forged in the unconscious world, not in reality.

If this is no longer the 173th cycle but reality fixed as the 999th cycle, naturally her keepsake must vanish.

Such a simple fact—

'…I hadn't realised until now.'

As though forgetting felt natural.

Even though I'd long known that "real-world Go Yuri" and "unconscious-world Go Yuri" were different.

"…"

I fell silent.

The rabbit ears in front of me flopped.

"Do you truly believe that being is your ally nya?"

Footnotes:

1 - Xu Shu, courtesy name Yuanzhi, originally named Xu Fu, was a Chinese politician of the state of Cao Wei during the Three Kingdoms period of China. He was born in the late Eastern Han dynasty and used to be a vigilante swordsman in his early life.

2 - Zhuge Liang, also commonly known by his courtesy name Kongming, was a Chinese statesman, strategist, and inventor who lived through the end of the Eastern Han dynasty and the early Three Kingdoms period of China.

3 - Pei Songzhi, courtesy name Shiqi, was a Chinese historian and politician who lived in the late Eastern Jin dynasty and the Liu Song dynasty. His ancestral home was in Wenxi County, Shanxi, but he moved to the Jiangnan region later.

4 - The Red Hare or Chi Tu was a famous horse owned by the warlord Lü Bu, who lived during the late Eastern Han dynasty of China.

5 - Guan Yu, courtesy name Yunchang, was a Chinese military general serving under the warlord Liu Bei during the late Eastern Han dynasty of China. Along with Zhang Fei, he shared a brotherly relationship with Liu Bei and accompanied him on most of his early exploits.

6 - Zhang Fei, courtesy name Yide, was a Chinese military general and politician serving under the warlord Liu Bei in the late Eastern Han dynasty and early Three Kingdoms period of China. Zhang Fei and Guan Yu, who were among the earliest to join Liu Bei, shared a brotherly relationship with their lord and accompanied him on most of his early exploits.

Chapter 373

The Receiver IV

Sinnoa

“Oh, you’re back? Guild Leader?”

“…”

Go Yuri welcomed my return from the cruise liner with a perfect, hundred-point smile.

Lü Bu was sprawled at the stern of our little skiff, snoring drrrrng—her nose blaring like a siren while she napped away.

Tilt. Go Yuri cocked her head.

“Whatever became of Ms. [Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace]? Since you came home safe, it looks as though you won.”

“…Ah, yes.”

I opened my right hand.

Fwoosh, light blossomed. Seeing it, Go Yuri pressed her palms together with a soft “Oh my.”

A tiny meteorite on my palm was radiating pearly-white light.

“A Star Fragment! It’s the drop you get for felling a Constellation. Waaah, as expected of you, Guild Leader! I knew you’d succeed. What sort of game did you use to topple [The Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace]?”

“We just wagered on who had better luck. We rolled a die: odd numbers meant my victory, even numbers hers. A pure gamble, free of any outside interference.”

Tilt.

Go Yuri's head tipped once more.

"Uh-oh. But if an even number had come up, wouldn't that have been bad?"

"Hmph. In the worst case I still have a secret weapon called you. Even if I'd lost to [The Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace] and been reduced to a slave, you would have come to rescue me. Right?"

"…"

Tilt.

"Yes, that's true! Ufufu. Still, Guild Leader, as I always say, depending on me too much isn't healthy, you know? You must remain the protagonist of this stage."

"I'll be careful."

I was about to slip the Star Fragment back into my pouch but hesitated.

"Come to think of it, how should I store this? You already swallowed [The Collector of All Anomalies]. Should I hand this over to you as well?"

"Hmmm."

Go Yuri's gaze slid from my face to the fragment and back again.

"No. That's a trophy you earned yourself, Guild Leader. I think it ought to stay with you!"

"Very well. I'll keep it."

"Great. Let's head for the next port of call!"

I strolled along the gunwale and flicked Lü Bu on the head. The comically over-inflated snot bubble popped with a bang.

"Geh-hyeck?! Wu—Yuan Benchu[1] is a hypocrite! Cao Mengde is a spiteful villain jealous of a hypocrite! Only Lord Xuande2 truly acted for the people! Long live the Han! Long live Shu Han!”

“It warms my heart to see you using sleep-learning so constructively. Now back to your post as the engine.”

“…Yessir.”

“Oh? What’s with that look?”

“And what’s wrong with my eyes, exactly?”

“They look as though you’re pining for a former sister who filed her change-of-address inside Go Yuri’s stomach. Seeing such beautiful sisterly love makes me think that reuniting separated families might be the noblest deed of all.”

“Yahoo! Driving the Red Hare is the whole purpose and meaning of my life! Engine, fire! Overwhelming engine power! Wooooong! Lü Bu is happy!”

The kid, her face alone the spitting image of the Saintess, began rowing with such fervor that even Roman galley slaves would have gasped in admiration.

Rumble-rumble-rumble—

Once we had put some distance between us, the cruise liner in mid-ocean crumbled apart.

That casino liner had been all but a personal relic of a Constellation. Its collapse proved that [The Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace] was dead.

“Uwaaah! B-balance! Brother! Keeping our balance is murder, sir!”

[The Monarch of the Crimson Horse screams from the depths of her soul.]

It was not the Pacific, no.

By now, in the 999th cycle, the whole surface lay submerged, so calling it Panthalassa[3] was more accurate.

The wave kicked up by the sinking mega-liner tossed our skiff this way and that.

Blue spray, like cherry petals, brushed across Go Yuri's cheek.

"…"

Watching that, I remembered—

—the private conversation I had just shared atop the liner with [The Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace].

"We may have split into assorted Constellations, but in the end our essence traces back to Mother Saintess nya."

Flap-flap.

[The Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace], whose face was the Saintess's twin save for the rabbit ears, spoke.

"True, Lü Bu-nya is far more violent than Mother. And I myo am frank about desire and pleasure beyond the original. Even so, essence is essence nya."

"What are you getting at?"

"The unbreakable rule that we exist for humanity."

Hop—she jumped down from the baccarat table in the liner's casino.

"Think of it as the Three Laws of Robotics, nya. Mother Saintess isn't foolish. She anticipated 'monstrification,' where Constellations slip her control and run wild-nya."

"…"

"Undertaker-nya, why did you decide the moment you fell into this ruined world that you had to hunt us Constellations nya?"

“Because if I let things be, you would degrade into Outer-God-class monsters bearing the very title Constellation for real.”

“Sound analysis, myo. But are you sure you reached that conclusion entirely on your own nya?”

I was not.

If you thought about it, neither [The Monarch of the Crimson Horse] nor [The Collector of All Anomalies] had ever truly threatened me. For ocean-class anomalies they were disconcertingly mild—

—true to their origin being the Saintess.

“…Was my train of thought guided? Without me even noticing?”

“‘Manipulated’ would be the precise word nya. And it wasn’t simple brainwashing either myo.”

“What is Go Yuri after? Why egg me on to cull Constellations?”

“No idea, nyoom.”

[The Dream Demon] shook her head.

“To be frank… I expected ‘it’ to board the liner at your side and was terribly on edge nyan. Obviously so myo.”

“…Because the longer I act alone, the greater my chance of shaking off Go Yuri’s conditioning.”

“Exactly, myo.”

Even so, Go Yuri had let me leave her side without protest.

In fact, in a way she seemed to want me not to rely on her too much.

Paradoxical.

She was brainwashing me at will, yet kept handing me chances to escape her grasp—an uncanny situation.

I frowned.

“In its own way, it’s an opportunity.”

“Nyoom?”

“…In my long life as a regressor, I’ve mostly avoided Go Yuri.”

True, I had discovered that the Leviathan Priestess—the silver-haired psychopath—acted as a vaccine against Go Yuri alone.

But every vaccine has a shelf life.

Across the next centuries or millennia, Leviathan’s aura would see less and less use.

Just as Hecate was fated to wane, Leviathan too would fade quietly from the universe.

“It’s nearly time I faced her head-on.”

“…”

“If I’ve decided to enter the ‘narrow gate’ for the sake of saving the world, I inevitably have to investigate the riddle called Go Yuri. Perhaps… the 999th cycle is, where she is concerned, a kind of tutorial stage.”

“Nyo-ho-hong.”

[The Dream Demon] laughed oddly.

“If so, what a colossal prologue! Needing 999 play-throughs just to attempt the tutorial—what kind of outrageous boss is that, nya!”

While she laughed, the exact opposite question flashed through my mind.

If a boss had to wait alone on her stage while 999 rounds of the game revolved before a player could reach her——what was in that boss’s heart as she waited?

“Good, myo! If Undertaker-nya is resolved to fight that being, we’ll do everything we can to help nya.”

“‘We’?”

“Myooong. As I said, Mother Saintess isn’t foolish nya.”

The rabbit-eared Constellation grinned.

“And we daughters who share her source—aside from Lü Bu-nya—aren’t hopeless idiots either myo!”

She flicked a casino chip.

The black-and-gold chip spun, then landed perfectly on her palm.

At that very moment—

[The Morning Star of the Second Coming is watching you.]

[The Librarian of the Great Library is watching you.]

[The Understanding of Anguish is watching you.]

My mouth fell open.

“No way?”

“That very way, nya. With that terror stalking around, do you think we’d idle away our time in civil war, nyoom?”

——The Constellations were already cooperating.

More precisely, only those who agreed to cooperate had survived.

The rest must have been exterminated after fierce fighting. Maybe even among the allies there had been casualties.

“Yet I sensed none of that from Lü Bu…”

“Ah, she’s one-hundred-percent dumb by sheer stats, myo.”

“…”

“Try talking ‘strategy’ or whatever and she’ll only set off filial fireworks for her parents. We agreed from the start to use her, nya. Lü Bu-nya is bound to believe she was acting on her very own will, myo!”

An idiot.

Yet precisely because she was foolish, she remained safe from Go Yuri.

If she understood nothing of the current schemes, the chance of leaking info to Go Yuri dropped to zero.

“And [The Collector of All Anomalies]?”

“A scout, nya. We wondered if brute force might work, tried it, and got crushed like me—nyoom. A waste of talent myo…”

So that was how.

“Oh, but that jerk was unlucky-nya, so part of me feels refreshed. Serves her right, myo.”

“…”

Is the Saintess perhaps suffering extreme self-loathing and fragmentation??

“I see. Then my goal, besides saving the Saintess, is to learn every possible way to resist Go Yuri’s brainwashing—for this run and the ones to come.”

“Nyoom. Agreed.”

“So what will you do? Say our duel ended in a draw and postpone your culling?”

“…”

Grin. [The Dream Demon] smiled.

“Undertaker-nya really is always kind to Mother, nyoom.”

Except for the face, nothing in her manner or aura resembled the original, yet the faintness of that smile felt like the Saintess's.

"Just curious, myo, but any chance you'd like to share a kiss with me?"

"……"

I take it back. Including the smile, she resembles the Saintess in no way whatsoever.

Seeing my expression, the Dream Demon burst into uproarious laughter. When she finally calmed down, she spoke.

"Well, if it were Mother, she'd be glad she could still help Undertaker-nya even after falling to a monster. And unlike a certain idiot, I'm a genuine filial daughter, myo, so I follow Mother's will to the letter."

"…Considering what you said twenty seconds ago, I can't endorse that claim."

"Have you heard the tale of Jing Ke[4], nyoom?"

The topic changed without warning.

"Jing Ke… The assassin who failed to kill the First Emperor?"

"Exactly, myo."

The Dream Demon chortled.

"If you're going to assassinate an emperor, you must first lull him, and to lull him you need a convincing tribute nya. Undertaker-nya, it's been fun, nyoom."

Before I could grasp her meaning, the Dream Demon summoned a sword—

—and, without hesitation, pierced her own throat.

"…"

No blood sprayed.

She was not human but an anomaly.

Right after her head severed, pitch-black fluid dripped like candle-wax. Soon her whole body melted away, leaving only a lone meteorite gleaming.

An anomaly could kill itself.

I'd long known that fact, yet it was never the sort of shock one grew used to.

[The Morning Star of the Second Coming recommends you pick up the Star Fragment and return to the skiff.]

[The Librarian of the Great Library informs you the Dream Demon's death was pre-arranged.]

[The Understanding of Anguish wishes to discuss avenues for communication with you from now on.]

"…"

I bent down and picked up the meteorite. Warm, as though it still held the sun's heat.

"All right."

In the empty casino, I muttered toward allies who were not present.

"So the alliance has flipped."

Number of Constellation fragments remaining:

Three.

Footnotes:

1 - Yuan Shao, courtesy name Benchu, was a Chinese military general, politician, and warlord who lived in the late Eastern Han dynasty. He occupied the northern territories of China during the civil wars that occurred towards the end of the Han dynasty.

2 - The Xuande Emperor, also known by his temple name as the Emperor Xuanzong of Ming, personal name Zhu Zhanji, was the fifth emperor of the Ming dynasty, reigning from 1425 to 1435. He was the son and successor of the Hongxi Emperor.

3 - Panthalassa was a vast superocean that surrounded the supercontinent Pangaea during the late Paleozoic and early Mesozoic eras, roughly 300 to 200 million years ago according to Wikipedia. It encompassed nearly the entire Earth and is considered a precursor to the modern Pacific Ocean.

4 - Jing Ke was a youxia during the late Warring States period of Ancient China. As a retainer of Crown Prince Dan of the Yan state, he was infamous for his failed assassination attempt on King Zheng of the Qin state, who later became Qin Shi Huang, the Qin Dynasty's first emperor.

Chapter 374

The Receiver V

Sinnoa

Go Yuri (高妖理).

When we come to discuss her, it is fair to say that even her name alone feels decidedly ominous.

Yu (妖): sinister yet enticing, seductive yet uncanny, a syllable that lures in demons, foretells an early death, and is therefore monstrous—yet, above all else, beautiful.

Ri (理): the principle that governs such things.

Go Yuri.

The logic that rules over eldritch anomalies.

…No normal parent would ever saddle a child with a name like that.

From the outset, Yu (妖) carries the nuance of dying young—of "perishing before one's time."

Who would ever give their beloved child a character that screams ill fortune? One might as well cast a curse instead.

"Come to think of it."

"Ye—?"

"I've never once heard you talk about your family, Yuri."

While we were sailing toward our next destination, the [Morning Star of the Second Coming], I asked the question as casually as I could.

“Well. In times like these it’s hard to imagine any family surviving intact, and frankly I have to wonder whether you ever truly had one.”

“Ahaha.”

Go Yuri, who had been peering past the horizon through a pair of binoculars, let out a faint laugh.

“Guild Leader does have a habit of tossing off remarks that dig right into a person’s heart. You’re awful.”

“…I was insensitive. Sorry. So you did have a family?”

“Yes. I did. Quite a large one, actually.”

A large family? The phrasing sounded odd.

Did she mean she’d had so many brothers and sisters that it was practically a clan?

‘A bustling Go Yuri household—little brothers, big brothers, older sisters everywhere. They’d probably start by dropping a colony on Earth as a housewarming gift…’

Lost in silly thoughts for a moment, I stared blankly ahead, just as the bow of our dinghy sliced a clean line through the ocean.

The sea of this world, overflowing with Leviathan’s blood, was eerily calm; the wake our little boat left behind was likely the only wave for miles.

“Guild Leader, do you remember your own family?”

“No. Not at all. I’m not sure I’ve mentioned it, but I’m suffering from a sort of amnesia.”

“Oh dear. For their dutiful son who even made it into a top university to forget them… that’s tragic.”

My heart lurched.

“…Do you know what university I attended?”

“Ahaha, of course. If it weren’t an elite school, do you honestly think the pseudo-aristocrats of Sejong would have hired you as their daughters’ private tutor?”

“…”

On that point I too had long been puzzled.

‘…Why on earth did the Cheon family choose someone like me, a complete nobody, as tutor to their daughters, their precious heirs?’

The gap in status was simply too large.

As was clear with that summer I spent with Yu Ji-won when she was fourteen, my own family was anything but wealthy.

During my college years I’d lived alone in a tiny rental across from her hillside neighborhood, a seven-pyeong* room in a run-down multiplex. (*Roughly 23 m2)

I was probably covering the rent on my own, surviving on student loans.

‘Meanwhile, Cheon Yo-hwa lived in a mansion sitting on 14,990 pyeong of land. The cult followers had an entire private community.’ (Roughly 49,524 m2)

‘They even ran their own school corporation, grooming the next generation of believers.’

The class divide was obscene.

Even if the old me hadn’t been penniless, it was impossible to imagine I’d had the connections to mingle with a provincial noble house.

Prestigious university or not, entrusting their treasured heirs’ studies to some random “just a college student,” and a male tutor at that—there was simply no reason.

‘Something doesn’t add up. I’m still missing a piece.’

A riddle unsolved.

“If Guild Leader can’t remember his family—”

Go Yuri spoke again while my thoughts chased their tail.

“—then I can’t talk about mine.”

“Hmm? What does that mean?”

“If whatever I say makes you remember them, you’ll just be sad. Either discover them yourself, or remain unaware forever, that’s how it should be.”

“…But I asked about your family, not mine.”

Go Yuri offered no answer.

Still smiling gently, she lowered the binoculars.

“I think we’ve arrived!”

I turned my head, and the sea split like the miracle of Moses.

Just as in Exodus, the seabed gaped open. Down there, a massive structure showed off its majesty.

“…”

It was so familiar that for a moment my voice simply left me.

And no wonder.

“…Why is every other building in the world underwater, yet the Kumsusan Palace of the Sun[1] is perfectly intact?”

“This too must be the grace of the Supreme Dignity. Wow. Not even the Great Deluge dared swallow the North’s holiest shrine!”

Even when the world was whole, that place alone would have been branded a nexus of anomalies and void. Fitting that the [Morning Star of the Second Coming] was waiting for me there.

[The Morning Star of the Second Coming].

Among all the Saintess's alt accounts, it had the most fanatical followers and by far the most convoluted lore.

Outwardly, that account wore the face of Mo Gwang-seo: the kind of middle-aged Korean man you'd get if you asked an image generator for "middle-aged Korean male" and clicked refresh a dozen times.

More precisely, it was an anomaly that merely borrowed the "shape of Mo Gwang-seo."

Well, this palace was practically a mummy dungeon to rival the Pyramids. Like building, like owner.

"Welcome, Undertaker."

So I could hardly help being startled.

"To greet you not with Clairvoyance but with my own eyes is a first. I've long wished to meet you."

"…Uh. Ms. Saintess?"

Seated upon the throne was, by anyone's eyes, the Saintess as she might have looked at ten.

The problem was her speech.

"That title refers either to my poor mother or, in another sense, a pitiable daughter. I am no Saintess."

Unlike the equally child-sized [Monarch of the Crimson Horse], the Constellation before me was remarkably composed.

My head spun.

"First off, where is Mo Gwang-seo?"

"Who knows? I do not. When the Great Deluge came and the world sank, I awoke with my siblings—yet Mo Gwang-seo was already gone.”

“…”

“But you spoke down to my other sisters, and now you use honorifics with me.”

“Well, yes. I always used proper honorifics with the real Ms. Saintess. As for the knock-off and Bunny Ears… recognizing them as the Saintess would only demean her, so I refrained.”

“Ha-ha.”

[The Morning Star of the Second Coming] laughed.

Somehow the laughter brimmed with authority, but coming from a child half the throne’s height, the dissonance was wild.

“The sisters may feel slighted. Each of them carries one aspect of Mother.”

“That’s something we’ll need to ask the Saintess herself later.”

“Hmm? A fair point.”

She stroked her chin.

“You do try to listen to others. Even as a regressor, you still respect people. I admire that.”

A meaningful smile.

“Of course, no matter how hard you listen, there are some whose words you can never be sure you’ve truly heard.”

“What do you mean?”

“That being. The one you call by your own chosen name. Whatever it says, you can never be certain those words are truly its will—an absolute anomaly.”

Go Yuri.

“Why does that being appear to you as a woman with pink hair—an appearance that belongs to no one in this world?”

“…”

Once again, I alone had come inside. Go Yuri was still outside, tying the dinghy.

“The simplest answer,” she continued,

“is that your type is pink-haired girls—ones who laugh easily, sit demurely, can debate the Three Kingdoms, play janggu, and cheer for Shu. If that’s your ideal, it makes sense.”

“My tastes are perfectly ordinary.”

“Well, that’s a debate for another time, but something about its appearance is too odd to be mere preference.”

The Constellation narrowed her eyes.

“If that being could change at will, then at least once it should’ve shown someone else’s face—Dang Seo-rin’s, say. Don’t you think?”

“You plan to have Oh Dok-seo steal a peek at the side story someday, right? No comment.”

“And yet you say it has kept the exact same face since before the fifth run. So very peculiar.”

A fair point.

“If someone else could draw your greatest affection, shouldn’t its face have changed to them at least once?”

“It’s not the only strange part.”

There were couples in this world.

To the lonely that might feel cruel, but ‘people who love each other’ do exist.

“For such a person, Go Yuri should look exactly like their lover. At the very least, someone should see her as a real-world celebrity. Yet…"

"There is none."

The Constellation spoke with certainty.

"No one ever mistakes that entity for anyone who truly exists."

For example—

It was awkward to admit, but whether anyone liked it or not, the person Sim Ah-ryeon 'loves most in the world' is me, the Undertaker.

I won't label that feeling. Ah-ryeon's mind isn't easily caged by a single word.

"…To Ah-ryeon, Go Yuri ought to look exactly like me—or at least resemble me. Yet Ah-ryeon never confuses the two of us."

Click. She nodded.

"The same with Yu Ji-won. Even if she can't recognize faces, if that being could turn into whoever best draws her affection, it would have become you."

"But Go Yuri never managed to become me."

"Indeed. We must conclude she lacks that power."

Why?

Of course, one exception exists.

As mentioned, the [Admin of the Infinite Metagame] claims Go Yuri looks like me—the Undertaker.

…Utterly baffling.

"Therefore,"

The Constellation hopped down from the throne.

“Before I die by your hand, I will risk everything to see that being.”

“…”

“Until now I avoided looking for fear of being brainwashed. But I’ll die anyway—so on my sisters’ behalf I’ll witness it myself, and then die.”

She fixed me with her gaze.

“So that my final words, my dying scream, might leave some clue to its identity.”

“…It will probably do no good.”

I shook my head.

“Go Yuri’s brainwashing even affects language. Whatever you try to say will reach me already censored.”

“We have a countermeasure.”

“A countermeasure?”

“In this world, and across all your cycles, only now does it become possible.”

She covered her right eye.

“As you see, I’ll watch using Clairvoyance only with my left eye.”

“……?”

“And at the same moment, my sister, the [Understanding of Anguish], will watch using only her right eye.”

She grinned.

“And we’ll share our visions.”

“W-wait. That means—”

“In my left eye I’ll see ‘the being as viewed by Morning Star,’ and in my right eye ‘the being as viewed by Understanding of Anguish.’”

“…!”

My own eyes widened.

“So the Go Yuri who always shows just one face might appear in several forms at once?”

“Exactly.”

“If the contradiction cracks, we might glimpse its true face.”

“But aren’t you sisters all fragments of the Saintess? Won’t you see the same ideal?”

“We share an origin, but each of us has her own taste. A simple example: little Lü Bu is fascinated by your backside, while I prefer firm thighs—I’d like to try a lap pillow.”

“Excuse me?”

“We’re mirrors shattered by Hecate, both the Saintess and not. If we perceived that pink-haired being identically, then we’d collapse into ‘one Saintess.’”

Something sounded off, but as if nothing odd had been said, she continued.

“So while someone else’s vision might overlap, ours never will. Because the moment it does…”

“…the paradox Hecate built would crumble, Mr. Undertaker.”

The voice was not mine.

From behind a massive pillar stepped another figure—her face that of the Saintess, but perhaps ten years older.

“And you are…?”

“Please call me [The Understanding of Anguish].”

Her ankle-length hair swayed as she spoke in a near whisper.

“And there’s no need to learn more. I’m only here for this operation.”

She strode forward and, without hesitation, clasped my right hand.

As I blinked, [Understanding of Anguish] looked up at me with steady eyes.

“Mr. Undertaker knows that sufficiently enhanced clairvoyance can be shared.”

“…Ah.”

Indeed—cycle 107, when the Saintess first fell, she’d briefly shown me her third-person sight.

“So I’ll project what I see with this right eye into your view,” she said.

[The Morning Star of the Second Coming] took my left hand.

“And I’ll overlay what I see with my left eye,” she added.

They spoke in unison.

“We’ll show you.”

“We’ll overlay them.”

“Human eyes are first-person, but our Clairvoyance is third-person.”

“With two angles, the pink-haired being’s single face should blur.”

“A trick possible only in a run with multiple clairvoyants, as monstrous as us!”

“This might be the last chance to see that being.”

“It’ll likely lash out, try to ruin us—but, Mr. Undertaker, we want you to look.”

Identical faces, identical eyes, living along different timelines… they looked up at me together.

“Someday.”

“So that even that being can be conquered.”

“…”

For a long while I said nothing.

My lips were sealed, but my heart pounded madly.

I could see Go Yuri.

In this run where the Saintess was broken into Constellations—in this bizarre post-calamity epilogue born of Hecate—I might at last witness Go Yuri’s real face.

Yet—

Would she want that?

Everyone has a face they choose to show.

If I tear away her unknown visage, would that not bring her sorrow?

That worry weighed on me.

– Ms. Dang Seo-rin killed the me outside.

Her words on that bench in the unconscious realm resurfaced.

– Thanks to that, even if only briefly, I’ve been able to move a bit more freely.

“…”

Go Yuri is not one.

The Go Yuri in reality, in the unconscious, the one I see, the one Sim Ah-ryeon sees, the one the Constellations see—they are all different.

A kaleidoscope of glass shards.

But has she ever wished for this?

Always forced to wear countless faces, never once her true one—could she really welcome that?

Is this truly the right state for her?

"…All right."

With effort, I spoke.

"I have no idea what will happen, but… I'll accept your plan."

Grip. Fingers tightened around mine.

"Then,"

"Please close your eyes."

The point of no return.

When Cheon Yo-hwa kissed me in the Classroom of Four Seasons. When Yu Ji-won called me "Mr. Matiz." When Dang Seo-rin bound my heart with eternal magic.

That instinct—that certainty—enveloped me once more.

If I take one more step—

I will tread a road with no way back.

"…"

I shut my eyes.

Darkness filled my vision.

Then, alternating by my left and right ears, the Constellations counted.

“We’ll count to three.”

“Do not open them.”

“One.”

“Two—”

“Three.”

And then—

Go Yuri appeared before my eyes.

Footnotes:

1 - The Kumsusan Palace of the Sun, formerly the Kumsusan Memorial Palace, is a building near the northeast corner of the city of Pyongyang that serves as the mausoleum for Kim Il Sung, the first Supreme Leader.

Chapter 375

The Receiver VI

Sinnoa

Go Yuri's true face.

To insist I had never once imagined it would be a flat-out lie.

Yes… let me confess frankly.

Whenever I was idle I would picture what Go Yuri might really look like.

Was she an anomaly? A genuine human being?

Did she have a blank, featureless head like Slender Man? Or was her face nothing but churning noise, like the Abyss itself?

Perhaps, just perhaps, she had once been one of my own companions, fallen and corrupted until "Go Yuri" was all that remained.

And so—

"……?"

Bzz-zzzt—

The instant my sight linked with the Constellations' and I saw what their third-person clairvoyance was seeing, I could hardly trust my eyes—nor even the [Clairvoyance] that was sharing the image with me.

"J-Jeong Seo-ah?"

There, a tiny child was standing.

Jeong Seo-ah. Anyone with a prodigious memory might recall the name, the little girl from the bakery in Haeundae who always ran up to me and gave me sugar-coated doughnuts, a pint-sized assassin whose dream was to become the Empress of Insulin.

‘Jeong Seo-ah? Go Yuri? Why… how?’

Moreover, every time a cycle changed, Seo-ah’s gender and appearance changed as well. It had to, because her baker parents conceived their child after the apocalypse, and the timing of a pregnancy naturally shifted from run to run.

‘That’s… Seo-ah from the 19th cycle.’

A being only I could recognize. Even her parents would not have known her if the cycle were different, yet there she was, in the 999th run, in front of the Kumsusan Palace of the Sun, poking curiously at the parted walls of water like a child at the Red Sea.

‘What in the world…’

Was that Go Yuri’s true form?

Just a cute sugar-bomb terrorist whose lethal doughnuts threatened me with hyperglycemia, and yet she was supposed to be the star of the “pink entity”?

My understanding, painstakingly built over countless regressions, began to crack. Static crawled across my view like an old CRT screen.

Bzz, bzzt-bzzt. Bzz.

The black was Seo-ah’s shadow—alive, tentacular, climbing to swallow her whole.

The white was Seo-ah’s face—skin melting like candle wax, dropping onto the shadow in thick plops.

After black and white crossed—

“Ah?”

She changed.

A face at once familiar and impossible to grow used to.

– …

The so-called Undertakeress—my female self whom Dang Seo-rin and I had met on the flight to Salar de Uyuni.

– …Seo-rin.

Undertakeress looked up at someone.

Toward a shadow creature made of black-and-white noise—unrecognizable. She reached out with her right hand, gently stroked the thing's cheek.

– Sorry.

At that word, the shadow drove a dagger down. Thud! From the breast that blade pierced burst a spray of blinding white noise—blood.

White droplets spattered, and the shadow's sooty black spread like ink in water.

When black and white had mingled—

Bzz-bzzzt, kshh, bzzt-bzzt!

A wholly different scene unfurled.

– All units, advance!

A man's voice.

The face was familiar, yet my brain buffered a moment before it placed him.

– Guild Leader Lee Baek! A meteor shower's coming down!

– It matters not! If we falter here, the Great Witch of Night will wipe us out anyway! Fear no losses—forward!

Lee Baek. The thug from the Busan-Station tutorial who always split survivors into cliques—his power, Lion's Roar.

That I failed to recognize him at once even with [Complete Memory] was no wonder. His whole demeanor was transformed.

'Why is that punk… like this?'

First, the expression, it was stalwart. All the greasy bravado of a hoodlum was gone. His eyes stared straight at reality.

– Left flank! Draw the meteor fragments away!

– Yes, Guild Leader!

– Right flank! The Witch's main body is hiding nearby—find it and annihilate it!

– Aye, My Lord!

…What on earth was happening?

Lee Baek was commanding a vast battlefield with nothing but [Lion's Roar]. Awakeners moved as a single organism under his orders.

– Undertaker.

– Hm.

From behind came the one called Undertaker. Lee Baek looked at him with absolute trust, a look that had never once passed between the real Lee Baek and me in ten thousand years of cycles.

– The final blow is yours.

– As always.

– Can you manage it? The foe is the Great Witch.

– That question is meaningless. If I can't, I die.

Behind Lee Baek stood Undertaker; behind him, another presence flickered like a shadow. It murmured, and both Lee Baek and Undertaker nodded at once. I tried to see who it was—

Bzzt-bzzt-bzzt-bzzt-bzzt!

Black-and-white static devoured the world.

From the left of my vision a white fluid splashed. Something burst with a wet pop. And I knew, instinctively, that it was happening not inside the "screen" projected by Clairvoyance but outside it.

"…Mr. Undertaker."

I opened my eyes.

My left hand—[Morning Star of the Second Coming] had been holding it moments ago. The Constellation still held it, yet her wrist had lost all weight. Her body dangled in empty air like a puppet on a broken swing.

"…"

"The Morning Star is dead."

I turned right.

[Understanding of Anguish] was not unharmed either. White blood trickled from her mouth, eyes, and ears.

"I won't last long either, so…"

"Exchange… information."

"…Yes."

Cough—white liquid spattered from her lips. She seemed to gather the last of her life into our interlocked fingers.

A vision attempted at the cost of life.

The Constellation reported the result.

"We… saw nothing."

“Nothing.”

“Yes. Only swirling black-and-white static. Of that being itself—not a glimpse.”

“…”

A critical clue… even fragments of the Saintess, degraded to ocean-class anomalies, had failed to observe Go Yuri’s essence with their full [Clairvoyance].

Yet—

“Mr. Undertaker… you saw, didn’t you?”

“I did.”

Why only I could perceive it, I did not know. Perhaps someday I would. But through the sight they had fought to share, I had seen a part of Go Yuri.

“…Good… to hear.”

Understanding gave a faint smile.

“Mr. Undertaker… please… the one that still… remains…”

[The Understanding of Anguish wishes you good fortune.]

Sluuush.

Her body, already melting like wax, collapsed completely.

Left hand. Right hand.

“…”

What last words had she tried to leave me?

‘The one that still remains… take care of it.’

Whatever “it” was, I felt the outline in her broken breath.

"…I understand."

One fragment of a Constellation remained to me now. Only one.

Clap!

Go Yuri smacked her hands together.

"My goodness. A pair of nasty Constellations lying in ambush, and the mighty Guild Leader wiped them both out in one go. Amazing as ever!"

…I edited what had happened inside the palace and told her a more palatable version. She accepted without suspicion—or perhaps she simply didn't care whether she believed it or not.

R-r-r-umble.

Soon the parted sea crashed closed again, like the clap of Yuri's hands.

From the stern Lü Bu howled, manning the oar.

"Uooohhh!? As if I'd let my Red Hare sink! Red Hare is unsinkable! Not like the nags of commoners!"

"Kyah-aa-!"

With Lü Bu's rowing skill, already S-rank on water, the dinghy shot clear of the collapsing trench. The route was as wild as any roller coaster. Go Yuri screamed with delight while white spray, as pale as Constellation blood, lashed us on all sides.

"…Go Yuri."

"Yes?"

"By our bearings this must once have been Pyongyang. So Busan is completely submerged, isn't it?"

"Ah, yes, probably. After all, the uninhabited island where you first woke up was Busan."

I peered overboard. The water was unnaturally clear, streets of a drowned city lay visible below. Empty underwater avenues, smashed windows, lampposts—with not even fish gliding between them. No sign of life at all.

"I see."

I chose my words with care, wearing a regretful expression.

"I guess I'll never again buy bread at that Haeundae bakery."

"Ah. That place was a gem."

Go Yuri volleyed back my remark as naturally as tossing a volleyball.

"I loved their croissants most! Mmh, peeling off those thin layers and biting down, so crisp."

"…"

After clearing the Busan Station tutorial, Go Yuri had vanished. Only later had sightings popped up in Daejeon. Chronologically, she could not have tasted any croissant there, for the bakery reopened much later.

"And inside, all pillowy and soft… like your tongue was lying down on a little bed."

Yet the expression melting across her face as she reminisced overflowed with life. She spoke of memories from a street that no longer existed.

"…Personally, I liked the owners more than the flavor."

"Eh?"

"Every morning at seven they swept the walk, greeting passers-by with big smiles. They met as exchange students in Hawaii, I think."

Go Yuri was watching me. I swallowed, not with my mouth, but with my heart.

"…Their kid was wonderfully polite too. I only wish she'd stop using me as the guinea pig for new recipes."

"Fufu. Guild Leader does exude that hard-to-approach aura. Children rarely dare get close."

"Isn't that too cruel? She calls me oppa."

"You have to understand, Guild Leader. Whether it feels unfair or not, you've lived tens of thousands of years by lifespan alone. If you still insist on being called oppa… hahh. You'll pioneer a new frontier in the domain of humanity's conscience…"

A drop fell into my chest.

In the 999th cycle, this very run, Jeong Seo-ah was a boy. Not a little girl.

"…"

My heart thumped.

"…Well. Thanks to that boy Seo-ah I'm used to being called mister now."

This time I pictured the cheerful boy of the 999th run. As always, [Complete Memory] supplied a crystal-clear recall.

"Cute kids chirping 'mister, mister,' and their cuteness just overruns my dignity."

"…"

Thump. Thump-thump.

My racing heart would not calm.

Just now I had uttered two statements blatantly at odds with each other. A moment ago I'd said a girl named Seo-ah called me oppa.

Immediately after, I added that a boy named Seo-ah called me mister.

A contradiction. An odd exchange. Any ordinary person—say, Noh Do-hwa—would have barked, “What nonsense are you spouting?” right away.

“Ahaha.”

Go Yuri—

“——Maybe that’s because you actually don’t mind being called mister, Guild Leader.”

—answered as though nothing whatsoever was strange.

“…Me?”

“Yes. Think about it. When Oh Dok-seo calls you mister, you feel quite a bit of closeness, don’t you?”

As if there had been no oddity in our entire conversation.

“More than anything, you honestly don’t care about age.”

Go Yuri was smiling. As if teasing me.

“I even know why, you see?”

“…Oh? And why is that?”

“Because of Ms. Saintess. She used [Time Stop] so much her lifespan keeps stretching abnormally.”

Go Yuri was smiling. As if finding me impressive.

“If you fretted about your own age, you’d inevitably force Ms. Saintess to count hers the same way. So you’re being considerate of her.”

Go Yuri was smiling. As if she understood me.

“…Is that what you think?”

I managed to reply, but I had no composure to move my tongue.

Every five seconds I pivoted the images in my mind with [Complete Memory]—Noh Do-hwa of the 53rd run. Switch. Sim Ah-ryeon of the 95th. Switch. Yu Ji-won of the 777th. Switch. The Saintess of the 107th.

Over and over, like turning a kaleidoscope, swapping memories at a resolution only I could achieve.

“Yes!”

Go Yuri was smiling.

“That delicate consideration of yours moved Noh Do-hwa.” “Because Sim Ah-ryeon is surprisingly sensitive.” “A natural at telling lies from truths.” “Which made things hard for Yu Ji-won,” “yet also led her to listen to your voice.”

Go Yuri was smiling.

Go Yuri was smiling.

Go Yuri was smiling.

“And Ms. Saintess already knows—she won’t say it out loud, but she knows you’re thinking of her. Wahh. I find that relationship truly beautiful!”

“…”

Ah…

My soul, not my lips, released a sigh—black in color.

‘This is not a conversation.’

No one could have realized it, unless they, like me, had lived through contradictory timelines. Unless they, like me, possessed flawless recall of each one.

‘…I’m not talking with her at all.’

There was no such thing as “Go Yuri.”

I could neither see her nor hear her.

Her thoughts, tastes, hobbies, likes and dislikes, memories, shared recollections—none of it could pass between us.

‘She merely reads the sights of the timelines I’ve walked and, matching them, enacts the perfect dialogue, the perfect action…’

It was not mind control. It only became mind control as a side effect.

‘Whoever she speaks with, she reads their deepest interior and resolves it.’

The optimal conversation.

The optimal counseling.

In other words: the optimal route.

Strategy Guide.

That was Go Yuri’s authority.

Within it, her own will and desire did not exist.

“…”

I thought about the being before my eyes.

Has she ever, even once, conversed with someone?

“Huh? Guild Leader?”

Go Yuri—

“Why are you looking at me like that?”

—was smiling.

Footnotes:

Chapter 376

The Receiver VII

Sinnoa

Shall I bring up a slightly different topic.

Everyone has, at least once, fallen into the fantasy of [Character Making] themselves.

For example, if you're of the Harry Potter generation, you've probably day-dreamed about your avatar (for some reason sorted into Ravenclaw House) enrolling at Hogwarts.

Bloodline? Noble. Appearance? Naturally a peerless beauty—absolutely a peerless beauty. Luck? Top-tier. The rest of the settings… huh, who cares? ONLY the peerless beauty. Even if you have to pile on every negative trait imaginable to scrape together enough points, you absolutely refuse to give up that peerless beauty. Your body is frail, you cough delicately all the time (people have to notice by pure coincidence, of course), and you're actually afflicted by an incurable disease and a curse? All the better… and so on.

It makes no difference even if you're not imagining yourself entering a particular fictional universe.

TRPGs, role-plays, whatever.

At the very least, you wish that the real-life you could turn into someone a bit more ideal.

'The greatest version of myself I can picture.'

Opportunities to sketch an original character in your head are surprisingly common.

Now, let's add one more layer of imagination.

Imagine that a person called A really gained the ability of [Character Making].

Of course, an ability called [Character Making] doesn't exist in reality.

I'm not speaking in circles just to confuse you.

To put it bluntly, this is not an accurate account of Go Yuri.

I'm only using [Character Making] as an example so you can picture it easily.

Even so—if such an impossible fantasy came true, what would happen next?

First of all, the fact that you'd check off 'peerless beauty' as your very first trait is so obvious anyone could predict it without being a prophet.

After that, according to your taste, you might deepen bonds with a childhood friend, bump into a literary girl in a hidden archive, secretly help a genius artist who's perfect on the outside but a bundle of yandere nerves on the inside, or be doted on by a sibling who's unusually kind only to you.

Just design your life however you like.

– Life is wonderful!

And then, just when you're enjoying that beautiful life to the fullest, an unfortunate bit of news arrives: the Void comes calling.

– Uh-oh?

The genre shifts.

No matter how lovingly crafted your OC is, they can only panic. How can a whole universe change this suddenly?

Thankfully, the panic doesn't last long. The odds are high that you already invested in something like 'Mental Fortitude: A-class' during [Character Making].

– Ahh, so that's what the hidden setting was?

Above all, to your surrogate A, this sort of genre drift feels like a cliché in itself.

– I've seen this somewhere before!

– Well, it can't be helped. Let's give it a go… saving the world.

Now A starts paying attention to traits they barely glanced at when they first did [Character Making].

'Swordsmanship Talent.' In a modern story you figured you'd never need such a trait, but things are different now. Pick it. Slot it in. Talent cap? Obviously S-class.

'Magic Talent.' Same story. Scribbling even more cheat codes onto an already happy life might offend A's aesthetic sense, but next to a grand event like the end of the world, personal qualms are trivial. Pick it. Slot it in. Talent ceiling? SSS-class.

Far beyond an OC and into the territory of an undeniable Mary Sue —a munchkin that anyone would complain about—the overpowered build is now complete.

– Now then! How do you like me!

And the Void arrives.

– Huh?

The difficulty feels a bit off.

– Hmm?

Still, there's no need to worry.

A has a cheat key:

Unlimited [Character Making] ticket service!

Spin the gacha as much as you like! Apart from having to invest your time with each spin, it's practically free! Good grief. The devs must be crazy!

So what's left?

You.

– What, I have to pick even more traits…?

A hint of dissatisfaction.

A lone Mary Sue stomping everything flat by herself is way off A's taste.

Even so—what choice is there? The world must be saved.

Because the childhood friend whose bond you painstakingly built, the literary girl who makes you light-hearted just by her presence, the genius artist who shows a real smile only to you, the sibling who'd dive into Hell for your sake—

If you don't save the world, they all die.

And it won't be a peaceful death either.

– Mm.

For yourself. For others.

For the life that has already become precious.

– Fine, just a bit more.

'Charisma.' You never wanted to stand out, but if you're going to block the Void you have to unite humanity. Mediating between countless people with conflicting interests already makes your head spin and your chest feel tight, but—

– Just a bit more.

'Natural Socialite.' Then all you need is a trait that lets you enjoy socializing itself. Now hanging out with scheming power players isn't painful. Sure, as a human you still get stressed, but—– A bit more?

'Indomitable Will.' In that case, nullify the stress itself. More precisely, impose upon yourself a steel will that never collapses even under stress. Traits like 'Diligent' and 'Conviction' are bonuses. Willpower beyond anything your past self could have imagined.

– Just a bit more.

'Graceful Speech.' The ability to speak at any time and place without losing dignity or courtesy, so no one ever underestimates you. But some people positively dislike formal manners, so—

– Just a bit more!

'Psychological Insight.' If you can sense someone's psyche instinctively, you can tailor your response. 'Mind Reading.' Read their thoughts outright and you can judge not just instinctively but with intellect. 'Status.' By reading even the opponent's talents and disposition, you remove any room for misunderstanding.

– Just a bit more.

– Just a bit more.

– Just a little…

There are countless roads to unhappiness, but only one path to happiness, so they say. Tolstoy said something similar.

Road. Route.

The sun sets but the road is still long.

It can't be helped. The journey is urgent, yet the sun is already sinking.

If letting the sun set is the law of nature, then walking the road is the law of humanity. And Nature—the world—now hates humankind. So why should I place nature's law above human law?

– Huh?

Somehow I feel more erudite.

Now you can quote both Anna Karenina and the Records of the Grand Historian with perfect ease.

You couldn't read classical Chinese at all before.

Since when?

…You're not sure.

Was it when you took 'Culture' as a trait? Or when, to recruit a particular someone, you chose 'Calligraphy' as a shared hobby?

Or, or, or—

– …Huh.

Déjà vu.

– …

Once, your family badgered you to get into a prestigious university. Studying was boring, but the world is harsh, they said, and a top-tier diploma is indispensable. Lacking the courage to ignore that brief, persuasive logic, you probably took the trait 'Scholastic Ability.'

Once, you hated people, hated forcing yourself to smile, but you had no power to trample those you disliked and no nerve to face them without a smile, so you probably took the traits 'Sociability' and 'Smile.'

You didn't hate it.

You didn't love it either.

Things you merely 'didn't hate' piled up.

Before you knew it, perhaps the heap had grown into something close to 'hate.'

– …Just a little more.

No need to worry.

A has a cheat key:

‘Optimism.’ ‘Bright Smile.’ ‘Sense of Happiness.’ ‘Carrier of Happy Virus.’ ‘Stress Immunity.’ ‘Dopamine System Immunity.’ ‘Unquenchable Hope.’ ‘A magic switch that turns sadness ON/OFF.’ ‘Be Happy.’ ‘Healthy Self-Love.’ ‘Ability to forcibly redirect your train of thought.’ ‘Be Happy.’ ‘Don’t grieve over failure.’ ‘Don’t despair over frustration.’ ‘Cherish success.’ ‘Never lose curiosity about the world.’ ‘Be Happy.’

And what remains after all this?

Everything.

– …

Just that… you are no longer there.

The rowboat fell silent.

“…”

“…”

The reason was simple.

After that last exchange, I’d stopped talking to Go Yuri.

I’d realized that any conversation was meaningless.

“…”

A faint smile.

Go Yuri likewise didn’t open her mouth first.

She must have decided that, with me as I am now, the best way to draw goodwill was ‘silence.’ She kept only a faint smile on her lips.

So on the broad sea only the sound of oars stirring the water broke the hush.

“Uh. Um.”

Shifting around awkwardly—

Lü Bu glanced away.

“…Ah, right! Brother! Now only [The Librarian of the Great Library]’s star shard is left, isn’t it! Wahaha. That means either she or I will become the final Constellation. Brother, whom will you choose?”

“We’ll see when we get there.”

“As expected, Brother, you’re cautious! Ha-a! But I! Even if I’m reborn as the one and only Constellation, I swear I will never betray you, Brother! Am I not the very model of a loyal retainer!”

“Right.”

“Ah-ha-ha! Heh-ha, ah-ha-ha-ha….”

Lü Bu’s expression slowly flattened.

“Ehh, this is bad news.”

When I still didn’t react, Lü Bu glanced up at the sky like a dog whose owner had scolded it.

[The Monarch of the Crimson Horse voices serious doubts about the current mood.]

[The Monarch of the Crimson Horse does not understand your sudden change of heart.]

I couldn’t explain.

Lü Bu had already come into too close contact with Go Yuri. Even if he understood my explanation, he would never be able to abandon his attachment to her.

In the end, until we reached our final destination, the rowboat was steeped in silence.

“Whoa, hey. We’ve arrived.”

The Tower of Babel.

Lü Bu moored the boat to that structure standing in the middle of the sea. As usual he tried to flop down and stretch out, but I stopped him.

“You’re coming with me this time.”

“Huh? Ah, yes. Understood.”

Just as I was about to disembark with Lü Bu—tug.

Something gripped my clothes.

When I turned, Go Yuri was gently pinching the hem of my collar with her fingertips.

“…”

In her other hand she held out a star fragment.

[The Collector of All Anomalies]. It was the residue of the Constellation Go Yuri had devoured on the deserted island.

“You’re kind, Guild Leader.”

Go Yuri parted her lips.

“No matter what we say now, you can never know what I truly meant. The ‘real me’ is cut out of the dialogue, and only the ‘Go Yuri’ created by your imagination is left smiling.”

“…”

“So there’s only one way to communicate with ‘me.’ Silence. If no words are exchanged, your silence itself shows you’re keeping quiet for my sake.”

She gave a bright smile.

“Thank you.”

“…”

“It’s so like you to find a method anywhere, Guild Leader, but you don’t have to be considerate. I’m actually more comfortable if you keep talking to yourself. It’s a kind of pleasant white noise!”

Was that truly Go Yuri’s feeling?

I couldn’t tell.

I even tried using [Mind Reading] as an experiment, but it had no effect.

Like a warped mirror, like a broken kaleidoscope, the being before my eyes only refracted my own psyche.

“…I’m sorry.”

After accepting the star fragment, I murmured quietly.

“Huh.”

“To talk with you, I’d have to face you while holding your real form in my mind. But for me now, that’s impossible. I… can’t know your true face. I’m sorry.”

“Huh. Huh.”

“Forgive me.”

Go Yuri’s lips slowly opened.

“□□□□ □□□□.”

But no voice came out. Even her lips didn’t move. In the pitch-black well beyond, there wasn’t even a sign of a tongue.

“□□.” “□□□ □.” “□□□□.”

I couldn't reach her.

The Void.

"…"

Closing her lips, Go Yuri smiled. And she never spoke again. She only waved her hand, as though bidding farewell.

I stepped out of the rowboat.

When I climbed the Tower of Babel and glanced back, the boat moored at the steps was drifting all alone, with no one on board.

"Brother."

"Mm? Yes?"

"Do you remember who was with us just now?"

Lü Bu tilted her head.

"Huh? What are you saying, Brother? Ever since the deserted island, haven't the two of us siblings overcome every ordeal together! Wahaha!"

"…I see."

"Yep! The moment this little brother lost his Sky-Piercing Halberd yet still defeated [The Collector of All Anomalies] must be recorded in Brother's heroic chronicles! I truly hope your personal Prophet will do it justice!"

The instant Lü Bu said that, for some reason my own memory conjured up an image of this kid actually clashing with [The Collector of All Anomalies].

Vaguely—at some unknown place, maybe that deserted island. But the image was vivid.

'Just as I thought.'

If I didn't possess [Complete Memory], my original memories would already have been entirely painted over.

‘Perhaps it isn’t a coincidence that I was given this kind of memory.’

Threads of inevitability woven like spider silk.

Feeling one of those flimsy strands catch my ankle, I climbed the tower steps.

A short time later.

“Welcome, my master.”

A certain Constellation awaited me in the tower’s innermost chamber.

Seeing me freeze for a moment, she spread a fan and hid her lips.

“Your face has hardened. Why? Were you expecting [The Librarian of the Great Library] instead? Oh dear, how disappointing.”

“…Why are you here?”

“Oh my, do I really need to explain? That crude, barbaric, stupid miko must have followed ‘that side.’ Naturally, that leaves me by myself on ‘this side.’”

The white girl.

Despite her aristocratic speech and bearing, shackles bound her ankles, wrists, and even the slender neck beneath her face.

“Ahh. Truly! Free of that wretched brat—oh my, pardon. Free of that wretched apostle—the very air feels different.”

This was the first time I’d met her in reality.

Even so, I could speak her name without hesitation.

“…The Admin of the Infinite Metagame.”

“Yees.”

Click—the fan folded shut.

“I’ve been waiting, regressor. My detestable master.”

Unlike the other Constellations, whose beginnings were lies from the outset, the outcast god who alone was a true Constellation smiled fearlessly.

[The Admin of the Infinite Metagame greets you.]

Footnotes:

Chapter 377

The Receiver VIII

Sinnoa

[The Admin of the Infinite Metagame].

Once, she demoted this entire world to a mere “game,” re-classified every anomaly as a “monster,” and labeled Awakened folk “NPCs,” thereby securing near-invincibility for herself, that outcast god—

“Phaa. I’ve always wondered from inside the screen! Just how good is this thing they call chocolate cake? Every time that chewable miko ate it she’d sneer, ‘A clump of pixels like you will never taste this, pity,’ and my nerves would fray, fray, fray!”

…was now, in splendid Homo Sapiens form, munching cake.

For the record, I baked the dessert.

The instant we met she folded her fan with aristocratic grace and asked, “Might I trouble you for a sample of your culinary skill?” like some noble heiress placing an order.

Fortunately the Tower of Babel keeps a stock of ingredients.

I improvised a full course from what was left, and, as you see, she’s reaping happy chemicals in overdose.

“Did the Librarian tease you like that?”

“Yes! Really… that plebeian; filth beyond the word ingratitude. Mmm—this chocolate, the faint bitterness followed by a brush of sweetness on the tongue—irresistible….”

“Sorry to cut into your gourmet discovery, but first things first.”

“Mm?”

“Your diction. That gaudy noble-lady lilt—where did it come from?”

A natural human question.

“To my memory you never had a Young-Lady trait. Even the character that became the template for ‘White Girl’ was technically a noble daughter, but she never spoke in that rootless style.”

“Hm.”

The Admin speared another bite of cake, head tilting in the same posture.

“I didn’t choose it because I like it. Partly the [Young-Lady] tag stuck on me, as you said, but mostly the chewable miko forced the trait.”

“What?”

“Please don’t make that face. What did she say… Ah—‘The old man lacks a noble-lady character; you’ll be perfect for it.’ Something like that.”

“…”

“She shoved a setting sheet not 5,700 but 57,000 characters long down my throat, as if training ChatGPT. If she had time for that circus, I’d prefer for her to write another line of her novel.”

Dok-seo, Dok-seo! Dok-seo…

“By her logic, overlapping character traits are the worst catastrophe. Thus, I am a catastrophe.”

“So in short it’s all the Librarian’s fault.”

“Well. Until she met a certain ‘someone,’ my miko’s psychosis wasn’t this far gone.”

The Admin’s eyes began to narrow at me, so I hurried topics.

“Constellations have materialized, but I didn’t expect you to remain. Why haven’t you messaged me until now?”

“Oh my, have you forgotten already?”

Tap tap—after wiping her lips, the Admin lowered her lashes.

“To me, ‘Undertaker’ is always two people.”

“Ah.”

“Normally my miko would tag whichever is near her as the ‘real’ one, but the world has nicely ended. Two masters in one boat, I couldn’t tell which was genuine.”

“And now?”

“No.”

Her smile warped into resignation, like sneering at herself and me alike.

“For all I know you’re the pink entity. Or truly the Undertaker. I can’t decide, so I'll converse assuming you’re my real master.”

“…”

“If you’re fake and I miss it, apologies in advance. Because of me your chance to beat the pink entity will vanish forever, but please accept it as karma and be magnanimous.”

I frowned.

“Vanish forever? Explain.”

“Like this.”

Shrrk.

She extended claw-like nails and slit her own chest straight down.

No blood flew.

Inside, static hissed.

Grotesque enough, yet stranger still:

"……?"

I could read the static.

Once it would've been meaningless noise, now faint shapes formed.

Noise filling her torso… on closer look every flicker was a 'letter.'

L A P O T W I R E K I D O B A S E L O T Y G R A L P O R E S Y N
O T I K E R A B L W I N E D O R O S T L A K Y B E S I O N T E R I
P A L Y N O K E D I T O L A R E S Y L A P O N O B L R E K I T S Y
W I D O K E R A L Y S T N O T E P O R E D I L A K Y I N R O S E
B A T I G R A L P O S Y N O K E L A R E B L W I T Y

Plop!

She thrust a hand into the typographic swarm, into her own chest.

"Hmmm. Ah, here?"

Fishing around, she pinched letters between finger and thumb.

"Found them."

Six letters:

O T P A P L

They wriggled on the tabletop.

She skewered and rearranged them:

L A P T O P

Lined up, they tore with a rip—shraaak!—and a laptop sat there.

The bound item I receive each time I restart at Busan Station.

She beamed.

“Here, detestable master. A laptop that survives regression… my personal ark. With this—”

“Incredible. You just turned letters into a thing?”

Blink.

Her head tilt turned even steeper.

“Pardon?”

“What you did just now.”

“Er… master, are you saying you could actually see it?”

“……?”

My turn to tilt.

“Of course.”

“What exactly did you see?”

“You slit your chest, letters writhed, you plucked the six reading ‘laptop.’”

“…”

Her face hardened; she had meant to unveil the laptop, yet now propped her chin, grave.

“…”

“What’s wrong?”

“…‘Sudden’ better suits you, master. Even with the chewable miko gone, me wearing a perfect human shell is odd.”

“…?”

“Regressor, my detestable master.”

She fixed her stare.

“The authority you glimpsed isn’t something human eyes parse easily.”

“I still don’t follow.”

“…That my true body is letters, that you casually perceived it—that alone is bizarre.”

Her eyes narrowed.

“Odd, no? You never had such power.”

“Hmm.”

“Hmph. You don’t grasp the weight yet. Fine, let’s do a test.”

She reached in again, drew out nine letters, stretched them:

W H I T E G I R L

Chin on hand, she smiled.

“Go on, poke around.”

“Poke?”

“If you truly see them, you can touch them.”

“…”

“Prove it.”

Easy enough. I pressed a finger on “W H I T E G I R L.”

Twitch! Letters jerked, the Admin’s shoulders quivered.

Watching, I kneaded ink from ‘W’ and ‘G,’ reshaping:

B L O N D E G I R L

At once the letters leapt up the Admin’s body—arm, shoulder, neck, cheeks, hair—like cockroaches.

“Ah?”

Where they burrowed her hair’s whiteness turned gold.

“…Not a lie, then.”

She sighed, twirling new, fuller golden hair.

A weary smile.

“Congratulations, detestable master.”

“…”

“You’ve become a monster’s monster.”

“Yes.”

“Any workaround?”

I shook my head.

“It’s a contract—with Hecate, with Nut.”

“Oh my.”

“Try to record anything about Hecate and it counts as a breach. Directly or indirectly, there’s no loophole.”

Even if one existed, breaking the contract was unthinkable.

She laughed behind her fan.

“Understood. But… information unrelated to Hecate, without any mention of the 173rd run, but only events of the 999th—what happens then?”

Snap—the fan closed.

“If it concerns the pink entity alone, could we not leave clues inside my laptop?”

I almost sprang up.

“Information on Go Yuri!”

“Yes. To me, data on that pink entity equals ‘data on the Undertaker.’ It fits the laptop just fine.”

Ohoho.

“As you know, that laptop preserves the Undertaker’s chronicle across runs. Therefore we can stock it with pink-entity intel.”

“…!”

A spark in my head.

‘Right… she can’t tell me from Yuri, so she can record Yuri perfectly!’

Brilliant.

Details of Dang Seo-rin were too bound to the contract, but—

Clues on Go Yuri from the 999th cycle could reach my next self.

“Of course, the contract might wipe everything anyway.”

“It’s still worth trying.”

“And one more safety measure…”

Click.

She powered on the laptop.

It should have nothing installed, save the text files for my chronicle. Less software means fewer authorities for her.

Yet—

“To keep the 999th-run data safe, shall we add a safeguard?”

The once-empty desktop showed a single unfamiliar file:

“Library Society.”

While my eyes widened, she continued, smiling like a debutante seasoned in intrigue.

“Any Constellation we miss this run devolves into a true anomaly, correct? Then—”

“…we turn that to our advantage.”

“Indeed. The Great Library floods daily with hundreds of data items.”

“In that ocean we’ll scatter the clues to defeating the pink entity. The hints which you found in this cycle.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 378

The Receiver IX

Sinnoa

[The Librarian of the Great Library] will be left behind as a bona-fide Constellation.

The goal is singular.

Go Yuri, who only managed to seize a clue worthy of the name after reaching the 999th run, a being whose real name remains an enigma.

All of this is to pass information about her down to the next ‘me’.

“How do you like it, Master?”

Admin of the Infinite Metagame, the very person who came up with the operation, flashed a self-assured smile.

“Please humbly admit that the only strategist in your party is no longer just that blasted puppet-master behind the scenes.”

“…I get that Dok-seo is your priestess, but do you really have to hate Yohwa that much too?”

“Oh my, you are absolutely right, Master! After all, you only got handed [Mind Reading] by her, twisted my century-long master plan in a single stroke, ruined the most promising priestess worse than anyone, and even made me sign a humiliating instrument of surrender—but sure, there isn’t a single reason in the world for me to bear a grudge, is there?”

“…”

Leaving the blazing-with-rage Admin of the Infinite Metagame aside for the moment, I ran the numbers on the operation’s success rate in my head.

‘Not bad.’

No—better than merely ‘not bad.’

There were, however, several side effects and loopholes that could be foreseen once the plan was set in motion, and I rolled each of them across my tongue in turn.

“Very well, Admin of the Infinite Metagame. Let’s assume, as you say, that [The Librarian of the Great Library] indeed ascends as the one-and-only authentic Constellation.”

“Yeees, sir.”

“In that case, she’ll have inherited not only the remnants of the Great Witch Hecate but the Saintess’s traces as well. If we leave her be, won’t she become ridiculously strong down the road?”

“Hmm. You’re worried about a rebellion, aren’t you? Then the constraints have to be strong—very strong.”

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame tilted her chin, as if she had expected such objections and was nonetheless happy to play the red team in our thought experiment.

“From what I’ve heard from the other Constellations, you’ve already gathered the fragments, Master.”

“Ah, you mean these?”

“Um, Master, sorry to say, but could you please not play so casually with an anomaly’s main body?”

She paled when she saw the Constellation fragments I’d just fished out of my pocket.

No one had ever pointed it out, so I hadn’t noticed, but apparently even touching these shards counted as the outrageous misconduct of a monster in her book.

“Haa… Well, perhaps it’s for the best. The pieces that end up in your grasp are, so to speak, the Constellation’s core—the very essence.”

“Ho-oh.”

“In other words... by using these fragments you can design the Constellation’s ‘settings’ however you like.”

“For example, something like [Must Never Be Hostile Toward Humanity]?”

“Exactly. You can impose as many rules as you fancy, right down to something akin to the Three Laws of Robotics.”

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame grumbled from behind her fan.

“Honestly. The original plan was for me to tweak the settings with my authority, yet the already unfair gentleman disappears for a bit only to come back even more upgraded. The world really is, hopelessly, unfair.”

I ignored the complaint—it was beside the point.

‘So I’m entering the settings.’

I define the essence of the anomaly.

With my fingertips, I create an anomaly.

“...”

A pitch-black unease rose from below my navel, but I clenched my fist.

It was something that had to be done.

I could not abandon the strategy against Go Yuri like this. I could not squander the chance that had finally arrived in the 999th cycle.

“...Right. If I have no choice but to create this anomaly, I have to configure it so that it harms humanity as little as possible.”

“Hmm. Speaking as someone who already surrendered, I’ll warn you it won’t be easy. You’ll have to brace for some collateral damage.”

“No. There is a way.”

I looked straight ahead.

“I’m going to put you to use, Admin of the Infinite Metagame.”

“?”

From that day on, the days of writing the setting bible for [The Librarian of the Great Library] began.

[Eeeeeeeek!]

A high-fidelity soprano rang out of the laptop speakers—none other than Admin of the Infinite Metagame’s fury-stricken groan.

Only a short while ago she had enjoyed the freedom of the outside world; how had it come to this?

As if she’d changed jobs back into a VTuber, the avatar of a noble lady on the laptop screen was gnawing on a handkerchief.

[I finally thought I’d gotten a real body, and now—again! Again you shove me into this rice-grain-sized studio apartment! My goodness! Do you truly lack even a shred of human compassion?!]

Slurp.

I leisurely sipped the canned coffee I had salvaged from the Tower of Babel’s storeroom and looked down at the laptop.

“Every VTuber is either a reincarnate or a reincarnation candidate. You’re simply walking the path allotted to you.”

[Eeeek! T-talk about frightening out of nowhere.

“Enough. Get ready.”

I held the Constellation shards up to the laptop screen, beckoning for her to hurry up and eat them.

[Haa. So bull-headed, honestly…]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame let out a sigh.

The moment the noble-lady avatar stretched out her arms, the fragments that had definitely been ‘outside’ the screen migrated to ‘inside’ it.

Piro-ro-ro-rong ♪

On the white desktop the shards were now lined up like icons, transformed into clumps of pixels.

“Is there any reason to sigh? This isn’t bad news for you either, it means a bit of your mark will remain in [The Librarian of the Great Library].”

[Yes, yes. That’s why I’m cooperating, otherwise I’d never have returned to this solitary-cell existence.]

“Hmm. Strictly speaking, you’ve sworn unconditional obedience to me, so when I give an order, you follow it first and complain later.”

[Could you perhaps share that wretched unpleasantness of yours not only with anomalies like me but with the humans around you as well?]

I cracked the knuckles of my interlaced fingers.

I clicked on a Notepad file.

“All right.”

[Yees.]

“Let’s get started.”

The fragments broke apart.

As the pixels shattered, black dots appeared.

The moment my fingers clacked on the keyboard, those black specks birthed from the shards were dragged along and turned into letters, like ink.

Just as I had rewritten Admin of the Infinite Metagame's core in my own handwriting, I would now define the essence of [The Librarian of the Great Library] through typing.

The first line of the setting bible read as follows.

※ This work is a piece of fiction. Any institution names, work titles, personal names, or trademarks that appear are entirely fictitious.

Why did that feel so familiar?

Yes. The restriction that it was nothing more than 'fiction.'

A way to ensure that, even if an anomaly-cum-constellation called [The Librarian of the Great Library] did come to life, it would inflict no damage on humanity or reality.

[Hmm. Your brain does work well.]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame craned her neck to peer at the Notepad file. Her avatar hung from it like someone clinging to a wall.

[Seeing as I'm an Outer God who once ruled over 'fiction,' I've been pretty much completely neutralized already.]

[Therefore, now that [The Librarian of the Great Library]'s sphere of action is limited to fiction, she will never unleash unexpected explosive power.]

"Exactly."

Only powerful anomalies had value, so I once thought.

Even a weak anomaly gained a fresh purpose by virtue of its weakness.

"To lock her inside 'fiction' I'll need not only the fragments' ink but your assistance as well."

[Yes. In a sense... you could call her my daughter?]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame made an odd face.

[Her original is that Saintess, her maker is you, and I am her helper. Three parents, how lucky the child is to have so many.]

“Let’s keep going.”

Even if I managed to save the world, this anomaly would probably persist somewhere in it, forever taking the form of a ‘creative work.’

The parameters for that entity continued.

1. [The Librarian of the Great Library] records every anomaly and every tale of the uncanny. The method of recording varies each time.

2. Every ghost story circulating through reality or cyberspace has either been authored by [The Librarian of the Great Library] or penned unwittingly by someone she has enchanted.

2-1. [The Librarian of the Great Library] cannot reveal these facts. She records the stories, nothing more, and must not be concerned with proving her own existence.

Juru-ru-ruk.

Every time another line was entered into the setting bible, ink seeped from the shards, and a white ichor trickled from Admin of the Infinite Metagame’s avatar.

From my fingertips as well.

“...”

The letters ‘Under’, ‘ta’, and ‘ker’ tumbled into the screen one after another.

‘In the past, even my eyes would never have been able to see such a sight.’

Just how did such a perspective suddenly open up to me?

I still lacked the answer, but what mattered now was that it was useful to me.

“When I think about it.”

Tap-tap-tap.

I muttered while hammering endlessly at the keys.

[Yes?]

“From the very start, [The Librarian of the Great Library] was defined as the Constellation presiding over the Library Society, whose leader is a character called the Duke of the Black Library—whose true identity is…”

[Master, that’s you, isn’t it?]

“Right.”

Tack, tack-tack.

“To pass off the strategy methods for anomalies to the Awakeners in a manner that sounded plausible, I used the façade of a ‘Library Society.’ The whole setup was my design from start to finish.”

Tack.

“I could have entrusted the imaginary Duke of the Black Library to someone else, like [The Dream Demon of the Grand Pleasure Palace] or [The Morning Star of the Second Coming].”

[And yet?]

“Why, then? I kept the hidden lore that ‘the Duke of the Black Library is actually the Undertaker.’ There was no need to, but unlike the other Constellations, [The Librarian of the Great Library] alone possessed my identity.”

[…]

“And now, [The Librarian of the Great Library] is literally being born at my hands.”

Tack.

“All of these coincidences...”

[Feel almost like inevitabilities.]

“Ahh.”

I smiled.

“How many failures must there have been before reaching this inevitable path? Imagining them makes me want to bless myself for having arrived at this moment.”

[Hmph.]

“Then your presence at my side now is hardly a mere coincidence either, Admin of the Infinite Metagame.”

[...]

“Because you demoted everything in this world to fiction, I could hand over the clues about Go Yuri in the form of a creative work. Perhaps you too were necessary—for me, for us.”

The keyboard clattered.

“A pity.”

[What’s a pity?]

“I’ve felt gratitude toward you for the first time in my life, yet once we pass on to the next cycle I’ll forget it forever, that’s the pity.”

[...]

“So oblivion was this frightening after all.”

Stare. On the screen, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame was gazing up at me.

That gaze no longer felt awkward.

“To remember every minute of one’s life, I had thought that was the punishment and curse laid upon me, but perhaps it wasn’t after all.”

[Whichever path we start on, every human ends up bearing their own heaven-ordained punishment.]

Admin of the Infinite Metagame’s voice murmured through the speakers, the quality now slightly degraded.

[If there had been no yearning or lament for worlds other than this one, an Outer God like me would never have been born.]

“So, round and round, you exist because of humanity’s incorrigible nature?”

[Yes. Cursed, isn’t it.]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame looked up at the sky.

I suddenly wondered.

How did the world ‘outside the screen’ appear in Admin of the Infinite Metagame’s eyes?

[Which is why your author Hecate concluded that humanity’s nature had to be remodeled entirely. It seems she failed though—thanks to you, Master.]

“…”

[Since you’ll forget anyway, I’ll confess now: I didn’t surrender to you solely to survive.]

“Then why?”

[I wanted to watch.]

Hee-hee, a laugh laced with static.

[Your epilogue.]

"…"

[I acknowledge your effort. Yes, I concede defeat. But when it all ends, what will you obtain? A single human? Humanity? A world of billions, each harboring billions of curses?]

The defeated Outer God—now closer to human—smiled with her eyes.

[I've come to want to see it at any cost, even if I must discard all my authority, the moment you fall at the very end.]

"That will never happen."

[And whom you'll end up dating, and if you do, how many holes will get punched in your gut.]

"Please spare me that at least..."

[Oh my. I need some sort of spectator sport to add a bit of fun to a life fallen from godhood to servitude, don't I?]

Kyaruruk.

It was a laugh that fit her form from long before, far more than the noble-lady guise she bore now.

Time passed.

The setting bible was enormous; I needed meticulous and subtle coding to ensure that under no circumstances could [The Librarian of the Great Library] evolve into a dangerous anomaly.

'How much time has passed?'

It was hard to sense time.

As I said, every letter I wrote drained 'something' from my being.

In martial art terms, it was like innate true qi.

Just as the fragments that formed the core of the Constellations were being used as ink, something that formed the backbone of me, the regressor known as the Undertaker, was being consumed.

‘...But it doesn’t matter.’

It will all reset anyway.

‘I mustn’t write a document directly about Go Yuri, the chance she’ll notice is too high.’

Call a ghost and a ghost will come.

It was the most basic of spells.

‘Now I think I see why Go Yuri suddenly adopted the identity of a ‘tiger.’

There must have been several reasons.

Perhaps she needed the concept of dragon-tiger contention in order to oppose a dragon like Leviathan.

She might have borrowed the legend of the Jangsanbeom[1], which can mimic any face or voice, to express that trait.

Go Yuri.

A name permitted only to me.

‘...Everyone has their own way of calling Go Yuri. Ha-yul has her own term, Dok-seo has hers.’

Therefore I must not call her ‘Go Yuri.’

If I do, she’ll realize from ‘over there’ that it was none other than the Undertaker who summoned her.

The instant I call her, she perceives it.

‘What an absurd spell.’

A bitter laugh escaped me.

‘Therefore, when drafting the Library Society document, I must not mention the name Go Yuri.'

'As if writing in cipher, so that only I can understand it.'

An epithet.

'One that the next me, or even the me hundreds of cycles hence, will be compelled to click the moment I see it.'

I pondered.

'...This is it.'

I hammered the keyboard.

'With this, even if I lose my memory—even if I regard the flood of data in the Library Society as nothing more than rootless scraps of information whose source I can't trace—'

'—I'll still take it seriously.'

'Others will see nothing but a meaningless string of characters.'

'But the Undertaker—that is, I the regressor—could never dismiss such characters as a joke.'

I wrote the document about Go Yuri.

I penned Go Yuri's story without ever using the name Go Yuri.

It seemed a narrative style that suited her quite well.

With each character I typed, the fragments of the Constellation melted away, and in no time they were gone.

[...]

Even the avatar resembling a noble lady—

—had, at some point, fallen silent altogether, becoming a blurry mass of pixels.

But.

‘Finished.’

Tak.

I hit Enter.

The moment I wrapped up, a sudden wave of fatigue hit—no ordinary fatigue, but a sensation close to spiritual depletion.

Through dimming vision I could just make out the laptop with its screen now dark. Had the Admin of the Infinite Metagame also spent her soul to the very end?

If so, then this was the regressor’s will.

A guidebook for one solitary strategy.

‘I’m counting on you… the next me.’

I closed my eyes.

Footnotes:

1 - An urban legend about a mysterious creature resembling a tiger that appears in the mountains of Jangsan Mountain in Busan Metropolitan City in Korea.

Chapter 379

The Receiver X

Sinnoa

I was dreaming.

Inside the dream, Go Yuri and I were amicably riding a tiny boat, so the very moment I saw it I realised at once that it had to be a dream.

‘Ha, an impossible sight.’

Even if I died and came back to life (and that is no exaggeration), there was simply no way Go Yuri and I would end up in the same place, much less in a space this cramped.

I am the Undertaker. Believe it or not, I’m the sort of young man who actually listens when grown-ups warn him to steer clear of dangerous neighbourhoods.

‘And what’s with that oarsman?’

‘She looks like the Saintess but has an eyepatch on, and that way of speaking… heavens. Could she be some bizarre hybrid of Dok-seo and the Saintess?’

‘What a blasted dream.’

Just as I tried to swallow a dry laugh, my eyes flickered—not my physical eyes, but the eyes of my mind, blinking like a lamp.

‘Wait. I have never experienced anything like this. Then is this scene… being spun inside my dream by some anomaly that slipped in?’

Because I possess [Complete Memory], a dream for me is either a replay of reality or the appearance of an anomaly, there is no third option.

A “trip with Go Yuri across a world drowned beneath the sea” was obviously not a replay of reality.

That memory did not exist inside me.

‘…’

It did not. It was not. It had never been.

With every kind of negation—of being, of statement, of action—I peeled away the sight before my eyes.

That was what my head did.

‘…Yet what is this feeling?’

My heart failed to follow suit.

The pounding would not quit.

‘The outlines are bleaching ever whiter, or should I say they’re drawing farther away?’

‘The colour of the sea, the look on Go Yuri’s face… I feel as though we were discussing something important.’

‘Ah.’

Realisation moved slower than my heartbeat.

‘I see.’

‘So this is what it feels like to forget.’

The world faded at frightening speed.

The blue of the sea, the slime on the gunwale, the ripples raised by the oarsman, all of it turned white, like fine sand on a beach.

Yes.

I was forgetting something.

“…”

My stomach churned.

“Mr. Undertaker.”

A voice rang out in the whitened world.

When I turned my head, the Saintess with long, sea-coloured hair stood there alone.

“Saintess?”

“Yes.”

She was the only one in this white world. Thus, the spot where she stood felt like the very centre of existence.

“What is going on? Has an anomaly broken into my dream again? Or is an anomaly wearing your face to show me an illusion this time?”

“…”

The Saintess did not answer.

Instead she looked straight at me.

Somehow, she seemed sad.

“…Saintess?”

Sadness—an expression rare for one who almost never shows emotion.

While I stared in puzzlement, she exhaled a small, steadying breath.

Strange. If she needed a moment she could have frozen time with [Time Stop].

“…Mr. Undertaker, you are dying right now.”

“Pardon?”

“Literally. Just as your life was about to end outside, I stopped the world so I could buy us a brief moment to speak.”

Confusion washed over me.

Me, dying outside? It made no sense, after all—

“I hardly dropped dead out of nowhere. Moments ago I was simply drinking with Dang Seo-rin…”

Huh.

Her eyes saddened further.

“…The 999th world has already met its end. So has the 173rd. That’s why the agreement you and Lady Hecate made—the promise—is beginning to carry itself out.”

She murmured.

“This place is an interlude Lady Hecate and I barely carved out with our authority—a tiny gap between instants.”

“Right, I was living in the 999th cycle. But the 173rd? That’s already long finished.”

“…”

And Hecate?

It was sudden. Of course I knew the name, she is a goddess of Greek myth.

But no being I knew bore that epithet.

Most epithets for Awakeners or anomalies were coined by me. It is not my habit to fling divine names about.

Names are basic spells. Grant someone a mighty name lightly and they may indeed grow too mighty.

The only goddess name I have ever borrowed is ‘Nut’.

Thus, in the regressor's lifetime—in my lifetime—no character named Hecate existed.

I can swear that nowhere in all my memories has the word Hecate appeared.

"…You truly don't remember."

The Saintess reached out.

It was the first way humans ever found of bridging the gap between selves.

"But that's all right."

Jingle.

Somewhere a bell chimed.

She clasped both of my hands.

"Even if it's missing from your memory, the mark remains in your heart. If not today, you will recall it someday."

"…"

"Just as you found me again in this 999th cycle after being apart since the 267th."

My eyes widened.

Only then did I grasp the source of the bell.

"…!"

On the Saintess's wrist, which held my hand, hung an ornament she would never normally possess.

A silver bell.

The souvenir I always buy in the Busan Station concourse, across all cycles, only one Saintess has ever worn that bracelet.

I stared, dumbfounded.

Perhaps she read my gaze, for she formed a faint, unfamiliar smile.

"…I told you we'd meet again soon, didn't I?"

"…"

"You kept your promise, Mr. Undertaker. No matter how many cycles, no matter how long it took, you swore you would come to save me—"

Jingle.

Her words were replaced by the light ring of the bell.

I had drawn her into an embrace.

"…"

"I'm glad. Truly… glad."

A quiet sob fell in the white world.

Why I was about to die in the 999th world, why the Saintess had postponed that death, why the Saintess of the 267th cycle stood before me—

I did not know.

Nor did I need to.

Someone I had lost forever had returned. The luck of meeting her like this left me only gratitude.

Even once more—

I wanted to meet her.

"…"

Hesitant fingertips brushed my back.

For a moment…

the hands that had paddled empty air now held me.

“…Ah.”

A soft murmur seeped from the Saintess.

Neither of us could see the other’s face.

She was probably closing her eyes, embracing the only darkness allowed in this whiteness, seeking human warmth.

I too asked in the white darkness.

“Was it hard?”

“…I was all right. It was only a moment. I closed my eyes. In this place where time has stopped I simply waited.”

“Truly?”

“…To be honest, I felt a little. From the 999th world onward time began to move again for some reason, so through Lady Hecate’s eyes I could faintly sense you.”

“I missed you.”

“Yes. I… missed you too.”

The sob shook loose.

But the Saintess swallowed.

“I’m sorry. I want to talk more… spend more time, but our reprieve is brief.”

“What do you mean?”

“There is much you won’t understand. You have lost much. Yet the sacrifice wasn’t meaningless. Mr. Undertaker, you achieved something tremendous.”

Steadily, as if stitching each word, she went on.

“Don’t worry. Don’t be sad. Now it’s not your turn but your comrades’. One day Oh Dok-seo will definitely witness ‘this very moment’.”

“The Dok-seo…”

I understood at once.

[Side Story Creation]—the power to revisit any part of my chronicle at will.

In game terms, a [Replay Room].

“Either way, you will not remember this moment. That is the contract.”

“I understand.”

I did not know what had happened, could not even guess what the ‘contract’ meant.

But I was not omniscient. I could not be omnipotent. It was fine not to bear and grasp everything myself.

I had comrades.

“You truly did well, Mr. Undertaker. I too will shrug off the shackles of this frozen world and return to the regressor’s timeline like any ordinary person.”

“…”

“But first, there’s something we must do.”

She stepped back.

“One last chance remains.”

This was not a farewell. Without caring who moved first, we squeezed each other’s hands.

“A chance?”

“Because you gathered my shards so diligently, because Lady Hecate freed herself… I am now stronger than ever, almost beyond precedent.”

She added, though I barely understood, that only by relinquishing this power would Hecate’s sacrifice gain meaning, likely words meant for Dok-seo.

“Oh, and I was busy cleaning up Lü Bu because you forgot to wrap her up.”

“Lü Bu?”

At my reaction she smiled faintly.

“Thanks to that I could use an immensely reinforced [Time Stop] to create this interlude—and even a variant of the Utopia.”

“…”

“The same goes for [Telepathy], Mr. Undertaker.”

Her eyes locked on mine.

“With my current power I can—just once—overstep time and space and leave a ‘message’ for someone.”

My jaw dropped.

“…Incredible. If true, that power is colossal.”

“It is true,” she said firmly.

“Not only to the future. I can send [Telepathy] to the past as well, to the days before you ever began life as a regressor.”

“…”

“Using this chance is the final quest of cycle 999. This one-and-only chance, this miracle… I want to decide with you how to use it.”

Why, I wondered.

It was a crucial choice and an extravagant gift, practically an extra sheet of canvas.

I ought to have pondered deeply, yet the moment she spoke, the destination flashed into my mind—instinctive.

"…"

"…"

I looked at the Saintess.

She looked at me.

Wordless. I felt sure she had reached exactly the same thought.

"Saintess, do you remember?"

I smiled.

"When you were still acting as a 'Constellation' to me—wearing the mask of the [Saintess of National Salvation]—when I travelled up to Seoul for our first meeting."

"Yes."

"Back then I asked you similar questions every time."

The oldest memory:

– I would like to ask about the Constellations first.

The 36th cycle.

When I discovered the [Saintess of National Salvation] was actually human, I asked why she acted as a Constellation.

– What exactly are Constellations? Are they real transcendents? Are you their agent, Ms. Saintess?

Those were days when I was far less experienced.

Before our relationship became what it is now, we had that conversation.

– Constellations… do not exist.

– They don't exist?

– Yes. The Saintess of National Salvation, the Conqueror of the Alps —they are all characters I created on my own.

– Why would you do such a thing?

Then she answered.

– I awakened about twenty days ago.

An Awakening earlier than others.

– Since then my hair changed colour, and in my dreams monsters appeared in nightmares, too vivid to shrug off as illusion.

She went further.

– I don't know why, but I was convinced it would truly come to pass. So I asked myself what I could do. Not stockpiling cans or bottles of water, but something only I could accomplish.

Looking back, isn't it odd?

I didn't see it then, but afterwards I came to know her nature.

The Saintess is never drawn to superstition, never favours irrational impulses.

She is almost always calm.

Would someone like that, because of a few vivid dreams, sincerely believe in the end of the world and prepare for it?

"It was now."

"…Yes. Probably."

“It was now.”

The Saintess was no prophet.

Nor a fanatic.

For a rational person to truly believe in the apocalypse, convincing dreams alone are nowhere near enough.

Even so, she began acting as a Constellation.

She formed a plan.

Executed it.

Met me.

Stood here now.

Had there been no reason—had she dismissed the dreams, formed no plan, taken no action, and thus not been watching someone in the Busan Station concourse when the Void arrived, had we failed to cross nine-hundred-ninety-nine wheels—this moment could not exist.

“I’ll send [Telepathy].”

I will pass on a message among the stars—

“To the Saintess of the past.”

—To you, before you even knew you were made of starlight.

Footnotes:

Chapter 380

The Receiver XI

Sinnoa

I was dreaming.

"…Another weird dream."

She sat up and covered her eyes.

It was a time when no one had yet called her a Saintess, and she herself could not have imagined it, therefore all I can do is refer to her simply as "she."

"…Haa."

And yet she was still her.

With a light toss of her chin she shook off the nightmare she'd had during the night, then tied her hair back with a band.

Perhaps it was the hang-over from the sleeping pills, but her mind felt slightly murky.

Just as she peeled one of the bananas she had bought yesterday, planning to get breakfast over with, her fingers stopped.

[How curious.]

A voice only she could hear.

[It's always been I who was observed by ■■'s ■■, yet this time I'm the one observing Sain■. The feeling is rather odd.]

[That's not me, it's the past me.]

[Mm. Isn't that even more interesting?]

[I find it embarrassing, though.]

“…”

She frowned.

For several days vivid nightmares had unfolded every time she slept, and now, as if that were not enough, she was beginning to suffer hallucinated voices and visions while awake.

[It seems you still can’t properly make out our voices.]

Bzzz—crackle.

Static, broken by noise, rolled round her ears like tinnitus.

[Yes. The me from back then couldn’t make it out, either. Even if my ability had already grown into a full authority, I guess the message still isn’t clear enough. I’m only sorry.]

[There’s no need to apologise. This alone is more than enough.]

[But as for Mr. ■■……]

[If that were possible, the Saintess of today wouldn’t exist. I’ll leave that part to Dok-■. Proper conversation will be in tonight’s dream —]

Bzz-crk, bzzzz.

The tinnitus rose to a peak, then died as though its strength were spent. Only then did she finish peeling the banana and breathe out a sigh.

…In psychopathology, hearing voices is not a good sign.

Humans possess an instinctive sense, distinguishing “outside” from “inside.”

Hallucinations arise when that basic line blurs.

In other words, the dream state.

She was, in a sense, sleep-walking while wide awake.

…Maybe, without realising, she was far more cornered than she had thought.

"…"

But it doesn't matter, she told herself.

She tapped open the Calendar app on her smartphone.

The month lay blank—no schedules at all, only empty squares.

She claimed social anxiety, yet played guitar in a band with friends. In a modern society full of lies she alone upheld the true meaning of "outsider."

One square alone was not empty.

[6 June]

[END]

A modest entry. "End." Truly an ending.

Its meaning was literal.

On that day she intended to die.

Her daily routine never changed.

Up before dawn. The moment she rose she ate a banana. A hoodie chosen with no thought for fashion. A jog along the riverside.

Feed for the fish in her aquarium. Feed for herself. Breakfast. Shower. Open the stock app and check the markets. At the same time read finance articles.

Her earnings were likewise fixed; she never made more than a million won in a day.

It was not a task she pursued with burning willpower—merely a habit.

Once, in a beast's frenzy, she had fired her entire fortune like bullets, but at some point she ceased to see meaning in piling up more.

A dopamine detox.

The age of beasts was over; now was the age of sages.

Others might have tried to buy a house on the Han riverside, or clung to some other plausible goal.

She did not.

Yongsan. An old multiplex in Dongbinggo-dong. She had no thought of moving.

Liquidate assets. ON.

The decision was swift.

Of the 9.78 billion won she owned—being in the early or late nine-billion range mattered to her more than one might think—she donated 93% of it.

It was the happiest time she'd had all year.

Perhaps the happiest in her life.

She did not disregard the value of money, she simply refused to let donations flow someplace absurd.

So she spent time and information—choosing seven reliable NGOs, eleven welfare foundations, and one academic group, dividing the money among them.

That "research" took quite a while.

She even posed as a volunteer and inspected orphanages in person, caring above all whether the director was the right sort of person.

Again, she did not despise the value of money.

She despised only her own value.

[Wow, you made ten billion won in stocks? You were soaring even before the world ended, ■■.]

[Please. It's embarrassing, don't react to every bit.]

[No, it's incredible. If Ji-■ had talent like yours she wouldn't need to slave away at modelling.]

[Ah… well, that person refuses to count human emotion as a variable. In a way she's the least suited to the market.]

[I see.]

…Another hallucinated voice.

"Haa."

But the detective game and the anonymous benefactor game ended here.

After wiring the final donation, her heart felt lighter—her bank account, too.

[The truth is, I'm not completely at ease. Right up to the end I worried what to do with my fish.]

[Didn't you find anyone to take them?]

[No. I was… reluctant.]

Crackle, crackle. It was too loud.

With practiced hands she drew out sleeping pills.

Prescription zolpidem—one tablet… no, two. And one barbiturate hypnotic smuggled in through a broker.

"Mmm…"

A ripple of hallucination washed over her, like a pleasant wave. As the bedroom swam before her eyes, her consciousness slid down, down—and in the next instant,

“Ah.”

she realised she had plunged once more into the heart of a nightmare and let out a breath.

“…Why is it you keep showing me nothing but ruins?”

Perhaps it was her resolve to die.

The nightmare was always brimming with death: a city that must be Seoul turned to ashes by a nuclear blast, grotesque monsters slaughtering people.

It unnerved her to think her own unconscious might secretly crave such sights.

[You’ve come.]

While she gawked at the ruins and carnage like a B-grade movie, a voice rang out.

She turned.

[Can you hear my voice?]

Beneath a fallen wall white “shadows” writhed—look closely and they almost resembled human figures.

One seemed male, the one addressing her now was, perhaps, female.

“Yes, I hear you.”

[Good. No matter how I tried while you were awake, my voice wouldn’t come through right.]

“Your voice?”

She knitted her brow.

“Sorry, but even now the sounds you’re making don’t really sound human.”

[…]

They were mechanical—far more unnatural than any AI voice: within the single word “voice” every syllable leapt a different way.

The shadow stirred.

[I know you’ve decided to die.]

She was not surprised.

It was a nightmare, a dream, an echo of her unconscious.

Anything she knew herself would appear in it.

[But I’d like you to postpone your death, just for a little while.]

“I’ve delayed it several times already, on the off-chance I might change my mind. It wasn’t impulsive. I chose carefully.”

[I know.]

“…”

[Even so, please, once more, delay your decision. I beg you.]

A faint awkwardness prickled.

She had never poured her feelings out violently to anyone, yet somehow this white shadow stirred her heart.

“You know this, you know that—amazing. Seems you know an awful lot.”

So, uncharacteristically, even in a dream, words close to sarcasm slipped out.

The white shadow hesitated.

[…More than you do now, yes.]

“Must be nice, knowing so much.”

[It isn’t, really.]

Words spilled from the shadow.

[…No. It isn’t. I already know what will come of this conversation, and I have no power to change it.]

[I can’t tell you about Mr. ■■■■, or about Mr. ■■■.]

[I can’t hand you stories you don’t yet know.]

“…”

The shadow writhed.

Perhaps that twisting was it breathing in and out, she thought.

“I can’t say I follow, but…”

She stared straight at it.

“Fine. Why do you urge me to live? I understand the possibility—deep in my unconscious mind there may still be a strong desire for life, so you appear like a lucid dream to show me illusions.”

[…]

“So I’d like to hear. If you are my last lingering desire, what joys, what pleasures could possibly lie ahead that make you cling so stubbornly?”

Silence settled.

Meanwhile the dream flowed on—near and far, cities shattered, people died.

Only the white shadows and herself—set apart from everything like a quiet uninhabited isle.

[…I'm sorry.]

Slowly the shadow parted its lips.

[The life you're going to live… won't be very happy.]

An unexpected answer slipped out.

"Pardon?"

She had thought the dream would lure her with sweet words, telling her life was beautiful.

[You'll do something very noble. Many lives will hang on it.]

[But the work is not as beautiful as you imagined, not as lovely as you hoped.]

The mechanical voice rolled on.

[People aren't consistent.]

[Even someone who rejoices that you saved their life— their gratitude isn't always strong.]

[When they find out you were human, not a ■■, some feel betrayed.]

[Betraying others is easy, betraying oneself is… a little easier.]

[So no one can know you.]

[No one will recognise you.]

"…"

[That is the life you will walk.]

[Even as others manage daily life in a ruined world… daily life won't come to you.]

[Your heart will grow dull.]

[I'm sorry. Before it dulls—while you still have even a little love for the world—you must have wanted to lay this down.]

[I'm sorry for blocking you.]

"…"

Her stomach churned.

[You'll go through many hells.]

[You thought yourself capable—now you'll learn, point by point, where you are powerless.]

[You liked people who smiled beautifully, one of them will kill without a flicker.]

[If your own life is worthless, you at least wish to help others a little, all of it crumbles. Your service, your donations, meant nothing.]

[The world still ends.]

"…"

[Everything will grow worse.]

[The more you know,]

[…the more you see,]

[your heart will shrink.]

[I'm sorry.]

[You were never invincible.]

Her lips parted and closed.

"Then why, in the world…"

A question that had festered in her heart since long ago—

“…are you telling me to live on?”

She could not fathom it.

So she was curious.

“Rather—why are you, who say all this, still alive instead of dying now?”

[…]

The white shadow stirred.

Instinct told her it had closed its eyes, drawn a deep breath—

though it had neither face nor form beyond a pale lump.

[You are going to meet one person. And then—]

The shadow opened its eyes.

[You are going to like that person.]

Footnotes:

Chapter 381

The Receiver XII

Sinnoa

[You are going to like that person.]

That person?

"…"

To her, it was almost impossible to believe such a prophecy. From some angles you could even call it an insult.

In fact, it probably bordered on verbal abuse.

Proof of that lay in the shock she felt. as if someone had cracked her across the head.

"…When you say I'll 'like' someone… Are we talking about love? A romantic feeling?"

[I understand. It must be hard to believe.]

The shadow spoke.

Its tone implied that it had already mapped every gear and spring of the tangled emotions inside her.

Just as that arrogant manner was about to grate on her again, the speaker cut the ribbon with its tongue first.

[No wonder. It's because your tastes are really, really exacting.]

"Excuse me?"

[I'm only stating the facts. I've never met anyone with preferences as finicky as yours.]

Robbed of her timing, she was left speechless. What on earth was this lump of shadow spouting?

“I’m sorry, but I have perfectly normal standards. I almost pointed that out earlier, you clearly don’t know me.”

[Is that so? Well, first off, isn’t basic self-care a given?]

“Of course it is.”

She answered instantly.

“Even on nights when I’ve taken sleeping pills, I never skip my dawn run. Even when I feel lazy I still go. Not because I enjoy it, but because I need a baseline level of fitness.”

[And would you agree that amassing enough wealth to support your life also falls under basic self-management?]

“Naturally.”

Again her reply was immediate.

“Modern South Korea rests on capitalism. There are many ways to define it, but personally I see capitalism as a system that quantifies life in money. Some find that reductionism suffocating, others liberating. Yet once a society grows past a certain size, any system breeds side effects. Imagine an ancient order that measured every life solely by individual martial prowess—that would have been just as violent as capitalism. Human society is violent by nature; we have no choice but to live in a violent world. If in that hypothetical age honing one’s martial skill was a basic virtue, then in a capitalist age husbanding one’s property is the basi—”

[I see. So that’s what it feels like.]

The shadow murmured, sounding somehow like a sigh.

[And, unexpectedly, you care about appearance too.]

“Pardon?”

[No, wait. That could be misunderstood. Appearance is secondary, of course. I don't mean you like someone because of their looks; I mean you like the looks of the person you've come to like.]

"That makes no sense."

[Also, you believe every decent human should have compassion for the weak.]

"Isn't that obvious?"

She frowned.

"Compassion is one of humanity's basic conditions."

[You also think a good memory is essential, because without it a person may forget their own past and lose consistency.]

"That's perfectly true."

[And you need to be able to dive deep into philosophical conversation together, right?]

"The word 'philosophy' may be antique, but philosophical questions have never vanished from humanity. Everyone tackles philosophy from some crooked angle of their own life."

[They should like keeping fish as well, shouldn't they?]

"Raising fish is like tending a garden: a pastime that grants diligence and meditative time together. Stillness in motion, motion in stillness—an important mindset."

[Even if they don't love the world, if the world demands their life, they should be ready to lay it down—yes?]

"Yes."

[In short, you want someone exactly on your level, because you think you yourself aren't anything special, but just an ordinary human.]

"Why do you keep pointing out things that are only natural?"

[…And if that person happens to brim with a little extra energy, you'd call it a bonus, since you're so static. Yet here's the paradox—you'd also like them to love stillness enough to spend an entire day indoors without a single complaint.]

"Naturally. Humans are multifaceted. I'm aware of my contradictions, and since I'm aware, they'll be resolved one day."

"…"

Silence.

After a long pause and several sighs, the shadow spoke again—slowly, as if reluctant.

[Your standards… are simply too high.]

"Excuse me?"

[Your basic problem, the source of every difficulty, is that you grossly overestimate what a being called 'human' can do. You want everyone to perform exactly as much as you do.]

"Doesn't everyone?"

[No.]

"Then they must be inhuman."

[See? That reaction, that's the issue.]

"If my standards are wrong, then the world is what's wrong, not I."

[There you go again.]

"I get it. You're saying I'm the problem, yes? Fine. I'll die, then. I've been completely refuted."

[…And yet, for all your fussiness, you'll still come to like that person.]

"…"

This time it was her turn to go silent.

Toward her, the shadow continued:

[Nothing in this world is obvious. Your standards, your wishes… none of them are givens.]

[Even the tiniest things are miracles.]

[And for you, a slightly larger miracle is waiting.]

"…"

[Please stay alive just a little longer.]

She couldn't answer.

It wasn't something she could promise lightly.

[While you're watching that person, you'll learn a little more about how to cherish yourself.]

[…You'll even live that dream of studying together—just the two of you, reading side by side.]

[You'll come to like things you've never liked before.]

[You'll learn something from that person every single time.]

It was an impossible picture to imagine.

[You'll read the Romance of the Three Kingdoms, for example… books you could have lived your whole life without opening, praising historical figures by force—doing things you never once expected to do.]

"?"

The Romance of the Three Kingdoms? That old classic only grown-ups read?

[■■, ■■■, really, ■■?]

[I’m sorry, but please be quiet a moment, Mr. ■taker. Anyway, Mr. ■■■’s voice isn’t coming through.]

[■■■.]

[If you keep on like this I’ll swap my allegiance to Sima Yi.]

“…”

The second shadow, which had sat meekly by all this time, gave a slow wriggle. Judging by the outline, it seemed male, but it soon quieted again.

[Now, while you wait to meet the greatest miracle, let me tell you a few smaller ones that will pass the time.]

A white shadow stretched out.

It wrapped her hands firmly.

[Put your palms together.]

She did so.

[Yes—just like a prayer. Good.]

[With your hands like that, you can send messages—only to people you know, and only to those who have awakened special abilities.]

Messages?

[Think of it as KakaoTalk. At first there’s a character limit and sending your voice is tough.]

[But you’ll adapt in no time.]

[Just as I did.]

“…”

Ridiculous.

Was it telling her she was about to awaken some super-power? Like in a Marvel movie?

[And when you close your eyes—]

[You can see through someone else's vision. That one takes longer to master. At first you'll get a touch of motion sickness every time you share someone's view.]

"…What—"

[But don't worry.]

The shadow still clasped her hands warmly.

[You can practice whenever you want. In fact, you possess the ability to stop time.]

"…"

[Try them, one by one.]

The white shadow squirmed.

[At a bank. In a deserted mountain. At a zoo. On Hongdae's Gyeongui Line Book Street.]

[Surprisingly, it will be fun.]

"…"

She thought the shadow was smiling.

[And one day, you'll become me.]

"You are—"

[I'll be waiting.]

[Until the day I become you again.]

Everything around her turned white.

From the warmth on the back of her hands she knew instinctively that this strange dream was ending.

“Ah.”

And that she had already held similar conversations more than once.

Because it all happened in dreams, there was no guarantee her brain, dulled by long use of sleeping pills, would remember any of it clearly.

I must remember.

She prayed with all her might.

I must remember—the conversation, the feelings I felt.

She pressed her hands together as if in prayer and wished.

It was a preposterous dream, full of absurdities, yet she did not want to forget a single part of it.

If only that white warmth that had wrapped her hands… please… just that much.

[One more thing I didn’t mention… ah.]

[Once you practice stopping time, you’ll probably find yourself with a surprising amount of free hours.]

Oblivious, or indifferent, to her desperation, the white shadow spoke in a leisurely tone.

[When that happens, taking up web novels or webtoons wouldn’t be a bad hobby.]

“Pardon?”

Web novels? Webtoons? Out of nowhere?

[There may be hints in them for how to use your abilities.]

“What on earth—”

[Fighting!]

And then…

…everything went white.

She was dreaming.

“…Another weird dream.”

An everyday morning, the same as any other.

But when she sat up in bed, she met a slightly odd sight.

“…?”

Her hands were clasped.

She had fallen asleep with her palms pressed tight together, as if praying to someone.

Why in the world am I in such a pose?

“…Must be the sleeping pills.”

She felt sure she’d had a significant dream.

Yet nothing would surface.

“Haa.”

Recently the nightmares had grown worse. Maybe it was time to quit the pills.

She felt like scolding herself.

The instant she let out a sigh, an absurd sound slipped between her lips.

“Uh?”

It was astonishing.

[I’m pathetic.]

Because right there in the empty air, where nothing should be, proper letters floated.

And that wasn’t the end.

[Huh? Letters? Is this a dream?]

Words kept appearing in mid-air.

Her voice grew even stupider.

“Eh?”

[Eh?]

“…”

[…]

“What on earth—”

The moment she stretched out her hand, as though it had all been an illusion, the letters vanished.

“…”

Why?

A hallucination? But it had been too crisp to be a hallucination—no wavering.

Sleeping pills? Taken to excess they could deepen hallucinations, but the ones she used couldn’t cause visions the morning after.

Then why had those vivid letters vanished in an instant when nothing had chan—

“Ah.”

She looked down.

Her hands. Her palms.

With a sinking hunch, she resumed the praying pose on the bed.

[No way?]

"…"

As if on cue, letters bloomed again.

She muttered blankly.

"…Impossible."

[Impossible.]

"Could it be—"

[Am I insane?]

"…"

Spellbound, she spent the whole morning testing this sudden mania.

Glancing at the wall clock, she found it was noon, already midday.

"Super-powers? No, impossible. That can't… except… it actually—"

She still didn't know.

That what she had just experienced would one day be called an "Awakening."

That most Awakeners had to endure enormous trial and error just to learn what their power was.

That she, by contrast, had grasped her abilities' nature far too easily, absurdly fast.

That others would call it luck and envy or resent her, claiming it was coincidence.

But in truth, it was inevitable.

“…”

She still didn’t know.

That come summer, she would fall in love with someone.

Footnotes:

Chapter 382

The Receiver XIII

Sinnoa

“At last, it’s finished.”

“You’ve worked hard.”

“Soon, even this intermission will be over.”

“That’s a pity.”

“I’m sorry. It seems I used up too much power. My eyes can hardly see… Could you hold my hand?”

“Of course.”

“Haah…”

“I never imagined talking to my past self would be this exhausting. Back then I was truly young—far too young.”

“Mm. Don’t worry. I’m sure it was conveyed well enough.”

“Do you think so?”

“Certainly. This isn’t empty consolation. It was conveyed so clearly that the Saintess reached this place.”

“…You’re right.”

“To be honest, I don’t clearly remember what I heard in that dream.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes. It’s just… so much time has passed.”

“Ah.”

“It can’t be helped. Unlike Mr. Undertaker I don’t have [Complete Memory]. Hundreds of years, thousands, tens of thousands…… Every precious memory has faded.”

“…I see.”

“That’s why I turned to diaries so often. What happened, which memories must never be lost—just like reincarnated protagonists jotting down their past-life knowledge…”

“…”

“For me, perhaps this very world was an otherworld from the start.”

“Is this the notebook you used as a diary? It’s terribly worn.”

“I’ve looked through it more times than I can count. Especially when I used [Time Stop] to block Hecate—no, Nut. When I had to live in a world frozen for 2,000 years, it helped me a lot.”

“…”

“It was a little hard.”

“Of course I have no regrets. If I hadn’t stepped in, the world would’ve perished and your regression been endangered, so I had no choice. It’s just… one day I awoke and realized I couldn’t recall other people’s voices.”

“It grew harder to picture Ms. Noh Do-hwa’s tone in my head.”

“Ms. Cheon Yo-hwa’s laughter wouldn’t surface.”

“Mr. Undertaker’s voice… slipped away from memory.”

“So, in that stopped world I would often—no, constantly—climb to the roof of Tower of Babel and look at you all. Even if I couldn’t summon the voices, faces at least—though you were like statues—were still visible.”

“In fact.”

“When I decided I was strong enough, when I thought it was time to lift the [Time Stop] and face you again, I worried a lot.”

“What worried you?”

“Whether I could…… properly act like the me from 2,000 years ago. I wasn’t confident.”

“Would the language I speak be intelligible? Would my expressions look strange?”

“Would I look… like a monster?”

“I was a bit worried.”

“But think about it, Mr. Undertaker, you’re the same. You endured an equally long time… So whichever way it turned out, it wouldn’t matter.”

“Even if I’d become a monster, we could just be monsters together.”

“And if we could remain human… we’d remain human together.”

“…”

“It’s all white. Everything.”

“Saintess.”

“Yes. Your hand…”

“Right here. I’m still holding it.”

“Mr. Undertaker has actually gained a new ability.”

“Eh?”

“You won’t understand yet… but Ms. Dang Seo-rin cast an incredible—truly incredible—spell on you.”

“A spell powerful enough to move a universe. Born of the sole wish to stay by your side despite being a monster—truly miraculous.”

“While that spell is singing in your heart, you… will be able to hear the voices of the anomalies.”

“The voices of the anomalies?”

“Yes. Just as only you could understand Dang Seo-rin-ssi’s voice… from the next cycle on you’ll comprehend the anomalies’ screams.”

“…”

“Perhaps, mine as well.”

“The fact we can talk so easily may also be thanks to Ms. Dang Seo-rin’s magic.”

“I don’t understand.”

“It’s all right. It’s your miracle. Surely… as you said, another comrade will recognize it someday.”

“It’s amazing.”

“…Talking to my past self, I realized this.”

“In the end, what I needed to keep living might have been just a single human being.”

“Somewhere in this world, if at least one person hasn’t given up…”

“If a beautiful human being could exist.”

“Even if it’s only one.”

“…If I have seen—am seeing—that proof with my own eyes, I won’t choose death. Never.”

“Thank you, Mr. Undertaker.”

“Always, always… forever. I’m grateful I met you, grateful you lived.”

“Always…”

“Forever…”

“Again, there. At the convenience store.”

‘…’

“Saintess?”

‘…’

“Saintess.”

‘…’

“…”

“I was always grateful too. Thank you for waiting until we could meet.”

“I’ll come find you again in the thousandth summer.”

“Miss Ye-ji.”

There is an epilogue.

As I stressed last time, this story, too, was a manuscript the Regressor never reviewed.

Precisely for that reason, there were many points where I could pound the typewriter freely.

For example.

“Saintess, from now on you must hide your real name not only when playing the Constellations but also in daily life.”

“Eh? Why is that?”

I can now reveal in full the part of that first-meeting conversation the Regressor deliberately [CENSORED].

Why hide anything?

I proudly fancied myself a scoundrel.

“A name is the most basic ingredient, and the frame, of any spell.”

The 1,000th cycle.

The Regressor who etched a feat for the ages, conquering Hecate, travelling with Go Yuri, rescuing the Saintess, remembered none of it.

The moment he opened his eyes in the waiting hall of Busan Station he blurted, ‘Huh? I was just drinking with Dang Seo-rin, so why—?’ panicked, then in the restroom, ‘Wait? Why can’t I feel the Saintess’s warmth even though I touched the mirror?’ utterly confused.

Facing a situation too baffling to grasp, he simply copied what ordinary people do.

Ah, whatever. Let’s stick to the routine.

“From now on, Saintess, you’ll play a key role in the peninsula’s spiritual infrastructure, so you mustn’t reveal your weak point to anyone.”

“…”

Thus, as in any cycle, the Regressor went to persuade the Saintess.

Near Jamsu Bridge.

Beneath the parasol of a ruined convenience store, the Regressor and the Saintess were having their thousandth ‘first meeting.’

“So Mr. Undertaker already knows my real name? Even though I never told you?”

“Of course. I heard it in the 36th cycle. After that we skipped introductions.”

“I see.”

Up to here, events matched other cycles.

However.

“Then… would you call me by my name just once?”

“…Pardon?”

For some reason.

The Regressor saw a brand new response, never observed before.

Across the table, the Saintess sipped a canned drink and stared expressionlessly at him.

“Sorry? Did I mishear?”

“I asked you to call me by my name.”

“Uh…… Saintess?”

“Not the title, my real name.”

She spoke remarkably straight. She always pronounced perfectly by abusing [Time Stop]; she would never stutter like a northern knock-off Saintess.

She was genuine.

“I believe you’re a Regressor, but I still need to verify whether you truly know my name.”

“Ah……?”

“Besides, if this is the 1,000th cycle, the 36th is ages ago. We could update it once, couldn’t we?”

“Update? Update what… hm.”

About to argue, he closed his lips.

He hadn’t used [Mind Reading], he simply reached the conclusion.

‘Indeed. I’ve been making an unreasonable demand.’

He had just told her, ‘Give up being addressed by your real name for life.’

Since he’d never been called by his own name, it hadn’t struck him, but it might be lonely for her.

‘Was I too insensitive?’

A brief self-reproach.

“Kh-hm.”

He cleared his throat.

Tens of thousands of years had passed since he last said her name, so it felt strangely awkward.

Blankly—

Her gaze felt embarrassing for some reason.

“…”

“…”

At last he opened his mouth.

“…Well.”

“…”

“Um.”

“…”

“…Ms. Ye-ji.”

Blink.

She blinked.

Finding no change, he tried again.

“Ms. Ye-ji.”

“…”

“Ms. Jeong Ye-ji.”

Jeong Ye-ji.

A tiny white sandbank that surfaces where the current bends.

White crafted by time.

It seems a thousand summers were needed to speak that white name.

“…”

While he shyly averted his eyes, something more disconcerting happened.

Squeeze.

Warmth covered the hand he’d left on the table.

“M-Ms. Y-Ye-ji?”

He was genuinely flustered.

The Saintess had taken his hand!

Today was supposed to be the ‘first meeting,’ after all.

“Um. Why all of a sudden…?”

“…”

Yet she did not release him. No—she interlaced their fingers.

And intently examined his face.

If Constellations were real, messages would be exploding.

She murmured.

“I still don’t quite know.”

“…?”

“But maybe I understand a little.”

“……??”

She let go and bowed her head.

“I’m sorry, Mr. Undertaker. I had something to check.”

“Uh… no need to apologize. I was just startled. You never initiated physical contact at our first meeting before.”

“Was that so.”

“Ah, yes.”

“…”

“…”

Imagine the greatest awkwardness, insert it here, and endure five seconds.

“Well then, shall we return to the main topic?”

“Yes, let’s.”

Afterwards they discussed how to run the Constellation system and what the Regression Alliance would be.

To the anomaly-slayer regressor this part would be vital, but the historian thought otherwise.

It mattered not a whit.

Instead, the side story values another part.

For example:

“Ah, right. Saintess.”

“Yes?”

“When I go to Busan next, please don’t observe me with [Clairvoyance] for one day.”

Here. This part.

“Of course. Even though we’re allies, I won’t spy if you don’t want me to.”

“Ahaha. Thank you.”

“But I am curious. May I ask why?”

“Ah. I’m meeting someone, purely for personal reasons.”

“…”

Originally she answered, ‘All right,’ and kept her word.

Thus she realized days later that Dang Seo-rin stood by him. For someone as noble as the Saintess, harboring ‘that’ feeling toward one who already had a partner would be unthinkable, so she neatly arranged her heart.

It wasn’t hard.

Controlling emotions still mere seeds is easy.

She even liked romanticists like Dang Seo-rin.

The monster-lover Regressor knew nothing, but the Saintess had cheered Dang Seo-rin on for countless cycles.

With all sincerity.

“…”

But what miracle is this.

From the 1,000th cycle on, she checked his warmth the moment they met. In truth she measured her own heart.

There was no need, it was warmer than the Han River.

“I see.”

She nodded slowly.

“All right. I promise not to watch you that day.”

“Ah, thank you.”

She smiled faintly.

“Think nothing of it. I look forward to working with you, Mr. Undertaker.”

As you can guess,

that became her monumental ‘first lie.’

Footnotes:

Chapter 383

The Suicidal I

Sinnoa

Have you ever, perhaps all of a sudden, for no particular reason, out of the blue and through no fault of your own, found yourself seized by a premonition like this?

——Something has gone wrong.

What, exactly, has gone wrong? That was hard to explain. Why the situation had arisen was even harder to grasp.

And yet I could feel it.

Not with my head but with my heart.

——Something… something truly crucial had gone irretrievably wrong.

Yes.

In short, I had recently started to sense, from somewhere I could not pinpoint, that I was utterly doomed.

“Undertaker. Good mor-ning.”

“Ah, Dang Seo-rin. Good morning.”

“Fuaaah. Honestly, the weather’s gorgeous these days, isn’t it? It used to be tricky to go walking because the fine dust turned up whenever it felt like it, but I guess even the end of the world has its upsides.”

“Mm.”

“Oh! One of my guild mates said the plum and cherry blossoms are in full bloom all around Beomeosa Temple. Want to go today? We could grab lunch there, too."

"Uh. Th-that sounds good. Fine by me. Yesterday and the day before we definitely tore around everywhere for flower-viewing as well—"

"What?"

"I'll pack sandwiches."

"Yup!"

"…"

"What?"

"Nothing. I was just going to ask what kind you'd like."

"Hey, anything tastes good if you make it!"

"Right."

…Dang Seo-rin was acting strange.

Granted, Dang Seo-rin had always been strange.

Whenever the impulse to travel or play hit her, not even the entire Samcheon World guild charging in could stop her.

But—

"Isn't the frequency kind of weird…?"

And that wasn't all.

No matter how much spontaneous wanderlust she possessed, ever since we entered the 1,000th cycle the intensity had ramped up.

"Undertaker! Good mor-ning."

Last winter she suddenly wanted to see Hokkaido's Christmas tree, so the two of us went off on a Japan trip (post-apocalypse Japan boasts S-class travel difficulty, let me repeat).

And that wasn't all.

"Undertaker, another glo-rious mor-ning."

Last summer she whipped up a giant water park at Haeundae with magic, rented the whole thing for the two of us, and splashed around all night long.

And that wasn't all.

"Good moooorning, Doc!"

A fortnight ago she actually resurrected the National Singing Contest, took contestants from every guild and faction, built a special stage in Tower of Babel Square, plunged all of Busan into a frenzy—and then hauled me onstage for the final duet.

"Undertaker! Goo—"

"Today is a very—"

"Good morning!"

Every single day. Day after day after day after day.

Almost daily, Dang Seo-rin dreamed up and carried out wild events.

By now even the narrator from the TV show Master of Living would be running in "having fun" mode.

Thanks to her, the citizens' happiness index had been soaring like a civilization devouring every last luxury resource.

"Huu. She really shows up at dawn every single day to offer a morning greeting…"

Of course one particular Busan citizen (a former level-7 public servant) who harboured fundamental doubts about the idea of "happiness" had a different view.

"I can't even tell whether she belongs to Samcheon World or the National Road Management Corps anymore. Wouldn't it be simpler if the two of you just lived together?"

"…I apologise, Director Noh Do-hwa. I'll just go down to the Samcheon World station every morning, say hello and come back."

"Well, I didn't mean to nit-pick quite like that… anyway, it's none of my business. Show us some fancy footwork, will you…?"

"?"

Yes.

For some reason, in the 1,000th cycle Dang Seo-rin seemed to have jammed the button marked "Change course: massively strengthen diplomacy with Undertaker."

I had no way of knowing it yet, but it actually hadn't started only in the 1,000th.

Since the 1,000th cycle—and onward—it had been this way without a break.

"Why on earth?"

"I eliminated every opening for a butterfly effect, didn't I?"

Confusion upon confusion.

In the end, unable to stand it, I once leaned on the courage alcohol lends you and asked her point-blank.

"Seo-rin, why are you trying so hard to spend time with me?"

"Hmm. I can't help it. I keep hearing good music from you."

"Music?"

"Mm-hm."

I already knew that Dang Seo-rin intuitively perceived the world in terms of sound.

Still—was the music she sensed from me, Undertaker, really that good? From a normal standpoint it was absurd. How good would a song have to be to shrink the distance between two people overnight?

“Here.”

Pok.

She extended her arm and pressed a fingertip to my chest.

“From right here—truly. I hear a wonderful sound. Part humming, part a cappella… It really calms my heart.”

Then, cheeks flushed with drink, she laughed he-he, completely fearless.

“When I’m beside you, it feels as if lies and bluffing vanish on their own. So, I like it.”

“…….”

Alert alarm.

According to the special laws of the Republic of Korea, the person in charge of an alert alarm—a civil-defence warning issued when enemy attack is expected—is Doridori Dad, the beaver who has mastered the greatest Sound Technique in Bonobono[1].

Even if an enemy launches an unexpected “heart-thump attack,” Doridori Dad’s alert must be triggered, and Doridori Mom must immediately be dispatched to whack every hostile entity on the shins.[2]

The end.

If it wasn’t obvious from that nonsense, my brain’s language centre was in total panic.

“Dang Seo-rin! What’s going on? I don’t think we were ever this close!”

And that wasn’t all.

[Hello, Mr. Undertaker.]

[Good morning.]

At some point, every time I woke up a Saintess-brand KakaoTalk arrived as though she'd been waiting.

"Ah, yes."

At first I didn't think much of it.

The Saintess is the one who got granted humanity's wish to "subtract sleep time from our lifespan," so having cast off sleep she can run [Clairvoyance] twenty-four hours a day. Working out when I got up was trivial.

The problem came next.

"Saintess, good morning to you as well."

[…….]

"Saintess?"

[…….]

"Um."

[…….]

"…"

[…….]

"…Good morning, Ms. Ye-ji."

[Yes. I hope you have a pleasant day too, Mr. Undertaker.]

"Right…"

Why on earth!

Why (why)! How come (how)! for hundreds of cycles the Saintess had never fussed over names yet (why)! Starting with the 1,000th cycle (why)! She suddenly cared about forms of address (why)!

While the refrain echoed in my skull, I clutched my head.

“So you came to me for counseling…?”

Oh Dok-seo muttered, chewing a cheese stick.

“Yeah.”

“Hm. You picked the right woman, mister. I don’t know how you found out, but I happen to be a dating master.”

“Really?!”

“Sure. I’ve cleared thirty-six classic dating sims and twelve of the latest.”

“…”

“Oddly enough the heroines I support never get their own routes, but that’s not my fault—the scenario writers have no taste.”

“What is your favourite heroine in *Tsukihime*3?”

“Satsuki4, obviously.”

“Tsuki ni Yorisou Otome no Sahō?”

“Nanami5.”

“Who’s the true strategist—Zhuge Liang, Pang Tong or Xu Shu?”[7]

“If I must pick, Beopjeong[8].”

“…”

And here I was forced to rely on a lunatic with terminal Sub-Heroine Syndrome.

Again I wondered if my long regressor life had gone wrong somewhere.

“Why? You’ve got others.”

“Could you ask Ah-ryeon?”

“Ah.”

“Would you get a straight answer from Yu Ji-won or Noh Do-hwa?”

“There’s Ji-soo.”

“You want me to dump this on a kid who’s busy healing awakened folks’ trauma? I’m human too.”

“Mm.”

Oh Dok-seo folded her arms and thought.

“What about Mr. Seo Gyu?”

“He’s the Saintess’s mole.”

“Ah.”

“Every day he says ‘Boss, my lips are sealed,’ and the next morning the Saintess already knows. It’s happened more than once.”

“What about Ha-yul?”

[ABSOLUTELY OPPOSED!]

Flash.

The instant Lee Ha-yul heard my dilemma she grabbed her sketchbook and launched a picket protest.

[OPPA NO REMARRIAGE!]

“Wait, remarriage? Old man, you’ve never been married, right…?”

Oh Dok-seo glanced at me.

“Of course I haven’t! The most fatal cliché among the 108 ways to break a regressor’s heart is falling in love or having a child, only to have the memory erased in the next cycle! I'm not insane!"

"But you do have those 'non-existent memories' from before the fourth cycle."

"…"

Oh Dok-seo poked a finger.

"You sealed the people closest to you first with [Time Seal]. Odds are high you sealed your spouse first."

"…At the very least, no such memory exists!"

"Huum. Interesting."

[ABSOLUTELY OPPOSED!]

[Oppa is too valuable for anyone ordinary.]

[If Oppa dies, civilisation rebuilding collapses—proved as follows.]

[If the Saintess dies, we can last twenty years. If Dang Seo-rin dies, no problem. BUT Oppa? We start by surrendering Pyongyang, Seoul and Sejong to the monsters. QED.]

[If you must remarry, I recommend this puppet. Highly capable, all-purpose.]

"No. Are you nuts? That doll maid is secretly your mother."

[I don't see a problem?]

"Hm."

"Now you see why Ha-yul never made the counsellor shortlist?"

"Okay. Got it."

Oh Dok-seo made a wry face.

"Turns out I'm the only colleague with a neutral viewpoint."

“Exactly. That’s why Seo-rin noona and the Saintess keep looking after you.”

“Gasp. Was that why?”

Oh Dok-seo was shocked.

“I thought they spoiled me because I’m cute!”

“…”

Strange. Why do I have so little luck with people?

“Excuse me.”

While we were still deep in discussion a small voice spoke. All three of us—me, Oh Dok-seo and Lee Ha-yul—whipped our heads around.

There stood Cheon Yo-hwa, the elder twin, wearing an ambiguous smile.

“I’m happy you dropped by, Sunbae, but barging in together and chattering like a marketplace is a bit much.”

“Mm.”

“I get that you’re in a bind, but do you have to discuss it here? Honestly this is my sanctuary—I’d like it to stay dignified and mysterious…”

Right. We were huddled in the forbidden zone where Cheon Yo-hwa had been placed under [Time Seal].

“Sorry, but there’s no help for it.”

“Why, Sunbae?”

“Anywhere else, even a sealed room, the Saintess can peep in with [Clairvoyance]….”

“Ah.”

Cheon Yo-hwa’s brows drew together.

“Didn’t she usually stop when you asked her not to watch? That’s how I remember it.”

“She did, but for some reason in this cycle she keeps watching. Just my impression, but.”

“Hu-u-m.”

One eye closed—her thinking habit.

“…True. Up till now she surrendered on her own, so it was odd. In fact she has the biggest advantage.”

“Biggest advantage?”

“Yes. She knows every weakness of the people around you. She knows who said what, who did what.”

Cheon Yo-hwa gave a tiny snort.

“She always looked calm and blank, so I could never read her. Turns out it was only a matter of time.”

“……?”

“It’s just my little sneer, Sunbae.”

She smiled with her eyes.

“Instead of worrying, why not treat this as a chance?”

“A chance?”

“Yes, a chance. Once you’ve conquered the entire Void, you’ll have to try the romance you’ve kept off-limits, right?”

“Uh-huh.”

“When that day comes, how will everyone react? That, too, may be knowledge a regressor needs.”

Is that so?

“And since it’s the 1,000th cycle, your vacation run, why not…”

Cheon Yo-hwa beamed.

“…conduct one experiment. Try a ‘fake’ romance, just once.”

Footnotes:

1 - – A long-running four-panel manga by Mikio Igarashi that began serialization in 1986. It follows the laid-back everyday antics of a young sea-otter and his woodland friends and has been adapted into multiple TV anime series (1995; 2016-) and a 1993 theatrical film.

2 - Doridori Dad / Doridori Mom are a beaver couple from Bonobono. Doridori Dad is famed in-series for his exaggerated head-wagging “dori-dori” shout; here they are jokingly cast as Korea’s civil-defence alert team.

3 - – A 2000 adult visual novel by Type-Moon that laid the foundation of the Nasuverse; remade in 2021 as Tsukihime –A piece of blue glass moon–.

4 - Satsuki Yumizuka is a minor classmate character in Tsukihime. Fan adoration for Satsuki’s brief screentime spawned the long-running meme “Give Satsuki a route!” because she had no dedicated romance path in the original game.

Tsuki ni Yorisou Otome no Sahō

[6] Nanami Nanai is a side-heroine from Tsuki ni Yorisou Otome no Sahō; a devoted maid whose popularity belied the fact she, too, lacked a full romance route until later fandisc content.

[7] Zhuge Liang, Pang Tong, Xu Shu – Historical strategists from the 14th-century novel Romance of the Three Kingdoms. Thanks to Koei Tecmo’s Romance of the Three Kingdoms and Dynasty Warriors game franchises, modern players debate which adviser was Liu Bei’s “true” mastermind—the very topic parodied in the dialogue here.

[8] Beopjeong, born Pak Jaecheol, was a Buddhist monk and writer from South Korea.

Chapter 384

The Suicidal II

Sinnoa

After weighing every possibility from every angle, we chose Sim Ah-ryeon as the perfect partner for the Regressor's "pretend romance."

I decorated the classroom, Cheon Yo-hwa's personal sanctum, with mountains of flowers I had prepared in advance, then invited Ah-ryeon in.

"I love you. Please go out with me."

"Eh? N-no, thank you."

"…"

I was shot down at the speed of light.

Do you know when a human being reaches the utter depths of misery in this Solar System?

When they're broke? When they're sick? When their pinky toe slams into the corner of a desk? When a heated thread on SG Net mobs them with insults? When their dreams come crashing down?

Sorry, but none of those are the right answer.

The true answer is the instant—three seconds after you confess—to Sim Ah-ryeon, that knock-off Saintess of the North, that hateful name, and get rejected on the spot.

"Ah… uh… ugh……"

I collapsed flat onto the classroom floor and trembled. If an amoeba had seen me, it would have rejoiced at finding its long-lost relative, my movements were that pitiful.

“Huwaaaaaaah!”

“W-whoa, you scared me.”

Thud!

Ah-ryeon flinched as I suddenly flipped over and smashed my head against the floor.

“W-why are you doing that, Guild Leader? Even if a cockroach popped out, you should swat it with your palm, not your forehead.”

“I see. Then may I take your advice and headbutt something once, Ah-ryeon?”

“Eh.”

For the record, Oh Dok-seo, Lee Ha-yul, and Cheon Yo-hwa were already rolling around at the back of the room like human vacuum cleaners.

Their laughter was pure noise pollution. Narratively, I wanted to mute it.

But I couldn’t ignore the sight of Ha-yul stumbling upright, scribbling [hahahahaha] in her sketchbook, tumbling again, then standing to scrawl [hahahahahahaha] on a fresh sheet.

“She, she dumped him! He just got rejected by Ah-ryeon unni!”

“Pffft-phuh-khya-hahaha!”

[hahaha haha]

“Just yesterday he boasted, ‘Ah-ryeon will say yes without me even asking, so there’s nothing to worry about!’”

“Kkyeut, hu-ha, hu-huf-huf.”

[hahahahahaha ha haha]

“Dumped… in three seconds flat!”

“Eek-huf, hoo-ha, huf, hahaha!”

“The Undertaker’s first confession in his entire life! The first time in the Regressor’s tens of thousands of years that those words crossed his lips! ‘I love you! Please date me!’ And the target waaas… Sim Ah-ryeon! And yet… he got dog-level dumped.”

“Hit-hik, stop, it’s too… too funny, I-I’m dying…! He even timed it for her birthday… Decorated the entire classroom with nothing but mountain lilies! Honestly, collecting those lilies probably took way longer than the three-second rejection—hik, hit…”

[haha ha ha ha ha]

“…”

Those bastards. Die. Please. Just die.

No, what needed to die wasn’t them, but me. My damned brain.

More precisely, this moment, forever taxidermied into my soul as a record of the 1,000th cycle, needed to disappear.

“Fine. It’s my fault. I’m just a fundamentally flawed being. I’ll go see Udumbara right now and reset this regressor life. Don’t stop me. I’ll just live the thousandth cycle one more time.”

[hahahahahahahahaha]

“F-fact is… Mister, we already defeated Udumbara in this run, so you have to wait until next cycle to delete your abilities.”

“I’ll kill myself.”

“Huf, a regressor who commits suicide over being dumped by Sim Ah-ryeon! Wow. Has any other regressor ever died for such a magnificent reason? I-I don’t think so, Sunbae… You’re writing a brand-new chapter in regressor history!”

[hahahahahahahahahahahahaha]

Why?

This was supposed to be the vacation cycle, the one designed to take care of my mental health. So how did my mindset get wrecked instead? Where did it all go wrong?

“Mm. Hmmm.”

While pandemonium erupted on all sides, only Sim Ah-ryeon tilted her head in her usual calm.

“U-um, Guild Leader. Could you please explain what’s going on…?”

I explained everything.

“Ah. So, in other words: one day, after preventing the end of the world, you’d finally be free to date, but seeing the current chaos you’ve realized you’re afraid of the karmic blowback. Therefore, before entering the ‘ending cycle’ you want to learn how to handle that karma, that hate, that aggro in advance. Step one of the plan is to pretend to date me, check how everyone reacts, and devise concrete countermeasures—figure out whether they’ll back down gracefully if you’ve got a partner, or, if not, exactly what kind of incident they’ll cause. Is that right?”

“Yeah…”

“Ehehe. G-Guild Leader, you’re seriously trash!”

“Those punks bamboozled me!”

I pointed to the back of the room, where the “Oh-Cheon-Ha” trio were pouring juice for one another, patting themselves on the back for masterminding such an amusing scheme.

“I didn’t even plan on doing this! But Cheon Yo-hwa! And Oh Dok-seo! They egged each other on and slyly gaslit me!”

“Mm.”

Ah-ryeon didn’t even turn to look at them, she just hmm-ed and cocked her head.

“C-certainly, if it were confirmed that you and I were dating… an enormous amount of aggro would pour in. Hup. Just thinking about it makes my mouth water with anticipation…”

“That’s one of the reasons I chose you.”

Sim Ah-ryeon was a notorious attention addict, a mutant who actually felt ecstasy when others showered her with hatred, contempt, and resentment.

“Since things are already ruined, let me ask frankly: why did you dump me the moment you heard the confession?”

“Eh.”

Ah-ryeon made a complicated face.

“W-well, dating you means I’d have to care about clothes and hair and stuff… and you’d probably interfere with my lifestyle habits too… It sounds… bothersome.”

“Hmm.”

Congratulations, Ah-ryeon.

This Guild Leader’s psyche rarely gets scratched, but your words just carved wounds that will never wash away. Maybe you should quit being a healer and switch to a DPS.

“I l-like things just the way they are! No hassle, just leeching off you, Guild Leader… Ehehe. No matter who you date, I’ll still be right here…”

“Yeah. That’s just like you, but…?”

Huh? She’d stay the same no matter who I date?

Just as I was about to ask what she meant, Cheon Yo-hwa approached with a sunny grin.

“Come on, Sunbae, don’t be so disappointed! Sure, your hobby is gathering the most mentally twisted people on the peninsula and stealing their hearts, but that hobby can still run into difficulties!”

“If you’re trying to comfort me, could you at least wipe that huge smile off your face first, Yo-hwa?”

“Ah, sorry. Let me change the classroom motto real quick.”

Yo-hwa borrowed a page from Ha-yul’s sketchbook, climbed onto a desk, and altered the motto.

Needless to say, the motto now read only [hahahaha] in Ha-yul’s elegant handwriting.

“Hoo-ah. Done! Now, Sunbae, let’s discuss this seriously again.”

“Seriously? After looking at that motto??”

“As you can see, Ms. Ah-ryeon is sadly out. Even if you dated her, I doubt Dang Seo-rin or the Saintess would take it seriously.”

Cheon Yo-hwa pressed on.

“By the same logic, Ms. Dok-seo won’t work either.”

“Aw, why not! I’m totally date-able!”

“With Lee Ha-yul, people will just assume Sunbae’s gone insane, so that’s a double no.”

[Objection noted.]

“Personally I’d love for you to date my cute little sister, but even if we spelled out that it was a fake relationship, she’d go completely off the rails. She’d spend all her brainpower just trying to knock you over, forgetting the entire operation.”

Scribble, scribble.

Yo-hwa borrowed another sheet, once again transforming the ha into modern art, flipped to the blank backside, and wrote something.

“So, I recommend the following candidates.”

I looked.

"…"

I raised my head and looked at Yo-hwa's face this time.

"Are you serious?"

"Yes."

"Wrong question. Are you sane?"

"Yes!"

"Let's drop it. Really. On reflection this was nonsense from the start. Yeah, that's it! I must have gone crazy for a moment because you hoodwinked me, Yo-hwa."

"Hm-hm."

Cheon Yo-hwa smiled with her eyes.

"Sounds easy, doesn't it, talking about people's feelings and consideration, spinning fancy words? But do you really think you're being considerate of anyone's feelings by just putting this off forever?"

"…"

"If you were an ordinary person, and the people around you were ordinary, you wouldn't need these worries. But we're Awakeners—each of us flirting with the level of Corruptor or Miko."

Yo-hwa shrugged.

"It's only because you keep calling us 'human' that we stay that way. If something snaps, we might act in ways we ourselves can't predict."

"What kind of actions…?"

"Ah-ah—The world has been saved!"

Yo-hwa adopted a theatrical tone.

“The Regressor lived! All his companions lived! Hurrah! But—huh, look at that. The regressor is pledging eternity to someone who’s not me?”

“…”

“I’m pissed off? That’s not a happy ending. I don’t need a world like this, let’s flip the board and start over again!”

“No, no matter how angry they are, that’s…”

“And now, an interview.”

Yo-hwa mimed a microphone with her hand and lunged at Sim Ah-ryeon, who squeaked and hid behind my back.

“Eek.”

“Ms. Ah-ryeon. We’d like to do a quick interview. Will you oblige?”

“W-what is it?”

“Suppose this sunbae, your Guild Leader—swore to spend his life with someone who isn’t you. How would you feel?”

“N-not really… I don’t feel anything. That’s the Guild Leader-nim’s freedom…”

“But wait, the partner says she absolutely cannot have you anywhere nearby. She asked the Guild Leader to sort out the relationship, cut off contact, and gradually drift apart. Once you sense that, what would you do?”

“Ah, aah. T-talk! Cooperation! I’m really a worthless being! Please, let’s compromise somehow…!”

“Ms. Ah-ryeon tries her best to propose compromises, but good grief.”

Yo-hwa beamed.

“The partner absolutely refuses to accept any of it.”

“Th-then… ah! Maybe just the internet or phone? Videocalls? Um, contacting only through remote means…?”

“No. Romantic feelings depend on distance, and behavior like yours, clinging to the Guild Leader at all hours, is intolerable. Distance means not only physical space but also KakaoTalk, messenger, every channel. The partner is a very nice person and understands your feelings and state completely, but the Guild Leader is hers now. She asks you to back off. What do you do?”

“Pardon? I’ll… kill her.”

‘…’

“Eck.”

“Eh?”

My gaze, Ah-ryeon’s gaze, and our cracked voices crossed all at once.

“Uh. Ah-ryeon?”

“Y-yes?”

“Kill her? What do you mean?”

“Uh, w-well. You said there’s no room for compromise… If I can’t talk to it, it’s not intelligent. And if something unintelligent—some object—blocks my path… then it’s an obstacle, and obstacles have to be removed…”

“She’s a person too!”

“Hmm. That’s her claim…”

“I—the Guild Leader—think she’s a person too!”

“Mm. Thinking that is your freedom, Guild Leader.”

Ah-ryeon scrunched up her face and shut her eyes tight.

“I-I’m sorry! I don’t want to be like this either! It’s just… that’s reality. To be an adult you have to accept reality. There’s no helping it…”

“…”

Yo-hwa spun around and looked at me, utterly dazed.

“See?”

“O… oh.”

“Sunbae, you tend to take your own romance too lightly. Thinking, ‘I’ll just decide after I see the ending,’ and so on.”

“So I’ve been too naïve?”

“Sunbae, you’re trapped in a preconception. Whoever you date, whoever accepts your heart, is an endlessly secondary issue.”

“Then what on earth is the essential issue?”

“It’s that whoever you date must be someone who can tolerate Sim Ah-ryeon hanging around you for the rest of your life.”

“…”

“Otherwise someone dies. One of the two of you.”

Is this for real?

“You think only Ah-ryeon’s like this? What about Ha-yul?”

Lee Ha-yul nodded and flipped her sketchbook with a blank face.

[I have already reached an agreement with Oppa.]

[Oppa is my family, and family members are beings who live together.]

[Since I belong to Oppa’s family, a mere third party obviously cannot decide where I live.]

"…"

"As I said yesterday, Oh Dok-seo is the only one with normal sensibilities—at least regarding this issue."

"Eh? Uh, well, I'm just like Mister's kid sister, right? No need to actually live together. It's enough to meet up and shoot the breeze when I'm bored."

Hmm, Oh Dok-seo furrowed one eyebrow.

"But sometimes I'll crave the coffee or sandwiches you make. Oh, that's right! Mister! Just run a café! One only acquaintances can visit. Then I just drop by as a customer, drink coffee and eat sandwiches whenever I want, and leave! I can work on my novel there with my laptop. Kiyaah—amazing. Honestly, it's a perfect solution, right?"

"Sure. In someone's eyes that's a daily café date. You heard that shameless speech, right?"

"…"

"Amazingly, that stance will probably be among the most moderate viewpoints you'll encounter from here on out."

"…"

"So accept it."

Cheon Yo-hwa spread both arms wide and made a playful peek-a-boo pose.

"From now on, Sunbae, you have to find a partner who's fine with Sim Ah-ryeon hovering nearby, okay with Lee Ha-yul living together, and unbothered even if Oh Dok-seo barges in every single day!"

"Does such a person even exist!"

"No. That's why you have to look. Starting now, little by little, diligently, consistently, until you reach the regressor ending."

Silence.

After a long pause, I nodded.

“I see.”

Regressor Undertaker’s Ending No. 1: “Live single until death” – is highly probable!

Footnotes:

Chapter 385

The Suicidal III

Sinnoa

It seemed I was destined to be single for the rest of my life.

I pinned that one brief letter to the wall of our hide-out in the Inunaki Tunnel and left.

From today on, I—the Undertaker—was opening Chapter One of my runaway-teen saga.

ShaaAAAA—

Saipan Island. Waves shattered on a beach once famous as a resort, and my heart shattered right along with them.

The reason I chose a distant foreign island was simple: even the Saintess's Clairvoyance couldn't reach this far.

Born alone, yet even to be alone required effort—

I muttered to myself, lonely:

"So this is solitude."

"…"

"How should I describe what I feel now? I only ever meant to live each moment earnestly, yet this is the result. Life never gets easier, no matter how long you live."

"…"

"You know, I honestly don't care if I never have a romance in my entire life. Why must every feeling between a man and woman be translated into that one word, love? Wine doesn't all taste the same; human emotion comes from countless vineyards and varietals mixed together.”

“…”

“In fact, trying to define my ties with the people around me using those two syllables—‘ro-mance’—is violence, pure and simple. All we do is prove each other’s existence.”

Crashhhh—

The breakers smashed again. They kept flinging themselves at the island, fearless of breaking, just like humankind, just like me.

“Hrm…”

Noh Do-hwa narrowed her eyes.

“Fuck, I closed my eyes for one second in the office and opened them here on some random scrap of island. When does our illustrious Regressor plan on explaining that?”

Trust Noh Do-hwa. Even faced with this beautiful coast and my tragic monologue, she offered no reaction at all.

“P-please think of it as a little vacation.”

“Oh? These days a vacation automatically skips immigration while the traveler’s asleep. What a marvelous era. If only it hadn’t also skipped the traveler’s consent, I might have praised this technological leap.”

“Gasp! Look at this, Director!”

Like a pirate discovering buried treasure, I dug in the sand. There, amazingly, lay a wooden chest. When I opened it, rows of exquisite vintage wines were sorted by country of origin.

“Holy—this is insane. Do you see these bottles? Some of these masterpieces are impossible to buy now.”

“…”

“The world must have left this gift to celebrate our arrival. And—whoa! Jazz records, the very ones you love! That’s it, vacation mode activated!”

“Want me to end your life?”

No sale.

Hard to believe, a hardcore alcoholic who downs vin chaud every dawn didn’t even blink.

“Don’t worry. I packed sunscreen and all your personal toiletries. I filled an entire suitcase with the exact same products and already set them up in that picture-perfect cottage.”

“Hm…”

“Well? Isn’t it flawless, Director? I mean it, how many humans today get to enjoy a trip like this? You’ve worked yourself half to death. You deserve to rest!”

“…”

“…”

“So, you shit-weasel. What’s your real point?”

“I heard a few things from the older of the twin sisters, and—”

I explained.

“—in short, she thinks you’re the one and only talent who can pull this mission off. Of course, that’s her opinion, mine differs. Ha! Director is far too busy to play along with this kind of—”

“In summary, you want me to collude with you, fool everyone else, and stage a fake romance?”

“Put bluntly… yes, that’s one way to phrase it.”

She throttled me.

“Well, I get the gist.”

Not until the next morning did Noh Do-hwa sit at the same table as me.

For the record, three of the wines from the treasure chest had already vanished overnight.

“If you’re serious about facing the ‘Ending,’ you have to think about the ‘world after the Ending,’ and sooner or later your trash-heap of relationships will have to be sorted out.”

Clink. She tipped her glass.

From the corner of the cottage, an HMV gramophone dripped mournful jazz.

“But what I don’t get is this: Cheon Yo-hwa—the strategist, right? The one you sealed away and booted from reality?”

“Yes, that’s her.”

“Why did she recommend me of all people?”

Do-hwa’s brows knit.

“Awakener Undertaker, you know I have zero intention of stepping into the swamp you built. I loathe it. Why not ask Team Leader Yu Ji-won? She’s smart enough to manage the mess.”

I wondered the same. That’s why I’d asked Yo-hwa if she was sane.

Logically speaking, there was no way the mighty Noh Do-hwa would join such a scheme.

“Yo-hwa told me to give you this note.”

“Hm…?”

I drew a slip of paper from my pocket.

On it, in handwriting imitating Yo-hwa’s, stood a two words:

‘Reverse thinking.’

Do-hwa’s brows drew together.

“Reverse… thinking?”

“She said you’d figure out the reason yourself once you saw that.”

“…”

“Don’t overthink it, Director. She likes acting superior. Showing a note and calling it the key to the plan—what does she think she is, Zhuge Liang?”

“…”

Do-hwa didn’t look at me.

Ting—

She set her glass down and tapped the rim lightly with a nail.

Slowly. Over and over.

Ripples quivered inside the crystal, and in her jet-black pupils the wine reflected as a wavering shade of gray.

“By any chance…”

“Yes?”

“Is there another note?”

“Er.”

I swallowed a sigh and produced another slip.

“I didn’t want to hand this over, but Yo-hwa said, ‘If the Director asks for a second note, give her this.’”

“…Open it.”

“Here.”

Two lines were written on the second note:

‘Simply trust one human being.’

‘A wager.’

A sneer tugged at Do-hwa’s mouth.

“Hmmm…”

Sneers were as natural to her face as sunsets to the western sky, yet this time even that law of nature felt strained.

“Wait. Did you truly understand that message, Director?”

“More or less.”

Her voice said “more or less,” but her eyes were different: the sarcasm aimed with surgical precision at an orange-haired schemer who could not be present.

A long silence passed.

“However…”

She opened her mouth carefully.

“All right. I need to confirm whether I’m following. Since she called it a duel, I’ll place my stake too…”

“Your stake?”

“Open the third note, Undertaker-nim.”

“…”

“If I’m right, the last note will contain something truly vile. Then I’ll join your ridiculous ‘fake’ scenario with everything I’ve got.”

Do-hwa glanced at me.

“But if it says anything else, well. I’ll forget every bit of nonsense I heard on this island.”

I blinked.

“Really?”

“Yes. I won’t hold it against you or tease you. We’ll call it a simple vacation.”

That was exactly what I wanted.

I drew out another slip. I’d never said there was a third note, yet she accepted it as natural.

And then—

“Heh.”

The moment she read it, Do-hwa laughed.

Deeply, darker than her own eyes.

‘Cowardice of the defeated.’

‘If you want more, see the back.’

She flipped it over.

A longer sentence filled the reverse:

‘Miracle logic: Invoice yourselves as debt to get what you want. Then claim it’s separate. Detach! Booster! Launch!’

‘Good thing this person is kind, right?’

Rip. Rip.

She tore the note to confetti.

Then something even wilder happened: she dumped the scraps into her wineglass and drank them in a single gulp.

“Uh.”

While I gaped, Do-hwa swallowed the paper, wiped her lips with the long sleeve of her doctor's coat, and said,

"Undertaker…"

"Y-yes?"

"You have a real knack for collecting absolute bastards. Fabulous. Had I not met you, I'd have died not knowing this little land crawls with such dogs."

"…"

It was obvious—at least to me.

Anyone else might miss it because her face looked normal, but I saw it clearly:

Noh Do-hwa was genuinely angry.

Maybe "angry" was too broad, let's call it "pissed off."

Which amazed me.

"My God. Three scraps of paper actually pissed off the Director for real? What sorcery is this, Cheon Yo-hwa?"

"Fine. Undertaker. I will gladly join your 'fake' romance."

She stood.

"On one condition."

"A condition?"

"Yes. Just one, so don't fret."

Turning her back, she approached the gramophone, flipped through the LPs, and pulled out Piazzolla's "Libertango."

"If we start dating, from that instant every word I speak and every move I make will be a lie."

"Excuse me?"

“Exactly what you heard. Even if I say ‘I love you,’ it’s a lie. In fact, I intend to speak and act only falsehoods.”

“…”

“Holding your hand? A lie. Saying I’m happy? A lie. Until this cycle ends, I will never, ever show my true feelings again.”

Every act, the reverse of her heart—

Saying “I feel good” would really mean “I feel awful.”

A romance that was counterfeit in the literal sense.

“Ah. Of course, I won’t stop you from misunderstanding. Delusions are a personal liberty.”

“…”

“Well?”

Still she kept her back to me.

“Will you date me anyway?”

In that instant, I still didn’t grasp the meaning of Yo-hwa’s notes, but a different certainty kicked in, like instinct.

The Noh Do-hwa before me had made a monumental decision—one she’d avoided or hesitated over in every other cycle.

If I missed this chance, she would never reach it again.

Trusting that certainty, I answered at once.

“Yes.”

“…”

Crrk.

She dropped the needle. The vinyl began to haul jazz up from the depths of the earth.

“Very well. From this moment…”

Do-hwa slipped off her white doctor’s coat. When she turned to face me—

Noh Do-hwa was gone.

Only a single person remained, smiling brilliantly, like a flower in full bloom.

“Shall we drag everyone else into hell together, Mr. Undertaker?”

“…”

From that day forward, the most dangerous fake romance of our lives began.

Footnotes:

Chapter 386

The Suicidal IV

Sinnoa

We first made our way back to the Korean Peninsula.

And for a few days we lay low, quietly holding our breath as if to say, “Nothing happened at our resort, nope, not a thing.”

All of this was at Noh Do-hwa’s insistence.

“Hmph. Even if we start dating, nobody will care if we proclaim ‘Day 1’ on a deserted island now, will they…?”

“Our aim is, after all, to observe how the rest of humanity reacts, and to discover the perfect strategy that suits those reactions. Wouldn’t you say so…?”

“So.”

“Go back to Busan and spend about a week acting as if a mouse has died, please…”

Naturally I wondered what scheme lay behind those words. When I asked the perfectly reasonable question, Noh Do-hwa merely lifted the corner of her lips in a faint smile.

“Just sit back and watch. Things will get rather entertaining…”

Because of that—

I returned to the graveyard on the roof of the Tower of Babel, to the classroom where the elder twin had been Time Sealed, and began interrogating Cheon Yo-hwa.

“How on earth did you persuade Noh Do-hwa?”

“Ahaha. Well. Even if you ask me, I’m not sure.”

Cheon Yo-hwa sat on a classroom desk, swinging her legs.

“As you know, ‘the me from back then’ and ‘the me now’ are different. Every time you enter or leave this place, I reset.”

“…Even so, your essence doesn’t change. You must have an idea.”

“Hmm-m. You said you passed her some notes, right? May I see what was written on them?”

I wrote them directly on the blackboard.

‘Reverse thinking,’ ‘Simply trust one human being,’ ‘A wager,’ ‘Cowardice of the defeated.’

‘If you want more, see the back,’ ‘Miracle logic: Invoice yourselves as debt to get what you want. Then claim it’s separate. Detach! Booster! Launch!’ ‘Good thing this person is kind, right?’

At first Cheon Yo-hwa tilted her head, but as the white letters multiplied her expression gradually changed.

“Ah-ha.”

“You understand?”

“Yes! And your handwriting is truly beautiful, Sunbae! If you’d been born in the Middle Ages you’d have lived comfortably as a scribe. You were born in the wrong era, Sunbae.”

“…Not that, brat.”

“Ahaha. Just joking, just joking.”

Cheon Yo-hwa chuckled.

“Mm-hmm. Most of this would seriously damage Ms. Noh Do-hwa’s honor, so I must keep it secret. Still! Don’t worry! There’s exactly one part I can explain.”

“Which part?”

“You said Ms. Noh Do-hwa asked if a second note was ready right after receiving the first, yes?”

I nodded.

“Right. That was my first question, why did she assume there would definitely be another note?”

“Obviously! From Ms. Noh Do-hwa’s point of view, a person named Cheon Yo-hwa pushing her toward romance with the Undertaker is automatically suspicious!”

Chk.

Proclaiming “Here comes the answer arc,” Cheon Yo-hwa proudly declared.

Then, apparently to mimic Noh Do-hwa, she scowled, produced a monocle from somewhere, and put it on.

“Hrrmm? Cheon Yo-hwa? The self-proclaimed comrade who was Time Sealed? Why would she recommend I date someone? What gain could there be?”

“…”

“On top of that, she’s openly confessed for ages that she likes the Undertaker. Now she wants to help me date him? Oh-ho. Something stinks.”

The kid’s impersonation skills were unexpectedly high.

Cheon Yo-hwa removed the monocle.

“Sunbae. Ms. Noh Do-hwa never moves unless she first grasps the other person’s real intent and desire. She always assumes a trap.”

“Mm.”

“So the second note was written to bare my own heart.”

Its content was simple:

‘Simply trust one human being.’

‘A wager.’

Cheon Yo-hwa flashed a bright smile.

“Ms. Noh Do-hwa is wondering whether Sunbae can truly reach a happy ending.”

“…”

“So she reserved a bad ending in advance. But against that, I replied that I ‘simply trust this one human being, the Undertaker.’”

I see.

“Hence ‘a wager.’”

“Exactly!”

Cheon Yo-hwa beamed.

“Can Sunbae—the Undertaker—really draw out ‘an ending that every last one of us can completely accept’? And beyond that… will even ‘Noh Do-hwa’ be included in that ‘every last one’?”

“…”

“Ms. Noh Do-hwa doesn’t believe in that possibility. Naturally so—it looks impossible.”

Indeed.

Noh Do-hwa always distrusted happiness, rejecting the very word ‘happy ending.’

With a 99.9 percent probability the world would not escape destruction, and so she naturally bet on that side.

Meanwhile—the girl before me was the exact opposite.

She was the type to stake everything on the 0.01 percent chance.

Not because it was ‘hopeful’ or ‘romantic,’ but because, very simply, the lower the odds, the greater the thrill when you win: the logic of a gambling addict.

“I’m sorry, but I can’t explain the other notes. You’ll need to hear those from Ms. Noh Do-hwa herself. Hehe. Of course, you can obtain them with her mouth—or with her lips, if you like.”

“Yo-hwa, do you….”

“Yes?”

“Do you truly believe I can reach a happy ending? Why? How?”

The smile faded from Cheon Yo-hwa’s face.

“Sunbae. Humans are always looking for a reason for defeat they can accept.”

Even so, a faint echo of her smile lingered at her lips.

“If I lose because of you, I can accept that defeat without any question. In fact, I’d gladly lose.”

“…”

“To believe in someone—if that belief is genuine—means you’re ready not only to trust in their success but also to embrace their failure. Just as you trusted me, trusted us.”

Cheon Yo-hwa said softly,

“I trust you too, Sunbae.”

A week passed in a blur.

Given my recent narration, I may seem to have focused only on human relationships.

But that’s merely because I tackle one theme per episode.

In the 1,000th cycle there were incidents far more serious than my social experiments, and I intend to cover them in the very next episode.

Thus—

[By the way, Mr. Undertaker.]

[Did you enjoy your vacation in Saipan?]

"…"

Even if the Saintess sent me such a message, it would be wrong to assume her interests were confined to 'this sort of thing.'

She was the Saintess. She ceaselessly strove for the security and ethics of the Korean Peninsula.

Only occasionally, about once a day, did she strike at my heart with a razor-sharp question.

"Ah, yes, well. You could say I enjoyed it. It was genuine rest, a proper vacation."

I fought desperately to keep my expression steady.

"Besides, Ms. Saintess, you know full well that even if you set up a playground, Director Noh Do-hwa would never play."

[Indeed, that is true.]

"So I built a hut and left her to rest thoroughly. Unless she's forced, that woman never rests."

[…]

I felt it—the gaze of suspicion. The silence.

Yet I absolutely refused to let a hint of emotion show on my face.

The experience of a regressor is no joke, unless it's a catastrophe on the level of 'confessing to Sim Ah-ryeon and being rejected,' nothing rattles my mental fortitude.

[I see.]

After a very brief silence, long enough for the Saintess to 'pause' and examine my face from every angle, her message continued.

[Then the fact that Ms. Noh Do-hwa purchased a large quantity of going-out clothes yesterday has nothing to do with the time you spent vacationing together on a deserted island?]

How could I not be startled by that remark?

“P-pardon?”

[Exactly as I said. Yesterday Ms. Noh Do-hwa, accompanied by two staff members, bought a set of bright, fashionable outfits.]

“Uh, I… this is the first I’ve heard of it. Didn’t she usually just throw on whatever rags, cover them with a doctor’s coat, and call it a day?”

[Yes. She claims it’s because she can’t be bothered. To the public she’s popular for setting an example of frugal living.]

Honestly, if the Regressor Alliance had to arrest only two fashion terrorists, Sim Ah-ryeon and Noh Do-hwa would top the list.

“Hmph.”

[…It seems you truly didn’t know, Mr. Undertaker.]

Perhaps my stunned expression erased the last shred of her doubt. The Saintess continued.

[I apologize. It looked as if Ms. Noh Do-hwa’s feelings had shifted dramatically. I ended up questioning you as if interrogating.]

“N-no problem. Director Noh Do-hwa is of supreme importance, after all.”

[Yes. And in addition, today there is a hairdresser… no. Never mind. I’m sorry to disturb you during work.]

“?”

The ominous signs did not end there.

“Mr. Matiz. We have an emergency.”

That evening, Yu Ji-won barged into the guild dormitory. Since her room was next door, invasion was easy.

“Huh? What’s up?”

“It is an extremely serious matter. Director Noh Do-hwa has….”

“Noh Do-hwa?”

“…been possessed by an anomaly.”

“?”

Yu Ji-won’s face was deadly serious. I suspected she’d looked more relaxed even while slaughtering her own parents.

“Uh… Ji-won, maybe you don’t know, but Director Noh Do-hwa isn’t the sort who gets possessed easily.”

“I thought so too. But after serving at her side for the past week, I reached an unavoidable conclusion. The current Director is… abnormal.”

“What exactly is abnormal?”

“Shh.”

Yu Ji-won glanced around, then leaned close like a spy passing Soviet secrets.

“The Director asked me whether her clothes suited her.”

?

“She knows I worked as a fashion model in my youth—mainly look-books. Few people in the Corps rival my eye for style.”

“It’s nice to see you still advertise yourself as naturally as breathing. And?”

“About a week ago, she began with, [Now that I think of it, Team Leader Yu has good fashion sense, doesn't she?]—and next thing I knew, she summoned Busan's hottest designer and pattern maker."

???

"What on earth are you saying?"

"I share precisely the feelings you're experiencing now, Mr. Matiz. And that's not all."

"There's more?"

"Yes. It's hard to phrase, but… her way of speaking."

"Her way of speaking?"

"Originally the Director's tone was like gathering all of humanity's pessimism, hauling it into her mouth, and letting it dance on her tongue."

"Ji-won, you've been reading a lot, your prose has improved."

"Thank you. But since a week ago, the Director's speech has… um."

"What? Don't leave me hanging."

"…"

At that moment Yu Ji-won shut her mouth, clearly distressed.

"…I apologize, Mr. Matiz."

"Huh?"

"I thought it urgent to brief you, yet the Seoul Yongsan control tower seems to think otherwise."

My jaw dropped.

"You're telling me the Saintess telepathically stopped you from finishing that sentence??"

"I'm sorry."

“No, Saintess? Ms. Saintess? Could we have a quick talk? What is going on!”

“I’m sorry, Mr. Matiz.”

Yu Ji-won used every surviving facial muscle to display the utmost contrition.

“Even if I withdraw now, your affection for me will not change. Regrettably I have not forged such bonds with others.”

She bowed.

“Thus I must focus on the variable of ‘other people’ rather than the constant that is you. Politics and human relations hinge on controlling variables. I shall take my leave. Have a good night.”

“Ji-won? Ji-won. Ji-won! If you start talking, finish! Hey! Yu Ji-won! Dobongsan, you little—!”

Thud.

“…”

Left alone in my room, I could only gape.

What the heck? Seriously, what the heck?

That question was answered the very next morning, the day the promised week ended.

Dawn.

After spending a sleepless night in anxiety, I left the guild, exited the Inunaki Tunnel, and found Noh Do-hwa waiting at the entrance.

“Huh?”

Noh Do-hwa offered a faint smile.

“Good morning, Mr. Undertaker.”

"…"

"I thought I'd go for an early walk again today, and suddenly you came to mind, so I waited a little."

Objection.

Noh Do-hwa had never waited outside for me to emerge from the tunnel. Such an event was impossible under classical mechanics.

Nor did she ever end her sentences with gentle ellipses or greet someone with a mild 'Good morning.' Such an event was impossible under quantum mechanics.

Furthermore, Noh Do-hwa wearing a shy, breeze-hidden smile was equally impossible.

Her usually messy black hair—half-dried and sticking out in every direction—was now smooth as silk, swaying gently in the wind. She brushed it back with the back of her hand and smiled again—also impossible.

And finally—

Noh Do-hwa, who always wore a battered doctor's coat over whatever rags she owned, now donned a perfectly fitted outfit—clearly commissioned from a designer and pattern maker who had poured their talent and hours into crafting it—yet still radiated the feel of 'everyday, casual wear.' Impossible.

In other words—

"Noh Do-hwa… Director?"

"Yes, Mr. Undertaker."

The woman before me had become beautiful.

So beautiful that even Yu Ji-won, whose looks were an impregnable fortress, might retreat half a step.

"I know you're busy, but… I recently found a place with delicious sangria.”

Seeing my shock (and finally noticing she wore no monocle), Noh Do-hwa blushed faintly and, somewhat shyly, continued.

“If you have a little free time, would you like to take a walk with me?”

“…”

Mo Gwang-seo, Lord Jesus Christ.

What in heaven’s name is happening to me?

Footnotes:

Chapter 387

The Suicidal V

Sinnoa

What, really, makes the greatest masterpiece.

According to the opinion of a certain writer, Ms. Oh, whose credibility ranks dead last in the world.

“In the end, the novel you loved when you were a kid is, for you, the greatest masterpiece. Nothing else can beat a work that’s been taxidermied inside your memories.”

“Why’s that? Memory only does one of two things, mister. Either it slaps on a filter that scrubs every blemish from a selfie, or it preserves that one blemish in ultra-high definition. The masterpieces of the past are always the former.”

If I accept that claim, then sadly I’ve already missed the window to remember the <Harry Potter> series as the crowning masterpiece of my life.

It wasn’t only <Harry Potter>.

Because for me, the Undertaker, every scrap of information about my childhood got sorted into the recycling bin labeled “memories that don’t exist.”

Even so, on the timeline of my memories, <Harry Potter> still stands as the very first novel I ever encountered among all the books I have read.

Back when I was still pure—namely, before I was tainted by that otaku Oh Dok-seo—I was already under Commander Dang Seo-rin’s orders to read and reread <Harry Potter>.

If I have to pick the single most memorable scene, it was the moment the character named “Hermione” made her debut at the school ball.

– Wait, Hermione was that pretty?!

– Gah! No way! How can that bookworm with the permanent turtle neck suddenly become the belle of the ballroom!

– Just yesterday I was chatting with her like nothing. Can someone like me still stay by Hermione's side as her friend…?

It was, quite literally, the classic hidden-power-nerd cliché.

She had always possessed the looks to conquer the social battlefield if only she dressed up, yet until now she'd simply kept her distance from the mundane world to probe the truths of all creation—

But because the ignorant masses never stopped bad-mouthing her, the Grandmaster Hermione chose a single instant to unleash her hidden cultivation and rearranged the entire jianghu pecking order in one stroke.

I nodded and turned the page.

'Mm. This is sweet.'

Back in my 5th cycle, when I was still quite young, I never caught on.

Yet that very scene served, for me, as the archetype that would later shape the genre called "romance fantasy."

Even before I met Oh Dok-seo and was formally introduced to rofan, I had—like prophets sensing God's will before Christ spread the Gospel—already been baptised in the DNA of romance fantasy.

And what is the flower of rofan? Without a doubt, the high-society ball. Mandatory debutante. No theories or objections accepted.

For the record, I stayed firmly on the Harry-and-Luna ship till the very end.

A hero born as the prophesied child yet forever tormented by "fake news," and beside him Luna Lovegood, the daughter of a paper that printed nothing but "fake news," yet who alone saw through to Harry Potter's essence—surely they are the one legitimate couple skewering the series' irony…

But I digress.

So why was I suddenly reminiscing about Hermione's ballroom-debutante scene?

"…?"

Tilt.

Because the very person now strolling down Haeundae beside me—who sensed my stare, met my eyes, tilted her head, and softly smiled—Director Noh Do-hwa herself—

"If you keep staring at me like that, even I'm going to get a little embarrassed, Mr. Undertaker."

…was live-action inheriting the very roots of romance-fantasy cuisine right before my eyes.

I snapped back to myself with an empty laugh.

"Ah, my apologies. You just look so unfamiliar I stared without meaning to. But, um."

"Yes, go ahead."

"Are you… truly Director Noh Do-hwa?"

Noh Do-hwa—or whatever anomaly I was seeing—covered her mouth with a hand and laughed quietly.

"Mmm-hm. Seeing you this flustered makes all my preparation feel worth it. But it's a little sad too."

"Sorry?"

"If you fail to recognise me just because I dressed up a bit, that's lonely, you know. Or do you, like Team Leader Yu Ji-won, suspect I've been possessed by an anomaly?"

As I stammered, Noh Do-hwa's eyes curved into a smile.

"I'mreallyNohDo-hwa."

"…"

Her smile was as warm as spring sunlight, yet my head went ice-cold.

That single sentence yanked me by the hair and hauled me out of my daze back into razor-sharp reality.

'Right. That's how it was.'

Flustered? Why be flustered?

Noh Do-hwa herself had released the trailer over a week ago.

– If you decide to date me.

– Every word and every action of mine will be fabricated.

– Holding your hand is a lie. Saying I'm happy is a lie.

– Until the day this run ends I will never, ever, reveal my true feelings again.

A declaration of fake love.

It had started as a simple suggestion to pretend to date, yet Noh Do-hwa piled extra conditions on top.

However hollow the lies might be—no, precisely because they were hollow—

If I chose to date her, I would be allowed to see nothing but the "fabricated Noh Do-hwa," never the real her.

'I see. So this is what she meant by falsehood.'

By producing an entirely different self she could keep every shred of sincerity out of the romance, while feasting on my embarrassment.

That's Noh Do-hwa for you.

Truly an elite talent at teasing her partner straight into hell.

In that case, I too had a stratagem.

"I'm sorry to have disappointed you."

I clasped Noh Do-hwa's hand—gently, as though handling precious porcelain.

Then I spread across my lips a smile more perfect than anything on earth.

"I was so taken by you, Ms. Noh Do-hwa, that I blushed without realising."

"…"

"From now on I'll try to act like my usual self, too. Ahaha. Though it won't be easy, what with my heart pounding nonstop."

At that moment.

Cutting through all the lies and acting, a razor-sharp exchange of looks flashed between Noh Do-hwa and me, between the Director of the National Road Management Corps and the Regressor.

– And what kind of cheap trick do you call this?

– A secret art.

Heart-to-heart. The screech of naked intent.

I was, after all, someone who could interpret even the screams of anomalies. Cracking a human's gaze didn't require me to loosen my wrists.

– Countering the fake romance.

– Ah, so you'll play the fake Undertaker and pit fake against fake until one of the real ones breaks? Is that it?

– "Win before you fight," says the Art of War. For one like me who values human intimacy, light physical contact is routine. You, Director Noh Do-hwa, brand yourself a voluntary outsider and avoid human relationships. There's already a density gap in our lives. This battle is mine to win.

– Oh, screw you. Fucking bastard.

The instant those eye-beams crossed, Noh Do-hwa, as though nothing happened, softened her gaze again, folding her brows like curtains in shy fluttering.

'…Terrifying.'

An acting ability of truly fearsome calibre!

Who could look at this Noh Do-hwa and imagine she's that Director? No wonder even the Saintess or Yu Ji-won made a fuss.

'However.'

I kept that perfect smile glued to my face.

'I, the Undertaker—while I may not boast the inhuman acting chops of Oh Dok-seo's "Side Story Creation," I'm still skilled enough to not bring shame to my long, long life.'

What if I'd hesitated, dithering?

I'd still be floundering in confusion, feeding nothing but Noh Do-hwa's twisted voyeurism.

I could not allow that.

'Well then. How will she strike back?'

We had already left the seaside path behind and were nearing the entrance to Jagalchi Market.

Even at dawn it was crowded. At this rate, the sight of us holding hands would be put on public display before all Busan citizens!

A split-second crisis.

"…"

Squeeze.

"…!"

Amazingly, Noh Do-hwa did not answer with a barbed line or teasing wordplay.

She forewent her specialty.

Instead, wordlessly, she demonstrated with action.

'Interlaced fingers?!'

Yes.

Not content with casual hand-holding, Noh Do-hwa wove our fingers together, changing the battlefield through the tactic commonly called "locking fingers."

'Director Noh Do-hwa is locking fingers?!'

A scream made entirely of French rang inside my skull. I felt like a soldier witnessing the Wehrmacht's first blitzkrieg.

"…"

Unable to contain my shock I tried to force eye contact again, but it misfired.

The entity presumed to be Director Noh Do-hwa simply dipped her head thirty degrees, as if steeping embarrassment upon embarrassment like tea.

Even a regressor's eyes found no flaw in that acting.

'Have you lost your mind, Noh Do-hwa!'

I shuddered.

‘Just how badly did Cheon Yo-hwa’s message scratch you that you’re willing to dive this deep into hell? Aren’t you afraid of creating black history!’

And then it hit me.

‘…Gasp! When all is done I’ll be the only one left who remembers this!’

From Noh Do-hwa’s perspective, even if a black-history event was born she had nothing to fear.

A few years on, once she embraced the world’s end, everything would reset with an “oh well, I’ll just forget.”

‘Ah, damn it!’

If the fake-dating front escalated into a black-history battle like this, I alone was doomed to shoulder all blame.

Around the moment my mind began buzzing blank—

“Ah! Undertaker, good morning. What brings you to the market toda—huh….”

Thud.

At the market entrance, someone wearing a witch’s hat, someone who looked very much like Dang Seo-rin, was clutching a basket stuffed full. She had three attendants as well. The moment she spotted me and ran up to greet me, she suddenly dropped the basket.

Thump, roll roll roll…

Apples spilled from the basket, bright red and perfectly ripe, scattering across the ground.

Just like when Don Corleone was gunned down in The Godfather Part I.

My own feelings were not much different from Don Corleone's failing heart.

"…"

"Uh, you, uhh, you…."

Dang Seo-rin's finger, pointed at me, trembled violently.

"You—"

"Seo-rin."

"You, youuu!"

"Seo-rin. This is a misunderstanding."

"Youuuuuu! Who is thaaaaaat!"

The Heavenly Demon Dang Seo-rin's sonic arts tore the sky above Jagalchi Market in an instant.

Every gaze zeroed in on us.

"W-what? What's going on?"

"What in blazes is that noise?"

Mutter mutter.

The vendors who had been up since dawn stared at us wide-eyed, as if they'd just been woken up a second time.

I squeezed my eyes shut.

I almost envied Don Corleone—better to take a few bullets. This was hell.

"Who is she! You, who are you?! Do you know whose hand you're holding?! Huh? That's the Undertaker! Undertaker! Undertaker! Do you even know that?!"

"Oh?"

A soft chuckle slipped from Noh Do-hwa, perhaps the dirge that backs hell itself.

“Of course I know, Guild Leader Dang Seo-rin.”

“You know who he is and you… you know who I am and you still?!”

“Certainly. But it hurts my feelings. We used to chat whenever we bumped into each other at the dawn market. It’s only been a few days and you no longer recognise me?”

“Huh?! I-I don’t know anyone like you!”

“Guild Leader Dang Seo-rin.”

Srrk.

Noh Do-hwa drew a monocle from her bosom and set it over her eye.

With her other hand she kept our interlaced fingers, then leaned in and hooked her arm through mine.

“It’s me. Noh Do-hwa.”

“What?!”

“Noh Do-hwa.”

“…”

“Noh Do-hwa.”

“…….”

Cause.

To Dang Seo-rin, everything in the world translated into sound. Each object had its own timbre, and a unique tone resonated from Noh Do-hwa as well.

In other words, even if everyone else saw the current Noh Do-hwa and shouted “Fake! Enemy of the sect!” Dang Seo-rin alone could not.

Naturally, treating the Undertaker at her side as “fake” was also impossible.

“Ubbuh-bubbuh-buh—”

Result.

Dang Seo-rin fainted.

“Great Witch!”

“Seo-riiin?!”

“Hehe.”

Her attendants and I rushed up and shook her, but her runaway consciousness refused to come home.

Vendors gathered from every side, clamouring “What’s going on!” “Oh dear, Great Witch!” Even now Noh Do-hwa stuck to my side, adding confusion to the chaos.

It was bedlam—no, a literal market scene.

– Click!

At that moment an ominous sound hit my ears.

“H-haaa… whoa, h-holy crap…”

On the market floor, now a sea of people, I heard a voice all too familiar—one I dearly wished were not.

“Extra… sensational scoop, extraaa…”

My eyes locked with Sim Ah-ryeon.

“……!”

Gooseflesh spread across my skin.

I nearly forgot to wake Seo-rin.

“Ah-ryeon!”

“H-hieeek… s-scary.”

Click click click.

“Ah-ryeon, what are you doing! Ah-ryeon!”

“I-it looked fun so I followed you… heehee. Holding back my sleep the past few days to get up early really paid off… The early bird gets the worm… and not just any worm either, a huuuge, squirmy earthworm…”

“Ah-ryeon! Don’t go! Ah-ryeon, where are you heading!”

“Wiggle wiggle wiggle. Hehehe. D-delicious. Such a delicacy… The worm keeps wriggling and wriiiggling…”

Sim Ah-ryeon ignored me and slipped through the wall of people with her own footwork. I couldn’t abandon the scene to chase her.

Later that very day.

A post went up on SG Net.

(Likes: 3,103)

“……”

And thus SG Net logged the highest like count since its founding.

Footnotes:

Chapter 388

The Suicidal VI

Sinnoa

Sssk.

– [Samcheon] MeteorIsIceMagic: I used to like the Undertaker because he always charged to the front and took down monsters faster than anyone, but fuck, he had the nerve to look away from our Great Witch? My back of the head still stings, lol (400m)

AnonymousMischiefMaker: I knew this would happen

"…"

Even if I look over there.

– [NRMC] ForbiddenBooksDept17: Rumor's been circling Tower of Babel for days. They say the Undertaker confessed to the Director first. (500m)

Anonymous: fr??

[NRMC] ForbiddenBooksDept17: Yep. Was it a week ago? The Director took a short vacation. She went with the Undertaker, and apparently that's when he confessed. (500m)

Anonymous: wow

[Samcheon] MeteorIsIceMagic: This little punk, lololol (400m)

Anonymous: Isn't this fake news??

AnonymousMischiefMaker: I knew this would happen, I just knew it

"…"

Even if I glance that way.

– dolLHOuse: It's real (1,200m)

Anonymous: wtf, a deep-layer source just verified it lolololol

Anonymous: So you're telling me the Undertaker was flirting with the Great Witch of Samcheon World, but behind her back he sneaked off on vacation with the Director of the National Road Management Corps and traded confessions?

Anonymous: lolololol

Anonymous: But why is everyone logging out and commenting as guests??

Anonymous: Because anyone bad-mouthing the Undertaker with their guild nickname showing in this situation would have to be crazy lolol

Anonymous: fr lol most guild masters probably owe that guy all sorts of favors

AnonymousMischiefMaker: I knew this would happen, and I knew that I knew it from a very, very long time ago, too

"…"

Every single post.

No matter how far I scroll on my smartphone, all I see is yesterday's exclusive scoop.

Flame war. Combustion. No, a five-alarm inferno.

The community was ablaze.

– Anonymous: Any awakeners living in Busan? I saw the photos last night—since when was the Director that pretty??

Anonymous: fr… I had no idea who she was. if OldManGoryeo hadn't explained in the post I would've never guessed – [Baekhwa] NewspaperClub2: Breaking)))) Café Azit closed indefinitely!!

Anonymous: lmao

Anonymous: Undertaker barista has rage-quit!!!

Anonymous: Nooo, damn it, my daily joy—my iced Americano!!

"…"

Ahh.

My head went fuzzy.

Even so, I clung to my sanity.

'If I lose it here too, annihilation! Everything ends!'

The door of hope has not yet slammed shut.

Modern times are different from the past. These days the only community left on the internet is SG Net. Compared to the golden age, it's literally just a handful.

If I unleash the power of "SuchafuckingGarbageMan" here!

"Seo Gyu!"

"Ah… hyung."

Basement of the National Road Management Corps. I barged into the monster prison where Seo Gyu had been appointed as chief warden.

But for some reason the look in Seo Gyu's eyes as he greeted me was troubling.

As if he had resigned himself to 'Well, it's finally here.'

Sensing danger, I immediately activated the patented technique of a regressor. I 'pasted' the regressor's information straight into my brain.

“Right! My little bro! Wow, your shoulders get broader by the day. How do you end up with delts like that when all you do is smash cereal? Huh? It’s pure talent, talent. That’s real dinosaur DNA!”

“Ah. Thank you…”

“Your outdoor gym at Haeundae is popping off these days. Yeah? The members’ bodies are, whoa, if they were civilians back in the day they’d have entered competitions. Feeling stiff anywhere lately? Should I ask Uehara Shino to whip up some S-rank joint supplements?”

“Uh! N-no, I’m good, hyung.”

Inside my skull a siren shrieked.

Seo Gyu usually lit up at shoulder compliments, but he was lukewarm. That was beyond abnormal.

“Uh, uh-huh. Hmm. Anyway. SG Net’s been a little noisy lately…”

“Yes. Not just lately, it’s been on fire from last night straight through this morning.”

“Hmph. SG Net was founded so we could easily share info on anomalies.”

“It was, once.”

“Well. Hmm. I’m not sure it’s right to let fake news completely unrelated to our community’s purpose incite awakened ones like that.”

“…Hyung.”

A complicated look clouded Seo Gyu’s eyes.

“This place is, in the setting, a community run by Constellations. No matter how hot the boards get because of news about you, hyung, the Constellations have no reason to interfere.”

“Gasp, I’ve got a great idea. Let’s stage a blackout! Seo Gyu. We claim a ‘Blackout Anomaly’ appeared, shutting down smartphone access across the board!”

“Hyung…”

Huh? Weird. We weren’t even talking about Three Kingdoms trivia, yet Seo Gyu was looking at me just like back then.

“Please start facing reality.”

“W-what?”

“What good is sinking SG Net? No matter how much the kids there scream, it doesn’t affect you. The problem isn’t SG Net, it’s people around you like Dang Seo-rin noona or Chairwoman Cheon Yo-hwa, right?”

“…….”

“I’ll quietly make sure baseless rumors stay buried. So please, hyung, forget SG Net… uh?”

Seo Gyu stopped after glancing at his phone.

Every human born on the Korean peninsula has a special auditory device built in.

Just from the single syllable ‘uh’ we can instantly tell if it means affirmation, surprise, hesitation, and a rainbow of other nuances.

Seo Gyu’s ‘uh’ just now translated crystal-clear: ‘We’re screwed.’

“W-what is it? Why’re you like that?”

“…Hyung, um. You should probably take a look at the SG Net post that just hit the recommendations.”

I logged in.

– [EasternHolyState] NorthernSaintess: I have a confession for all believers, so I’m posting this. (1,200m)

“…”

The title alone sent a chill creeping up my spine from my tailbone.

Needless to say, '[EasternHolyState] NorthernSaintess' was the nickname Sim Ah-ryeon used. Not OldManGoryeo, but the alias when she pretended to be the Saintess.

'But Ah-ryeon said using that ID was boring and she hardly ever touched it.'

Why now of all times?

I tapped and read the body.

– I was informed that a rumor has been spreading on SG Net since yesterday.

– The rumor claims that someone called the "Undertaker" is dating, or in a similar relationship with, the Guild Master of Samcheon and the Director of the National Road Management Corps.

– I wish to say a few words regarding this, so I have taken the difficult step of posting. As I am unfamiliar with community culture, please forgive any breaches of etiquette.

– Please, believers, do not be swayed by the incitement and defamation in this virtual space; stand firm in your faith.

– Because the Undertaker—far beyond what I deserve—confessed to me, Sim Ah-ryeon, who has been given the title of Northern Saintess, just last week.

– "I love you. Please go out with me."

– …It was an extremely passionate confession. Even my heart fluttered without meaning to.

– But I am one who devotes herself solely to the love of God. After hearing Mr. Undertaker's confession, we agreed to pursue a platonic communion of souls transcending the flesh.

– I trust him.

– If you think about it logically, someone who conveyed his feelings to me last week could not possibly be sharing romantic moments with others this week in full view of the public.

– Once again, I earnestly ask all members of the Eastern Holy State to refuse fake news.

– In the name of our Lord Mo Gwang-seo, Jesus Christ. Amen.

"……."

"Hy-hyung, this is obviously bs, right?"

Seo Gyu watched my face.

Meanwhile the post's upvotes kept climbing: one hundred, two hundred, three.

Especially the comments from members tagged with [EasternHolyState] multiplied exponentially.

– [EasternHolyState] KindServant: ?

– [EasternHolyState] LowlyServant: Saintess??

– Anonymous: So that bastard even messed with our angel who knows nothing of the world?

– [EasternHolyState] BraveServant: Is this real?

The wind blew.

Into the flames of the board, a wind was blowing.

Pure headcount-wise, if you count awakeners by guild membership, the Eastern Holy State was overwhelming number one——

Until now they had treated the flaming board as "those Busan guys at the southern tip doing crazy stuff" and merely spectated.

But they were beginning to realize the burning house was actually theirs.

“Come on. No matter how crazy the world is, there’s no way you confessed to Ah-ryeon, hyung.”

Seo Gyu laughed.

“Ahaha. So it’s a lie, right? Seriously, Ah-ryeon doesn’t know where the line is. If it’s false I’ll nip it in the bud right away… huh? Hyung? Why aren’t you answering? Hey, stop joking. Hyung. There’s no way, even if the sky falls, that you said those kinds of words to Ah-ryeon. Hyung? Hyung? Hyung?! Seriously?! Are you serious?! Hyyuuung!”

I left the basement.

It was absolutely not running away.

I was deeply moved by Seo Gyu’s words. Fretting over anonymous reputations in cyberspace? Far better to pour my attention into my precious people nearby.

[Mr. Undertaker.]

“Saintess!”

I glanced around the corridor to make sure we were alone and spoke at once.

“Why did you ignore my calls all day and only speak to me now! I almost rushed up to Seoul!”

After two days of silence, the saintess telepathy finally reopened.

[I’m sorry. I did everything I could to dissuade Sim Ah-ryeon, but I couldn’t stop her.]

“No, it’s fine. Ah-ryeon is a fake, a knockoff, a phony saintess at best. As long as the true Ms. Saintess stays by my side, I fear nothing.”

I was desperate.

Yes. If I could at least bring the saintess over to my side in this situation, hope remained.

“More importantly, Saintess. In the name of the Constellations, could you put in a good word with Dang Seo-rin? Doesn’t Dang Seo-rin tend to trust messages from the Constellations? If you would just __”

“Oh-raa.”

A voice drifted from down the hall.

“Mr. Undertaker. What are you doing here?”

It was a storm.

This was the Tower of Babel, and there was no way the Director wouldn’t know I’d come to the basement, so of course the odds of running into her were high.

Noh Do-hwa today was again in “Hermione” mode. Semi-formal suit attire. Different vibe from yesterday, but her beauty unchanged, perfectly styled.

No, this is not the time to admire fashion.

“Ah. Director Noh Do-hwa. Good morning.”

“Yes. Good morning.”

“Please wait a moment. I’m in the middle of a call with the Saintess __”

“Hmm. Are you, now?”

Softly. Noh Do-hwa came closer and, like yesterday, casually linked her arm through mine.

“Got it. I’ll just wait right here like this. Go on with your call.”

“Uh…”

[…]

While I stood flustered, Noh Do-hwa glanced up at the ceiling and spoke.

“Huh, how odd. Miss Yongsan. weren’t you talking with my Undertaker? It’s awkward when you suddenly message me instead.”

“…”

“Sorry. As I told you for days now, I prefer face-to-face communication unlike you, Miss Yongsan… I don’t think I can give you a proper answer.”

After a pause, the saintess’s voice came back to me.

[All right.]

She pronounced each word crisply, syllable by syllable.

[I’ll come down to Busan today.]

[Since Ms. Cheon Yo-hwa was already preparing hundreds of guild members at Baekhwa Girls’ High, I’ll join them and head down together.]

[See you shortly, Mr. Undertaker.]

[Ms. Noh Do-hwa.]

Click.

The telepathy cut off.

“…”

I turned to look at Noh Do-hwa.

The dark circles under her eyes were nowhere to be seen; she smiled with a freshness that was downright dazzling.

“Oho. Miss Yongsan and even Cheon Yo-hwa Student Council President. Looks like the Tower of Babel will be crowded with guests for once. Fufu. Shall we browse the market today and pick out gifts for them?”

"…"

That evening.

"All right, all right. Attention everyone!"

Bang, bang, bang.

Tower of Babel's grand conference room. A gavel echoed; the attendees were a star-studded lineup.

'Chief Warden of the Monster Prison', Seo Gyu.

'Director of the National Road Management Corps', Noh Do-hwa.

'Great Witch of Samcheon World', Dang Seo-rin.

'The Strongest Awakener', the Saintess.

'Baekhwa Girls' High Student Council President', Cheon Yo-hwa.

'OldManGoryeo Villain', Sim Ah-ryeon—who shamelessly showed up wearing her saintess robes.

Plus Lee Ha-yul and Yu Ji-won. And even Fairy No. 264 (why are you actually here?).

Not only the members of the Regressor Alliance but even Dang Seo-rin were present!

Just with the people gathered here, we could probably take a shot at world domination. In fact, tally up the number of times we've destroyed the world and it easily breaks into double digits.

In this weighty space, for some reason Oh Dok-seo sat at the head table presiding over the meeting.

"Given the gravity of the issue, Mr. Undertaker ought to serve as chair—but—"

Oh Dok-seo pointed the gavel at me.

Off to one side of the room, I was tied to a chair, limbs and torso and neck all bound. Lee Ha-yul had used her Puppet Threads, tougher than any rope in existence.

“Mmph! Mmmph, mmphh.”

For the record, my mouth was gagged too.

Oh Dok-seo wore a sorrowful expression.

“——Unfortunately, the Undertaker is attending as the defendant, so I, Oh Dok-seo, will preside against my will. Any objections?”

“Mmphhh!”

“None? I’ll take that as unanimous.”

Oh Dok-seo nodded, solemn and grave.

“Then, given the urgency of the current situation, namely the possibility that Samcheon World, Baekhwa Girls’ High, and the Eastern Holy State might form a triple alliance and attack the National Road Management Corps, we shall commence the meeting immediately.”

“…”

This place…

was hell.

Footnotes:

Chapter 389

The Suicidal VII

Sinnoa

People each had a role of their own.

Even when my voice failed to reach anyone, when nobody cared, a moment always came when I had to accept that role for myself.

“Mmff, brbrmmf brrmf!”

So I fought back.

The obstacle sealing up my body and my mouth was Lee Ha-yul’s Puppet Thread, the strongest fiber known on Earth.

No matter how wildly I, the Undertaker, writhed about to prove the earthworm DNA stamped onto my genes, snapping that thing was nearly impossible.

But if I drew on aura here—!

“Shh, quiet.”

Noh Do-hwa, seated right beside me, murmured into my ear.

“Please stay still, Mr. Undertaker.”

“Mmrf?”

“You aren’t really going to toss aside the grand cause of sealing Leviathan and unleash your aura just to defend your rights in this chaos… are you?”

“…”

“Hehe. Kidding. I know better than anyone you’re not that vulgar, Mr. Undertaker.”

Oh, heavens above!

“Hol-o-oon a min-uut-e!”

Thud. Someone sprang up in the conference room; a white sailor uniform fluttered.

It was Cheon Yo-hwa, who an hour earlier had dragged hundreds of Baekhwa Girls’ High students into the “Busan Landing Operation.”

“First off, I hate this seating plan. Why is that girl sitting next to Teacher like it’s natural?”

Cheon Yo-hwa’s crimson eyes burned.

She had already dunked one person on the way here, and you could almost feel her resolve not to miss a two-for-one sale on adding another.

“Vacate Teacher’s left and right seats. Now. Or it’s war.”

“Uh, President Cheon Yo-hwa? Over just that? Are you serious?”

“Why? Need proof?”

“Ah—so you are serious. Very well. This court orders both seats beside the defendant, the Undertaker, to be cleared immediately.”

Bang bang—the gavel sound effect rang.

“Hng.”

Noh Do-hwa flashed a smiling gaze, feigned regret, and slid one seat over.

Cheon Yo-hwa still snorted but closed her lips. Sealed or not, “intent to kill” and “murderous aura” were already manifesting around her, so it hardly mattered.

“Thank you for tidying the seats. Now, as pre-agreed, the Saintess will speak first.”

Bow.

The Saintess opposite us stood and dipped her head.

Incidentally, only yesterday Dang Seo-rin had swallowed the red pill that no Constellation existed and the Saintess was acting, and, on top of that, learned the Undertaker was a regressor. Fainting again after that one-two mental punch was no surprise.

“Honourable Judge, esteemed jurors, I must first remind everyone that thanks to Noh Do-hwa an old promise among us has been broken.”

Huh, an old promise?

“Indeed!”

I had no clue what she meant, yet assent exploded across the room.

Cheon Yo-hwa even looked ready to tie on a red band and start picketing, and nearly every attendee nodded.

“Your Honour, on this side contract I request testimony from the witness holding the document.”

“Request granted.”

Apparently I alone was ignorant of this “promise,” for Oh Dok-seo smoothly produced something.

The evidence looked painfully familiar.

“Mmgh?”

“A laptop?”

Yes, the Infinite Metagame Admin’s laptop.

Oh Dok-seo toggled the power, and [lolololololololol]

—as if the camera had watched everything—the desktop wallpaper was plastered with ‘lol’.

[I-knew-it-lol] [If you're an Outer God watching this, smash that like] [I'll go first lol] [Mastermind: the GOAT 'Faker' Cheon Yo-hwa] [We worship]

[What-you-staring-at?] [Not-done-laughing-yet]

[lolololololololololololololololol]

That… that little—

"Ahem, witness. This is a court. Unrelated comments are excess, please refrain."

[Oh my. Do you speak, O glorious Judge, vaster than the cosmos itself?]

"Yes. Since your marinade's still raw, next time we'll feed you only sub-two-star Three Kingdoms fanfics on SG Net before AI training."

[Apologies……]

Are you doing that behind my back, Dok-seo?

"Everyone here's busy. Testify quickly."

[Yes.]

Cha-ak. The white-haired noblewoman on-screen hid her lips behind a fan, the tinny speaker filled the room.

[As the Judge already knows, this 'side contract' was drafted in the 925th cycle.]

The 925th cycle, the run where the Infinite Metagame Admin surrendered to me, when the Invisible Dragon rampaged in the Daegu desert.

[Similar verbal pacts existed previously.]

[But once I grew 'safe' by surrendering, I was officially entrusted with safekeeping the document.]

Oh Dok-seo nodded.

“Please state its contents plainly, witness.”

[Certainly. The side contract is:]

[A pact that until we’re clear of complete world destruction, no one will actively form a romantic relationship with the regressor, the Undertaker.]

[More exactly, until he himself sincerely seeks romance, we won’t force anything on him.]

[And the one who proposed this was the serialization dropper posing on the bench—]

“The Three Kingdoms.”

[—but actually a perfect grand writer with unmatched talent: Oh Dok-seo.]

???

[The grand writer feared that even a hairline crack could shatter the regressor party.]

[Thus Grand Writer Oh Dok-seo…]

“Yo, my GOAT. What’s up?”

[I feel rather like you. What is it, miko brat?]

“Since you surrendered, you can inherit documents next run like an ark outside time, right?”

[Restrictions exist, but broadly yes. Why?]

“Then could you sneak over files besides the old man’s chronicle?”

[Possible, but nothing harmful to the Undertaker—surrender’s condition.]

“Fine, that part’s okay.”

[……?]

“Because the file helps him.”

[……??]

“So, Saintess unni, here’s my idea: we draft an agreement and pass it to our next-run selves.”

“…”

“Honestly, how busy is the old man? Even ten bodies fall short. If some emotional bomb drops? Haah. Were I him I’d quit.”

“…So wishes to deepen ties with the Undertaker are postponed until the world-ending threat is gone—yes?”

“Yup!”

“I think it’s a fine idea.”

“Knew it! Now, I’m most worried about President Cheon Yo-hwa. Help me persuade her—”

“All right! Everyone gather!”

“…”

“…”

“You’ve all read the contract. I’ll read it: The seven of us—Saintess, Noh Do-hwa, Cheon Yo-hwa, Sim Ah-ryeon, Yu Ji-won, Lee Ha-yul, and Oh Dok-seo—swear to guard this pact. We shall not deepen relations with the Undertaker into true romance, and if any of us breaks it, we’ll actively exclude her. Uh, yes, Ha-yul?”

[Why’s Seo-rin unni missing?]

“Ah. Dang Seo-rin isn’t in the Regression Alliance. Even if we sign in the 925th cycle, she won’t hear it in the 926th. She’s already limited, forcing this too would be cruel.”

[Okay. Got it.]

“Great. Continuing. Even someone like me, without feelings, must watch the signatories faithfully—oh, crap. Ah-ryeon unni?”

“Um, well, w-what if Dang Seo-rin makes the first move on Guild Leader and he gives in?”

“Uh… I combed the past and that never happened.”

“T-that’s the past. I’m talking about the future… maybe that’s too hard for you… hmm…”

“Ah. Damn. Fine. Ah-ryeon unni has a point. If that happens, we meet fast and plan. Okay?”

“Umm… y-yes…”

“And! Never! Tell the old man this happened! Ever!”

“W-why?”

“Because I ship Nohtaker; if he learns we schemed, he’ll just start dating Seo-rin unni to end everything.”

“…”

“…”

“Guys, don’t look at me like that, okay? My motives don’t matter, only helping him does. No? I’m the only trash? I’m giving you hope —maybe not now but someday—through this contract! You should thank me! None of you would tolerate two-timing anyway!”

“T-trash…”

“Oh. Fine.”

“Then let him date, wipe love each run, and enjoy full-course despair.”

“…”

“A tragedy? Great. All his efforts end in love a regressor can’t keep. My taste too. Let’s have kids. Why not? Hey, let’s decide the order. President Cheon Yo-hwa, you date him next run!”

“…”

“Then Ms. Ji-won. Then Saintess unni. One love, one despair. Infinite failure. Masterpiece, right?”

“…”

“A man repeating life for a fleeting moment with his beloved. That’s essentially Schopenhauer, isn’t it? See! He was right! The old man suffered 900-plus runs for nothing. Right, Sim Ah-ryeon? Hey! Sim Ah-ryeon!”

“I misspoke.”

“Good. Sign. I don’t care if you’re an empress or King Sejong. I just want this story’s end, real life gives enough stupid angst.”

“…”

“Ah, signing’s optional. Except the next-run me inherits it. So… please. Unnies. Ha-yul. Even if we hate each other sometimes, let’s not wound one another behind the curtain. Please.”

Silence fell on the room.

“…”

“…”

People each had a role of their own.

Even if their voices reached no one, when nobody noticed, a moment came when they accepted that role.

Oh Dok-seo was the same.

“We’re all patients, infected by Void Poison to some extent.”

From the bench, Oh Dok-seo rested her chin, fatigued yet sharp-eyed.

“We all know we’re partly insane. Once emotion hits, you want to possess, monopolise, feelings so fierce they barely seem human; sometimes you’d hand yourself over to them.”

“…”

“But, are you sure you can handle it?”

Her fingers stroked the laptop.

“Almost everyone here is a shrine maiden. Are you certain the feelings you have are truly yours alone, untouched by the Void?”

“…”

“Let’s delay things a bit.”

Thud. Oh Dok-seo shut the laptop.

“For us, twenty years tops. Mister waited tens of thousands. I don’t know love well, but I know promising to walk the same timeline is part of it.”

“…”

“When every last bit of the Void is gone and humans can face humans properly, we’ll pick up the epilogue then.”

Her gaze drifted once around the room and settled on me.

She shrugged.

“Sorry, Mister. I’d rather you not see us like this, but here we are.”

“…”

“No, that’s cowardly. Truth is, I showed you on purpose. I figured you suspected, but I wanted to jolt you harder.”

The Puppet Thread sealing my mouth came loose on its own. I spoke.

“Was I too naive?”

“No, too trusting. It’s your best and worst point.”

Oh Dok-seo sighed.

“To you, twenty years is a blink, but for most, waiting that long in silence rots them inside.”

“…”

“I hated piling more weight on you, but hiding it felt ruder. So I used shock therapy.”

She scratched her cheek.

“If you show zero interest in romance, everyone copes, focuses on work. But when Dang Seo-rin gets close, dominoes fall, some lose control.”

“…”

“And asking you to pick one person now, before averting the apocalypse, is cruel. Embarrassing. So… sorry, Mister. This was my real aim.”

Oh Dok-seo spoke.

“Couldn’t Seo-rin unni join the Regression Alliance and stand with us?”

I paused.

Her eyes, tinged with some sorrow, faced me squarely.

“Inside your heart, the final words tenth-run Seo-rin unni left… Let’s finally lay them to rest.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 390

The Suicidal VIII

Sinnoa

「 Undertaker. 」

「 If at all possible, do not tell the next-run me that you are a regressor. 」

「 I'm greedy and a devout follower of the God of Impulse-Buying— 」

「 So the idea of 'I'll throw away this run for the sake of the next one' simply won't take root in me. 」

「 If I find out I still have hundreds of years of lifespan left, I'll definitely burn it all on the present run. 」

「 Only at the very end. 」

「 Until the truly final crisis arrives, guide me so my lifespan keeps accruing interest. 」

And so it was.

The conference room, moments ago ablaze with the heat of world-ending fury.

One would have thought someone's lovely neck would soon be decorating a gallows, yet, astonishingly, it was all settled in a single "Silence!" from the great author Oh Dok-seo.

Even this regressor's eyes had not foreseen that development.

"True… even when she'd gone rogue, Dok-seo threw out Heavenly Demon Lord Footwork, so in a way she's the textbook 'hidden powerhouse.'"

“No. I think she’s actually the proof of ‘the quiet ones are the scariest when they snap.’”

Tower of Babel. Terrace.

There the Saintess and I were getting a breath of air alone for a moment. Oh Dok-seo had adjourned the meeting for about thirty minutes.

“Dok-seo, quiet…? Search the whole peninsula, and I bet even old man Jo Yeong-su would give up finding anyone more uncontrollable than her.”

“She only lets all her defenses down in front of Undertaker-ssi.”

The Saintess spoke.

“When Dok-seo deals with other people she usually volunteers to be the one who gets pushed around. I think that’s the posture she learned for interacting with others.”

“Then why is she always making trouble for me?”

“…”

The Saintess didn’t answer.

Instead, she cast a glance down to the plaza ten floors below the Tower of Babel.

Packed solid.

Hundreds of Baekhwa Girls’ High guild members, Samcheon World guild members and even the Eastern Holy State’s holy knights were crammed shoulder to shoulder.

– Undertaker, awaken! Awaken! Awaken!

– Drag that bastard out! Drag him out right now!

– Everyone! Our northern Saintess! How noble and pure she is! To mock! To harass! Huh! Such a shameless unbeliever is hiding inside that Babel Tower!

– Unbelief! Hell! Unbelief! Hell!

– Why the Tower of Babel, you ask? The very name the Lord used to punish human arrogance! Do you think it was attached by chance? For the sake of the Saintess, who has risked her life for us until now, we must repay this grace and tear the tower down!

– Ooooooooo-!

– Divine wrath! Divine wrath! Divine wrath!

"…"

Honestly, it was a little frightening.

Ah-ryeon, just how much propaganda did you pump out in the Eastern Holy State?

Samcheon World and Baekhwa weren't groups to lose out in the madness department, but even they had quietly edged back to the outskirts of the plaza, cowed by the State's fanaticism.

"This time… it looks like Dok-seo didn't tell anyone and went ahead alone."

Against the riotous roar below, the Saintess's voice drifted across the quiet rhythm of the terrace.

"Eh?"

"I actually suspected, when Mr. Undertaker whisked Ms. Dok-seo and a few others off the roof of Babel Tower a while ago, that it had all been arranged in advance."

She was referring to the crystal gravestone bearing the trace of the [Time Seal]. No one but me could see it.

"But seeing your reaction today, it really does feel as if Ms. Dok-seo rammed ahead on her own."

“Why? At least talk it over with Ah-ryeon or Ha-yul, why do it alone…?”

“I’m sorry. Offering a guess with my own lips might be disrespectful to Dok-seo-ssi.”

The Saintess gave a wry smile.

“That’s also why I didn’t dare approach you these past few days. I was busy checking with the members of the Regressor Alliance one by one, trying to understand what on earth was happening.”

“Ah…”

“But now I understand. I think Ms. Dok-seo wanted not only you, Mr. Undertaker, but also me, to face reality and reflect on ourselves.”

Reality? Reflection?

“To discover just how impatient I am. How people can be so oblivious and indifferent not only to others’ feelings but to their own.”

The Saintess still kept her gaze hanging in mid-air.

Because she spent most of each day using [Clairvoyance], her sense of ‘sight’ had to be different from ordinary people’s.

For her, ‘direct gaze’, looking someone straight in the eye, was an angle that actually required practice.

“When I saw Undertaker-ssi dating Noh Do-hwa… my heart shook. I was startled by how strong the feeling was, not realizing I had it.”

“…”

“Obviously it had to be a disguise set up by someone’s scheme. Even if I considered the worst case, it was the work of an anomaly. So there was no need to react emotionally; the thing to do was determine if it was a human disguise or an anomaly’s phenomenon. …I judged that way and I acted that way.”

A mutter.

“I thought I understood everything, and yet it turns out I still didn’t understand myself. And…”

The Saintess turned her head. The water-colored light of her eyes looked straight at my face.

“…”

Suddenly.

As I met that gaze, this thought rose in me.

True orientation. The correct direction. In a house, for instance, good orientation is a south-facing room that sunshine pours into.

Then what is the true orientation of a person’s gaze?

Perhaps it is the direction where the one who lets the brightest light seep into your life and your time is standing.

“To learn about the parts of me I still don’t understand, I think the way isn’t digging deeper into myself, but overlapping the direction of trying to understand someone else.”

“…”

“I like you, Mr. Undertaker.”

The Saintess smiled softly.

“I’ll wait until the day I can hear your answer.”

On the way back to the conference room.

“Ah. Mr. Matiz.”

I ran into Yu Ji-won in the corridor.

The usual expressionless face. She was carrying a silver tray piled with paper cups of instant coffee.

“Have you finished speaking with the Saintess?”

“Yeah. Ji-won, you’re doing coffee delivery?”

“Yes. Normally I would have ordered a subordinate, but given today’s illustrious attendees I decided to do it myself.”

Yu Ji-won said without so much as a blink.

“If I’d asked Mr. Seo Gyu he would gladly have obliged, but I volunteered on purpose.”

“Huh? Why?”

“Mr. Seo Gyu is the type who’s touched by small considerations like this. When I serve the coffee cup by cup in the conference room he’ll surely exclaim, ‘No, you should have told me to do that!’ and I’ll reply, ‘You finally made it up from the dungeon, so please just relax for once.’”

“…”

“Seo Gyu’s favorability toward me will rise without fail. With a single coffee errand I dramatically increase the chance of recruiting the Warden of Anomalies to my side in an emergency. Nothing but profit.”

Honestly, I had never met, and probably never would meet, another human as strangely diligent as Yu Ji-won…

“Let’s walk.”

“Yes.”

Step. Click.

Our two sets of footsteps echoed together on the corridor leading back to the conference room.

They never fell out of sync. The speed and stride were perfectly identical. Not a centimeter ahead or behind.

"…"

It was something she had learned.

One summer in middle school, after meeting a man who introduced himself as 'Matiz,' she had analyzed his walking speed and stride and grafted it onto herself.

To Yu Ji-won, the person Matiz had never once been physically absent, even in all the years she hadn't seen his face.

"A lot of people kicked up a fuss in this incident."

"Yes."

"But you stayed quiet from start to finish."

"That is only natural."

Her voice came from about forty centimeters to my left shoulder.

"Natural? What do you mean?"

"First. Director Noh Do-hwa would never start openly dating Mr. Matiz unless she had completely lost her mind."

"…"

"From what I have observed, the Director's likelihood of entering a romantic relationship is exceedingly low, and even if she did, the probability she would flaunt it before others converges at absolute zero."

"Can't argue with that."

"Second."

Yu Ji-won spoke as usual.

"Mr. Matiz would never decide to date someone without consulting me first. That probability is likewise zero."

"…"

“A single event might pierce extreme odds, but for two events to coexist requires truly astronomical probability. Believing the romance to be real is the irrational position.”

Though her tone was calm, I felt a strange embarrassment, so I changed the subject.

“Ah-ryeon said if I started dating someone who wouldn’t accept her, she’d kill the partner.”

“As expected of Sim Ah-ryeon.”

“What about you, in a similar situation?”

“You keep positing highly improbable scenarios, Mr. Matiz.”

Yu Ji-won tilted her head.

“There is no way Mr. Matiz would love someone who won’t accept my existence.”

“…”

“Of course, human beings are creatures of emotion. Even if Mr. Matiz’s reason rejects it, his feelings could resonate.”

But, a whisper flowed,

“Comparing the time spent in such a love with the time spent with me, the latter has far greater value to Mr. Matiz.”

“All correct, so I can’t refute.”

Step. Click.

“Others seem to interpret your avoidance of romance as the regressor’s pain—the inevitable farewell—”

“Hmm?”

“My view is a little different.”

Yu Ji-won said.

“Mr. Matiz simply feels that the way of life we are sharing now is the happiest, and thus had no need to choose romance.”

“…”

“In your mind, even now, are the people being sacrificed by anomalies. Starvation. Thirst. Necrosis. You remember countless deaths.”

Step. Click.

“To you those deaths are past, present, and future all at once. Colors that will never fade. Therefore, you comprehend more clearly than anyone how precious, how joyful, this brief peace with the people around you is—the scant twenty-odd years granted each run.”

“…”

“I trust your judgment. If you are living like this, it means this is the optimal state. And I am not the kind of person who, while in the optimal state, bewails her lot as unfortunate.”

“I see.”

“Yes.”

Step. Click.

For a while the corridor echoed with two sets of footsteps and a single rhythm.

Yu Ji-won retrieved the pause she had placed in her words and opened her lips.

“Some may call this the ‘normal ending,’ claiming there exists a happier one beyond. But for me, this moment alone—as a normal ending—is enough.”

Suddenly.

「 Vice Guild Leader, Your Excellency. 」

A memory of the past overlaid the present.

「If the me of run five was happier than the me of run six, isn't there a fair chance the me of run seven will be a little happier still?」

「Please leave a will telling the next-run me to try her utmost to live a happier time before holding the funeral…」

「Mm. Won't I be a bit happier next run?」

For someone like me with Complete Memory, the past was always equal to the present.

「I think I can be a little happier next time.」

The 'Yu Ji-won' of the past and of the present wore the exact same face and the exact same expression.

So I ended up asking the exact same question without thinking.

"Ji-won."

"Yes?"

"Are you a bit happier now?"

Our steps stopped.

When I turned my head, she too had turned hers. When two sides meet, it seems to become a front.

And then—

"——'Happiness' is a strange word."

A different answer came from Yu Ji-won's lips.

The overlap of past and present began to crack in my regressor's vision.

Little by little.

"Everyone uses that word as if the concept were fixed, yet for one person it means affection, for another, lust. Power. Shade in midsummer. A glass of good liquor."

"…"

"People sign the concept of happiness in their own handwriting, so happiness looks less like a word and more like a blank space."

Little by little,

the 'current' Yu Ji-won drew closer to me.

"If that is so, then even someone like me, setting aside all other words, must have the freedom to sign the blank called 'happiness' however I wish."

At some point the silver tray in her hands had been passed to me, and at some point I had accepted it without a word.

Thus lightened, she rose on tiptoe and leaned her face near the nape of my neck.

A breath.

It was not a gesture of affection or desire.

"…"

Confirmation.

Authentication.

Proof.

A quiet breath confirmed the scent clinging to my skin.

In this world humanity was not a single species; each person was a different race, and this was a rite permitted only to the race called Yu Ji-won.

Satisfied that the perfume of seven hues still lingered unchanged, she slowly withdrew.

“I too have filled that blank with the name ‘Matiz.’”

“…”

“And I know my name is written on your page, in your own script.”

Yu Ji-won smiled.

“So, yes.”

An artificial yet more beautiful than nature, human smile.

“I am happy now, Mr. Matiz.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 391

The Suicidal IX

Sinnoa

The meeting was quietly entering its final stretch.

From Dang Seo-rin's point of view the last few days had been nothing short of chaos.

First came the bombshell that Undertaker and Noh Do-hwa were dating, then the revelation that Undertaker was actually a Regressor, and on top of that the real reason he had never "regress-outed" until now was the sealed will her tenth-cycle self had left behind. Taking three fastballs to the head like that would have rattled anyone.

Even so,

"…It feels cowardly, you know. I ought to be angry that you hid it from me all this time, but in the end you were keeping the secret because of a promise you made to me, not anyone else."

After hearing the whole story Seo-rin could only sigh as though she had no other choice.

"Do you realise how foolish that is? Promise or not, who on earth tries to keep faith with something agreed thousands of years… Wait. Was it thousands of years ago?"

"No. It was tens of thousands of years ago."

"Good grief. How does anyone honour a promise that old to this very day?"

Her expression was a tangle, anger and joy, sorrow and wonder, all vying for the front seat.

She would need time to settle those feelings.

So I voiced only the question that had to be asked now.

“Seo-rin.”

“…”

“As Oh Dok-seo pointed out, I have followed the will your tenth cycle left behind. No, I have tried my best to keep it. I believed doing so would prove that someone called you once existed in that distant past.”

Silence blanketed the room.

The Saintess at the table, Yu Ji-won, even Sim Ah-ryeon, who chased dopamine wherever she went, all held their tongues.

“And now that we have reached the thousandth cycle, I want to ask for your decision again.”

“…”

“May I keep telling the next you, and the one after that, that I am a regressor?”

The silence lingered.

“Tenth-cycle me must have… I do not know exactly, but I think she trusted very little.”

After letting the weight of my question sink all the way down, Seo-rin finally opened her mouth.

“All sorts of things. Faith in myself, whether I could fight anomalies without burning through my whole lifespan… Faith in you, whether you were as precious as this world.”

“…”

“But you waited tens of thousands of years for me. If I could not even hold out and watch how this world ends, that would be pathetic.”

“So.”

“Right.”

She clasped my hands.

“I will endure, no matter what.”

“…”

“I have no idea how much lifespan you have already stacked on me, but that span does not belong solely to me. It is yours as well, the result of you guarding my will. Therefore,”

Seo-rin smiled,

“The life you protected, I want to spend it when you want me to. My lifespan, I leave it in your care.”

Warmth flowed through our palms.

“Bravo!”

Clap-clap-clap-clap-clap!

From the judges’ dais Oh Dok-seo sprang to her feet, hammering her hands together, tears streaming for some reason.

“Yes, this is it, sniff, absolutely moving. See, all you have to do is talk. If you just talk you can move forward, so why, why not talk, huh? I despise stories that drag out conflict you could solve with an honest conversation, it is manure, total manure. If you claim to care for each other why must hurting each other be inevitable? Only conflicts that survive true dialogue are real conflicts. Hrk, uncle, sob, I always trusted you, dang it!”

“…”

Except for Dok-seo and one single other person, no one in the chamber joined her standing ovation.

Rather, the prevailing mood was “for the love of all things, do not lump me with that one.”

In short, it ended in a way everyone could accept.

“Tch.”

Cheon Yo-hwa still rested her chin in her palm, looking somehow hollowed out.

Her head and her heart never stopped rubbing each other raw.

Stories about Yo-hwa could wait for another time; a heavy emptiness still draped over her and that shadow deserved its own episode.

Therefore,

my gaze fixed on a single person.

Clap, clap, clap, clap.

“…”

With a flawless smile, no shade over her face, no shadow at the corner of her lips, she applauded right after Dok-seo.

Only Noh Do-hwa.

An epilogue had to be told.

This one was not short.

Quite a long one, in fact.

Let us go through it step by step, in order.

“Brothers and sisters, please calm yourselves.”

The first piece of cleanup was, of course, soothing the Awakener mob in Tower of Babel Plaza that looked ready to lynch me on the spot.

The Northern Saintess ascended the podium, showing off the saintess robe she had changed into ahead of time, a holy smile on her lips.

“There is no doubt about Sir Undertaker’s feelings. He loves me, and that love is not some vulgar romance but the pure Mo Gwang-seo style compassion that embraces my entire being.”

– What.

– Wait, really?

– See, I told you so!

Murmurs swept the crowd.

The paladins who had been one step from declaring a crusade downgraded at once into woodland critters.

I, a man of common sense, had no idea what “Mo Gwang-seo style love” was, but apparently it carried profound meaning for them.

Sim Ah-ryeon beamed.

“Yes. It is just that Sir Undertaker’s boundless compassion has taken root in many people besides me, like the Guild Leader of Samcheon World or the Commander of the National Road Management Corps.”

“…”

“I sincerely support and bless this man’s love.”

She hopped off the stage, trotted over to me, looped her arm through mine and flashed the brightest grin imaginable.

“So please, brothers and sisters, bless him as well, amen.”

“…”

From that day on the Eastern Holy State had a single archenemy, not heretics, atheists, anomalies or even the Road Corps, but one man called Undertaker.

Every dawn when I made my patrol through Inunaki Tunnel, I found the entrance on the Holy State side piled high with anonymous letters.

[Die.]

[Miss Saintess is so innocent that she was momentarily deceived by your devilish tongue, but my eyes will not be mocked…]

[Die.]

[I have relatives in Busan. Just last month they sent me a photo of you having lunch with the Great Witch of Samcheon World. If you still possess the conscience God grants to all men—]

[Die.]

"…"

Paper was not a resource one could squander freely in this era, so the sheer waste made it clear how sky-high their hatred rose.

"Ah-ryeon."

"Y-yes?"

"I can endure no longer."

"…?"

At last I made my decision.

–ZERO_SUGAR: ☆★ Great shock! The true identity of OldManGoryeo the vile troll! She is actually the Northern Saintess! Exposé! ★☆

It was, without exaggeration, a nuclear move.

If anyone thought this Guild Leader would stay passive forever, they were sadly mistaken.

I curled a bitter smile.

The post was perfect.

The fact that OldManGoryeo and the Northern Saintess had never been active at the same time, that assuming they were the same person solved every mystery, the copious evidence attached—everything immaculate.

Even the title was crafted to bait clicks no matter how you tried to resist.

‘How long did you think you could rule the forum as a tyrant? Die for once, Ah-ryeon!’

Comments began to pour in.

The greatest scandal in SG Net history. The fanfare of doom, its overture blaring.

–Anonymous: Ignore the troll.

?

–Anonymous: What is this now…

–[Baekhwa] PressClub2: Do not feed.

–[EasternHoly] KindSoul: lol, this jerk used to spin fake homeland stories, now he smears the Saintess for attention, what a life.

Anonymous: What bait is it this time?

[Samcheon] MeteorIsIceMagic: I said ignore the troll, 400m.

[EasternHoly]KindSoul: sry sry

–Anonymous: You fools realise giving him attention is exactly what he wants.

–dolLHOuse: Not easy, 1 200m.

That was all the reaction to my magnum opus.

“Uh…”

One-hundred-and-twenty-one downvotes.

Only two upvotes, one of which was mine.

–OldManGoryeo: Hooeheehee! Turns out I was the Supreme Being of the Eastern Holy State all along? While I was not looking I became the Northern Saintess and was out there saving lives >_<)!!

–OldManGoryeo: As expected the only one who cares about me here is ZeroCola-chan, people are so cold! Big like. Let my love reach you, ZeroCola-chan, take my heartttttt ♡

–OldManGoryeo: Starting today, I am dating ZeroCola-chan! Day 1 ♡♡♡ (D-1)

The other upvote was from Sim Ah-ryeon.

“…”

Why? How?

Enraged, I posted again.

–ZERO_SUGAR: Come on, guys. Set emotion aside and look at the evidence. OldManGoryeo equals NorthernSaintess, I am telling you.

Anonymous: Ignore the troll.

This time there was exactly one reply.

“What? Why?”

Unbelievable.

Had the public finally lost all ability to distinguish fake news from real?

Very well. I hated to stoop to this, but I had no choice except to post side-by-side photos of Ah-ryeon cosplaying in the Holy State and slacking off in our guild base, showing how different she looked

—

[Mr. Undertaker.]

[Forwarding Mr. Sim Ah-ryeon's exact message. I left out the stuttering.]

['Guild Leader! I just wrote a post claiming ZeroSugar equals Undertaker and I am playing press-submit-or-not-submit, do you want to join the fun?']

[That is what she says.]

"…"

[What should I tell her?]

With a long press I quietly tapped Delete Post on my screen.

This was not just my defeat.

It was the defeat of the last truthful voice of journalism in this age.

In other words, the thousandth cycle was so peaceful that I had the spare nerves for SG Net drama.

It was not only me who felt this way.

"Wow, the thousandth really is different, incredibly calm," Oh Dok-seo agreed.

"You call it record-breaking calm? How would you know what other cycles were like?" I asked.

"Ah, actually I set Infinite Metagame in mirror mode and whenever I am bored I use my Side Story Creation ability and enter V-Tuber mode."

"Oh?"

"I mainly possess 'past-cycle me'. I ask what I was thinking back then, what situation I faced, how I acted, what results came, what I regret. It is fun research."

I nearly quipped that spending all her free time like that must be why she never sits still to write.

"The other cycles were absolute chaos. Stuff you never saw behind your back. For the honour of my comrades I will stop there."

"…You went through a lot."

"Eh, the others take things too seriously. I, on the other hand, see them as 'characters' in the Undertaker saga, so there is fan affection mixed in, not that stressful."

She scratched her cheek.

"Anyway, ever since the last meeting the back-room friction has practically vanished."

"Hmm."

"Look at Samcheon World and Baekhwa Girls' High, they hardly bicker any more, right?"

Now that she said it, it's true.

It had been too trivial to detail in the main text, but in reality and on SG Net Samcheon and Baekhwa fought every other day.

Guild Leaders for the title of strongest magic Awakener on the peninsula, guild members for the honor of strongest guild.

"Indeed, I have not watched Seo-rin and Yo-hwa jab at each other on the forums for quite some time."

"See?"

Dok-seo chuckled.

"If I had known things would improve this much when I spoke up, I would have done it sooner, not waited till the thousandth cycle. Ah, I feel like I lost a thousand years of my possessor life."

“Mm. Dok-seo, you occupy a position similar to a ‘book possessor’ but strictly speaking you are not one.”

“Hey, you get it by feel, right? By feel!”

She laughed, nudging my ribs, looking truly happy. Apparently she had suffered more quietly than I realised.

“Tra-la-la, tra-la-la, tra-la-la, tra—”

In high spirits she hummed The Song of the Birds while clacking away on her typewriter, promising to write a story for the first time in ages, and left.

As I savoured the cocktail of pride and self-reproach that came from recognising that tune—

[Mr. Undertaker.]

The Saintess contacted me the moment Dok-seo was gone.

[I have something to tell you.]

“If Ah-ryeon is pestering you to relay another message, please, I beg you, just tell her to spare my life.”

[No, that is not it.]

Her voice was low.

[Ms. Dok-seo is truly enjoying herself for once, so I chose this timing to avoid interfering.]

“Yes?”

[I am sorry to say, but the reason relations inside the Regressor Alliance have improved is… not Ms. Dok-seo.]

[Of course I believe she provided the first push, at least I believe so. However…]

[People, that is, relationships, rarely change with a single declaration.]

I blinked.

“What are you saying?”

[Someone else has been moving quietly behind your back, adjusting opinions, allocating time, patching rifts between the alliance members as much as possible.]

“Who would that be?”

[Ms. Noh Do-hwa.]

My heart lurched.

Independent of my will, the Saintess’s voice flowed in.

[It is Ms. Noh Do-hwa.]

Footnotes:

Chapter 392

The Suicidal X

Sinnoa

Noh Do-hwa.

There was once such a woman.

Do, the wave.

In the character for wave, it is the part that holds the meaning of a ceaseless swell.

It is not calm water at all but the heaving that never rests, like surf.

Since ancient times water like that has been a hell one could hardly cross, a demon's lair that stole lives again and again, so perhaps the forebears called it water on which a person's span of years was laid.

Do-hwa, a river where those waves run.

Noh Do-hwa, the road that crosses such a river.

"Eh?"

The fork that had just touched a chocolate cake stopped in mid-air and Noh Do-hwa looked my way.

Then she smiled brightly.

"What are you staring at so hard, Mr. Undertaker?"

"…"

"If you want a taste you can just say so. Here, aah—♪"

With practiced ease Noh Do-hwa cut off a neat bite and held it out to me on the fork.

In countless bits of subculture this would be the scene with the sign that says, “Dear customer, please feel your heart skip here,” yet my heart was surprisingly still.

When I took a mouthful of that extravagantly precious chocolate cake, Noh Do-hwa propped her chin on her hand and gazed at me as if I were something lovely.

“Is it good?”

“Yes, it is delicious.”

“Hehe, thank goodness. Work has kept you so busy we could hardly have any private time. Going on a date with just the two of us on such a fine day, I like it.”

“…”

For a moment the hesitation in my mouth mingled with the sweet-bitter scent of chocolate.

“…Is it good for you too, Ms. Do-hwa?”

“Mm?”

Do-hwa blinked.

“Of course. The cake is wonderful, and it has been ages since I enjoyed dessert with you, Doctor-ssi. How could I dislike it?”

“…”

That could not be.

Noh Do-hwa disliked sweets. She allowed only the faint hint that drifted out of certain drinks, and from the first she had rejected desserts ferociously.

Unless her palate had flipped overnight in the thousandth run, she could not be eating chocolate cake with that happy face.

Therefore.

“Mmm. The bakery here really is excellent no matter when I come.”

The Noh Do-hwa smiling in front of me was lying.

From the cheerful lift of her brows to the angle of the hand holding the fork, from the outfit chosen for a date to the tone she used, even this moment that looked as though someone had cut out the piece of daily life labelled ‘happiness’ and pasted it on with care, all of it was false.

“Ah.”

Perhaps spending time in the bakery had been a mistake. At the entrance Dang Seo-rin walked in, saw us, and came to a halt.

It was no coincidence. This place was one of her regular haunts.

“What the—”

A short while ago, if she had seen us sharing cake like lovers, she would have screamed.

“—Noh Do-hwa and the Undertaker!”

But not now.

Smack.

Seo-rin walked over without hesitation and slapped palms with Noh Do-hwa, no anger, sorrow or caution on her face.

Her heart had clear fences.

To anyone once acknowledged as family, her side, an ally, Dang Seo-rin gave endless generosity and friendship.

“See? I told you last time this place is really good, that delivery doesn’t compare at all!”

That friendship was now in the look she gave Noh Do-hwa.

This, too, had happened only in the thousandth run out of all the cycles I crossed.

“Yes, it is definitely different. I used to have a bias against cakes, but eating it here I finally get the appeal. Hehe, thank you, Ms. Seo-rin.”

“Haha. Ah— I shouldn’t block your date! Undertaker, don’t forget lunch tomorrow! Bye!”

“Uh, yeah, okay…”

“Do-hwa, have fun!”

Seo-rin waved and trotted off to the owner. Until she left with her reserved cake she never spared us a glance.

“…”

Not long ago I remembered a talk with the Saintess.

[Ms. Do-hwa has been adjusting the others’ schedules behind your back, Mr. Undertaker.]

– Adjusting schedules?

[She told them this.]

[I have no intention of monopolising the Undertaker. We are dating but I will not take it to the physical level.]

[It is fine for all of you to spend time with him.]

“…”

[I understand your possessiveness, but if you let me coordinate I will manage the calendar so none of you feel left out. Please trust me.]

[Except.]

– Except?

[Do not show the Undertaker any hint of it, ever. That was her order.]

"…"

[I am sorry. Even telling you this breaks the promise I made, but I thought you had to know.]

[After this I will keep silent.]

If the Saintess was right, Noh Do-hwa was still backstage managing the relationships inside the Regressor Alliance.

So that Dang Seo-rin would not feel left out. So that Cheon Yo-hwa would not explode. So that Lee Ha-yul would not be shunned. So that Sim Ah-ryeon or Oh Dok-seo would not grow lonely.

Oh Dok-seo once said that the nerves and clashes inside the Alliance were as nasty as a hardcore soap opera.

Yet Do-hwa was doing it, as if a difficulty of that level could not hinder her once she made up her mind.

Compared with leading the National Road Management Corps and ruling a ruined peninsula, it was child's play.

Effortlessly.

"Huh. You keep staring at me, Mr. Undertaker."

Noh Do-hwa leaned over the table, wiped my mouth with her thumb.

"You had chocolate on your lips."

"Ah."

"You said you would patrol the Void this afternoon, right? Please be careful."

She playfully licked her finger and smiled.

"While you are gone, I will guard the city and the towns."

Time passed.

Everything was perfect.

Dang Seo-rin had joined the Regressor Alliance at last, and I no longer had to tiptoe around using her as an asset.

Impossible.

The constant friction between Seo-rin and Yo-hwa, for some reason, vanished. They were not friends but they recognised and understood each other. Noh Do-hwa always smiled between them.

Impossible.

Sim Ah-ryeon, who had once viewed other people like dust, learned bit by bit how to draw near. Oh Dok-seo later told me Noh Do-hwa had worked to exhibit Ah-ryeon's paintings.

Impossible.

Lee Ha-yul opened her guarded heart not only to me but to Noh Do-hwa. It was natural. Do-hwa had fitted her with a prosthetic leg, and if that same woman spoke with warmth, how could a girl who had always wanted family refuse.

Impossible.

"Wow, mister, I feel really happy these days."

"…"

"People don't fight, the Alliance unnies get along great. Even ones who used to clash fatally are fine now. This has to be a miracle, right?"

Everything was perfect.

Time flowed.

The day the Monster Wave smothered the last human stronghold,

Dang Seo-rin was there, Cheon Yo-hwa was there, everyone was there.

They met death, yet it was hard to find unhappiness on their faces.

Humans may not live forever, but if they die with those they love they accept the end with humility.

The lines broke and broke again, and at last we fell back to the roof of the Tower of Babel, the last barricade.

“Ah.”

“…”

“They have all gone ahead, Mr. Undertaker.”

Only Noh Do-hwa remained beside me.

Naturally. She had no fighting strength, yet she was too valuable to lose, so she had stayed in the safest rear.

With clothes torn here and there she smiled faintly.

“Still, I did not see how the other runs ended, but… these days felt very happy.”

“Is that so?”

My voice rasped out thin. I could not help it.

To seal Leviathan we had to suppress aura as much as possible.

Even without that handicap the Wave had been close to impossible. With aura sealed, clearing that nightmare was beyond hard.

“Were you happy, Ms. Do-hwa?”

“Yes.”

The answer came at once.

“I met precious people.”

Still smiling, she pressed her right hand to her chest, as if to prove it with the beat of her heart.

“In a world this broken there are still those who fight for themselves and for someone else, and… I met the man I love, and I can die with him.”

“…”

“Mr. Undertaker.”

She opened her eyes wide.

“Were you happy too?”

Silence.

Boom, boom, behind the steel door the flesh of monsters pounded without end.

“…”

This was the last moment.

We were holding thanks to the puppet strings Ha-yul had set at the cost of her life, but soon they would break through.

“I have thought about it constantly.”

I spoke.

“Yes?”

“The turning point. When you accepted that strange message from the elder twin.”

“…”

“What words did Cheon Yo-hwa use, and why did you decide on a fake relationship with me. I could never understand, so for decades I kept wondering.”

“Hmm.”

She tilted her head.

“Is it that hard? I like you. I love you. I kept pretending not to, then her message provoked me, became the trigger, and we started dating.”

“…”

“The fake part is only the label. We pretend but our feelings are real, we grow closer, truly fall in love… It happens a lot, does it not?”

Perhaps.

The past decades, the thousandth cycle, had been sweet enough to tempt me to that mistake.

“No.”

But a good chocolate cake always hides bitterness at its core, and at the centre of every photo titled Happiness Noh Do-hwa was smiling.

“Director Noh Do-hwa. All you care about is wounding me.”

“…”

“Your reason is noble, but your emotions are trash. Calling you scum is not enough.”

Boom. The door quivered.

“Why, why say such things now? Even I, if the one I love says that, i-it hurts—”

“You admit I am a fine person. I thank you. But you did not join me to see the world grow bright.”

“Sorry? I don’t—”

“You want to witness the moment I break.”

“…”

Screech. Something scraped the door. A claw, or teeth.

“When you read the word Yo-hwa sent, you asked yourself.”

Q. How do you leave the deepest scar on the Undertaker?

“A simple bad ending? Too weak. I have seen too many stupid deaths.”

A. Think the opposite.

“So, give the regressor who chants happy endings the greatest happy ending imaginable.”

“…”

A happy ending.

Seo-rin and Cheon Yo-hwa no longer fight.

Ha-yul is not lonely.

Ah-ryeon, Ji-won, Dok-seo, all of them share time with me thanks to a perfect schedule.

“You showed me I can always reach the path closest to everyone’s happiness.”

“…”

“As long as one person, Director Noh Do-hwa, bears all the unhappiness.”

Noh Do-hwa had been indifferent to people. She broke that and forced herself to mediate.

She had cared nothing for clothes. She studied fashion, dressed up for me.

She never shared emotions. She cast aside her monopoly so everyone could share my time.

By carving away her own nature she produced one result, the Alliance's happiness.

"And you…"

"I?"

"You led me to become trash who feels joy in that artificial ending."

"Oh dear, you think I have such vile aims?"

"Yes."

"Then all the more, answer my question."

She looked at me.

"Mr. Undertaker, are you happy now?"

Creak, the door bent. Tentacles of flesh oozed through.

"No."

"Oh my."

"I dislike the you before me. Director Noh Do-hwa does not say 'oh my', she does not smile like that."

"Goodness."

"The person I trusted to guard the towns while I was away does not have such a clean smile. I did not admire her because she was perfect, but because although she was trash who always grumbled, she never dodged her duty."

"My."

"I dislike you."

"Ummm."

She smiled.

"Was I dumped just now?"

“Yes.”

“Ah, how sad. I really liked you. I worked so, so hard to make you happy.”

“…”

“I ran the organisation. I managed the relationships. I handled two missions nobody else could do. And yet you prefer—”

She stepped closer.

“Someone trashier than someone this perfect?”

“Yes.”

“I see.”

She covered my eyes with a hand and darkness fell.

“Close your eyes, Mr. Undertaker.”

“…”

“And turn on Mind Reading.”

Mind Reading. An ability I rarely used, especially on comrades. She had once begged me never to use it on her. Why ask now?

“Is it on?”

“…Yes.”

“Then listen to my last confession.”

Blackness behind my eyelids, her hand blocking sight.

“Mr. Undertaker.”

Amid the noise of monsters squeezing through the crack, her whisper.

[Awakener Undertaker.]

And the white letters Mind Reading drew.

“I was happy.”

[I was miserable.]

“…”

“There were hard times, but watching you and your friends grow closer was a great reward.”

[It was revolting.]

Whispered sounds, silent monologue, two lines tightening around my heart.

“Even though you rejected my love, I have no regrets.”

[In all these decades there was not a single moment for my own wish. You dragged my life into yours.]

“You must be confused. Your comrades are all gone.”

[I knew this ending from the start.]

“So, please remember.”

[Do not forget this moment.]

“I will always exist as your answer.”

[Do not forget that happiness for all is impossible.]

“If you wish, I will stay and help everyone get along.”

[Did you hope you could choose everyone and me at once?]

“I love you.”

[I hate only you.]

At that instant my lips were sealed. A kiss stuffed with lies.

[Do not breathe.]

Her voice faded, only thoughts burned white.

[No, breathe only the air I exhale.]

“…”

Strangely, I thought I heard her soft laughter.

[Remember with that clever head.]

[This is your thousandth ending.]

After that I recall little. Until my breath stopped I stayed in darkness. Perhaps I suffocated though her hands were not on my throat. Perhaps the door burst and the monsters devoured us in an instant.

Yet with extraordinary memory I could never forget the first cause that led here.

– If you date me, from that moment every word and act of mine will be a lie.

The fact that I nodded, that I accepted it with my own body, must be blamed.

Therefore, my thousandth cause of death was suicide.

Footnotes:

Chapter 393

The Bereaved I

Sinnoa

Now, the time to speak about Go Yuri is finally drawing near.

Yet before we can reach that point there are still a few unavoidable steps we have to tread.

For example,

an older sister and a younger sister,

twin shrine maidens,

the self-proclaimed Yo-hwa Yo-hwa☆Sisters.

"…"

Someone who, although it was a lie, once tried out a "happy ending" in the previous episode.

Someone who watched that manufactured happy ending with faint dissatisfaction until the very end.

The elder sister who was trapped inside stopped time.

The younger sister who was set adrift in the flow of hours.

Let us tell their story.

Imagine for a second what sort of news would leave an ordinary person most bewildered if it landed out of nowhere.

"Aliens have invaded." After the apocalypse modern humanity has suffered, aliens are hardly fresh news.

People at the market would simply nod "Well, that can happen," then turn back to arguing over fruit prices.

That very spirit of “Well, that can happen” is the slogan that defines our era.

Humankind wiped out, could happen. A staircase you never built appears in your house, could happen.

You step into an elevator and every button reads 4F—what, you rode an elevator without thinking in this day and age? Then just die.

Exactly.

The Babylonian proverb “Kids these days have no sense” has, after four thousand years, finally taken its first loss.

By now it is almost impossible for any ordinary incident to punch through a modern mind’s armour or topple that “could happen” attitude.

“Yo-hwa, there’s something I need to confess.”

“Ah, is this finally the moment you confess your love for me? I… I am ready, teacher!”

“The truth is, you have an older sister you cannot remember. A twin, in fact.

Your name is the same, Cheon Yo-hwa, the Chinese characters differ a bit.

Your sister was caught in a Time Seal, so from your end the memories became things that never existed.

Sejong City is stable now and the northern front is quiet, so I thought this would be a good time for us to go and meet her.”

“…”

One second. Two. Three. Four.

“Huh?”

The sound effect that plays whenever Cheon Yo-hwa's mental defence wall is breached is a faint "Huh."

And thus the regressor gained yet another fragment of knowledge about the world.

Experience Points up—Level up.

"Teacher, what kind of nonsense is that?"

"…"

Experience Points revoked.

Cheon Yo-hwa written 天寥化 and Cheon Yo-hwa written 千謠話—hang on.

Because the two names sound identical, it is terribly confusing to anyone listening.

Putting Chinese characters every time is tiresome, so from now on I will call the elder sister "Cheon-hwa" and the younger one simply "Yo-hwa."

Cheon-hwa and Yo-hwa.

A spur-of-the-moment idea, but it works rather well.

Anyway, about my Separated Family Reunion project, here is what the elder twin—the strategist caught in a Time Seal, the girl who mangles polite and casual speech at will, a heavy dopamine addict—Cheon-hwa had to say.

"Er, I would drop it if I were you, Sunbae."

Rather unexpectedly, she shot the idea down without hesitation.

"Why?"

"Hmm-mm." Cheon-hwa smiled vaguely.

“From my angle the real mystery is why sunbae thinks reuniting us is a good idea.”

“Because you are family.” My brows knit.

“To the younger sister, her twin vanished without warning. Seeing each other again would help.”

“Hmm-mm, I am not so sure.”

“Well, of course I would love it if my kid sister got over her trauma and came all the way here to greet me. I do love her to bits, I am her big sister after all.”

“Oh, I knew it.”

“But Sunbae, is the Yo-hwa we have now mature enough to accept me?”

I tilted my head.

“Mature? Does a reunion between sisters require maturity?”

“I have been trapped in this classroom by the Time Seal, so I have no idea what is happening outside.”

She looked toward the window.

“All I can do is inhale the information you bring me like oxygen and deduce the situation beyond.”

“I know.”

“So I can only imagine with my head how frightened my cute little sister must be.”

She pulled her legs up onto the desk and hugged her knees.

“You know, Sunbae, the Yo-hwa I remember was always as fresh as a spring breeze.”

“She still is.”

“She never burned with jealousy, never fought to prove herself, never wore a perfect smile while something inside her died.”

“…”

“Yo-hwa with a sister and Yo-hwa without a sister are very different people.”

Family, however close or distant, shapes a person deeply, and for twins that influence is beyond dispute.

“My sister and I were born twisted, so if anybody had mental shadows, it was me.”

“…”

“Meanwhile she is the textbook picture of mental health—jealousy, grudges, gloom, she fixes those with a game of basketball and a nap.”

Sometimes I wondered how such an angel was born into a family as crooked as ours.

“That,” I said carefully, “does not match the student-council president I know.”

Her bright smile faded into bitterness.

“Sunbae, I have no regrets about the Time Seal. It is the correct answer, the only clear route.”

“Is that so.”

“Yes. Waking up to find you here like today even makes me happy. But when it comes to my sister… I am not confident.”

The wind through the window ruffled her hair, and for the first time I saw her unsure of herself.

The regressor’s advantage is that, no matter the failure, we can keep pressing the retry button.

“Yeah, I am not confident, but like you said, Sunbae, it is worth a shot.”

The amnesiac’s advantage is that the scars of failure never last more than twenty-four hours.

“Even if it fails my day always resets, so I can just keep at it until it works.”

“The outside might stabilise more later, but if I sit on my hands I doubt my sister’s mind will heal by itself.”

“Then this too is a strategy.”

Right, retry and scar immunity meshed and set the gears of time turning.

“I am sorry, Sunbae. You already saved her once, but please, help my sister one more time.”

“Do not worry. The fee was already paid in advance as your tutoring bill.”

“Ahaha, right, my tuition was steep.”

Clap—a high five.

“Yay, Yo-hwa Yo-hwa☆Sisters reboot, Separated Family Reunion Project, begin!”

“Alright, for my precious students who give me headaches just by existing, I will give it a go.”

And then it went to ruin magnificently.

The start was not bad.

Even though the cliché “You have hidden blood relations” briefly possessed Yo-hwa with the soul of SG Man, her trust in Teacher had long since passed one hundred percent.

With calm explanation her horror began to thaw.

"…Well, Teacher, you do have the Time Seal ability, and you would never feed me nonsense. Hmm."

"Then will you meet her?"

"Hmm. Yes. But to be honest, it feels completely unreal."

She tilted her head at an awkward rhythm.

"The world has gotten so weird I let most things slide with a 'could happen,' but this is unbelievable. A twin sister? Me? Then she was supposed to inherit our order?"

"We will unravel all that when you meet."

"Hmm, alright."

I led her to the rooftop of the Tower of Babel. At the centre, as always, sat the crystal stele.

"Cheon-hwa!"

I stuck only my right foot through the invisible boundary, poking my head inside. Yo-hwa's hand was still in mine, so she could not yet enter the Time Seal.

"Eh, Sunbae?"

"Why are you coming in like that?"

"I brought your sister."

"Huh?"

"I struck a deal with yesterday's you. Let's meet her."

"What? Ah, ah, wait, I am not ready!"

Crash, thump.

She nearly fell over a desk, frantically checking her clothes and hair.

“Is my hair sticking up?”

“No sister on Earth fusses over hair to meet her sister. Just meet her.”

“Aah… I always kept the brand of a dignified, unreadable, therefore admirable big sister!”

“…”

“Um, Teacher,” came a voice from behind me, beyond the translucent door only I could see.

“Huh?”

“Forgive me, but you keep shouting by yourself. Are you alright?”

“Cheon Yo-hwa, because of your namesake I am about to look insane in front of my student!”

“Ye-yes?”

“No, not you, Yo-hwa. Cheon-hwa, big sister, I am coming in!”

“Aaah, the dignity I tended all my life…”

Since the very idea of a twin who worries about such dignity is anomalous, I pulled Yo-hwa in without hesitation.

A short “Ah—” and tap—

Just like that, the heel of the younger sister’s shoe touched the elder’s classroom floor.

“…”

“…”

Their eyes met.

Two people utterly identical except that one uniform was white and the other black, both wearing the same orange ponytail and the same crimson eyes.

“…Welcome, my sister.”

A breeze blew in through the window.

This Divine Realm is entirely under Cheon-hwa’s control, so the open window, the perfect timing of the breeze, the gust that tousled her hair, and the way she swept it aside were all handmade touches.

“Congratulations,” she said, smiling like a mastermind.

“To transcend the fetters of fate, to cross the boundary of time, and to arrive at this promised spot at last. I, Cheon Yo-hwa written as the lonely empty sky, greet you, my one and only sister.”

“…”

Ah, that sort of roleplay.

Footnotes:

Chapter 394

The Bereaved II

Sinnoa

For a moment, let's add a single, cruel thought to the mix.

I want you to think of someone very precious to you.

It could be your mother. It could be your father. It could be a lover. It could even be a pet.

It doesn't matter if you don't have such a precious person.

No. In fact, for the simulation we're about to try, it might be more fitting if you don't have a precious person.

– Ah, seriously! Unni!

It is enough to simply posit the hypothetical existence of 'someone incredibly precious to me'.

– I told you not to steal my clothes! I haven't even had a chance to wear that yet!

– They say wearing new clothes right away is bad for you because of all the chemicals on them, little sis. Your amazing older sister, in her infinite concern for your health, has graciously tested it for you first, just like a royal food taster.

– Die!

Your life story is so intertwined with that precious someone that you couldn't possibly write your biography without them.

Laughing. Fighting. Glaring. Apologizing.

Cursing. Blaming yourself. Trusting. Waiting for them.

Through that someone, you learned how to be ‘human’. You learned emotions. You practiced how to interact with people.

Thanks to them, you became human.

– I’m so glad you’re my unni. To think… that I have someone in my family I can talk to like this, even about our parents. I think it’s a blessing.

– Yeah. Me too.

– If, by any chance, I get dragged away by that god… help me, unni. I’ll help you too, no matter what happens.

– Okay.

Then one morning, you wake up, and that ‘someone’ is no longer by your side.

– ...?

A strange feeling.

It feels like you’ve left something behind somewhere.

– Huh?

They are no longer there.

If it was your mother, it’s as if you never had a mother to begin with. If it was a lover, you’ve never experienced such a love. If it was a pet, that child had never once climbed onto your back.

– …

It is empty.

A void.

This world, this universe, has lost something precious called the laws of physics. And you have just lost something a little more precious than that.

Even so, the world keeps moving, and you are still left there.

– …Ugh? What is it? I feel like I forgot something.

– Pre-President!

– Hm?

– Thank goodness! President, the school has gotten really, um, strange! We can't even get past the school gate. And all the teachers have disappeared!

– Whoa, whoa, hold on! Calm down! Everyone, take a deep breath in! And out. Yes, yes, in and out. Good. Calm down and speak one at a time.

– Sob. Well, you see….

As the world's time flows on and your own life remains, you have no choice but to keep living.

But then, it suddenly hits you.

While walking down a long, straight hallway, for no reason at all, a reason you yourself could never figure out, you turn around.

– …

Me.

What did I leave behind there?

– President?

– Oh, uh, yeah! Sorry. I just had a strange feeling for a second. Let's go! Let's find the other kids!

– Yes! Waaah. Really, I'm so glad you're here, President!

– Ahaha…

Why is it?

– …

This.

It feels like this isn't my life.

The reunion with the twin sisters… nearly ended in disaster.

“Ahahaha! Really—?”

“Hey, I’m serious. Ahaha.”

Unlike the older sister, who was a hikikomori of legendary proportions (having been trapped by Time Seal and left all alone in the classroom for eternity, she was effectively the world’s greatest loner), the younger sister was, thankfully, a complete social butterfly. The very epitome of an ENFP.

She had mastered that special magic exclusive to social butterflies, turning the momentarily frigid air into a soft spring breeze as if by a lie.

Oh, for the record, the older sister who made a mess of her first impression was classified as an INFJ. Since her personality type will never be mentioned again before the story ends, I’ll just get it out of the way here.

Even though a catastrophe had occurred, much like an otaku trying to make a deep impression on a blind date and instead leaving a very deep impression in a different sense, the younger of the twin sisters, Yo-hwa, skillfully performed a stunt called ‘getting close to someone you just met’.

“For some reason, from the moment I saw you, Teacher, I felt this incredible sense of familiarity. And, wow. So you were our tutor even before we met at Baekhwa Girls' High!”

“Yep, yep.”

“But why does unni call you Sunbae?”

“Ah. I was planning on getting into Seoul National University too. Since we were going to be senior and junior in a few years anyway, I just decided to start calling him Sunbae. That's how we settled on the title.”

“Wow. You must have been really good at studying.”

“Well, well. Studying is a piece of cake! Ahem.”

Hmm.

I had been watching the reunion of the separated sisters with a nervous heart, but….

‘This is surprisingly okay, isn’t it?’

Just then, my eyes met Cheon-hwa’s.

From an angle her sister couldn't see, she clenched her fist and mouthed ‘Nice!’. I found myself responding in kind.

“So, so. Yo-hwa, you won’t remember this, but when I was teaching you two, we used to wander through a secret passage in your house and stuff—”

“Heeeh.”

“And then! Sunbae—”

Cheon-hwa chattered on, unusually excited like a child. Yo-hwa played along, chiming in enthusiastically.

A contented smile naturally formed on my lips.

‘Well, they were such close twin sisters, so even if she lost her memories because of the [Time Seal], their basic human compatibility wouldn't just disappear…’

A mold grew in the cracks of my thoughts.

It was a sense of unease.

‘…Hm? Wait. How would I know how close the two of them were?’

This was the first time in my entire long life as a regressor that I had seen Cheon-hwa and Yo-hwa laughing and chatting together like this.

In other words, I had no clues or evidence to know anything about the two sisters' relationship.

It was only natural.

So why did I?

"Our family is the absolute worst, isn't it?"

"Ah, for real! You really can't understand it unless you're born as the successor to a pseudo-religious cult!"

"Right, right. I mean, what kind of parents mess with their daughters' names, planning to offer them as sacrifices? Did you know? We actually have different names officially registered at the government office. It was just within the family and the cult that we were both called Cheon Yo-hwa…"

"Wow. No way."

"We would've known sooner if we'd gotten our ID cards. They probably hid those from us too. Ah."

Poke, poke.

Cheon-hwa, with a mischievous, playful smile, nudged my ribs with her elbow.

"Sunbae, you probably know our other names, don't you? You know. When you were working with Grandpa Schopenhauer, you dug through all the government records."

"Who knows. I wasn't paying special attention to you two back then."

"Aww. But you could find out if you tried. Sunbae, please look it up for me! I don't particularly dislike my name, but I'm just curious to hear what it is. You never know. It might be something like Bok-ja or Gil-ja.”

“That does sound interesting.”

“Right? I’m Cheon Bok-ja. Ahahaha.”

It was then that I suddenly realized.

The classroom had gotten a little quiet.

Specifically, Yo-hwa. The younger sister had suddenly stopped talking.

“Ahaha…?”

“Hm?”

We both turned our heads at the same time.

And we saw.

“…”

From Yo-hwa’s face.

All expression had vanished.

She was just silently staring this way… in the direction where Cheon-hwa and I were sitting, with a blank look.

“Uh.”

Flinch.

Both Cheon-hwa and I were at a loss for words.

In the red eyes watching us, there was a vinyl-like film that seemed impossible for any wings to penetrate.

They resembled the eyes of a reptile.

“…”

“…”

Silence.

The thread of conversation was unnaturally torn, and a stillness continued.

Both Cheon-hwa and I had good instincts. While we pretended to be logical at a glance, in reality, we often relied on our gut feelings.

That was why we kept our mouths shut.

Like an insect. Because it knows that if it moves now, the lizard over there will react.

“Hey.”

After about 90 seconds of silence, Yo-hwa’s lips parted.

“Are you two close?”

“Yes! No!”

Cheon-hwa answered instantly.

“I-I’m not close with Sunbae! We’re mortal enemies! I really hate him! We’re always just looking for a chance to stab each other in the back! Right, Sunbae?!”

“Ah, ah. Besides, I’m not even 100% sure if this thing is a human or an anomaly. From my perspective, she’s not trustworthy at all. A self-proclaimed strategist? A schemer? She seems eager to brand her own character, but it just comes off as sinister.”

“See! He hurts people’s feelings just like that, without a second thought! Would close friends do this to each other? Huh? Aah- this is the worst. My youth was wasted because a person like this was my tutor. Yep, yep. It would have been better if I never knew!”

“I probably only taught her for the money. In my heart, my only true disciple was always you, Yo-hwa.”

“Die! Sunbae! Please just die!”

“You die. No, you’re already dead, so please just delete your very existence.”

“See!”

“We’re—”

“Not close at all!”

“…”

Silence. Ninety seconds again.

“Hmph.”

More silence. Thirty seconds added.

“Your hair. Dye it.”

This time, it was our turn to be silent.

Only, the meaning of our silence was quite different. It was because we couldn't easily decipher the meaning of her demand, the words that had popped out of her lips.

“Huh? What are you talking about, Yo-hwa? Dyeing?”

“…”

Yo-hwa didn’t answer. She didn’t even shift her gaze. She was looking at her ‘unni’ from the same unmoving angle as before.

“Ah.”

Cheon-hwa sighed in resignation.

“Yeah, I see. I get it.”

What could she possibly have gotten?

Cheon-hwa got up from her desk and walked to the blackboard.

Then she picked up the blackboard eraser and, out of nowhere, started rubbing it on her own hair.

Thump. Thump. Thump. Thump.

In the desolate classroom, only the sound of the blackboard eraser striking not the blackboard, but Cheon-hwa's hair, drifted down.

It was such a sudden, bizarre act.

I tried to approach her, but, squeeze.

Yo-hwa's fingers, which had been interlocked with mine since we entered the [Time Seal] classroom, stopped me.

"…"

It was a grip of negligible strength, but for that very reason, it was a pull I couldn't break free from.

While I was frozen, Cheon-hwa's hair had become caked in white chalk powder.

As the powder scattered in all directions, Cheon-hwa turned to look this way.

"Is this okay? Or… more?"

"Yes."

"Okay. I get it."

Rustle. Cheon-hwa undid her hair tie.

And with that, the ponytail that was as good as the sisters' trademark, vanished.

I couldn't understand.

"Sorry."

What was even harder to understand was that the older sister, Cheon-hwa, who had covered her own hair in chalk powder, dirtied her neat black school uniform, and let her hair down, bowed her head deeply.

“I am an anomaly.”

“…”

“The truth is, I’m the god your family, the Cheon Yo-hwa family, used to worship. An Outer God. The mastermind. But to entice the Undertaker, I’m mimicking your appearance, pretending to be human. A kind of doppelgänger.”

“…”

“I’m sorry for invading your space without permission.”

Cheon-hwa kept her head, now powdered white, bowed low.

“I won’t ask you to forgive me. But there are two points I’d like you to consider from my perspective. Will you hear me out?”

“Say them.”

“First. I am an anomaly that has been afflicted by [Time Seal]. So, when a day passes, I forget everything that happened today. You can assume it’s nearly impossible for the Undertaker and me to build memories together.”

“And?”

“Second. The Undertaker will never, ever confuse a creepy anomaly like me with you. I’m sorry, but the one who is confused is you.”

“…”

“The one who’s anxious is also you. It’s brazen of me to say this when I’m the one who caused the confusion, but no matter how much an anomaly like me imitates you, you will never be replaced by ‘me’ in the Undertaker’s heart. Please believe me.”

“Change it, then.”

Flinch. Cheon-hwa's shoulders, her head still bowed, tensed slightly.

"…Sorry. I can't change my appearance."

"Why not?"

"I just…. Can't."

"You said you were a doppelgänger?"

"I'm sorry. I really can't. It's beyond my ability. It's because I'm an incompetent person, no. An incompetent anomaly."

"You said you were an Outer God?"

"I was sealed. The me right now is just a trace left by the Outer God, nothing more than a shadow. I'm sorry."

"Hmph."

Yo-hwa tilted her head.

"Then you can change your name, can't you?"

"…"

"Mastermind, that's good. Your clothes are black, too. From now on, I'd like you to use the name Mastermind, not Cheon Yo-hwa."

TL/N: The word for Mastermind can also be "Black Veil", hence the black clothes.

"Okay. I will."

Creeeak.

Outside the classroom. The trees and flowers of the four seasons that had adorned the windows all withered at once.

The bark on the birch trees split, and from the cracks, black blood gushed out.

"But like I said, I'm a mayfly. Even the thought that I changed my name will be reset when midnight passes.”

“…”

“So you don’t need to worry about someone like me. Cheon Yo-hwa. A mayfly that doesn’t exist in the world anyway, that won’t exist in the future, and that won’t be able to leave anything behind. That’s what I am.”

“I see.”

“Yes.”

“Okay.”

Scrape, Yo-hwa pushed back her chair and stood up.

“Let’s go then! Teacher!”

Yo-hwa, who said that while looking at me, had a wide smile on her face, a smile without a single trace of shadow.

“Ahyoo. Really! I don’t know why I get so tangled up with doppelgänger-type anomalies.”

“…”

“You remember, Teacher, at Baekhwa Girls’ High? When we were isolated in the student council room all winter. Back then, too, a doppelgänger was the one who remained until the very end, wasn’t it.”

“…That’s right.”

Or perhaps.

——To subjugate the Outer God sleeping at Baekhwa Girls’ High, it wasn’t just Yo-hwa and me, but there was actually one more mischievous ‘someone’ by our side.

——So in the student council room, where the electric stove let off wisps of steam, there wasn’t the warmth of two people, but actually three.

——And by that someone being deleted, they might have been forcibly replaced by the anomaly called a doppelgänger.

It's just that I had resolved myself to the latter.

And the Yo-hwa before me had simply decided on the former.

'Ah.'

Only then could I truly feel how cruel my authority, the ability called [Time Seal], was.

As a regressor, 'I' could accept it.

Because I had been given enough time, over many regressions, to choose whether the being before me was an anomaly or a human.

But it wasn't the same for other people.

To even her own family, who must have been the closest and dearest to her, the being before her could only be seen as an 'anomaly'.

There was no choice in the first place.

Because they weren't even given a chance to understand what time and what path led to this situation.

'I see. Is this the epilogue I have to face?'

It was quite a harsh story.

"It was a bit bizarre, but it was a pretty interesting experience. Ehehe. Teacher! I've completely cleared my schedule for today, so let's hurry and go get something to eat!"

Even as I was led out of the classroom by Yo-hwa's hand, all the while.

Cheon-hwa just kept her head bowed.

“…”

Yes. To reveal it now.

This was a story about a person who lost someone precious due to [Time Seal].

Footnotes:

Chapter 395

The Bereaved III

Sinnoa

Everything in the world has its pros and cons.

The pros.

The advantage of the regressor, me, the Undertaker, was being able to roll the dice again and ‘retry’ at any time.

The advantage of the amnesiac, Cheon-hwa, was her ‘trauma immunity,’ where she could simply forget, even if she failed.

However.

“Oh? Yo-hwa. What are you doing here...”

“Ah, Teacher! I’ve, uh, decided to open a Baekhwa Girls’ High branch school in Busan, starting today!”

“A branch school?”

“Yes! Ahaha, it’s nothing too grand. I just talked to the leader of the National Road Management Corps and I’m planning to put up a temporary building, just a student council room, on a corner of the Tower of Babel rooftop!”

“...”

Every advantage, when turned upside down, was bound to become a disadvantage.

“But… Yo-hwa.”

“Yes!”

“This is difficult for me to bring up, but...”

“Aww, come on, you know the relationship between us. You can say anything to me, Teacher!”

“About the temporary building that’s under construction. The spot where the container box is supposed to go is, from my perspective, exactly where the crystal gravestone of the [Time Seal] is.”

“Oh? Oooh, was it?”

“Yes. I’m sorry, but would it be okay if you built the temporary building a little to the side, not right here?”

“Hmmmm.”

“…”

“Why? Teacher?”

The cons.

Until he rolled the dice again, until he reset the regression, the regressor was bound to be followed by the traces of his failures.

The amnesiac was given the compulsion of having to accept only the results of failure, without even the awareness that she had failed.

“I can’t see it. And I don’t particularly want to see it, but if you must visit, Teacher, you can just come into the student council room, right? I’m always welcome to have you!”

“…”

“Ah. For the time being, I plan to stay here at the Busan branch rather than the Sejong main campus because of various work. Hehe. Please visit often, Teacher!”

Yo-hwa’s red eyes were smiling.

——Access has been denied.

I was Yo-hwa’s teacher. We had even spent several years alone together inside the barrier of Infinite Void.

Naturally, I could read the hidden undertones in my lovely disciple's smiling eyes as if they were in the palm of my hand.

Just now, I had been forbidden from meeting with 'Cheon-hwa' at all.

That night.

[The prevailing reaction inside Baekhwa Girls' High is also confusion.]

I immediately tried to contact the Saintess. To grasp the situation.

"You don't mean to say this was the student council president's… Yo-hwa's, unilateral decision?"

[Yes. The vice president and the secretary, the other executives of Baekhwa Girls' High, didn't know.]

[Yesterday, Ms. Yo-hwa suddenly met with Ms. Noh Do-hwa alone and struck a deal.]

[Ms. Noh Do-hwa was also puzzled, but she gave her the container since it would be irrational to antagonize Baekhwa Girls' High over just giving up a corner of the Tower of Babel rooftop.]

It was fast. Excessively so.

The member of the Regression Alliance who had always been the fastest in judgment and action was Yo-hwa.

She was different from her older sister, who constantly calculated variables from behind the scenes to weave an epic saga of grand strategy.

The younger of the twin sisters created her plans the moment a strategy was established, or in real-time after diving into the battlefield.

To put it one way, she was the action leader.

My failure to consider that characteristic of Yo-hwa's was my fatal mistake.

In less than 24 hours, the rooftop of the Tower was under the surveillance of the Baekhwa Girls' High student council president.

When Yo-hwa was an ally, it was an incredibly reassuring advantage, like when she came as reinforcements during the Leviathan subjugation.

But in a situation like this, it felt as if my own breathing room was slowly being choked off.

"What is Yo-hwa doing now?"

[She's on the rooftop. She's been there the whole time.]

"..."

[She's continuously exchanging messages with the Baekhwa Girls' High guild members in Sejong through me.]

[This is just my personal judgment, but.]

[I think Ms. Yo-hwa really intends to stay at the Tower of Babel alone for the time being.]

[Um, Mr. Undertaker.]

[What on earth happened inside the Time Seal?]

"..."

A reversed scale.

A person's heart is covered in invisible scales, and among them exists one that grows in the opposite direction.

"…I'm sorry. If Yo-hwa happens to leave her post, please let me know right away."

[Yes. I will.]

What exactly one's own reversed scale is.

It was common for not only others but even the person themself to not know. Some people lived their entire lives without ever realizing it.

For Yo-hwa, that reversed scale was the existence of the twin sister she had already lost.

[I'm sorry, Mr. Undertaker.]

[I tried summoning her to the meeting room through Ms. Noh Do-hwa, and I've tried various other means, but Ms. Yo-hwa isn't budging at all.]

[Rather, she… doesn't seem to trust my words.]

[I think she was convinced from the very beginning that I was scheming to lure her somewhere else.]

"…"

[The only time Ms. Yo-hwa moves from the rooftop is when she goes out somewhere with you, Mr. Undertaker.]

Warning.

The sound of a low-quality siren flickered in my head.

"Hehe. It's so nice to be walking around the city with you like this, Teacher! Hwaa, I really wish I had settled down in Busan instead of Sejong..."

"But the Inunaki Tunnel is there, isn't it."

"Mm, yes. Still! Please understand the heart of a disciple who wants to be as close to her Teacher as possible!"

"Then how about moving into my guild hideout and living there?"

"Ah."

"Ah-ryeon does that all the time anyway. Except when she's working in Pyongyang, she's cooped up in a corner of the hideout all day. There's always a guest room ready for you."

"Ugh! Wh, what a sweet offer…! My, my heart is pounding like crazy... What should I do, Teacher?"

"What do you mean, what should you do. Just come in with the feeling of having another vacation home――"

"Do you want to meet her that badly?"

"..."

"Why? Teacher. I'm right here, aren't I?"

"..."

"That's cheap."

"..."

"I keep regretting that I was too far away recently. Sim Ah-ryeon is much farther, working in Pyongyang. I also went to help as reinforcements whenever the northern front was in danger. It's a little, cheap."

Warning.

Yo-hwa wasn't the only case of someone losing a family member to [Time Seal].

A long time ago, in an episode dealing with the football player Kim Joo-chul, his son Kim Si-eun had been mentioned.

As a result of his father's existence being erased and distorted from the very beginning, Kim Si-eun ended up living a life of traveling all over the country.

This was that kind of era. Traveling was synonymous with suicide, and Kim Si-eun, not content with just the country, even crossed over to the Japanese archipelago.

As if he were desperately searching for something.

Kim Si-eun never loved his father, the football player Kim Joo-chul.

Kim Joo-chul was a casino addict. Unable to forget his past glory, he wielded violence and abuse against his family.

That kind of human.

Even though he only lost that kind of family member, his son Kim Si-eun's life was decisively changed.

It happened even when losing a family member you didn't love.

…In the case of losing a family member you loved more than anyone, to what extent would the remaining person's life be twisted?

"Teacher?"

"Teacher."

Warning.

Nevertheless, I trusted my disciple and believed that the problem could be solved through conversation.

Giving up was always the easiest solution. It was also a stopgap measure. Therefore, I attempted to talk.

"Ahaha."

"So.... what is it?"

"That I have a twin sister."

"And that unni liked you so, so much. That she was willing to offer her very soul to save the world with you."

"And on top of that, if everything happened according to unni's plan. That means she's an incredibly-incredibly, incredibly smart person, doesn't it?"

“What is that! Ahaha.”

I attempted to talk.

“I can’t do something like that. Ugh, I could throw away my life for you a hundred, a thousand times, any number of times, but—”

“To calculate hundreds of regressions as variables and weave a plan with your own life. I don’t have that kind of brain, you know?”

“She looks just like me.”

“Her voice is the same too.”

“Her scent, it’s the same too.”

“That means she’s so much smarter than me, right?”

I attempted to talk,

“So that’s why you’re drawn to ‘that thing’, Teacher.”

“What do you call this? Hmm, there was a specific term for it. Ah. That’s right! A superior version! That’s what you call this, right? Ahaha.”

“Hmm. I don’t dislike being challenged like this. In fact, I like it. Because I can prove myself by fighting. But.... she’s not here, is she?”

“She doesn’t exist in this reality.”

“She’s dead more certainly than death itself.”

“So, what do I fight with? How do I fight?”

“Don’t you think that’s cheap?”

The attempt.

“So what am I supposed to feel?”

“A sense of apology for not even realizing my family sacrificed themselves for you and the world? Sadness for losing my unni?"

"Am I in a situation where I have to feel sorry and sad for a family I've never even had?"

"Isn't it the opposite?"

"I'd like it if you apologized. To me."

Warning.

"It doesn't end just because you got her consent, Teacher. It means I was there too. But unlike you, I'm not a regressor, and I don't have Complete Memory, so there's no way for me to get my memories back."

"She disappears on her own terms, and now she expects me to just accept it on her own terms?"

"If I acknowledge her on top of you, that thing, she'll really become my 'unni'."

"I don't want that."

"You're the worst kind of person."

"Cheon Yo-hwa is me. Teacher.... Yes, that's right, isn't it?"

Warning.

"Look. Teacher. This is Busan. The city you protected. The town."

"I'm the only one who can walk here, holding your hand like this. The real Cheon Yo-hwa, you know? Not some illusion that only exists in that creepy classroom."

"Your hand.... it's warm."

"Yes, Teacher. A little more...."

Warning.

"Teacher, look at this. I got a wound in the last battle."

“Here— On the nape of my neck. You can see it, right?”

“What? No. I didn’t ask Sim Ah-ryeon to heal it. I wanted to leave it.”

“Why, you ask.... Ahaha. Because, well, my wound doesn’t disappear even after 24 hours pass, you see?”

“It’ll heal, sure.”

“But it won’t be ‘reset’ without a trace. Never.”

“It’s okay to come closer. Actually, I wanted to show it to you. Yes, up close.”

“Teacher.”

“My Teacher——”

Reset.

The conversation failed. A great failure. A fumble.

Until that regression ended, Yo-hwa never left my side. Her position as student council president, her power as the head of one of the two major guilds on the Korean peninsula, none of it mattered anymore.

Baekhwa Girls’ High collapsed.

It was an organization that had been established on the charisma of a single student council president in the first place. The bees that lost their queen scattered, and their members were absorbed by the National Road Management Corps and Samcheon separately.

Once, the former vice president of Baekhwa Girls’ High came and cried out in protest. But there was no change in Yo-hwa’s expression.

The only thing I could do was take responsibility for Yo-hwa and accept her until the regression ended.

Reset. And.

"..."

The next regression.

I was at a classroom desk. Across from me sat Cheon-hwa. As soon as the new regression began and the situation was somewhat sorted out, I came to visit the sanctuary.

"Aah—"

Cheon-hwa, after hearing the whole story from me, the older of the twin sisters, sighed a long sigh.

"I see... So that's what happened. Yes. I'm sorry, Sunbae. I've really given you a painful role."

"It's fine. This kind of thing wasn't unique to Yo-hwa."

"Hm? Ah, I see. It was always common for mentally unstable colleagues to rely on you. Mm, still, I'm sorry."

Cheon-hwa muttered.

"My sister is right. This is the price for me using [Time Seal] as I pleased. At the time, I was so busy subjugating the Mastermind that I thought this was the best way."

"..."

"Actually, I don't mind it being this way! Wow. Just the fact that you remember me as a human, Sunbae, is a gamble that succeeded against astronomical odds, you know? To win the heart of my lovely little sister on top of this? That's like trying to pull a 5-star with a single roll in a double gacha. Ahaha."

"..."

"You don't have to tell Yo-hwa about me. Sunbae. I have some shame, you see. I don't want to be a nuisance to the point of harming my sister's mental health! Nope!"

Leave it like this.

Neglect it.

Just as I had until now.

No one would know anyway.

Yo-hwa would never know that she had an older sister. And Cheon-hwa would never be able to remember the fact that she had inflicted an indelible wound on her younger sister.

It was a story that no one in this world, aside from the two of them, knew.

Except for me.

"..."

If I were to just close my eyes to this, it could be left as something that 'never happened'. As a blank. As a void.

"Cheon-hwa."

"Hm?"

"This classroom you're sealed in. It's a sanctuary modeled after a classroom at Baekhwa Girls' High, right?"

"Uh... yes. But, why all of a sudden?"

And wouldn't that be in line with the entirety of a regressor's life?

"I have a strategy."

The fact that Yo-hwa wasn't a necromancer of zombies, but just a girl who wanted to save a few more of her friends.

The fact that Yu Ji-won wasn't a psychopath mad with power, but was searching for someone she met one summer.

The fact that the Constellations didn't exist, but were just an act put on by someone who wanted to save people.

Like with Old Man Scho, they were all facts that no one would know if I just closed my eyes.

Originally, the void was a world only to those who sought to know it, and the other was a human only to those who sought to see them.

I had believed that a regressor was a human who sings of loss.

“In this regression, I haven’t saved Yo-hwa yet. Right about now, Yo-hwa is probably trapped in Baekhwa Girls’ High, fighting a desperate battle.”

“Yes. So I’d like you to go quickly.”

“And as you know, to subjugate the trace of Infinite Void sleeping there, I have to endure until the world shrinks to the size of Baekhwa Girls’ High and enter the void within the void.”

“…”

“Into the Baekhwa Girls’ High of the void, I will summon you.”

“…!”

Cheon-hwa’s eyes widened.

I continued, declaring.

“I will reunite you two sisters there.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 396

The Bereaved IV

Sinnoa

Operation briefing. ON.

"Most awakeners perceive the Void as a type of dungeon. However, physical laws do not apply in the Void, and it cannot be defined as a physical location."

Snap. The piece of chalk broke in my hand.

But that was fine. At least the chalk had died a glorious death after scribbling its entire purpose onto the chalkboard.

"Therefore, the Void can just as easily arise within a person's mind."

"Are you saying that's my sister's current state?"

"Probably."

On the chalkboard was a chibi-style drawing of Yo-hwa.

Right in the middle of the rather well-drawn illustration, on Yo-hwa's chest, I drew a large '□', an empty square box.

"It isn't just Yo-hwa. It's everyone who lost the most precious character in their lives due to the Time Seal. All of them."

"…"

"We can surmise that a void has formed in the deepest parts of their psyches. You could call it a hole in the heart."

"A hole in the heart…"

"And until now, Yo-hwa's psychological void has been blocked in this way."

Scrape, scritch, tap.

Using the broken piece of chalk, I drew an arrow from the '□' and wrote a name next to it. Like this.

Blink.

Cheon-hwa's eyes, who was sitting in the very front row of the classroom, widened slightly.

"Ah."

"Yo-hwa has a hole in her heart. But right after, someone appeared who saved not only her life but also the lives of the Baekhwa Girls' High students. And that person was—"

"You, Sunbae."

"Yes."

I had found it slightly strange for a while now.

'Even if I saved her life, her affection for me grew far too quickly—and far too deeply.'

The moment I started having doubts was when I encountered the anomaly known as 'Savior Narrative Syndrome'.

'Of course, I approached those kids at the exact moment they needed me, in the exact role they needed. Nevertheless... Unlike me, the regressor, wasn't I still a stranger they had only just met?'

Why did they come to rely on me so quickly?

Why did their heartbeats resonate with my existence as if they had been waiting for it all along?

I recalled this question and came up with my own answer.

"It's simple. If you assume there's a void in their hearts, a hole that runs as deep as hell itself, then it all makes rational sense."

"…"

"Yo-hwa has a psychological void that she absolutely cannot fill. So, to deny and seal that hole, she placed the person known as 'Undertaker' at the very center of her heart."

"Sunbae, are you trying to say that the feelings my sister has for you aren't love?"

"No. I'm not discussing the color of the heart, but its structure. In a way, it's a feeling much deeper than ordinary love."

“…I see. And if she fails to block the hole, the void.”

"She would become an anomaly."

A desperate struggle to remain human.

She couldn't become human on her own. As I said, a fatal gap had already been torn open in her heart.

So, she finds a guarantor.

Because she herself is not enough, she borrows the existence of another to serve as a patch-up job for the hole in her heart.

"Trust, because she entrusts herself to another. Love, because they guarantee each other's humanity. Sacrifice, because she handed over her most precious heart to another. Obsession, because she cannot let go. You can call it whatever you want."

“…”

"The important point right now is—"

My chalk danced again.

Scrape. The trembling of the chalkboard stopped.

"The fact that I was not the one originally designated for this spot."

“…

"The reason I, we, failed in the last cycle was because we missed this. My thinking was too simple. I just thought that if she met her lost family member, an instinctive favorability would form."

“…Because in Yo-hwa's heart, you had already taken that spot, sunbae. I get it now."

Cheon-hwa's eyes lowered.

"My existence must have looked like an 'enemy' that threatened not only Yo-hwa herself, but you as well, Sunbae."

"That’s right."

"She can bear it if she's the only one threatened. But if it feels like someone is trying to take your place, Sunbae... Definitely. She's bound to react sensitively."

A more delicate approach.

That was why a more sophisticated strategy was desperately needed.

"In the end, it's a matter of timing. If 'Undertaker' has already become Yo-hwa's teacher and completely replaced the hole, it's already too late."

"Yeah. I understand. I, her 'lost older sister,' have to appear before Yo-hwa falls for you, Sunbae."

“…However you want to put it, yes. At any rate, the direction is correct."

"But that's impossible."

Cheon-hwa said.

"Look, Sunbae. I've been hit with a Time Seal, so I can't move a single step from the rooftop of the Tower of Babel. On the other hand, for Yo-hwa to get here, she first has to clear the 'Baekhwa Girls' High Tutorial Dungeon.' But to clear that dungeon, your existence is indispensable, Sunbae. So how… Ah."

Cheon-hwa's eyes went wide.

Clatter. She pushed back her chair and stood up.

"The fairy!"

I smiled.

"Exactly."

The tutorial fairy.

Or, the 'first anomaly'.

It was the first anomaly-like anomaly that the vast majority of awakeners encountered. That was natural.

That's why it was the 'tutorial' fairy, after all.

Of course, that was just a nickname given for convenience.

Its true name, the name that revealed the anomaly's identity in its entirety, was something else.

I lamented.

"In the end, in our world, you guys are a succubus and an incubus...."

"Hoe-eh."

Fairy number 264 was happily stuffing a sausage into both its cheeks, like a happy hamster.

For the record, it was a bribe I gave them. I don't know why, but their species went crazy for sausages.

Once, I thought, 'Maybe they'll like a fancier sausage more?' and got them a Johnsonville product, but strangely, they shook their heads, saying it didn't suit their taste.

They were a strange bunch, anyway.

And as you might have guessed from my use of the word 'bunch'

here.

"Such a sweet taste...!"

"Hoe. Why did my comrades fall for the bourgeoisie's appeasement and turn into the hunting dogs of power, hoeeh. This food is so counter-revolutionary it makes me realize it inadvertently."

"Is it a taste that makes you abandon the world revolution and regress into nationalistic revisionism that only cares about Russia?"

Right now, a number of fairies were gathered before my eyes in a small huddle.

"You guys seem to be subtly lacking in enthusiasm."

"Hoeeeng. That's because…"

"We ambitiously started the tutorial dungeon, but the Fairy King who was giving us orders suddenly disappeared…"

"Praised as a revolutionary fighter and sent to the jungles of South America, only to find out it was just a purge from back home…"

"The wall of reality is the North Sea Ice Palace…"

That's right.

Originally, the tutorial fairies were under the control of the Outer God, Infinite Void, or the Mastermind.

However, Infinite Void had been intellectually castrated and reduced to something like a lump of power, and the Mastermind had been sealed by someone on the rooftop of the Tower of Babel.

In a word, the fairies of today were.

"No different from dogs abandoned by their masters."

"Hieeek! Wh-what cruel wording!"

"We opened the tutorial dungeon out of inertia, but we just don't feel motivated for some reason…"

"When I think about it, who cares about humans? Whether they get killed by other anomalies is just their own fate…"

Just like humans falling into depression, the fairies were collectively shrouded in a dark cloud.

I caught a strange sense of déjà vu.

'In a way, isn't this also the result of a void suddenly appearing in their hearts?'

…An angle of thought I would have never come up with in my past self.

My hatred for anomalies was still preserved along with my Complete Memory, forever burning my heart.

But now, I could observe with a cold detachment from the opposite side, at least when it came to the tutorial fairies.

'It might not be all that different.'

One day they woke up, and Mugan had become strange and the Mastermind had disappeared.

All thanks to the actions of me, the regressor.

The flow was always similar.

"I will become your new pillar of support. Specifically, I will distribute one sausage to each of you every day."

"Hoe-eh! Comrade General Secretary!"

"You're going to rule over us!"

"The forefront of the revolution!"

"Long live Comrade General Secretary! Long live! Long live!"

In the first place, what is an anomaly?

Why did these beings come to exist?

'Almost every awakener must first meet the tutorial fairies.'

'And the fairies' true identity is the Dream Demon. Anomalies of dreams.'

'In short, the first void that people encounter is none other than… a dream.'

A human's dream. The first void.

'In a way, a more fitting name for the tutorial fairies might be the [Fairy of Beginnings].'

Tutorial. Starting point. Dream.

All the puzzle pieces shimmered just at the edge of my grasp, as if I could understand them but couldn't, as if I could catch them but couldn't.

'Could all of this be a mere coincidence?'

One more step.

It felt like if I could just find the last puzzle piece, I would see the destination this picture was pointing to, but for now, it was still a mystery.

Pushing the puzzle to one side of my mind, I spoke with a deliberately solemn expression.

"What I require of you is very clear. From now on, I will infiltrate Baekhwa Girls' High disguised as a security guard. There will be a girl there who is the student council president, and whenever that girl falls asleep—"

"—I'm going to use the fairies to manipulate her dreams. And I will continuously show Yo-hwa the image of her 'older sister' in her dreams."

"…"

"Yo-hwa just recently lost her sister. If she sees even a vision resembling her sister in her dreams, the hole in Yo-hwa's heart is bound to react."

“…”

"So, Cheon-hwa."

I said, looking at the girl in front of me.

"I need your help to create a dream that is as close to reality as possible. Tell me what happened between you two sisters in your childhood. As detailed as possible, please."

A long silence followed.

Cheon-hwa's face looked complicated.

Gratitude for someone who would go to such lengths for her and her sister. Apology for having to rely on him so much.

And an overwhelming emotion for being accepted as a human, not an anomaly. Trust. Love. Sacrifice. Obsession.

"But there's a problem, Sunbae."

Leaving behind the emotions that wouldn't disappear no matter what you called them, Cheon-hwa, ever the strategist of the self-proclaimed Regressor Alliance, pointed out the practical problems first.

"No matter how hard the fairies try, they won't be able to perfectly replicate my childhood self. They're no different from dolls that only act as they're programmed."

"That's true."

"My sister has good instincts. Her nose for telling the real from the fake is almost genius-level. Will her heart really be moved by an 'older sister doll' that the fairies clumsily imitate?"

It was a truly accurate point.

"Who do you take me for? I'm a man who has even run a reincarnation project using writers and fairies."

I puffed out my chest.

"It's no exaggeration to say that there are few who know the strengths and weaknesses of fairies as well as I do. Naturally, I've prepared a countermeasure for that."

"Heeh. As expected of you, Sunbae! What kind of countermeasure is it?"

"A very effective one, Cheon-hwa. Do you not have the world's best actor right before your eyes?"

Blink.

"?"

"?"

Cheon-hwa's head tilted to the side. My head tilted the other way.

About ten seconds passed like that.

"Uh…"

Cheon-hwa's lips parted hesitantly.

"Sorry, Sunbae. I think I misunderstood something. If I did, please feel free to correct me."

"Mm."

"So… based on the story I tell you, and because your memory is super, super good, you'll memorize everything like it's a script."

"Mm."

"And then… 'you're' going to act as 'me'? You, Sunbae? You're going to 'transform' with the help of the Dream Demons, like me, like a Ditto, like a female student in a black sailor uniform… and act as her older sister for my little sister. That's not what you're saying, right? I misunderstood, right?"

"No. You understood it perfectly."

“…”

"What. Don't you worry. Although it may not be on the level of Oh Dok-seo's VTuber mode, I, as a regressor who has lived for tens of thousands of years, boast the strongest acting ability among present-day humanity. I will act out a 'Cheon Yo-hwa' who is more you than you are."

“…”

"So come, hurry and tell me the life story of you and your sister. How you talked to each other at home, what habits and quirks you had, input every single thing into my Complete Memory—"

"That's creepy!!"

Why?

Regardless of what the strategist complained about, the operation was pushed forward.

The Baekhwa Girls' High Tutorial Dungeon was a demon's den where casualties would increase exponentially if left alone for even a moment. Realistically, at this point in time, besides me, there was no one else suitable to enter Baekhwa Girls' High and act as 'Cheon-hwa' in the dream.

And so.

“…Security guard mister.”

After building up a decent level of trust, just like in other turns, Yo-hwa cautiously approached me.

As you can tell from the fact that she still calls me 'security guard mister’ and not 'Teacher', it hasn't been many days.

"Yes? What is it?"

"Um, I have something I'd like to talk about… Could you listen for a moment?"

Finally! I clenched my fist in my mind.

But I didn't show any of it on the outside.

"Of course. As the student council president, Yo-hwa, it must be hard for you to show any weakness in front of the other kids, so you can always rely on an adult."

"Ahaha. Thank you."

"So what's on your mind?"

"Lately, whenever I fall asleep, I have these really, super, seriously creepy dreams… They're just completely unpleasant dreams. Could this also be the influence of ghosts or something?"

"…"

Why?

Footnotes:

Chapter 397

The Bereaved V

Sinnoa

I was confident in my acting.

I had already lived for tens of thousands of years, so it would have been more difficult not to have accumulated experience in any art form, regardless of the field.

I could even change my voice by mobilizing just a tiny bit of aura.

If I shaped the aura and overlaid it on my facial muscles, it could even function as a temporary disguise, a type of human-skin mask.

– Hayul, peekaboo! It's daddy.

– …

– This is Jung Sang-guk. Daddy has come to his senses. I love Hayul very much.

– Die.

My genius-level acting skills received rave reviews from my colleagues around me!

Looking across the entire martial world, there was only one person who would dare to challenge me at this level, and that was Oh Dok-seo, who had turned on her VTuber mode with [Side Story Creation].

But that kid, Oh Dok-seo, can't act as someone who has been time-sealed, right? It was impossible for her to empathize with Cheon-hwa in the first place, wasn't it?

Yes, she’s garbage.

Naturally, I, the Undertaker, had no choice but to be selected as the master actor to play the part of Yo-hwa's 'long-lost twin sister'.

Now, all that was left was for Yo-hwa to reminisce in her dream about the sweet childhood days with her precious sister, and recover her lost memories from the very beginning!

It should have been a truly perfect calculation.

"I hate you, unni!"

"…"

"You ate the chocolate ice cream I put in the fridge again, didn't you! I can only eat one of those a day, but you pretended to be me and ate mine too! I hate you! I really hate you, unni!"

Right before my eyes, or more accurately, in the 'dream,' a young version of Yo-hwa was screaming her lungs out.

All I had to do now was lower my eyebrows apologetically and bow my head to my lovely younger sister.

If I just did that, a reasonably 'good memory' would be imprinted onto Yo-hwa's subconscious.

When she woke up later, although Yo-hwa wouldn't be able to remember every single detail of the dream's scenery, at the very least, a faint feeling of 'I made memories with someone like family' would remain.

But.

"Oh, really? But I like my little sister so much."

My tongue, having already achieved a perfect state of oneness with Cheon-hwa through my supreme acting ability, moved on its own.

"Because you're here, I get to eat two ice creams. I love you, Yo-hwa. But since I want to keep eating chocolate ice cream no matter how much I have, I think it would be great if I had just three more little sisters like you!"

“Hwaaaaaah!”

In the end, Yo-hwa burst into tears.

“I… I hate you, unni! Die! Waaah! Unni, just drop dead!”

– What is the matter, young lady?!

Crash. The housekeepers, having detected the crying from outside the door, came running.

And just like that, not only Yo-hwa but also Cheon-hwa immediately launched into an impromptu crying act.

“Hic, hwaaaaaah! Cheon…, Cheon-hwa unni… sob! Sh-she hit me… and scolded me!”

– What?!

“N-n-n-no! I’m Yo-hwa! I’m the one who’s Yo-hwa, but unni took my ice cream and…”

“Hwaaaaaah!”

“Sob, hic, waaaah, u, uwaaaaaah!”

The housekeepers' eyes trembled violently.

To reiterate, Cheon-hwa and Yo-hwa looked identical.

Of course, the family had its own ways of distinguishing the twins, like dressing the sisters in different clothes, but Cheon-hwa, who had been cunning from a young age, exploited those methods to act like her ‘younger sister.’

As a result,

“I… hic, I’m… the real Yo-hwa……. She’s unni……. Why, only me……”

Yo-hwa, whose ability to talk back was weaker than her sister's, was abruptly singled out as the culprit and made to stand in the hallway with both her arms raised.

Meanwhile, Cheon-hwa, who had slipped away from the housekeepers' watch like an eel, was in front of her sister, pantomiming her crying face.

"I'm the unni, but why only meee…"

"Hwaaaaaah…"

"Heoeoeoeong."

"Unni, I really, hate youuuu……!"

"Kyaahahahaha!"

Cheon-hwa burst out laughing and rolled around on the hallway floor. She rolled so vigorously that there was no need to dust the floor separately.

And as for the 'me' who was the actor playing this true personality of Cheon-hwa, the young Cheon-hwa.

The Undertaker squeezed his eyes shut in a corner of his mind.

'This is a good memory?'

They deceived me.

"Hoe. Currently, the target codenamed 'Yo-hwa's' favorability toward Cheon-hwa, when converted to a numerical value, is 5."

Inside the child Yo-hwa's dream.

A grand mansion in Sejong City. The twin sisters' hometown.

Of course, the surrounding scenery was all just a dream. It was no different from a so-called 'set' that the Tutorial Fairy and I had built in collaboration.

In the backstage of the dream, where the flow of time was jumbled and mixed, Fairy No. 264 and I gathered to whisper back and forth.

"I see. So the maximum favorability is 10."

“Hoet, no? It’s 100.”

“…”

“For reference, a favorability of 5 is a value even lower than that for a complete stranger. Hoee, the love between human siblings is so very, very scary.”

“Keuk.”

I scratched my head roughly. Ah, and of course, my current appearance was fixed as ‘Cheon-hwa.’

“This is strange. I had a feeling that the Cheon-Yo-hwa sisters definitely had a bond so close it was second to none in the world. But why is it that in their childhood, it’s like they were dying to kill each other…”

“Comrade Secretary-General. Then wouldn’t it work if you just acted out the part of an ‘ideal older sister’ for her to see?”

“No.”

Thump.

I plopped down in a posture that a young lady from a great mansion would never take, cross-legged.

A perfect example of a delinquent noble lady.

I furrowed my brow deeply and grumbled.

“Doing that would just be soldering over the hole in Yo-hwa’s heart with another lie, far from patching it up properly. I have to restore it as close to the true history as possible for Yo-hwa’s mental state to become sound.”

“Hoee. We fairies can become happy just by eating a sausage, but human psychology is so complicated…”

“I agree with you on that point.”

I looked around.

“Really, it’s hard to see even an inch ahead.”

The grand mansion seemed fixed when I just looked at it.

But the story changed when I focused all my senses.

– The young ladies, I tell you, this time again…

– The madam has passed away! It was an assassination!

– This is the police! Don’t move! We received a report that a murder took place here.

– Aren’t our young ladies so cute?

Whisper, whisper. Murmur, murmur.

Shadow-like phantoms were restlessly coming and going through the hallways and the garden.

Bang!

A gunshot rang out somewhere in broad daylight, while right next to it, cult members were chatting leisurely.

It was all mixed up. Time and space.

“Tsk.”

I clicked my tongue.

“This is why I wanted to avoid entering someone else’s dream to look into their past if I could help it… This is no different from the void.”

“Hoe! Actually, Comrade Secretary-General’s dreams are unusually clear!”

The fairy bounced up and down.

“The vast majority, all humans except for the Secretary-General, dream about their past in this way!”

“I was aware of that.”

Whether one possessed the Complete Memory ability or not.

That alone caused the ‘dream about the past’ to be this chaotically entangled.

The facts of the events were twisted back and forth, and even the timeline was a messy, fluid wreck.

It wasn't a metaphor, it was literally the void itself.

‘Even if I want to shape the dream as I please, the situation won't allow it.’

Can you even imagine the difficulty, given that this is the state of things even with the tutorial fairies assisting?

The ‘Cheon-hwa’ I was playing, and the young ‘Yo-hwa’.

Just fixing these two characters and granting them each their own self-identity was a magical achievement in itself.

What about the other people? They all melted in the void poison.

For example, if you just look at the housekeepers who had rushed in moments ago to stop our sisterly argument.

– Y-y-y-y-y-young lady.

– They’resocutebothofthemsocuteIcouldjustgobblethemup.

– Sometimes I don't know who is who. So last night, I secretly peeled off the younger lady's fingernail. Now I will never confuse the young ladies again.

The housekeepers’ faces were melting like candle wax.

The wax was constantly alive and moving, at one moment forming into the shape of human eyeballs, only to melt again and stretch out their cheeks.

This wasn't something that started suddenly.

Earlier, when I was fighting with Yo-hwa over the chocolate ice cream, the housekeepers looked just like that.

It was just that Yo-hwa, without feeling any sense of wrongness, fought with her sister like a child.

'…In the end, my hypothesis that there's a hole in Yo-hwa's past was correct. That's why the closer you get to the past, the more this void unfolds.'

But if there was something I was curious about.

'Is it just Yo-hwa's past that is uniquely rusted by the void poison like this? Or are the other colleagues in the Regression Alliance the same…'

It was at that moment.

Thud!

A footstep so loud that it made the entire wooden hallway reverberate rang out.

At that, the housekeepers, who had been chattering like shadows until now, all straightened up at once and lined up in rows on both sides of the hallway.

The fairy trembled.

"Hoee. He's, he's here again!"

"…"

I twitched an eyebrow and unfolded my cross-legged position. Then I stood up and assumed a graceful posture.

Like the daughter of a prestigious family, without a single flaw.

Thud! Thump, Thuuud! Thud!

The footsteps grew closer.

Before long, Fairy No. 264 had vanished, leaving me, as ‘Cheon-hwa,’ alone at the end of the hallway.

I bowed my head.

Thuuud.

The source of the footsteps, which had stopped in front of me, cast a shadow.

– Oh! Cheon-hwa! My proud daughter!

I bowed my head even deeper.

“Yes. Sir Cult Leader.”

The master of this grand mansion.

A dictator of a large-scale Taoist pseudo-religious cult, the likes of which were hard to find in Korea.

Based on the circumstances, he was the main culprit who had worshiped two separate Outer Gods, Infinite Void and the Mastermind, and finally caused their descent into the mortal world.

More accurately, this was the form of the father as remembered by Yo-hwa, the owner of this dream, a manifestation of a child’s terror.

– Aigoo, Sir Cult Leader! If even you, Cheon-hwa, call me that, your father will be quite hurt.

“Yes. I understand, Father.”

– Ahem! You have come of age now, how long do you intend to appeal to mere blood ties instead of being the successor to the cult! Today, I must go to the discipline room and personally take up the rod!

“Yes. I apologize, Sir Cult Leader.”

The flow of his words was inconsistent and messy, but I was quite used to it.

‘This is how void beings are.’

In times like these, I couldn't let the other party take the lead in the conversation. No matter how bewildering it was, I had to respond with confidence.

“A little while ago, I was reading the scriptures with Yo-hwa. That child was misinterpreting them, so as her older sister, I scolded her a little. She should be reflecting on her actions well now.”

– …

Crackle, zzzzt.

The shadow cast on the hallway floor flickered and wavered, then stretched out as if it would reach the ceiling on the opposite side.

– Ooh, Yo-hwa did? Yes. That child has always been a bit slower than you.

– By whose authorityyyy! You two dare to touch the scriptures on your oooown!

– Did you review the part I taught you last time on your own? How praiseworthy. My daughter indeed. I am always so proud of you.

– It's contaminated. Contamination! It’s been contaminated! The sacrifices for the Taegeuk have been contaminated, they must be purified!

“…”

I didn't bother to reply.

A part of me was dumbfounded at what kind of memories were being planted in such a young child, but as a void expert, I calmly waited for the right timing.

– Yes, what passage were you studying?

I opened my mouth immediately. It was the question I had been waiting for.

“The name that can be named is not the eternal name[1]. It was the passage that says names do not exist for the things we ordinarily point to, and that a name is always nothing more than a temporary label.”

– …

“That is how Yo-hwa understood it. But I reminded her of how you, Cult Leader, bound our names together with the single pronunciation of Cheon-Yo-hwa, and pointed out that not only the names of things, but even her name, Yo-hwa, is also an illusion.”

Zzzzt. Zzzzzzzzt.

– Ooh.

“So Yo-hwa, belatedly feeling ashamed, said she should have looked back at herself before discussing other things, and she voluntarily asked for punishment as she reflected on her actions.”

– Excellent!

The paper screens lining the hallway trembled at the ‘father’ shadow’s resounding roar.

– Yes! Cheon-hwa. Your words are truly correct!

– In the end, the scriptures are a precious treasure only to those who accept them as their own story, and for those who dismiss them as merely the writings of others, they are nothing more than trash abandoned on the ground.

– My daughters. You two sisters were destined from birth to be able to accept our scriptures entirely as ‘your own story.’

– Ah! What a great blessing this is! Truly, the gods of heaven and earth are watching over us! The Tao models itself on what is natural.

Beyond their melting wax cheeks, the mouths of the housekeepers all moved in unison.

– The Tao models itself on what is natural.

– The one who will become our living sacrament, my daughter, the successor of the cult, and the salvation of the masses, is so wise, I am truly happy! Do not neglect your training for even a single day, my daughter!

“Yes. Sir Cult Leader.”

– Uahahahaha! Ha ha ha ha!

Thuuud. Thud, thump. Thump.

The footsteps and laughter grew distant. The housekeepers, as if it were only natural, followed behind the cult leader with uniform steps.

“…”

A past from a time before the button for world destruction had been pushed.

Beyond the walls of the vast mansion, modern people were likely living their daily lives as if nothing was wrong, but the Cheon Yo-hwa sisters were already living in a broken miniature garden back then.

‘Does this mean that someday, I, as a private tutor, will come here to teach the sisters?’

There was plenty of time.

With the help of the tutorial fairy, I could stretch the time within the dream as much as I wanted.

‘At first, I entered for the simple purpose of treating Yo-hwa’s psychology… But if I’m lucky, I might find a clue to the past.’

That wasn't all.

Step, step, step.

There was one more set of footsteps following the procession of the pseudo-religious cult leader and his followers.

A particularly small and quiet footfall. Unlike a resident of the void, it maintained a constant velocity, and within it, held vitality and a sense of presence.

I suddenly raised my head and our eyes met.

“…”

“…”

Nod. Nod.

Without either being first or last, we bowed our heads silently. The other person maintained a faint smile and walked away with casual steps.

An endlessly familiar sound of footsteps.

Watching the all-too-familiar back, I muttered inwardly.

‘Go Yuri.’

In this grand mansion where every character except for the twin sisters was infected with void poison and shimmered with noise, she was the only third party maintaining her own form.

My low monologue flowed into the hallway where I was left all alone.

“…Why on earth are you here, at this time, in this place?”

Footnotes:

1 - The opening line of the Tao Te Ching, a fundamental text in Taoism.

Chapter 398

The Bereaved VI

Sinnoa

Why was Go Yuri here? It was a question that not even I could answer, and neither could the fairies acting as the server administrators for this 'dream' world.

"Hoek, we apologize, Comrade Secretary-General."

"We were only trying to recreate the past as closely as we could, using Codename Yo-hwa's data and the settings you provided...!"

"But we can change the data and erase her existence, right? Should we activate your inherited authority, 'Existence Erasure,' Comrade Secretary-General?"

I just shook my head.

"No, there's no need for that. In fact, you must never do that. Our goal isn't to warp Yo-hwa's past, but to restore it to be as historically accurate as possible. We might have to tolerate minor distortions if they're unavoidable, but we must not intentionally corrupt the timeline. Remember that."

"Hoek, we understand."

The fairies saluted in unison.

"But, we're getting this funny feeling that not only your appearance but your speech is becoming more and more like Codename 'Cheon-hwa,' Comrade Secretary-General. Personally, we think it has a cute charm."

"..."

"The fervent support of the people. With this, our Red Empire can endure for another two hundred years."

I confiscated their sausages.

The fairies burst into tears, wailing "Hoe-eeeng," but I paid them no mind and began to carefully explore the mansion.

'The tutorial fairies are ultimately outsiders, so it's no surprise they know nothing about Go Yuri.'

'That means my only option is to ask the insiders, the members of this cult.'

More importantly, in this world, I was the cult's most treasured child, one of the successors handpicked to become a god for the next generation. My young age placed many restrictions on my actions, but something as simple as contacting the members to gather information should have been easy.

However.

– Shh, Young Miss.

– You mustn't talk about that woman.

Even the shadow-like cult members, who wandered the grand mansion like phantoms, offered contradictory statements about Go Yuri.

– Oh dear. This will surely sadden you, Young Miss...

– She is someone cherished by our Leader.

– Pardon? What are you saying, Young Miss? No such person exists here in the Holy Temple.

– Young Miss... you ask such a strange question.

– She is your new stepmother, isn't she?

"..."

The testimonies were all over the place.

One member said Go Yuri was the leader's lover. Another denied her existence entirely. Someone else claimed she was the woman the leader remarried after his wife's death.

It wasn't a case of one of them lying through their teeth, as I certainly have the sharp judgment needed to tell an act from the truth.

Every single one of them was being sincere.

It was as if…

'...as if even the information surrounding Go Yuri had become tangled in a mess of spacetime.'

I was completely disoriented.

A typical void was already an abyss beyond human comprehension, but with Go Yuri now in the mix, it was driving me to the brink of insanity.

I decided to visit my younger sister, who was the only person in this dream-like void, or rather the second if you included me, to have retained her 'identity'.

"Yo-hwa."

"Hmph. I hate you, unni. I hate you. Go away."

"Here's some chocolate ice cream."

"I love you, unni. Please live forever."

I casually posed a question to my dear sister, the great philosopher Madam Yo-hwa, who had just placed a scoop of chocolate ice cream right on the line between life and death.

"That very pretty unni who's always with Father," I began.

"Hmm? You mean Teacher?"

"..."

A shiver went down my spine.

'Teacher'.

So this is where that title originated.

"...My apologies, Yo-hwa. Your unni has had a lot on her mind lately, and my memory is a bit hazy. Could you remind me what we've been studying with our... 'Teacher', and since when?"

"The scriptures. The Tao Te Ching," Yo-hwa answered with a bright smile.

"I like Teacher. She explains the scriptures in a way that's much easier to understand than the other adults, and she never gets mad."

"Really...?"

"Yup. But you're acting strange, unni. You like Teacher a whole lot too, don't you? So why are you asking me this all of a sudden? ...Gasp. Oh, I get it. You're trying to drive a ledge between me and Teacher, aren't you? Aren't you?"

"The expression is 'drive a wedge,' not whatever you just said."

"It's the same thing. You're silly, unni."

"It seems my little Yo-hwa holds some very different opinions from the National Language Institute."

"Huh? The Na-National... what now?"

"They're the absolute arbiters of the Korean language, the ones who decide we should use awkward official terms instead of the words everyone actually uses."

"Eh. I-I don't get it..."

Yo-hwa's lip quivered and her eyebrows drooped.

'Ah. How cute.'

Without thinking, my hand reached out and started patting Yo-hwa's adorable head.

"Ungh..."

Yo-hwa narrowed her eyes. Her gaze flickered between my face and her own hand (equipped with chocolate ice cream).

Then, with a look that said, 'Ah, whatever,' she cheerfully resumed eating her ice cream quietly permitting my head-patting attack.

'So cute.'

Howcouldmylittlesisterbesoadorableandlovableandnaiveandfoolisheventhou

'—Wait.'

I snapped back to reality with a jolt.

'This is bad. I've been so focused on acting as Cheon-hwa, empathizing with her so much, that my own way of thinking is starting to become identical to hers.'

A chill crept over me.

The void, as expected. It was a treacherous place where even a seasoned expert like myself could lose their identity in a single, careless moment.

Well, of course, I still had my final failsafe, the [Complete Memory] ability, holding strong. Even if I were to completely lose my sense of self, as long as my vast memories as the Undertaker remained, I would always be able to find my way back.

Complete Memory really is an overpowered cheat, isn't it. I'm quite jealous that my predecessor got to enjoy such a great skill all by himself.

"Unni," Yo-hwa said, "there's something strange about this ice cream."

"Oh? What's that?"

"Well, the outside is chocolate, which I like, but the inside is green. And it tastes like toothpaste. Are you sure this is real chocolate ice cream?"

"Of course it is. All the really fancy chocolate ice creams are green on the inside these days. It's proof that they use organic, all-natural chocolate. That slightly cool, fresh taste just means it's extra healthy for you."

"Wow, really?"

"I heard that only the most refined ladies can appreciate the profound depth of such a luxurious sweetness. Haa, to be honest, it's still a little overwhelming for me. What about you, my dear Yo-hwa?"

"It's... it's super delicious!"

"Is that right? Well then, from now on, you should only eat this kind of chocolate ice cream."

"Ack."

Just as I was busy cementing this precious memory of our warm, sisterly affection...

Knock. Knock. Knock.

A sound came from the door.

I shot my sister a look, and she hurriedly swallowed the rest of the ice cream, destroying the evidence.

In this cult-like household, the family customs were so strict that we weren't even allowed to have dessert without permission.

"Who is it?" I called out, buying my sister a few more seconds.

But when I heard the voice that replied from the other side of the door, my heart gave a small jolt.

"It is I, Young Misses."

It was the voice of Go Yuri.

"Class is about to begin. Miss Cheon-hwa, Miss Yo-hwa, would it be alright if I came in?"

"..."

I didn't have to think for long.

"Oh, please, come in, Teacher."

After all, hadn't my sister just testified to this very fact? That I, 'Cheon-hwa', was very fond of my private tutor.

So, no matter how unsettling I personally found Go Yuri to be... I couldn't afford to act in a way that contradicted the established rules of this reality.

If the anomalies here detected that I was an entity even slightly out of place in this Void, they would immediately move to eliminate the foreign intruder.

'If my goal were simply to eliminate them, that wouldn't be an issue.'

But my objective in this void wasn't extermination or eradication.

It was the restoration of the past, and nothing else.

My task was akin to using a specialized recovery program to restore files that had been moved to the trash and permanently deleted from a computer long ago.

Therefore, my reaction as 'Cheon-hwa' the moment the door creaked open was already set in stone.

"Yay. It's Teacher."

"Haha."

Go Yuri offered a gentle smile in response to my broad, perhaps overly enthusiastic, welcome.

"Have you been well, Miss Cheon-hwa?"

"Yes. Wow, Teacher, how do you manage to look prettier every time I see you? And you smell so wonderful. I'm envious, Teacher."

"Thank you for the kind words. But you are the beautiful one, Miss Cheon-hwa. My appearance is just the result of some effort, whereas you, once you're a bit older, will surely cause people to marvel at your beauty wherever you go."

Go Yuri tilted her head, her gaze drifting past my shoulder.

"And how are you, Miss Yo-hwa?"

"Ah, y-yes. Hello, Teacher."

"Oh, my."

Go Yuri walked over and stopped directly in front of Yo-hwa. Hiccup. Yo-hwa was clearly tense.

A white handkerchief emerged smoothly from Go Yuri's pocket. An apple fragrance, seemingly woven into the fabric, instantly permeated the room.

Twirl. Press.

With a quiet grace, Go Yuri knelt down and gently wiped the corners of Yo-hwa's mouth. There had been a faint trace of chocolate on her lips.

"Ah, ahh, uhh..."

Smile.

Yo-hwa stammered, flustered, but Go Yuri simply put her handkerchief away and turned back to me, her expression giving no indication that she had seen anything unusual.

"Shall we continue our lesson on the scriptures from where we left off, my young ladies?"

"Yes, yes."

As I heard Yo-hwa's enthusiastic reply and offered a cheerful one of my own, a corner of my mind became chillingly clear.

I had sensed it faintly when we passed in the corridor earlier, but now I was absolutely sure.

"..."

Go Yuri.

She didn't recognize 'me'.

Let's rewind a bit, to a time not so long ago.

This was before I transformed into the young lady of a distinguished family, before I even entered Yo-hwa's dream.

It concerns a strange phenomenon that began occurring sometime after the 1,000th cycle.

"Hyung-nim."

"Oh? What's up, Seo Gyu? It's rare for you to seek me out."

"I felt it was best that I report this to you directly."

SG Net. The Library Society's Bulletin Board.

It was supposed to be an encyclopedic forum, a place for Awakeners to find and share strategies.

The constellation managing it, [The Librarian of the Great Library], was a completely fabricated persona, and the entire board was meant to be an artificial construct, but—

"It's this, Hyung. This post right here."

"Oh?"

"The person you warned me about so many times... the one you called the 'pink entity' or something. I think this information is about her."

For some time now, information that I myself had never seen or heard before had begun to flow backward, appearing on the [Library Society's Bulletin Board].

"What?"

"Look. Starting from this passage."

Most of it, no, 99.99% of it, was just useless drivel. It was mostly childish roleplaying about this marquess or that baron.

But among them all, one post.

There was a single post that was far too meaningful to be dismissed as a simple lie.

"..."

"..."

"It's a little different from your explanation, Hyung, but it's very similar, isn't it?"

This was a post containing information about Go Yuri.

Information that I couldn't have obtained no matter the cost, even if I had sacrificed dozens of regressions for it, was now available for free on the [Library Society's Bulletin Board] of all places.

"No, that's impossible."

Naturally, I denied it at first.

"Any posts on here that aren't written by us, but are automatically generated by some anomaly... they're all set to private, aren't they?"

"They are."

"That means only members of our Regression Alliance can read this post. So this entity secretly passed on information about Go Yuri for our benefit... It's impossible."

Seo Gyu blinked.

"Then what is this, Hyung?"

"It's just an anomaly imitating the infinite monkey theorem."

"The what?"

"The theory that if you give a monkey a typewriter and an infinite amount of time, it will eventually type out the complete works of Shakespeare."

"Ohh..."

"This is just a coincidence. A coincidence. Some random anomaly that took up residence on the board has been spouting nonsense for so long that it accidentally produced a post that resembles information about Go Yuri."

Swoosh.

I took the phone from Seo Gyu and scrolled to the bottom of the post.

"It's nothing more than an elaborate piece of fake ne—"

And then I saw them.

S U

The initials carved at the very end of the post.

"..."

A simple two-letter signature, left without any warning or preamble.

And I had just found it.

"..."

"Hyung? What's wrong?"

SU.

It was a last will and testament. A code.

A secret that, in this entire world, was known only to me.

If you don't recall, a long time ago, Oh Dok-seo and I had a conversation. She told me about the prologue of a novel he'd read before the Void's advent, [Omniscient Regressor's Viewpoint].

– That's him. The prologue. The fake protagonist.

– ORV, I mean, ORV. The [Omniscient Regressor's Viewpoint] I read before the void's arrival. The prologue has the exact same story.

Hearing Oh Dok-seo's words, the past me had asked.

– Then does that novel also say why his head suddenly exploded?

– Of course. He's a real prophet.

The Prophet.

The ill-fated fake protagonist who possessed the ability to glimpse the future of this world. Because of that power, he saw far too much, and his head exploded the very instant he awakened it.

There were six such prophets in the world, and every single one met the same fate.

One of them, the prophet who awakened in Japan known only as 'Y', also died instantly.

But right before his death, Y used the last of his strength to scrawl a dying message on the ground.

S U

Those were the prophet's final words.

His first and last prophecy.

And.

'...it's a secret I have never told another soul.'

In other words.

'This document... is authentic.'

I didn't know how or why. The cause was unknowable.

But somehow, an 'Undertaker' from a different regression had used a secret code that only the Undertaker could know to deliver this information about Go Yuri to me.

A message sent, perhaps, at the cost of his own memories.

"Seo Gyu. Delete this post."

"What? Oh, right."

"And don't you ever mention this to anyone. Don't even let on that you saw it. Understand?"

"...Yes, Hyung. I will."

That's right.

Since that day, I have been armed. I possessed a small weapon, a sliver of information as sharp as a dagger, that I could use against Go Yuri's [Perception Distortion] and [Brainwashing].

Even now, as I infiltrated Yo-hwa's dream.

Even now, as she appeared in this cult's mansion as the private 'teacher' of the twin sisters.

Even in this moment, as I watched Go Yuri read from the Tao Te Ching across the desk.

'I will not be played by you any longer.'

That dagger was in my hand.

Behind Cheon-hwa's bright, eye-crinkling smile, my own dark gaze remained steady.

'I will expose what you truly are, Go Yuri.'

Footnotes:

Chapter 399

The Bereaved VII

Sinnoa

A Heart-pounding ☆ Private Tutoring session with Teacher Go Yuri!

A scenario straight out of an old dating sim had become my reality. And my heart, both its left and right ventricles, were genuinely pounding in response.

And so, after spending thirty minutes reading scriptures with Go Yuri, feeling like a spy who had infiltrated the heart of an enemy nation's intelligence agency, the result was in.

‘What is this?’

I was bewildered.

‘This is... a remarkably normal lesson, isn't it?’

Ah, the reason my inner monologue was so formal was that I was doing my absolute best to emotionally immerse myself in the character of 'Cheon-hwa', a young Miss from a prestigious family.

Putting aside my soul-baring method acting, Go Yuri's private lesson was... truly 'normal'.

My fears about what sort of bizarre heresies she would try to brainwash into the soft, developing minds of the twin sisters were proving to be entirely unfounded.

“Therefore, Miss Cheon-hwa.”

“Yes?”

“Just because your own name feels empty and void, there is no need to forcibly empty out your own identity as well.”

"…"

"Parents hold absolute power over a child. But you, Miss Cheon-hwa, are a wise person. You not only know how to think for yourself but can also take responsibility for your actions, so you are already no different from a respectable adult."

"Is that… so? Teacher?"

"Yes!"

Go Yuri beamed.

"Honestly, I've never met someone your age who is as brilliant as you are, Miss Yo-hwa. I believe you have more than enough reason to be proud of yourself. Ah. Of course."

Shhh, Go Yuri playfully crossed her index finger over her smiling lips.

"It would be troublesome if the leader were to find out just how clever you are."

"…"

"Freedom is power. It is a natural right given to all humans from the very beginning. So, until you have gained sufficient power, Miss Cheon-hwa, I would be grateful, though I'm sorry to ask, if you would keep that freedom suppressed."

Go Yuri's advice.

The private tutor's counsel was utterly appropriate.

I forced the facial muscles of Cheon-hwa to move. Without betraying any of that forced effort, I managed to shape it into a natural smile.

"Thank you, Teacher. I will keep that in mind."

'This isn't brainwashing.'

My thoughts proceeded on two separate tracks.

While my face and my tongue were wholly engaged with the 'Teacher' before me, the angle of my thoughts continued to delve deeper inward.

“However, this mansion is no different from my father's fortress. The helpers, too, only appear to be maids on the surface, but in reality, they are followers more ardent than anyone. In a place like this, how can a mere young girl like me possibly build up any strength?”

“Oh my. But I’m here, am I not! My Miss!”

‘If it's not brainwashing. This feels almost like…’

It seemed to be the exact opposite, as if she were trying to liberate the twin sisters, Cheon-hwa and Yo-hwa, from the chains of this pseudo-religious cult.

“Are you saying you will be on my side, Teacher?”

“Yes, haha. With such adorable girls like you, and as twin sisters no less. As a responsible adult, how could I possibly not help?”

“…”

I turned my head slightly.

“Nyaa…. Unni, I don’t like green chocolate….”

Beside me, my lovely sister, Yo-hwa, was drooling on my arm as she dozed off.

It couldn’t be helped. How many children at that age could genuinely focus while reading the Tao Te Ching together?

After stroking my sister's soft hair once, I turned my gaze back.

“Teacher. I have also heard many rumors about you.”

“Oh my. What kind of rumors are you referring to?”

“That you are a self-made woman who, despite being an Oechul, captivated Father’s heart in an instant and rose to the very cusp of an executive position.”

Oechul. Naechul.

These were slang terms used only within this time-honored pseudo-religious cult. Followers who were born into the cult and raised for generations were called Naechul, while those who had just recently joined were referred to as Oechul.

The cult's history dated back to the time of the Imjin War. I didn't know if it was fact or propaganda, but there was even an executive who had supposedly served the cult for twelve generations.

Perverts existed in this world. They possessed a disposition to value the times they had not lived in more than the times they had.

And into this fortress of time, built by such perverts, an Oechul had unexpectedly seeped in.

The being before me was clearly strange.

Just as it had always been.

“Is it your intention to steal the cult’s power and wealth by stealing my father's heart?”

“Oh, my my.”

“And by securing the trust of me, the successor, you plan to enjoy power for the next half-century?”

“Ahaha.”

It wouldn't be strange for her to falter at least a little when faced with such sharp animosity.

But Go Yuri’s lips, on the contrary, softened.

“Power. Authority. Ahh, what sweet words those are.”

“…?”

“Never mind half a century, it would be quite nice if it could be maintained for even twenty years, hmm, or maybe even ten years.”

“…”

A chill shot straight up my spine.

‘She knows.’

At this time. At this very moment.

At a point in time when modern civilization so casually holds firm its love and trust in the laws of physics, the being before me already knew.

‘This being knows that the world is going to end. She knows. Already.’

How?

‘Is she really the main culprit behind the arrival of the void? A prophetic ability? No. If she were a prophet, why is only Go Yuri's mind intact?’

‘Let's assume she knows the future. Then every single second of this present time would be incredibly precious. Just look at me! Just look at Old Man Scho. Haven't we lamented countless times how wonderful it would have been if we could have regressed just a little bit earlier before the arrival of the void!’

‘A time limit precious as gold.’

‘Why is she investing such time in something like giving private lessons to the twin sisters of a pseudo-religious cult? Why?’

“Oh my.”

Steadily.

Go Yuri’s eyes half-opened and stared directly at me.

“Why do you look so flustered? My Miss?”

“…”

“I believe I said something quite ordinary.”

The clockwork of my thoughts accelerated desperately.

I removed the grime from between the gears that I, as the ‘Undertaker’, had created. I eliminated the noise.

The oil of acting was hastily injected, and the cogs that made up the current marionette, the one named ‘Cheon-hwa’, began to creak and turn.

“What do you mean, an ordinary story?”

I acted, with the resolve to deceive not just humans but even gods.

“Just now, Teacher, it was as if you declared it. That our family’s glory, our cult's future, will last for 10 years at most.”

“Aha?”

“Of course, I dislike my father. But that absolutely does not mean I hate everyone who has come under the protection of our cult.”

“Hmm.”

Go Yuri’s eyes narrowed.

“—Certainly. Yes. From your position, my Miss, it could have sounded that way. I'm sorry! I spoke too carelessly.”

“…”

“When you become an adult, you sometimes pick up a habit of pretending to know things. For me to do that in front of someone as smart as you, my Miss. I am truly lacking. Will you forgive me?”

“…Yes.”

“Thank you. I always feel nothing but sorry towards you, my Miss.”

Bzzt, the smartphone buzzed for a moment.

It was Go Yuri's phone. As if she had known a message would arrive at this exact moment, she picked up the smartphone with a casual motion and looked down at it.

Glance.

"Hmm, oh dear. It seems it's already that time."

Go Yuri clapped her hands together.

Clap!

"Hwek?!"

At that, Yo-hwa, who had been in a deep slumber, shot her eyes open. Go Yuri smiled gently and took out a handkerchief.

With a different handkerchief from the one she used to wipe the chocolate from Yo-hwa's mouth before the lesson, she gently dabbed at the drool marks.

"Heup. Ah, aht, aht…."

"Well then, shall we review the last passage from the Tao Te Ching we studied today?"

Go Yuri whispered.

"The Way follows what is natural. How about it? It's a familiar phrase, isn't it? It's the one our Reverend recites the most, after all."

"Yes, yees! Teacher."

"All things in the world are imitations. Ah, saying it like that might get it confused with Plato, so…. it might be better to call them 'incomplete works'."

Nod-nod, Go Yuri bobbed her head.

Yo-hwa, with a face that knew nothing of the world, mimicked the teacher's gesture.

“Why are they incomplete works? Because the very act of humans giving names to things is imperfect.”

“…”

“Man follows the Earth. Humans are imperfectly given their names from the environment of the current era. You are a student. You are the child of certain parents…. The Earth follows Heaven. The environment of the current era reflects a fragment of the flow of all ages, of destiny. And Heaven follows the Way. Even destiny itself stems from a single path.”

“…The Way follows what is natural.”

“Yes. Only the path itself proceeds as a path, without relying on anything.”

Go Yuri let out a small laugh.

“Your father, my ladies, seems to believe that by casting away his name, he can become one with that path completely…. but I, I interpret that passage in the opposite way.”

“The opposite?”

“Even a single path ultimately culminates in a single person. If that is the case, then I ask you, for what reason can a single person not change that path?”

“…”

The Tao. The Path.

The Route.

As ‘Cheon-hwa’, I tilted my head as if I half-understood, but as the ‘Undertaker’, I was thrilled.

Go Yuri. Why, and how she had infiltrated this place, this pseudo-religious cult, I could not know.

But I was certain of one thing.

This mansion was an indispensable stepping stone in the ‘Route’ she had drawn in her mind.

“There is only one way to reach that point. It is to become a human as vast as the path of nature, as vast as the universe.”

Slide.

Go Yuri stood up.

“To put it another way, perhaps the Way follows Man. Man-as-is, and at the same time, destiny? Ahaha. Really, it's a problem how much I like this kind of old-fashioned way of speaking.”

“…”

“Well then, I will see you again next time. Miss Cheon-hwa, Miss Yo-hwa.”

Yo-hwa shot up to her feet and bowed her head deeply.

“Uung! Teacher! Goodbye!”

“…Goodbye. Teacher.”

I, too, went to the doorway to see the teacher off and bowed my head.

Step, step, step.

The sound of Go Yuri’s footsteps grew distant.

Down the long wooden hallway, befitting a grand mansion, the weight of Go Yuri’s presence grew fainter and fainter.

‘Is it finally over?’

The me inside heaved a sigh of relief.

Since I was still bowing my head to see the private tutor off, there was comparatively less need to pour my mental energy into maintaining my expression.

‘Still, the guide on SG Net was a huge help. By empathizing with Cheon-hwa's ego, with someone else’s ego, I was really able to deal with Go Yuri normally. Yes. Just proving this fact makes this cycle an unparalleled success…’

“Oh, by the way.”

Thud.

The footsteps stopped.

Her gaze latched onto the crown of my head.

I could feel it.

Even though she had already left the room, even though she had walked down the hallway, I could feel Go Yuri's eyes looking ‘this way’.

The gaze of her smiling eyes.

“Come to think of it, you haven't called me by my name even once today, Miss Cheon-hwa.”

“…”

“You used to say it so affectionately every day, so it feels a little empty now that you've suddenly stopped. Hehe. The title 'Teacher' is nice too, of course. But I really, really love the sound of your voice saying my name, Miss Cheon-hwa.”

“…”

“My name.”

Whisper.

“Could you say it for me just once?”

My heart pounded.

‘I’m under suspicion.’

Countless answers formed routes and branching points in my mind, only to be blocked. Go Yuri? Wrong answer. ■■■? Wrong answer.

Because.

“Pardon?”

I lifted the head I had kept bowed for so long. And, just like Cheon-hwa would, I smiled sweetly and tilted my head.

“I’m sorry, Teacher! I think you just said something. What was it you said?”

“…”

The correct answer was, ‘I couldn’t hear you’.

I wasn't suddenly acting out a hard-of-hearing character. As I said, Go Yuri had walked a fair distance from the room down the hallway.

And just a moment ago, Go Yuri had 'whispered' in an endlessly low voice.

There was no way I could have heard it.

A voice whispered by someone from that far away.

It would be impossible for the childhood 'Cheon-hwa', who had yet to awaken any aura or anything of the sort, to have heard it clearly.

“Ah. It’s nothing.”

Wave!

Go Yuri waved her left arm back and forth and said in a slightly louder voice.

“It’s nothing at all! My Miss! Well then, I’ll see you again next week-!”

“Yes! Teacher! Goodbye!”

Only then did Go Yuri's back completely disappear around the corner of the hallway.

I lowered the hand I had been waving back.

'…If I had panicked just now and answered rashly.'

What would have happened, I wonder.

"…"

I didn't even want to think about it.

Ignoring the maids, the shadow aberrations that began to roam the hallway again, I went back into the room and hugged Yo-hwa tightly.

"Woong? Unni?"

"…"

"What's wrong, Unni?"

Yo-hwa reached out her small hand and stroked my head. It should have been the exact same size as my own palm, and yet, why did it feel so small?

I murmured.

"I'll protect you, Yo-hwa."

"Huh?"

"From Father. From the cultists. From the inscrutable Oechul. Even if the world becomes strange. No matter what, your big sister will protect you."

"…"

Please, hurry and come, Sunbae (—me—).

To the 'me' (Cheon-hwa) right now, this world is far too vast, and far too dark.

Footnotes:

Chapter 400

The Bereaved VIII

Sinnoa

Let’s skip the pleasantries.

Hello, everyone. How have you all been?

I’m not quite sure who I’m speaking to right now. Which makes sense, because my own existence has become rather vague and ambiguous these days.

I was Infinite Void, then the Mastermind's miko, then Cheon Yo-hwa, then the Undertaker, and then Cheon-hwa again.

This level of identity confusion is practically a grand festival.

They say that if you take something too far, it becomes a work of art. If that’s true, then the current 'me' must have far surpassed Leonardo da Vinci.

The world is just a jumbled mess of anomalies and void anyway.

Keeping in step with the trend that will sweep the globe in just a few years, I, Cheon-hwa, have simply embodied the spirit of an early adopter.

But the world has a nature that seeks balance.

If someone is fast, then someone else must be slow.

That is the way of the world.

Therefore, even I, who has become a complete mess of identity confusion, can confidently declare this one thing.

“That son of a bitch, my sunbae, is taking his goddamn sweet time, ah, fuck.”

“Unni…?”

The rest has been omitted.

It has been five years since I entered this dream.

And still, that sunbae of mine, the Undertaker, has not shown even a single strand of his hair at the grand mansion of the pseudo-religious cult.

On the veranda of the mansion’s annex.

I stared up at the sky, which was sharply cut off by the line of the eaves, and muttered forlornly.

“You’re late, Sunbae… Will I turn into an anomaly at this rate?”

Yo-hwa, who was doing push-ups beside me, turned only her head to speak.

“You know what? Sometimes, unni, you seem like a moron.”

“Oh my. My dearest sister. If I am a moron, then due to the genetic similarities between twins, you would inevitably be registered as a moron too, so why would you spit towards the sky?”

“Ah, sorry. I misspoke. You always seem like a moron, Unni.”

“This can’t be.”

I was slightly shocked.

Where on earth did the child who, just a few years ago, would cry and whine, ‘I don’t want the chocolate ice cream unni brought me! I don’t want it! I’m not eating any more!’ disappear to?

“Well, whose fault do you think it is, huh? It’s the fault of the person who fed me mint ice cream for over half a year while calling it chocolate ice cream, isn’t it?”

“This is all father’s fault.”

I said gloomily.

“He said that as the daughter of a prestigious family and the successor to the cult, we must never forget our dignity and etiquette, and from the moment he forced us to use formal language with each other, your life was already over, little sister. How sad.”

“You use the same formal tone, unni! Yo!”

“I cannot forgive him, father. For the sake of my sister’s normalization, I must perform my filial duty as soon as possible.”

“...When I get married, I’m never having children. Leaving behind that kind of DNA for future generations would be a sin against humanity.”

Well.

Although I have been completely colored by the persona of ‘Cheon-hwa’ in this manner, from my appearance to my inner self, a corner of my mind still remembers the existence of the ‘Undertaker’.

A while ago.

I had a conversation like this with a Tutorial Fairy.

“Hoeee, Comrade Secretary General… We are continuing to extend the time in the dream as you commanded, but it’s starting to get dangerous.”

“What exactly is dangerous about it?”

“Hoek. The only way to increase the time you reside in a dream is to dream again within that dream. You are already at the fourth level, Comrade Secretary General… You are in a dream within a dream within a dream within a dream.”

“A dream within a dream. I see. So you’re saying I’m falling deeper into the world of unconsciousness where the pink entity wanders.”

“An accurate diagnosis, hoeee!”

The fan in my hand snapped shut and gently tapped the tip of my chin.

“It doesn’t matter. Proceed.”

“Hoeek?! I-Is that really okay?!”

“Yes. The world of unconsciousness has seven levels, after all.”

I smiled sweetly.

“We only need to hold out for three more years at most, and a new ‘tutor’ will arrive. Our objective is to endure until then. There’s no need to wait any longer than necessary.”

“Hoeee, if it’s only about three years, we can certainly finish within the fifth level, but…”

I had other calculations as well.

I didn't tell the fairies, but I secretly wanted to get closer to Go Yuri.

‘This is Yo-hwa’s dream. But from the moment Go Yuri appeared, it was no longer just Yo-hwa’s dream.’

The ‘data’ that constitutes this dream.

I had a suspicion, no, a certainty, that this data might have flowed in from Go Yuri’s side.

‘Data that I could never obtain on my own.’

I would use Go Yuri to ‘restore memories.’

To look into not only Yo-hwa’s memories, but Go Yuri’s as well.

It was a truly dangerous plan.

‘In the past, I would never have attempted such an operation, but… now that I've learned how to handle Go Yuri to some extent through the fortunate encounters on SG Net.’

It was a challenge well worth taking.

“Are you really okay, hoe?”

The fairy looked at me with worried, sparkling eyes.

“Comrade Secretary-General. It's not just your appearance, you've really changed a lot.”

“Hmm.”

“Originally, one’s ego is supposed to melt away limply in a dream, da-yeo. The very fact that you’ve endured this much proves your iron will, Comrade Secretary General, but I am still worried!”

Nod.

“It’s fine. I have my memories.”

“Hoeee.”

“Rather than worrying about me, all of you fairies should focus your entire effort on maintaining Yo-hwa’s identity.”

“Hieeek! W-We are already allocating sixty percent of our power to that! Are you saying we should reduce the Comrade Secretary General’s ratio even further from here?!”

“Yes.”

My eyes narrowed unconsciously.

“Discovering the pink entity by chance made the situation interesting, but we must not forget our original purpose.”

“…”

“Yo-hwa. Our objective is to plant the ‘memories with her sister’ into my younger sister’s unconscious, to repair, even if just a little, the abyss-like hole that has been bored through her.”

On the other hand, it doesn't matter if ‘I’ lose a bit of myself.

As mentioned, I have the [Complete Memory] ability, and……. Once I eventually wake up from this dream, I will return to my original self anyway.

“B-But…”

“Do it. That is an order from the Secretary General.”

“Hiiik! Y-Yes, I understand!”

The fairies scattered in a hurry.

“…”

I quietly closed one eye and looked up at the sky.

No one in this dream world had noticed, but that sky has looked exactly the same for the past four years.

The color tone of the sky. The shape of the clouds. The intensity of the light.

The fairies had been erasing, one by one, the resources they deemed unnecessary for implementing this world.

‘That’s right. In the end, it’s just like the days I spent with Yo-hwa when we were hunting Infinite Void.’

Back then, too, the world grew progressively smaller, eventually shrinking to the size of the student council room at Baekhwa Girls' High.

‘Back then, I was trying to kill Infinite Void one way or another. Now, I’m trying so hard to restore Infinite Void. …No, not Infinite Void, but Cheon-hwa.’

The affairs of life are just so cunning.

Unlike the unchanging sky, time continued to flow unpredictably.

“Hoe. Comrade Secretary General. We can no longer match the time even with the fourth level… I am ashamed to say it, but we will have to proceed to the fifth level!”

“Go ahead.”

“However, the synchronization rate between you and the young lady here is unusual. A somewhat strange incident might occur…”

Tilt.

“A strange incident?”

“This is a first for us as well, so we cannot be certain, hoee! But we believe without a doubt that you, Comrade Secretary General, will overcome any difficulty without panicking!”

The nature of the ‘strange incident’ was soon revealed.

“…?”

Immediately after entering the dream within the dream, surrounded by fairies as usual, I opened my eyes to a world that was strangely silent.

“Fairies?”

Silence.

The dream demons, who would always cling to me to the point of annoyance, crying ‘hoeeng hoeng’ whenever they had the chance, were nowhere to be seen.

“Fairy number 264?”

No reply.

“…”

Indeed.

The one who commands the Tutorial Fairies and wields absolute authority in the dream is—— the ‘Undertaker’, after all, not the young ‘Cheon-hwa’ I am now.

“Does this mean that from now on, I am the only one who remembers the real world.”

“Unni? What are you doing over there?”

I turned to face the direction the voice came from.

Yo-hwa. My one and only sister was the sole source of vibrant presence in the void of this dream-within-a-dream, where only shadows roamed.

I can see the ‘aliveness’ in my sister’s eyes as she tilts her head and looks at her unni. Yup.

“Then I suppose it doesn’t matter.”

“…Ah. It’s monologue time again, isn’t it? Sorry. Forgive me for interrupting your precious life as a chuunibyou patient. I’ll just be over here doing my strength training.”

“I’d appreciate it if you’d stop the habit of subtly dropping the formal speech and using informal language.”

“I don’t want to. You should try it later, Unni. It’s fun.”

“Really? Then I’ll try. You’ve finished reading the scriptures, right? You can’t forget that father plans to personally quiz you on passages from the scriptures next week.”

“I love you, Unni! Please pretend to be me and take the test in my place this time, too! I’m off to exercise for a life of slow aging! Bye! Love you!”

“…”

What a naughty little sister.

Where has the sister who used to be so lovely gone? I feel like I should file a claim for damages against the universe.

Regardless of my grumbling, time flowed on.

Around this time it was becoming difficult to access the memories of the ‘Undertaker’ without conscious effort.

“Hah. Take a look at this, Yo-hwa.”

“Yes?”

“An interesting article has come out.”

Tap, tap.

My father flicked the newspaper with his finger.

My goodness, a ‘newspaper’. These days, even the elderly are enjoying a second life as smartphone addicts, father.

As expected, I must perform the traditional filial piety that has been passed down on the Korean peninsula since the Goryeo dynasty as soon as possible.

“This time, only one person got a perfect score on the CSAT. And the interview is quite amusing.”

“…?”

I leaned in, wondering how interesting an interview with a perfect scorer could possibly be.

———————————

Q. What is your religion?

A. “Taoism. My friends always look at me strangely when I say I believe in Taoism, but I really do believe in it. It’s deeply connected with self-discipline and cultivating the mind.”

———————————

“…”

“What do you think? Yo-hwa?”

My father wore a pleased expression.

“Your sister is always worrying that Taoism lacks expandability, but look. Even a student from another region, not one of our cult’s Naechul, says they believe in Taoism on their own!”

It seemed my father was subtly demanding recognition for his discerning eye.

Well. The fact that he believed I was his younger sister ‘Yo-hwa’ just because I, his older daughter, put on a little disguise, already proved that my father’s eye sockets had a pretty high compatibility rate with knotholes.

“Heeeh. That really is amazing.”

I decided to play the part of my younger sister without reservation and satisfy my father’s desire.

Recently, the faction within the cult that revered ‘Cheon-hwa’ had been growing.

It was only natural. No matter how much of an identity crisis I was going through, I had the knowledge and experience of a ‘protagonist’ to assist me.

Even my father, who wielded absolute power in the cult, had no choice but to be devoured if he granted me this much time over several years.

My father himself must be feeling a strange sense of anxiety.

That’s why he stuck closer to ‘Yo-hwa’ than to ‘Cheon-hwa’, acting as if to show off their intimacy to those around him.

“Sometimes, an outsider like that has to come in for a fresh breeze to blow through the cult. Indeed!”

“Ahaha.”

He wants to advertise that the power to select the successor lies with him, but… does this father of mine know?

That clinging to the right to name a successor is itself a bad move. The fact that it doesn’t suit the ‘Cult Leader’ who should be an agent of a god and the king of the cult at all.

Above all, there is no way my sister could become my rival.

A future where the assets of the cult, including Baekhwa Girls' High, are handed over to Yo-hwa.

That is truly impossible, unless I were to one day offer myself as a sacrifice to suppress an Outer God and be [Sealed].

Ahahahaha. A Time Sealer joke!

Time passed.

"Miss Cheon-hwa. Miss Yo-hwa."

One day. During a tutoring session.

Our tutor, Teacher Go Yuri, who had taught us various kinds of 'external knowledge' since we were young, once a week, closed the scripture and spoke.

"I'm very sorry, but it will be difficult for me to conduct classes starting next week."

"What?!"

Yo-hwa, who had been leisurely munching on a chocolate ice bar, was startled.

"What do you mean, Teacher?"

"I'm truly sorry. A family matter has come up."

Teacher wore an expression that would make anyone feel that she was being completely sincere in her apology.

"Starting next week, my successor will come and conduct the classes."

"Eh, a successor…"

"Fufu. From now on, you ladies will also have to seriously consider preparing for the CSAT. In that field, my successor will be able to teach you much better than I can."

I slightly closed one eye.

“It seems you know this person, Teacher?”

“Yes.”

Smile.

Go Yuri-Teacher smiled.

“I know them very very well.”

“…”

“They’re someone who has even received a perfect score on the CSAT. I don’t think you’ll need to have any doubts about their skill!”

What was there to hide.

The person who came to our mansion’s study room a week after Teacher Go Yuri’s sudden resignation.

“——Hello. It’s a pleasure to meet you. Miss Cheon-hwa, Miss Yo-hwa.”

He had the face of someone I knew well.

“My name is ■■■.”

The Undertaker.

“I have been faithfully handed all the materials regarding your academic progress from the previous teacher.”

The ‘me’ from before the world was destroyed.

The ‘me’ from before the advent of the void.

“Your achievements are both excellent.”

“…”

“It’s just that the university your parents want for you is Seoul University, so you need a pacer. Your school records are not a problem. Between us, I was told that the school you both attend is in a very… ‘special situation’.”

The man gave a slight smile.

The one whose whereabouts I could never find, no matter how much I searched through the data, who only revealed a tiny glimpse of himself when I explored Yu Ji-won’s past to fill in the empty canvas.

The missing person of this world.

The secret figure that no one knew.

“Well then, shall we begin our first class?”

Finally.

He appeared before me.

Footnotes:

Chapter 401

The Bereaved IX

Sinnoa

“Unni, did’cha know…”

“Use formal speech.”

“You know.”

“Yes. What is it?”

“I think… I might be in love.”

“That’s why you should make a habit of using formal speech, you’ll get an earful from Father if he finds out… Excuse me? What did you just say?”

“I’ve fallen in love.”

One day, my cute little sister confessed her feelings to me like that. I put down the pen I was studying with and whipped my head around to look at her.

“Oh. Um. I see. Right...”

“Unni, your eyes suddenly look scary.”

“My eyes are your eyes. If I look scary to you, it must be because of your own desire to see something frightening. So, who is it?”

“Teacher.”

“Ah. Your old teacher? Hmm. I don’t think our family would approve of a same-sex relationship, but don’t you worry, little sister! After I send Father on an amazing, all-expenses-paid trip, I’ll completely overhaul these damn family traditions and——”

“No. My current tutor.”

“…”

“Hey, now. Don’t look at me like that. If you glare any harder, you might actually kill someone. Come on, unni. This is your lovely sister’s first love, her first romance. You’re going to help me, right?”

Indeed.

So, my younger sister has fallen in love with the future ‘me’, and I am supposed to personally provide every form of support to make that love come true?

“Hmm…”

This is just not right.

Long ago, a man in ancient Greece who got his kicks from starting flame wars with people, and was finally branded a community troll and sentenced to death, was fond of using this phrase.

I, too, have recently taken this wise saying to heart.

A person who does not know their own nature, who pretends to be knowledgeable about the world but is ignorant about themselves, is a truly sad existence.

In that spirit, I will say this.

“What a thieving bitch.”

“Excuse me? Miss Cheon-hwa?”

“Oh, it’s nothing. Hehe. I was just thinking deeply about someone and a monologue slipped out by accident!”

“Ah. I see, is that so? Well. I’m used to it, as I have an acquaintance who is particularly prone to talking to himself.”

“Oh my. Is that right?”

“Yes. It’s someone you know as well, Miss Cheon-hwa. The one who taught you and your sister before...”

“Ah. You mean our first Teacher. You two must be close?”

“Haha, close, you say. Well! We are certainly on familiar terms.”

“A one-of-a-kind thieving bitch.”

“Pardon?”

“Ah, I’m sorry. My Habitual Convulsive Monologue Syndrome seems to have burst through my lips again.”

“...”

“What is it? What are you looking at? Ah. I suppose this is your first time seeing the daughter of a man who runs a religious order from a multi-thousand-pyeong mansion on the most sought-after mountainside in Sejong City. I can see how you’d find it fascinating.”

“Ah, it’s nothing.”

■■■ before my eyes, no.

Let’s just call him the ‘Undertaker’ to make things simpler.

This Undertaker is, in short, the me of the past. The first-cycle regressor.

If you were to ask what makes a first-cycle regressor different from a normal person… that’s just it.

There is no difference.

A regressor who has never regressed! What is that!

It’s a step beyond a fish-shaped bun without the fish, it’s a fish-shaped bun without the bun!

It would just fall apart in your hand! The red bean paste!

You can't even eat it!

Food that cannot be eaten. We have agreed to call such things food waste.

"This piece of trash."

"...?!"

The first-turn Undertaker flinched at my low mutter. Oh? What's this? Are you succumbing to such a faint amount of killing intent?

Ah, how pathetic, the me of the past.

But of course! How could a young, pipsqueak, amateur, piece of trash who is far from his 100th cycle, let alone his 1,000th, possibly withstand my pressure!

"W-well then. Miss Cheon-hwa. Shall we end the break here and move on to the next chapter..."

"Do you have a retirement plan?"

"Excuse me?"

"Do you have a way to stably manage your assets to keep up with inflation?"

"Uh, um... Pardon?"

"Oh, I'm sorry. Of course, you don't even have any seed money yet. We sisters are so privileged that I failed to be considerate. Let me rephrase the question. By when, how much, and by what means do you plan to secure your seed money?"

"..."

"Surely, you don't mean to say you have no plan at all?"

"Heek!"

"I see. You plan to trust in your youthful vigor and fighting spirit and just roll with the punches. I don't dislike such a youthful approach, but that lack of a plan is precisely why you've been rolling for over ten thousand years! Did you know that?!"

"I'm not sure what you mean but I apologize!"

"You're not even sure, and yet you dared to seduce my little sister?!"

"N-no. That's not it. I have absolutely no intention of doing such a thing. In the first place, even if Miss Yo-hwa were to harbor such feelings, I fully intend to refuse her..."

"Hah? You dare refuse my sister's confession?!"

"…Please spare me."

This is getting nowhere!

Even as I looked down at the Undertaker, who had gotten up from his chair only to prostrate himself flat on the floor, my anger hadn't subsided, and I continued to fume.

How could a person be so unmanly!

…That's me!

That thing grew up to become me!

So this is how Archer felt!

"Um, Miss."

"Yes...?"

"Might a humble person such as myself be so bold as to ask why you are prostrated right next to me?"

"Please be quiet."

"Yes, ma'am."

Well. It wasn't a total loss.

‘The fact that the Undertaker of this period knew Go Yuri. No, it seems certain that they were more than just simple acquaintances, they were likely cooperating closely… That much is clear.’

I had already inferred as much during the summer I spent with the middle-school-aged Yu Ji-won.

‘I’m sure of it.’

It was extremely valuable information.

However, the question of where this information could have possibly originated from still remained.

‘This is Yo-hwa’s dream. But there’s no way Yo-hwa would remember this.’

‘Even if the tutorial fairies did their best, they couldn’t have restored the details about Go Yuri and the Undertaker.’

‘If that’s the case…’

Is this Go Yuri’s dream?

‘It’s more plausible to think that from the depths of the unconscious world, Go Yuri’s data has flowed backward like a sewer in the rainy season.’

It was bizarre.

I had only entered this dream of the past to fill the □ in Yo-hwa, the hole that had been bored open in my sister’s heart.

‘Somehow… Yo-hwa’s □ is connected to Go Yuri’s unconscious world? Why?’

A complete mystery.

Just how much of this dreamscape I’m looking at now is true, and from what point is it contaminated data?

“That’s a question to be answered from now on.”

"..."

"Ah, were you complying with my request to be quiet? Well done! You may now faithfully answer my questions."

"Understood."

As I stood up, the Undertaker followed suit, and we sat facing each other across the desk.

Clap, clap!

I clapped my hands, and the lights in the study turned off.

They're sound-activated. Undertaker jumped in surprise, as if encountering a marvel of the new generation. Every one of his reactions screamed that he came from nothing.

"Let me say this in advance, Sunbae."

"Sunbae?"

"Ah. The title of 'Teacher' is already mortgaged to one person. Yo-hwa doesn't seem to care about such naming and calling conventions, but it's a very important matter to me."

"..."

"It's a given that I'll get into Seoul National University anyway. So I'll call you Sunbae in advance. That's alright, isn't it?"

"Yes. Of course."

"Then, my first question. What exactly is your relationship with our sisters' 'Teacher'?"

Undertaker's expression hardened.

He's so naive. I can practically hear the gears turning in his head as he tries to figure out how to speak to avoid my suspicion and earn my trust.

"For your reference, I dislike lies very, very much. Enough to jeopardize the tutoring fee that was promised to you, Sunbae.”

“…The money doesn’t matter.”

“The ones who say money doesn’t matter are always the most shackled by it.”

I opened my fan to cover my mouth. A little attack here should be enough to make him reveal an opening.

“I heard the news. That you have a child you hold very dear.”

“Pardon?”

“Where was it? Ah, it was in Seoul. Some village… Ahaha. I’ve forgotten the name.”

Then, casually.

I took a magazine from the bookshelf and opened it.

In that magazine was a photo of a very beautiful girl, a picture of a lookbook model.

“…!”

Suddenly, Undertaker’s eyes widened.

“You, this. Ji-won… How.”

“I’m a fan, you see. Of this person.”

“…”

Now his face was finally worth looking at.

“She lives while supporting her grandmother all by herself. How admirable. But there’s a limit to how much she can earn just from modeling. She must be desperate for someone’s income.”

“…What do you want from me?”

“The truth. Information.”

Thump. I closed the magazine.

“I’ll ask again, Sunbae. The teacher who was responsible for our childhood. The one who helped us breathe in this hellish mansion. What is your relationship with our ‘Teacher’?”

A long silence followed.

“…You won’t believe me even if I tell you.”

“The truth is decided by the powerful.”

Undertaker took a small breath.

A moment later, his eyes, now filled with resolve, looked straight at me. Hmm. This has a bit of spirit, it's not so bad…

“The world is going to end.”

Blink.

“What?”

“You can think of it as a prophecy. But I consider this to be a confirmed future. It’s information given to me by none other than the ‘Teacher’ you mentioned.”

“…”

“I see it’s still hard for you to believe.”

“N-no.”

That’s——not it.

There was another reason for my shock.

‘The fact that the world will end, the me of this period, the first-cycle Undertaker, already knew about it?!’

That’s impossible!

‘Th-then why did he let Old Man Schopenhauer lose Lady Adele?

The end of the world. If he knew that the White Night would come to Seoul... he could have evacuated her!'

'If not that, then. Did he intend for it? Did he intentionally neglect her? Lady Adele's death? Why?'

Undertaker's voice flowed into my chaos-filled mind.

"Should I stop here?"

"…No. Please continue."

"Understood."

The Undertaker spoke calmly.

"There are several causes for the world's destruction, but among them, the primary cause is you two. Miss Cheon-hwa and Miss Yo-hwa."

"Excuse me?"

"You two young ladies are confirmed to bring about the destruction of this world... To be more precise, you will summon the main culprits who will bring about that destruction."

"..."

The gods.

The Yang of the Taegeuk. The Infinite Void.

The Ying of the Taegeuk. The Mastermind.

"We call them the Outer Gods."

Not just gods, but Outer Gods?

Did the me of this period… no. Did the team that Go Yuri and I formed officially adopt the term Outer God?

"The descent of the Outer Gods cannot be avoided."

“…Excuse me, but couldn't we just be eliminated? You said we are the ones who will summon them.”

“Even if you young ladies do not summon them, the Outer Gods will descend one way or another. This is also confirmed information.”

“…”

“No, in fact, the situation would become worse. As you can see, you ladies are capable of rational conversation. But if other candidates are chosen as sacrifices for the Outer Gods—they become almost impossible to control.”

Hah, a hollow laugh escaped my lips.

‘The verification is complete?’

In other words, he has experienced regressions where people other than Cheon-hwa and Yo-hwa were chosen as the ‘Priestess of the Infinite Void’ and ‘Priestess of the Mastermind’.

He has lived through such cycles.

Which means…

‘This place right now… isn’t the [first cycle]?’

My head was spinning.

The sensation of the common sense I had believed in until now being shaken to its very core.

“Miss? Are you alright? Perhaps it would be best to end this story here.”

“No.”

I said firmly, pressing a hand to my forehead. I stared directly at the Undertaker’s face between my fingers.

“Please continue.”

“…I am sorry to say this, but your teacher’s appointment as a tutor in this mansion was also all part of a plan.”

“Aha. To gain our favor? To build up goodwill from a young age, so that you can manipulate us as you please when we later become the priestesses of the Outer Gods?”

“That is not it.”

Undertaker said.

“It was to save you.”

...?

“Originally, you two were destined to lose your sense of self the moment the Outer Gods descended. It’s only natural. You have been exposed to the brainwashing of a cult leader since the day you were born. Becoming the sacrifices for the Outer Gods is your only raison d'être, the only joy in your life.”

“What are you talking about. Yo-hwa and I have properly lived our own lives...”

“How was that possible?”

Undertaker’s eyes narrowed.

“You shouldn't have had any other choice. Your mother, who at least cared for you with love, passed away early. Your father treated you as nothing more and nothing less than living sacrifices. The cult members working in the mansion were all minions who agreed with the leader’s thoughts.”

“...”

“So what external factor could have possibly been introduced that allowed you to grow not as the successors and sacrifices of the cult, but as proper, individual personalities?”

“That’s…”

Go Yuri.

“Because of Teacher.”

“…”

“Is that not correct?”

Ah.

“Originally, the scripture reading class was such a critical time that the cult leader himself should have overseen it. It was the first task in raising his successors. Naturally.”

“But…”

“Yes. But your teacher intercepted that crucial time. Because your teacher worked incredibly hard to earn the complete and utter trust of the cult leader.”

“…”

“The person who recommended me to the cult leader as his successor was also your teacher.”

If that’s the case.

“In the interview for getting a perfect score on the CSAT… answering that I believed in Taoism was also deliberately done to make an impression on Father…”

“Correct.”

Undertaker nodded.

“Even the reporter who conducted that interview was someone your teacher arranged. It was thanks to knowing which newspaper the cult leader enjoyed reading.”

“…”

“Miss Cheon-hwa. You must become the sacrifice. Because…”

In the past. From this point on. Already.

“Only you, Miss, are the perfect candidate who can summon the Outer Gods and still maintain your own self, who can still remain human.”

——A regressor… had existed all along.

Footnotes:

Chapter 402

The Bereaved X

Sinnoa

“...Miss. I have, as you commanded, delivered the truth, the unadulterated information, without adding or subtracting anything.”

Undertaker's voice seeped through the haze of my consciousness like a whisper.

"Ah, yes. Yes. I heard you."

I quickly came to my senses. The Undertaker was looking at this face with a peculiar expression.

Since it was none other than ‘my’ own face, it wasn't difficult to guess his inner thoughts.

Tension, suspicion…

That was to be expected. He must have been wondering if the person before him would actually believe his words, his outrageous claims about the world's destruction and outer gods.

And on top of that, resolve. And a hint of… guilt?

I wasn't quite sure about that last one. No. Perhaps for Undertaker, sharing the 'truth' here today was an unexpected development.

'If that's the case, sharing this much information was his own unilateral decision, made without consulting Go Yuri… Ah, I see.'

So that was the reason for the guilt.

'His thoughts must be, My independent action could disrupt the plan my colleague has established. That's why he feels apologetic.'

Even without a [Status Window] or [Mind Reading], I could see right through him.

Because of that, I was able to calm my own flustered heart.

Yes. Right now, the Undertaker was even more nervous than I was.

I would rather bite my tongue and die than show a less-than-reliable version of myself to my own past self.

“Of course, I know this must be difficult to believe. To suddenly speak of destruction in a world like this, I must seem like a lunatic. But we….”

"No. I believe you."

"Pardon?"

Undertaker's eyes widened.

While I felt a sadistic glee at his dumbfounded expression, I suppressed the heart of 'Cheon-hwa' and spoke calmly.

"I've spent my whole life among cultists who believe lies to be the truth and dismiss the truth as lies, you know. I'm confident that I've at least developed a discerning eye for figuring out what is a lie and what isn't."

“…”

"Objectively, it might be a lie. But at the very least, I can feel that you, Sunbaenim, truly believe your own words."

"Th-then—"

"Yes."

I smiled.

"I'll believe you. That you and my teacher are in a cooperative relationship. And that the purpose of that cooperation is to save the world from its end."

“What a relief!”

Undertaker's face brightened.

At the same time, the atmosphere in the study room, which had been stretched taut with tension like one of Ha-yul's puppet strings, eased considerably.

“I knew it. The moment I saw you, Miss, I could tell you were an exceptionally sharp person.”

Was he congratulating himself on a successful gamble? The Undertaker hummed, openly showing his good mood.

"My friend told me I shouldn't let my guard down until the very end. Still, I trusted my own eyes."

"Yes? Your friend…"

"Ah. I'm talking about your teacher, Miss."

I blinked.

"My teacher… was suspicious of me?"

"Yes. What was it she said? That you seemed different from your usual self."

“…”

"She repeatedly warned me to be cautious, saying that although she couldn't pinpoint it, something felt off. Anyway, that friend of mine worries too much for her own good."

It was at that moment.

The world's colors vanished.

Undertaker, who had been chattering right in front of me, stopped. It wasn't that he stopped on his own accord. Literally, everything came to a halt.

The sky blue cycled to gray. The walls cycled into black and white dots. The low whispers of the cultists that could be heard from beyond the door ceased, and all the colors in the study room faded to monochrome.

And in the midst of it all.

"Ahaha."

Step.

"Really, I had a feeling this would happen."

From beyond the room's door.

The sound of footsteps and a voice drew closer.

"Something felt strange, you know. Hmmm. I haven't particularly changed this time around. So why has Cheon-hwa Miss become so clever?"

Step, step, step.

My whole body was frozen, and I could only let the 'sound' approach, growing clearer and clearer.

"Did her DNA change? Unlikely. I haven't touched a single thing about the surrounding environment that led to the birth of Miss Cheon-hwa and Miss Yo-hwa. If I meddle carelessly, you twins could have miscarried far too easily, you see."

The other person seemed to know this as well.

And for good reason.

"It's a simple conclusion. A change occurred. But the 'external' environment is unchanged. Then it's clear the change originated from the 'internal' environment."

She was whispering just like that.

As if she were certain I could hear her, no matter how quietly she murmured.

Whisper, whisper. Step. Whisper.

The 'sound' drawing ever closer to the door whispered in a seemingly cheerful tone.

"So I tried stepping down from my position as teacher a little earlier than planned. Ehehe. I had a small hope that perhaps my opponent would let their guard down, thinking I had disappeared, and reveal their true colors."

"…"

"Thank you for meeting my expectations, Miss. Ah! Is that not right? You wouldn't be Miss Cheon-hwa, after all."

Creeak.

The door opened.

"Is it Mr. Nameless anomaly?"

Through the crack in the door, I saw a pair of eyes smiling.

"Ugh."

In this world that had faded to monochrome, only the eyes were visible through the crack in the door. Only the smiling eyes. Only the face. Only the hair.

They retained their 'color' as if it were the most natural thing in the world, glistening with a sleek sheen.

Like a poisonous herb.

"W-wait a moment! Please wait!"

"Yes. I'll wait for you."

Creeak, the door opened completely.

The figure revealed there was the very image of Teacher 'Go Yuri', not a bit different from when she had left, saying she would quit being my tutor.

Neat clothes. Elegant hair.

And even a smile that seemed to define everything in the world.

"I'm not an anomaly! I have no intention of being hostile towards any of you! I just… It's a very long story, but I came here because I want to know the truth."

"Yes."

Step, she was approaching.

Even though I had asked her to wait. Even though she said she would wait.

As if such 'words' held no value whatsoever.

"Anomalies, you see, usually say things like that."

"I'm not! I'm the future of this person, the one who is frozen here!"

"Oh my. Now that's a little interesting."

Step.

"But it's not enough. Anomalies often mimic speech to draw my interest. Could you cry out a little more interestingly for me, Miss?"

"Th-this place is a dream. It's not reality! I accessed this place through Yo-hwa's dream."

"Not enough."

Step.

"A little more."

"In the future, you aren't human. You're an anomaly! But I was certain you held a clue to the world's destruction. So, to reclaim Yo-hwa's lost memories. That's why I came. With the help of the Tutorial Fairies… and the power of the nightmare!"

"Not enough. A little more."

Step.

"Ms. Go Yuri!"

“…”

Right in front of my nose.

Go Yuri stopped.

Her lips parted, and from within the abyss of a bottomless well where only darkness could be seen, a bright red tongue flickered.

"How interesting."

A scent, like crushed and peeled apple skins, a breath, brushed past my face.

"Wherever did you hear that name?"

"Y-you introduced yourself. Ms. Go Yuri. We can cooperate. I don't know what kind of plan you have at this point in time, but if you would at least share your information with me, I could carry on your work—"

"No."

Squeeze.

Go Yuri held my head steady with both hands. My cheeks were pressed lightly.

Her eyes were looking deep, so very deep into me.

"The one to disclose information isn't me. It has to be you. Mr. Mysterious anomaly."

"I'm…"

My lips trembled.

"I'm not an anomaly—"

"I told you, didn't I?"

Go Yuri smiled sweetly.

"Anomalies usually say things like that."

Pop!

The sensation of something bursting.

That was the end of that cycle.

…I was careless.

Yes. I'll admit it honestly. In my impatience and excitement to get information somehow, I inadvertently underestimated how dangerous Go Yuri was.

But please, try to understand.

If you had been stuck for over 1,000 cycles and you finally saw a clue to a world secret you could never figure out, wouldn't you pounce on it like a dog?

I still have a long way to go, it seems.

But I digress.

…There was still no evidence to confirm whether Go Yuri was another 'regressor' or a different kind of ability user.

Still, one thing was certain, Go Yuri was at least on 'equal footing with a regressor.' Whether she had become a prophet or something else.

She knew the future, and she was pioneering a route to break through that despair-filled future.

In that case… What element would Go Yuri be most wary of?

As a regressor myself, I can say with certainty.

It's a 'variable'.

The appearance of a variable in a world that constantly repeats is, in itself, a serious matter.

An anomaly. It's a very clear sign that an anomaly, with a high probability of being Outer God-class, has interfered.

And these Outer Gods usually possess powers like 'mental brainwashing' or 'reality distortion' as if it's a given.

There's a high chance that my mind could become contaminated just by conversing with her.

From Go Yuri's perspective, I was a virus that rightfully needed to be eliminated.

'More thoroughly this time.'

In the next cycle, I followed the exact same route and once again infiltrated Yo-hwa's dream.

However.

'This time, for real, I will completely assimilate with Cheon-hwa's psyche. I will absolutely not reveal my ego as the [Undertaker].'

So that Go Yuri would never find out.

One mistake was always enough.

——Again, time flowed.

This time, I avoided drawing Go Yuri's 'interest' by rashly distinguishing myself.

I was Cheon-hwa. The successor raised as a sacrifice for a pseudo-religious cult. I assimilated 99% into that role, and nothing more.

"Miss Cheon-hwa. Miss Yo-hwa. I'm sorry, but it seems it will be difficult to hold classes starting next week."

My childhood was spent with Go Yuri. The subsequent tutoring sessions with the Undertaker also passed without incident.

I watched from the side as Yo-hwa developed her first crush on the Undertaker, and observed as Cheon-hwa built her trust with the Undertaker over time.

I followed the correct course of history to the letter.

And perhaps it paid off.

"Cheon-hwa."

"Hm? Sunbae?"

"I've already spoken to your father, but it'll be difficult to have class next week. If anything comes up, feel free to contact me anytime."

In an instant, D-Day drew near.

Just one more week until June 17th.

Yes, the day the Void arrived in Seoul, and the point in time where the Undertaker always began his regression.

The day it all began.

The absolute point of no return for his regressions, a past to which he could never go back to, no matter how much he struggled.

"Heung."

My heart pounded.

It was a golden opportunity to witness the truth of that day with my own two eyes.

But right now I am 'Cheon-hwa'. I suppressed that abnormal palpitation and smiled cheerfully, pretending to know nothing.

"Well, I'm sure you have your reasons, Sunbae. I don't mind. But I wonder if Yo-hwa will be a little disappointed."

"Ahaha. I'll leave Yo-hwa in your hands."

My relationship with the Undertaker, which had been stiff at first, had softened to the point where we could freely exchange jokes.

'But, Undertaker's face is far too peaceful.'

In one week. Even though the world would begin to end in earnest on June 17th.

Even though Yo-hwa was about to be trapped in Baekhwa Girls' High and wander through hell until she reached the 109th cycle.

I felt no particular signs of abnormality from the Undertaker's hand as he patted my shoulder.

Time passed, and it was June 17th.

"…"

I was in my room, staring intently at the clock. It read 13:30.

'The void arrives in Seoul at 14:00. That's when Miss Adele dies. Old Man Scho loses his wife forever.'

Tick-tock.

The clock hands moved just a little slower than the wick of anxiety burning in my heart.

'Any second now. 5 seconds, 4 seconds, 3 seconds, 2 seconds.'

And then—— Tick.

'The void has arrived!'

I looked out the window.

The sky was perfectly serene, but I knew. I knew that at this very moment, the world had taken a decisive step toward its destruction.

'South of the Han River in Seoul has just been devastated this very second. Miss Adele has died, and the nucleus of the Ten Legs has been born. Undertaker must have finally begun his own first cycle!'

'Now. Show me.'

'What on earth... happened... in this missing past?'

It happened at that moment.

"Huh?"

Something.

“……? Hm, …huh?”

Something.

It vanished from my head.

No. To say it vanished from my head isn't accurate. From my memories, from my consciousness.

——'Something' disappeared from within my soul.

“…?”

A strange feeling.

A normal person might have brushed it off as a weird sense of déjà vu… But I still had my self-awareness as Undertaker, even if it was only 1%.

The faint memory of having been preparing for an incredibly momentous and dangerous moment just a moment ago… also remained.

And so, just barely. Truly, by a hair's breadth.

I was able to realize that the 'something' I had just lost was far too precious to be casually ignored.

□.

It was as if a hole had been punched through my heart.

'What did I lose? Just now?'

I listed the precious beings in my life in order.

'Yo-hwa, my lovely sister. Sunbae. The one who taught me that humans existed in the outside world. Mother. She passed away early, but I haven't forgotten her. And…'

And?

'And… was there anything else precious in my life? The cultists? No. That wouldn't be a huge problem if I lost them.'

Huh?

'Right. I haven't lost anything.'

No.

'From a young age, I was exposed to my father's brainwashing, but because I was exceptionally smart, I was able to avoid falling for such tricks. It was by my own strength alone.'

"…"

'Furthermore, I even saved my younger sister from the clutches of brainwashing. Just the two of us, my sister and I, deceiving our father, we managed to survive while maintaining our identities.'

"…"

'And then I met Sunbae for the first time. Sunbae. He was the very first person to teach us sisters about the world. Not a pseudo-religious cult like this, nor a school tainted by the cult, but the real outside. The outside world…'

That's not right.

"…?"

That was wrong.

'You' couldn't have noticed. Of course. Because you weren't given the ways and means to protect your own memories from the void poison.

But 'I' was different. Not the 'I' of the past, but the 'I' who had reached this point through countless coincidences and inevitabilities, could see through the fragments of this distortion.

“…Go Yuri.”

That was it.

"Go Yuri, Teacher."

You forgot that existence.

Just now. At 2 PM on June 17th.

Casually. As if it were the most natural thing in the world.

"Ah."

Drip.

The dream crumbled away. Melted wax dripped from the sky, and with every drip, color was erased, cycling the space monochrome.

It couldn't be helped. The moment Cheon-hwa became aware of that 'lost existence', the dream had already become too different from the past.

I could no longer be Cheon-hwa.

I was Undertaker.

Awakening.

“…”

I looked around.

The cafeteria of Baekhwa Girls' High. The students trapped in the tutorial dungeon were sleeping in a group, having laid out blankets and such here and there.

I had spread my bedding at the cafeteria entrance to protect the children. And, next to me, Fairy No. 264 lay dead, torn to shreds.

Amidst the quiet, sinking breaths all around, I touched my forehead and murmured inwardly.

'The hole bored into Yo-hwa's heart… The void, it wasn't just her twin sister.'

□.

It wasn't just her sister, Cheon-hwa, who was there.

'Go Yuri.'

The teacher who had taught the twin sisters since they were children.

'The existence of Go Yuri had vanished.'

She had disappeared.

Footnotes:

Chapter 403

The Bereaved XI

Sinnoa

What does it mean to trust someone?

I will confess honestly to you all. I, the Undertaker, have lived for far too long.

I had always thought so, but seeing the [1st cycle's Undertaker] made the feeling all the more distinct. That the me of today had become far too old for a human.

The word old man was not enough. I was beyond old. I had transcended aging. Truly, a new horizon of oldness was being updated daily because of me.

Seventies? Eighties? Oh, I'm sorry, but compared to me, they were no different than young children.

Just think about it. Even that old geezer Schopenhauer probably couldn't return from his 'vacation' even if he wanted to, because he wouldn't have the stamina.

According to the Confucian sayings that old man loved so much, how dare a young whelp, huh, raise his head so stiffly to me, someone so much older.

I trusted Cheon-hwa.

I also trusted Yo-hwa.

To trust another person. At some point, that had become extremely natural for me, overlapping in meaning with 'to trust a child.'

I hope they grow up well.

Even if they don't grow up well, that's okay. As long as they are safe. I hope they get along with their precious family.

For me, the words ‘to trust someone’ were identical to a declaration that I would take responsibility for that child.

And so, upon my return from the Arabian Nights of the dream within a dream, I immediately went to the gravestone on the rooftop of the Tower of Babel and cheerfully rambled on about the whole story.

“Cheon-hwa! There were a number of mishaps, but in any case, it was a success. In your sister's subconscious, there will now be a vague feeling and longing for her lost older sister!”

“…”

“Hoo. No psychiatrist in this world could alleviate psychopathological symptoms as well as I can. Really, what would you two sisters have done without me!”

“…”

“Yo-hwa is still busy catching up with her students, so I’ll bring her in about a week. This time, you two sisters will be able to have a reunion that is a reunion in the truest sense!”

“Yeah. Thanks, sunbae. I’m really, really grateful, but...”

Cheon-hwa's red eyes narrowed.

“In the end, you pretended to be me in a dream, with my appearance, with my way of thinking, like the daughter of a prestigious family. Even using formal speech in front of other people. You spent several years like that, right?”

“Mm. That's right.”

“It feels awful.”

“…”

“It feels awful! Sunbae!”

Cheon-hwa looked at me with an expression of genuine contempt and, wrapping her arms around her own shoulders, twisted only her upper body away.

'I see.'

Children sometimes go through puberty, after all.

This too was an aftershock of ‘trusting someone.’

I nodded my head, then drew up my aura to shape a form on the surface of my skin. Orange hair and red eyes, a subtle smiling expression.

An instant human-skin mask exclusively for Cheon-hwa, complete!

“Oh my. How do you do?”

Then I took out a fan I had prepared in advance and spread it open with a snap.

Elegance and grace. Those two words exist to describe the ‘me’ of this very moment.

“Kyaaaaaaak!”

“Haaah. I wish my father would just die. Ah, I must quickly give my father a taste of the Korean peninsula's traditional filial piety so that my dear sister can breathe a little easier.”

“Kyaaaaaaaaaa!”

“Sunbae. Please make me a happy person.”

“Kyaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaak!”

“Yes. Now, I think I've become happy enough.”

“Die! Die, sunbae! Please just die! Really, really! It really feels awful! Awfulawfulawful! Please just die—”

Playing with kids is fun!

A short while after the stormy, convulsive puberty (valid for 1 day) had passed.

At last, the historic reunion of the separated twin sisters took place.

"…You're my sister."

Reunion.

Literally, they met again.

In the previous regression, I had simply made the sisters face each other, and because of Yo-hwa's breakdown, it was I who once again orchestrated the meeting that had ended in the ruin of a regression.

More meticulously. Using the regressor's privilege to my heart's content, employing a method that could not be more thorough.

Was it that the fruits of that effort had seen the light?

"…I don't remember at all. But, mm, certainly. The strange impression that someone was by my side in my childhood… that much remains."

Unlike before, Yo-hwa's expression was cautious.

Last time, the feeling was strong that she was forcing herself to get close because she had received a request from me.

In the end, even while talking with the other person, she was merely responding with 'her feelings for me' and not 'her feelings for her sister.'

On the other hand… It's different now. This time, she was truly and seriously contemplating the existence of a 'twin sister.'

□.

Like someone sitting normally at their desk one day who suddenly spots a bruise on their forearm, not knowing where they got it.

Yo-hwa was finally able to stare clearly at the □ that had been pierced through her heart.

“I guess.”

“…”

“I did think it was strange.”

Yo-hwa muttered.

Cheon-hwa and I, who would normally have led the conversation, were now silently waiting for Yo-hwa's reaction.

Because we knew that forcing a ‘conversation of mere words’ would only be met with disastrous failure.

‘We've done all the work we can from our end.’

All information was disclosed to Yo-hwa. Including the fact that Cheon-hwa could be her twin sister, or she could be a mere trace of an Outer God.

Thump. My heart beat faintly.

'Now, the affirmation or denial of this relationship is entirely up to Yo-hwa.'

Our role was to accept the outcome.

And to be her sincere conversation partner until that outcome was reached, that was all we had left to do.

“Strange? What was?”

“Infinite Void. The god I served. Our cult, for all its worth, is a Taoist-based pseudo-religion. Just as the Christian sects obsess over the number ‘3’ of the Trinity, we are pathologically attached to the ‘2’ of the Taegeuk.”

Taegeuk.

White and black.

“Ah.”

Something came to mind.

Seeing my face, Yo-hwa gave a bitter smile.

“So if a non-existent ‘sister’ had broken the Baekhwa Girls' High school rules to wear a ‘black sailor uniform’… that was, in all likelihood, a result of my father’s intentions.”

“Crazy.”

I couldn't help but let out a low curse.

Cheon Yo-hwa’s father. The cult leader had even forced his pseudo-religious incantations onto the color of the school uniforms his children wore.

Looking at it this way, my own thoughts became clear.

“Infinite Void treats all things in creation as equal scraps of data. A world where all is equal. It can be seen as all of creation itself, and as space. On the other hand, the Mastermind simply takes that data as a base to constantly arrange and rearrange it, running simulations.”

“Yes. It is the time in which everything is manifested.”

“…For the Mastermind to have meaning, as much data as possible must be collected. Conversely, for Infinite Void's data to be useful, as many simulations as possible must be run.”

“Yes. Only then can it be free of any flaws.”

“From the Outer Gods’ perspective, they are imitating a ‘world’ that will perfectly replace our reality.”

Yo-hwa nodded her head.

“I think they are mutually complementary beings. To each other.”

Next to me, Cheon-hwa kept her lips sealed. But in her red eyes, a flicker of realization like a candle flame passed by.

The three of us, who could be called ‘anomaly experts,’ had reached the same interpretation.

“In that case, the names I gave to the Outer Gods will also have to be changed.”

“Yes. Teacher. Perhaps what I suppressed was not Infinite Void, but…”

The Yang of Taegeuk.

“And that one over there.”

“…”

“What the person who might be my sister embraced and sealed might not be the Mastermind, but…”

The Yin of Taegeuk.

“An Outer God that was one and two from the very beginning. Twins.”

“…”

“Of course, I don't know which one my father designated as Yang and which as Yin. It can't be distinguished by color alone, ah. You know this too, don't you, Teacher? When you look at the Taegeuk, there's a dot of the opposite color on each side.”

“I know.”

☯.

In the middle of the white, a black dot. In the middle of the black, a white dot.

It was a very important symbol when drawing the Taegeuk. As it emphasized that black and white were not just a separate ‘two,’ but a ‘one’ in which each led the other.

Yo-hwa smiled softly.

“So actually, that side might have been Yang, and my side might have been Yin. Well! It looks like father's plan failed anyway. Not that I care!”

“…Is that so.”

This was the final conclusion of the answer chapter.

The true name of ‘Infinite Void,’ which I first subjugated in the 117th cycle, was the ‘poles of the Taegeuk.’

It was only now, upon reaching this point—in the 1,003rd cycle, no less—that it was all revealed.

'Is calling something by its proper name such a difficult thing.'

I felt a sense of deep emotion.

As I was savoring that feeling, Yo-hwa wiped the smile from her face and stared at Cheon-hwa.

“It's still difficult to call you… Unni. I'm sorry.”

“…”

“But if you are my sister. If your personality is as teacher told me, you would be more hurt by me calling you unni on the outside when I don't sincerely think of you as one on the inside. So, please endure the slightly less painful wound.”

“…”

“If you are my sister. You were subjected to the [Time Seal] even though you knew I would be hurt. So bear it.”

“…”

Cheon-hwa nodded her head.

Then, Yo-hwa smiled.

“Instead, for now, you can call me Yo-hwa.”

“…Really?”

For the first time since the sisters' reunion, Cheon-hwa carefully opened her lips.

“Me, who might be an anomaly…”

“That's why there's a condition.”

“A condition.”

“Yes. A condition, or rather, a contest. Let's make a bet. If you want to, that is.”

A contest. A bet.

Those were words Cheon-hwa loved more than anyone.

It was also a game that would be played more often than any other, having been born as siblings so close in age.

“What kind of bet?”

“I heard from teacher. You, even here where you were subjected to the [Time Seal], deliberately made the day you were sealed your happiest memory in order to maintain your sense of self.”

“Yes.”

“By kissing teacher.”

“…Yes.”

Yo-hwa closed her eyes and took a breath.

And then she looked straight at the person who looked exactly like her.

“From now on, just once. I will call you ‘unni.’”

“…!”

“I will believe your story. I will believe teacher's belief. I will think hard in my heart—really, really hard—that you are my lost sister, and while pondering your pain deeply… I will sincerely call you ‘unni.’”

“Uh, um. That's good, but… Yes! It's really good, but…”

Cheon-hwa furrowed her brow.

“Why…?”

“…”

Yo-hwa's eyes grew calm.

“To test if you become happy.”

“Huh?”

“If you are really my sister. If a ‘real anomaly’ isn't lurking in some corner of your heart and merely mimicking my sister, if you are truly my sister. Then you… have to become happy.”

“…”

“You have no choice but to become happy.”

Yo-hwa's eyes were serene.

And for that reason, they were terrifying.

“The teacher you love has worked so hard for you like this. For the younger sister you love, he has tried this hard. Literally laying his life on the line.”

“…”

“No matter how many times this world repeats its destruction, you will never, ever be able to reach a scene like this again. Someone to lead you this far—to understand you. To yield to you. You cannot wish for such a person, for such a family, anymore.”

“…”

“So the moment I call you ‘unni,’ you must become the happiest. More so than the moment you kissed teacher on a whim. This moment. More. More. More. It must be happier.”

Yo-hwa's red eyes narrowed.

“Am I… wrong?”

“…No. You're right.”

“Yeah.”

Yo-hwa stated firmly.

“So it's a contest. If the moment you are called ‘unni’ by me makes you happier, so that the ‘day’ you repeat here in this tomb area becomes today instead of that day——”

“…My victory.”

“Right. I will accept the fact that you are my real sister. But if, even after I call you sister, the moment you remember most happily is still that moment from the 688th cycle. The day you shared a kiss with teacher.”

“…”

“If you forget what happened between us today. And if, after midnight passes, you repeat the same day as before.”

“My… defeat.”

“I will not accept that you are my sister. Forever.”

“…”

“Ah. Teacher? This is really a ‘forever’ kind of thing, okay? Even in the next cycle. Even in the cycle after that, please do not ever try to reunite me with my sister again.”

Yo-hwa smiled brightly.

“If she's just a person who values one kiss with teacher more than this scene anyway. It doesn't really matter if she's my sister or not.”

“…”

“So, what will it be? It's up to you.”

Yo-hwa rested her chin on her hand.

“It's fine if you don't accept this bet. Then I won't go as far as calling you sister, but… well. I can accept you as a plausible colleague of Teacher. I'll call you Cheon-hwa. And I'll accept you calling me Yo-hwa.”

“…”

“If you accept the bet, this is the only time. There are no more chances. Will you become my sister? Or will your existence rot forever inside a tombstone that no one but teacher cares about?”

“…”

“You decide.”

Silence fell.

Yo-hwa's proposal was, even from my perspective, a remarkably rare idea.

'…Unlike other sealed ones, Cheon-hwa preserves the very moment she was [Time Sealed] as her ‘happiest memory."

'In fact, it's as if she faces the moment of being [Time Sealed] every time she opens her eyes.'

That was Cheon-hwa's clever move.

A brilliant plan to simultaneously repeat the happiest day and also retain the ‘awareness’ that she herself had been time-sealed.

'By using such a trick, Cheon-hwa was cleverly continuing to update her day despite being time-sealed.'

'Memories with me. A slightly happier time, she was steadily accumulating them day by day.'

'Now Yo-hwa is… using the exact same idea as her twin sister, to ask a question in return.'

How precious am I to you?

Is being called ‘unni’ by your little sister truly as precious as the kiss with the Undertaker you claim to love?

If so.

Show me proof, not just words.

“…”

Only after a long silence had filled the classroom did Cheon-hwa, the strategist who had lived her entire life as a mad gambler, lift her head.

In her eyes…

There was resolve.

A day passed.

“What do you think? Teacher?”

For a whole day, the two of us set up a tent on the rooftop of the Tower of Babel and lived there.

Just a few days ago, we had spent time alone, isolated in the barrier of Infinite Void at Baekhwa Girls' High. The current situation seemed very familiar to Yo-hwa.

“Do you really think that person will accept the moment I called her ‘sister’ as her happiest day?”

“Who knows.”

I looked up at the night sky.

“There is nothing as close to the void as a person's heart. It cannot be grasped. They don't know it themselves. There are even parts they don't want to know, and parts they are willingly deceived by.”

“Ahaha… I think so too.”

“Sincerity is always a difficult word.”

A few hours ago.

Cheon-hwa eventually accepted the bet.

Yo-hwa, too, called her opponent ‘unni’ and gave her a tight hug.

Apologizing over and over for being sorry for forgetting, for leaving her sister to be sacrificed alone.

Tears streamed down Cheon-hwa's face.

“It's common to judge tears as a person's sincerity. But in the end, sincerity is proven not by that moment but by the time that follows.”

“…Teacher. You are spending countless hours to prove your own sincerity.”

“That's thanks to you all believing in me.”

I smiled.

“And I believe in you all as well.”

“…”

“It doesn't matter if the sisterly bond is broken forever. Life is not over. Thanks to you two sisters, I was able to learn that even the life of someone who has been time-sealed is not completely over.”

Whether one can learn from children or not.

Perhaps that was the standard of an adult.

Trrrrrrrrrrrrring.

We both turned around. On the simple table in front of the tent, a smartphone was ringing.

It had become midnight.

“…Teacher.”

“Yes.”

12 o'clock. For the humans of reality, it was the baseline where just now became ‘yesterday’ and now becomes ‘today.’

But for the beings in the time-sealed tomb area, it was merely the point at which the same day repeated.

“Shall we go in?”

“…Yeah.”

Yo-hwa took my hand first. A slight tremble. A clear tension was transmitted through her body heat.

Today, she would either gain a family member or lose one.

And that, at Yo-hwa's request, was engraved for ‘eternity.’

In the future, no matter if thousands or tens of thousands of regressions were to be repeated, the day I would introduce her ‘sister’ to Yo-hwa would never come again.

Step, I took a step forward.

Thud, footsteps followed at an angle.

“Huuuuu…”

A small breath.

It was the same as in the 117th cycle. Yo-hwa, the lively, orange-haired student council president, always trusted and followed me from behind.

At that time, Yo-hwa was able to find her lost self.

This time was different. She didn't just follow me, the teacher.

She thought for herself, created a standard that everyone could accept, and she herself bet herself under the name of a ‘contest.’

'You've grown, Yo-hwa.'

The world was destroyed without reservation and life was repeated without promise.

And yet, if a chance were given. Perhaps.

“I will open the door.”

“…Yes, Teacher. Please open it.”

Creeeak.

A door that only I could see opened at a speed only I could hear. The transparent tombstone, which seemed like it would accept no one, merely reflecting them like a mirror, revealed its interior.

What kind of scene was waiting?

Normally, upon seeing me enter first, Cheon-hwa would have laughed cheerfully, saying something like

‘Ah sunbae! Welcome! I knew you'd come!’

From her perspective, she had just kissed me a moment ago.

“_____”

She would have been smiling a confident smile, as if to show off, as if to say everything went according to her plan, as expected of her, a smile that made me want to give her a light rap on the head.

But.

“——Hik.”

Even before the door opened, Cheon-hwa was crying.

In a corner of the classroom. Crouched down using a desk and chair as a screen, she was shedding silent tears.

As if belatedly realizing we had entered, Cheon-hwa turned her head. Cheon-hwa's lips moved.

“Hk, uh…… ah, ……hk. Uuh……”

“…”

But no meaningful words came out.

She opened her lips to say something, but all that came out was a whimpering groan.

Even when she tried to suppress the groan, what remained in her mouth was the same groan, so cry was piled upon cry, and her voice kept sinking lower.

“I, I……. I. I, someday……. Someday, with sunbae……. and Yo-hwa. The three of us. Hk, the three of us…….”

“…”

“But, that. But, that's……. not possible. It's, it's hard. It's impossible……. So, even if it's just sunbae. I, I. With that, I thought it was enough……”

“…”

“I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry, Yo-hwa. I'm sorry……”

Yo-hwa walked forward.

Inside the time-sealed tomb area, originally, no one other than me was supposed to wander around freely. Because from the moment their contact with me was broken, they would be exposed to the void.

But for some reason, Yo-hwa naturally let go of my hand. I too, for some reason, felt that ‘it would be okay’ and let her go.

Step, step.

Yo-hwa walked over and bent her knees. And sitting at the same height, she stretched out both her arms and hugged her opponent tightly.

“I'm sorry, Unni.”

Yo-hwa said.

“I’m sorry for forgetting.”

“…”

“Welcome back.”

The sound of Cheon-hwa's weeping filled the classroom.

The sealed one. The one who lost her own existence.

There is only one name for the spell and curse that makes the stopped time of the lost flow.

Happiness.

Footnotes:

Chapter 404

The Bereaved XII

Sinnoa

There is an epilogue.

"Yay-hey!"

"The two sisters are troublemakers, but they're the strongest!"

"The tradition of the ten million cultists of the Korean peninsula! The essence of heresy! The last remaining prodigies of Taoism!"

"Yo-hwa-Yo-hwa☆Sisters! Descend!"

"Yeeaaahhhhh-hey!"

Clap! The sound of a high-five rang out.

"…"

There were two audience members who had been watching the spectacle from start to finish. Noh Do-hwa. And Yu Ji-won.

Both of them belonged to the National Road Management Corps, and this was certainly no coincidence.

The place where the Yo-hwa-Yo-hwa☆Sisters had just appeared was none other than the innermost sanctum of the National Road Management Corps headquarters, the 'Tower of Babel', specifically the office of the corps Director.

"Wonderful…"

Noh Do-hwa muttered with a face that looked anything but wonderful.

"Alright. Fine, so the Cheon family had a pair of twin sisters. I heard the stories, so I understand that much. But… I was told one of the twins was time-sealed or something. Then shouldn't she not exist in reality? So why is it that right before my very eyes, both sisters are physically present and putting on this goddamn sideshow…?"

"Gasp. An interesting point!"

"As expected of the National Road Management Corps Director. Were the fine wrinkles etched on your brow not only proof of a foul temper but also of a highly evolved intellect?"

"It can't be helped, Unni. Please show them your true form!"

I released my aura.

Shwaaaa.

My orange hair was bleached to black, and my sailor uniform reverted to a barista's outfit. The aura that had been writhing around me had been released.

It was just like a magical girl transformation sequence played in reverse.

The result was simple.

Cheon-hwa became the Undertaker.

"?"

Noh Do-hwa's head tilted.

"Trans! Form!"

I flared my aura again with a snap. Sensorially, it felt like finishing a strength workout and striking a pose.

Then, my appearance, not just my face but my height and fashion as well, distorted entirely, and wouldn't you know it, I reverted to being Cheon-hwa once more.

"…"

"Yay-hey!"

Clap, I high-fived Yo-hwa. A dacapo.

"The two sisters are troublemakers, but they're the strongest!"

"The tradition of the ten million cultists of the Korean peninsula! The essence of heresy! The last remaining prodigies of Taoism!"

"Yo-hwa-Yo-hwa☆Sisters! Descend!"

"Yeeaaahhhhh-hey!"

"……"

Silence flowed through the conference room.

"Mr. Matiz, here."

"Ah, thank you, Ji-won."

"You're most welcome."

Yu Ji-won poured black tea from the thermos she always carried and handed it to me. I had just been testing the limits of my vocal cords with Yo-hwa, so I was craving a hot liquid.

Slurp.

As I was peacefully drinking my tea, words finally burst from Noh Do-hwa's lips.

"Has this son of a bitch completely lost his mind—"

Once again, there is an epilogue.

Of course, I would have loved to end the epilogue just by playing the part of Cheon-hwa and teasing Noh Do-hwa, but this episode had a problematic part that absolutely needed to be revised and reviewed.

"I see. In short, you're proposing a hypothesis that there might be a regressor who exists separately from you, Mr. Matiz."

"Yes."

I said, having thrown off Cheon-hwa's aura farming a moment ago. I restrained myself, feeling that teasing her any further would just needlessly increase Noh Do-hwa's kill count.

As someone who dearly loved Noh Do-hwa's distorted facial muscles, it was a rather difficult thing to endure, but I managed. This was why mental cultivation was so important for a regressor.

"However, it's unclear whether Go Yuri is truly a regressor or not. But it is certain that she is at least in a 'position comparable to a regressor'."

"Hmm."

The testimony I paid particular attention to.

No, it was more of a transcript, and this was the part.

Go Yuri: Really. I thought it would be like this.

Go Yuri: Nothing in particular should have changed this time. Why has Miss Cheon-hwa become so clever?

Go Yuri: Did her DNA change? No way. I didn't touch a single thing concerning the surrounding environment so that Miss Cheon-hwa and Miss Yo-hwa could be born.

Go Yuri: If I had made one wrong move, you twins, you would have miscarried so easily.

Miscarriage.

This part was so excessively significant that I printed it out like a transcript and handed it out to my colleagues.

"Though I can't be 100% certain, Go Yuri spoke as if she also knew of a world-line where Cheon-hwa and Yo-hwa were never even born."

"…"

I glanced to my side.

Nod.

Yo-hwa, who had been working with me to test Noh Do-hwa's murderous intent until just a moment ago, now wore a serious expression.

"Originally, my mother was a bit… frail. After she gave birth to me, no, to us, the image I have of her is of someone who was always lying in bed."

"Hmm. So you're saying it wouldn't be strange even if she had miscarried you."

"Yes."

Yo-hwa affirmed Yu Ji-won's question without hesitation.

"So if Teacher's reasoning is correct, and ah, I think it's correct too. Anyway, then my 'first teacher', that Go Yuri person, probably induced it so that twins would be born on purpose."

"What would be the reason for that?"

"Ahaha. That, I'm not so sure about either…"

Yo-hwa scratched the back of her head with an awkward face.

Why, for what reason, did it have to be twins?

It was a question that could not be easily answered without being able to look inside Go Yuri's heart.

"Hmm."

Noh Do-hwa had deliberately sat a short distance away from us, propping her chin up at a crooked angle.

"What if you think about it in the exact opposite way…?"

I tilted my head.

"The opposite way?"

"You don't know the reason it had to be twins. In that case, wouldn't it work to try and guess the problem that would arise if they weren't twins…?"

Indeed.

I began to brainstorm back and forth with Noh Do-hwa.

"First of all, if only one was born instead of the Cheon-hwa-Yo-hwa twins, then calling them by separate names like this would become meaningless. In the first place, she would just be one person, 'Cheon Yo-hwa', so there would be no risk of confusion."

"Well, from my perspective, there is still only one Cheon Yo-hwa… In any case, that would leave only a single Cheon Yo-hwa. Is there some kind of problem with that…?"

"The thing is."

My mouth opened.

"Yo-hwa was designated as the sacrifice for Infinite Void, and Cheon-hwa was chosen as the sacrifice for the Mastermind. Therefore, the conclusion is that the Outer Gods that were supposed to be divided between the two of them respectively would become concentrated on one per—"

At that moment.

"Ah?"

My mouth and tongue stopped.

“…?”

"Teacher?"

"Mr. Matiz?"

The gazes of the three focused on me.

But I had no time to worry about each of their expressions. A sort of realization, a thrill like a lightning bolt, was piercing through my spine.

I said.

"Taegeuk."

"Taegeuk?"

"Let's try to think about it in reverse. What if it wasn't two Outer Gods from the beginning. What if originally, there was only one Outer God?"

Blink. Blink, blink.

The others still didn't seem to understand my words, their eyebrows twisted uncertainly.

But as I continued to speak, I myself was being swept away by a violent wave of electricity.

"It's Taegeuk. Taegeuk. It's not an Outer God of Yin or an Outer God of Yang. Let's assume that the two were originally one, and that in this world, there was originally only a single Outer God named 'Taegeuk'."

"…"

"That Taegeuk god treats all of creation as equal data. And it runs infinite simulations of the ways all of creation can be combined. Constantly, endlessly, so that a world-line advantageous to itself will always emerge… It keeps running simulations, so that the 'world most advantageous to itself' will come about."

"Ah?"

“…!”

Only then did the expressions of my colleagues begin to change.

Infinite Void. The Mastermind. Aberrations that were Outer God-class even when separated… What if they had been fused into one?

"In other words, from a human perspective, that Taegeuk god itself possesses the power of regression. It would be impossible to win, no matter how much one struggled. It's only natural."

"Because that side… would just run simulations until it wins."

Yo-hwa said, hesitating.

"Even if humanity were to achieve victory, it wouldn't be a true victory. The Outer God would just have to move on to the next cycle. Just like… Teacher."

That's right.

My voice also became low.

"It's useless even if a regressor exists. It's bound to be a draw forever. No, even a draw cannot last forever."

"Why is that? Teacher?"

"Humans do not have infinite mental fortitude."

It was simple logic.

Humanity has a regressor. Even if they are destroyed by the anomalies, they can challenge the next cycle until they win.

The anomalies have the Taegeuk god. Even if humanity is victorious, it can run the next simulation. Until humanity is destroyed.

However, unlike humanity, the anomalies have no intellect. No mind. No ego. No mental fortitude.

Neither stress nor trauma.

"...That is the worst-case scenario."

Yu Ji-won said with a blank face.

"The fact that humanity has been able to reach this point is entirely thanks to the existence of a regressor named Mr. Matiz. To think that the same power was given to the enemy as well. I don't even want to imagine it."

"Just by us being born as a single child, instead of twins, the Taegeuk god would emerge…?"

Yo-hwa muttered, dumbfounded.

Literally cornered on all sides.

A labyrinth and a maze that could never be broken through.

A trash game where no matter which option you choose, it will eventually lead to a bad ending.

If I, the Undertaker, were to face such an impregnable fortress, what would I do?

'I'd give up.'

Like Old Man Scho.

'But what if I don't give up?'

The problem is that the Taegeuk god exists.

'Simply getting rid of Cheon Yo-hwa cannot be the answer. Then another sacrifice will just be chosen as the miko.'

'Rather, it becomes even more impossible to control the variables, as it becomes unknown which human other than Cheon Yo-hwa will be designated as the priestess.'

Leave Cheon Yo-hwa alone.

'If the problem is that the Outer God is too strong…'

Split the Outer God.

“…”

Twist it by force.

Insult nature.

Artificially split what was naturally one into two.

The Way follows nature.[1]

– I interpret that phrase in the opposite way.

A memory.

– Even a single path ultimately culminates in a single person. If that is the case, then I ask you.

If there is no route…

– What reason is there that a single person cannot change that path?

Create a route.

Taegeuk.

The concept of Taegeuk had one loophole. Even though it was ultimately one, it could for the time being be divided into two extremes, yin and yang.

That's why it could be split.

Devise a way to split the originally single 'Cheon Yo-hwa'. The priestess of the Taegeuk god. Into a being that is one yet two.

'Twin sisters.'

It's simple. You just have to roll the coin until Cheon Yo-hwa's mother gives birth to twins. It's a low probability, but it's a possibility that obviously exists.

'Simply being twins is not enough. The two have to be made as if they are truly one… As if they are beings that reflect different aspects, yin and yang. And so.

Even their names were unified.

Cheon Yo-hwa. The same pronunciation.

When calling them, the same pronunciation is segmented into one, one side is Cheon-hwa. The other side is Yo-hwa.

'No way.'

A person. A mere human.

Succeeded in splitting the invincible anomaly, the 'Akashic Records that runs infinite simulations', the impregnable Outer God, into two?

– There is only one way to reach that point.

– It would be to become a human as vast as the path of nature, as vast as the universe.

"…"

– To put it another way, The Way follows inyeon.

The fact that one anomaly was split into two did not simply mean its combat power was reduced to 50% like in an RPG.

For example, think about separating 'Regression' and 'Complete Memory' from me, the Undertaker.

It wouldn't be a 50% reduction in power. 80%. No, maybe even 99%.

It would bring about a result where almost all of my advantages are lost.

The 'Taegeuk god' that had driven all of creation into fear no longer existed.

Only the mere, incomplete yin and yang. The traces of that separation called Infinite Void and the Mastermind.

Only some echo of fear faintly chirped in the universe.

The once-perfect Outer God had declined. It had fallen.

Only anomalies that were somehow incomplete, lacking something crucial, came to roam the earth.

'What if.'

A sinister thought suddenly occurred to me.

'What if the difficulty of this world that I have been challenging for over 1,000 cycles… the difficulty that I have thought of as Hard or Lunatic all this time, was actually adjusted to Normal by someone?'

Adjusting the difficulty of the world.

This feat, close to impossible, a being called Go Yuri might have accomplished it.

A fight that was originally a confirmed defeat.

Turned into a 'manageable difficulty' if one bashed their head against it enough times.

It was nothing short of a miracle.

'Wait. Then why on earth, if she was such an incredible being, is she now wandering around as if transformed into an anomaly?'

'In the first place, why was she deleted from Cheon Yo-hwa's memory on June 17th… No. There's not enough material to make a judgment on this.'

I shook my head.

Even though I might have succeeded in deducing the existence of the Taegeuk god, there were still too many mysteries regarding Go Yuri's actions.

I had to get more clues.

"For now. I have figured out how to approach the secret of Go Yuri this time."

Fortunately, I knew where the clues were hidden.

"If I hadn't entered Yo-hwa's dream and delved into her past, I wouldn't have known that a hole of the heart, a void, a '□' was pierced there."

"And you're saying you found that out after more than 1,000 cycles? Isn't this dereliction of duty for a regressor…?"

"Ahem. I have frequently wandered through my own dreams. I was just being careful to protect my privacy and to avoid contact with the Go Yuri residing in the world of the unconscious as much as possible."

Come to think of it, all the dreams about my past were also riddled with holes. Like the memories of my mother.

Everywhere I looked, only the [404 - Not Found] sign had appeared.

To think that it wasn't just me who was peculiar, but that Yo-hwa was similar too. I never would have imagined it in my dreams.

"But it's different now. I have definitely verified a method to deal with Go Yuri, a strategy to face her without getting brainwashed."

"Hmm…"

"So, this is something I'm saying to all of you."

I opened my mouth.

"I think that perhaps not only in Yo-hwa's past but in all of our pasts, including my own… there might be a similar empty hole (□) pierced."

"Yes…?"

"It's just a hypothesis for now. A hypothesis. So, just as Yo-hwa did, would it be alright if I took a brief look into your pasts?"

"No. I fucking hate that idea…"

Noh Do-hwa made a face of utter disgust.

But there was only one personality-disordered person like Noh Do-hwa in the world. Yu Ji-won coolly accepted.

"In the first place, the only scenery from my past worth cherishing is the summer I spent with you, Mr. Matiz. I don't care about the rest."

"Thank you, Ji-won."

"You're most welcome."

That very day, with the help of the Tutorial Fairies and Cheon-hwa, I infiltrated Yu Ji-won's dream.

Into the dream beyond the 4th stage. Into the past. And thus, to the precarious danger zone from which fragments of the unconscious world where Go Yuri resides flow out.

The result.

[404 - Not Found]

It was discovered.

The same void of memory as Yo-hwa's. A '□'.

“…”

A 'trace of the existence called Go Yuri having been deleted' also existed in Yu Ji-won's past.

'How?'

Right after that….

In Saintess's past.

[404 - Not Found]

In Lee Ha-yul's past.

[404 - Not Found]

In Sim Ah-ryeon's past.

[404 - Not Found]

Even Seo Gyu, Kim Ji-soo, and Dang Seo-rin.

A '□' was discovered in every single one of the people around me. Their pasts, a part of their past memories, had been 'cut out'.

Whenever I wandered the edges of that void pierced in their hearts, something that looked exactly like Go Yuri appeared.

"Why…?"

It didn't stop there.

I persuaded others as well. I infiltrated Lee Ju-ho's dream. I accessed the Sword Marquess's past.

Lee Baek, Lee Jae-hee, Uehara Shino, the Great Priestess, Manyo Neko, Phantom Blade, Obsidian Qin, Jo Yeong-su, Shin Su-bin, Cecelia, Kwon Ryong, Nenets, Manav, Akash.

[404] [404] [404] [404]

[404] [404] [404] [404]

[404] [404] [404] [404]

[404] [404] [404] [404]

Everyone. Every last one.

In the past of every person I looked into, perhaps in all of humanity, there were empty holes pierced like a void.

It was all 'the result of forgetting the existence called Go Yuri'.

“…”

No one in this world.

Not even I, who possessed Complete Memory…

Could remember the someone who had vanished from their respective pasts.

Footnotes:

1 - A phrase originating from Chinese Philosophy, first seen in the book The classic of The Way and Virtue. It is one of the Daoist interpretations of how the universe operates, saying that all things in the world must follow their natural course.

Chapter 405

The Interpreter I

Sinnoa

Ta-da.

Who could have possibly guessed it?

The final stop for the infinite regressor wasn't in the 'future' but in the past, back in the very first timeline, of all places.

A classic cliché, twisted. Even the regressor was surprised by this one.

"...Mister. I'm sorry. But you're genuinely giving me the creeps, so could you please stop mimicking Cheon Yo-hwa without any warning? Seriously. I'm begging you."

Unfortunately, having received Oh Dok-seo's 100% sincere ultimate technique, the dogeza, I had to declare the end of the season for my Cheon Yo-hwa impersonation.

"My apologies. Some side effects still linger."

"Aha. Right. So when mister has lingering side effects, he uses that divine control over his aura to copy his student's appearance and cosplay as her, is that it?"

"Thank you for understanding."

"Yep. This is exactly why the Regression Alliance needs a manager like Noh Do-hwa. Someone has to tell the crazy person he's crazy for the world to function properly..."

Oh Dok-seo treated me like a complete lunatic, but honestly, I felt it was unfair.

The habitual transformation into the young lady, this convulsive impersonation of Lady Cheon Yo-hwa, wasn't just some perverse or self-deprecating joke of mine. It truly was a side effect.

"Dok-seo, imitating someone else entirely within the void is an incredibly dangerous thing to do. It only ended with this kind of joke because it was me you were dealing with. If it had been anyone else, they would have spent the rest of their lives with a second or third personality living in a corner of their mind."

"Hmm. Is it that serious?"

"It is. In fact, I'm more surprised that you're perfectly fine. You sometimes turn on your VTuber mode with [Side Story Creation] and completely immerse yourself in other people. How do you manage to maintain your own ego so effortlessly after doing that?"

"Well, you know?"

Oh Dok-seo tilted her head.

"For me, it just works."

"You talented rascal."

Well, it was probably thanks to Oh Dok-seo's unique skill, the absolute defensive barrier known as the [AT Field].

Oh Dok-seo's sense of reality was, in some way, detached from that of others.

It wasn't that she didn't live her life seriously, but she had a strong tendency to perceive her own life and the lives of those around her as a [story within a work of fiction].

She insisted that she herself possessed the attribute of a 'transmigrator' who had simply been dropped into the middle of a story.

An experienced actor knows how to fully immerse themselves in a role while still maintaining their own self.

Oh Dok-seo's [AT Field], her [Absolute Defensive Barrier], and her [Fourth Wall] might have been interconnected in that sense.

It was just as I was lost in thought.

– Yaaaaah!

A loud shout.

I had been sitting across from Oh Dok-seo, drinking coffee in the cafe at the Inunaki Tunnel, when a 'noise complaint' suddenly echoed from the floor above.

– Shit! Die! Just die! Get out! Get oooout!

"Ugh."

Oh Dok-seo's expression soured as she was drinking her espresso.

It wasn't just the noise from upstairs that made her face crumple. This girl, despite hating bitterness, insisted on drinking espresso.

If her chuunibyou was at that level, she had practically reached enlightenment.

"That house is at it again."

"Mm."

"No matter where you sit, there's like a 30% chance you'll hear that noise from upstairs. It's even more annoying because you can't make out what they're shouting."

Oh Dok-seo was right.

It was the so-called noise complaint anomaly.

The very fact that a noise complaint was being heard here in the Inunaki hideout cafe was bizarre. Where could an 'upstairs' that generated domestic noise possibly exist in a submerged underwater tunnel?

But that kind of shouting was often heard in any building that simply had a ceiling.

In truth, many of the anomalies that ordinary people encountered in their daily lives were of this trivial sort.

Too insignificant to subjugate, yet too annoying to ignore.

They were the kind you just came to accept as an uncomfortable neighbor in life.

"Can't you get rid of that thing for me? Mister? Every time I'm about to take out my laptop to start writing, that noise starts up and completely kills my motivation."

"Once you get rid of the noise complaint anomaly, I suppose the phobia of the blank white page in your notepad file, the writer's block anomaly, and the burnout anomaly will be waiting for you in succession."

"The only reason I can't write is because of all the anomalies."

"This mister has an inkling that anomalies were born in the first place because people blamed others instead of themselves, hated them, and shirked responsibility."

"What? Are you saying I'm one of those irresponsible and insensitive types? My goodness. I'm hurt. Because of this wound and trauma I've received from mister, I'll now forever be a pathetic writer who can't post two chapters in a row...."

– Dieeeee! Die! Just die, already! Die!

"...No. I'm not joking, Mister. Seriously, do something about it."

Oh Dok-seo looked up at the ceiling with a fed-up expression.

"People on SG Net are always complaining that the noise is driving them crazy. That thing genuinely lowers the quality of life."

"Hmm."

"It's always making a racket with that incomprehensible noise!"

"..."

"It would be better if I could at least understand what it's saying! Then I could at least curse back at it properly!"

While Oh Dok-seo was fuming, I just quietly sipped my coffee.

Because…

'I can actually hear it. What it's saying...'

An astute reader would have already noticed.

The subtle difference that existed between Oh Dok-seo's complaints about the noise and my own narration of it.

– Why are you my mom! Why are you my moooom!

That's right.

To me, Undertaker, the shouts of the noise complaint anomaly from beyond the ceiling were perfectly understandable.

And it wasn't just the noise complaint anomaly.

The voices of all anomalies, I could hear them.

[I'm the Only One Who Can Understand the Anomalies' Voices].

That was the web novel-esque title I had given to my current situation.

If you were to ask exactly when this strange phenomenon began, I could answer with great precision.

It was from the 1,000th cycle.

"Huh?"

The moment that made me certain of this anomaly was none other than my encounter with Dang Seo-rin.

It was our first meeting, an event that had already been repeated hundreds of times.

– Where is this place?

– Dad. Dad. I'm here, Dad.

The moment I arrived to meet Dang Seo-rin as usual, I began to perceive sounds that had never been audible in previous cycles.

The diagonal crosswalk at Centum City in Busan.

An alternate space, a 'crossroads' that had become bizarrely wide.

– Can you hear my voice?

– There's someone here. Someone's here.

Drip. Splat, splat.

Thousands of traffic lights stood like pillars in a temple at the crossroads, and crimson blood overflowed from every red light.

– Excuse me?

– Excuse me, hello?

The blood from the traffic lights became 'red handprints' that crawled across the crosswalk with splatting sounds.

There weren't just one or two. Tens of thousands of handprints were chaotically moving back and forth across the crossing.

Visually, it was no different from the previous cycles.

It was a scene I had watched to the point of exhaustion up to the 1,000th cycle.

'Why can I hear voices?'

Auditorily, however, it was completely different.

– My house disappeared. Officer. Please find my house, please.

– My mother isn't answering her phone. I had it turned off for a moment. There's a missed call. I shouldn't have turned my phone off then. My mother isn't answering.

– I was kicked out of my house. Does this make any sense? It's my house. There were strangers living there.

Swarm, swarm, swarm.

Every time a bloody handprint was stamped down, a sound, as if it were prerecorded, played from that spot.

It was like hundreds of people in a crowd all muttering whatever they wanted to say at the same time.

"..."

Faced with that overwhelming scene, I was momentarily at a loss for words.

'Why? I've never heard the voices of the handprints at this crossroads before. So why now, in the 1,000th cycle, without any warning....'

No.

At the time, I was too flustered to think about it, but this wasn't the only sudden change that had arrived around the 1,000th cycle.

"Actually. I… I can hear a song."

Dang Seo-rin too, had changed.

"I can hear a song from you, too."

To be precise, it had started from the 999th cycle.

Dang Seo-rin's testimony that everything in the world sounded like 'music,' 'noise,' or 'songs' remained valid even after the 999th cycle passed and the 1,000th began.

What kind of magic could have unfolded?

Dang Seo-rin, for whom all things in the world, including even the sunset in the sky, had truly begun to sound like 'sound.'

And me, who had begun to perceive the 'voices' of anomalies that had been completely inaudible before.

A clear similarity was observed between these two strange phenomena.

However, no matter how much I thought about it, there was no way to know why this 'ability' was suddenly granted to Dang Seo-rin and me without any warning whatsoever.

"Dok-seo."

"Yeah?"

"It seems like a very strange incident that I don't know about must have occurred around the end of the 999th cycle. Is there any way you could use your [Side Story Creation] to find out what happened?"

Come to think of it, the 999th cycle was strange.

'I was just having a drink with Dang Seo-rin, and then the world suddenly ended out of nowhere.'

There were no clues or evidence, but I could at least deduce that some kind of incident had occurred then.

"Uh, yeah. I'd like to help you out if I could, Mister."

"But?"

"The 999th cycle is too recent, you know. My novel hasn't progressed that far yet. To empathize with someone using [Side Story Creation], it needs to be at least somewhat close to what I've written...."

"..."

"Ah. Why? Don't look at me like that."

"..."

"I want to write too! I want to write the novel too! I want to be revered by the readers as a super-diligent-author-nim who posts every single day except for Chuseok and Christmas! You think I want to be like this?! Huh? Mister, you don't know anything. You don't know the pain of creation. You don't know the pain of the soul! Shit, all those diligent writers are just talented hacks! It's in their DNA! If my mom and dad had just passed down some more diligent genes, I wouldn't be in this mess——"

I'll omit what followed, not for Oh Dok-seo's honor, but for the honor of her parents.

It dawned on me anew.

If I were to ever get married but choose not to have children, the reason would be singular. It would solely be due to the fear that there was even a 0.01% chance of a child like Oh Dok-seo being born…

'Two Oh Dok-seo lifeforms on this earth?'

A shiver ran down the back of my neck.

No matter how many world-ending routes I, a professional destructionist, had walked, I couldn't bear to face such a future.

"A-Anyway, please try to write as quickly as possible. Now there's no risk of the world being corrupted by Infinite Metagame even if you write fast."

"The more you rush me, the more my motivation drops."

"Please write as slowly as possible."

"Are you saying you don't trust me right now?! Mister?!"

"...Just please stay healthy."

"I was actually thinking about getting personal training from Mr. Seo Gyu. I heard he is a PT master? Could you put in a word for me, Mister?"

"Sure. Just don't go beating up your readers after you get strong."

"Hm? Ahahaha. Are you silly, Mister? Where in the world is there an author who beats up their readers?"

"..."

"Anyway, just you wait! Once I get PT and become healthy, I'm definitely going to earn the title of a diligent author who posts five times a week, every week, except for the holidays!"

‘You think that's gonna happen?’

The truth of the mystery fell into a state of utter confusion due to a certain author's catastrophic writing pace.

Still, it was a relief. It wasn't an 'unsolvable' problem, but merely a 'delayed' one.

After all, if I just held on for a thousand or ten thousand more years, wouldn't a future Oh Dok-seo eventually reach the truth of the 999th regression on her own?

For a regressor, time was the one thing I had in abundance.

"But is there really a need to be so anxious? Mister? In any case, you gained another ability, so isn't that lucky?"

"..."

"An awakener has awakened again. For now, isn't it fine to think of it like that?"

Though my personality wasn't carefree enough to jump rope with my nerves like Oh Dok-seo, for now, I had no other choice but to adapt to the new situation.

The advantage of being able to [directly and fully understand the voices of the anomalies] had certainly brought me an enormous benefit.

For example.

– Twinkle, twinkle, little star.

– How I wonder, what you are.

– Up above the world so high....

– Like a diamond, in the sky.

– Twinkle, twinkle... little star.

– How I wonder what you are.

The Meteor Shower. Meteor.

The shooting star anomaly that always arrived in the skies above the Gimhae Plains seven years after a regression began.

From the anomaly that had once driven the entire Korean peninsula into terror and even destroyed the world, a 'voice' of incredibly clear quality could be heard.

"Heo."

Originally, that is, before the 1,000th cycle, the only sound I could hear from the Meteor Shower was, at best, something like noise.

To express it in text.

– Twinkle, twinkle, little star.

– Wheeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeee!

– How I wonder what you are.

Something like that.

The melody was so familiar that I could guess it was a 'lullaby,' but even so, I had never been able to hear the Meteor Shower's song clearly.

It was different now.

I could hear it.

– Wheeeeeeeeeeeee.

– How I, wonder what you are.

– Like a diamond... in the sky....

And because of that, I could also understand.

I noticed a minute detail in the trembling of the song that I would never have caught before.

'The voice is trembling.'

The voice of the Meteor Shower belonged to a woman.

Between the brilliant starlight spread across the night sky, the whining sound of a siren was tearing through. It was an air-raid warning.

1. On a certain night when an air-raid siren is wailing.

2. A certain woman sings a lullaby.

3. With a trembling voice.

4. The humans who die by the Meteor Shower die instantly, feeling no pain.

"..."

Having gathered this many clues, I hadn't squandered my life as a regressor so foolishly as to be unable to make the leap toward the truth.

I wonder if you remember.

Back when I first subjugated the Meteor Shower.

I had mentioned in that story that there had been an 'unexplained bombing' in the Gimhae Plains at the time of the void's advent.

No evidence related to that bombing incident remained anywhere, so it was impossible to even know how exactly the bombing was carried out.

The reason for death had evaporated.

Because death went missing, life too went missing.

'Perhaps.'

I put Do-hwa down. I released my aura as well.

In a situation where I had to conserve my aura as much as possible to suppress Yu Ji-won's Outer God, also known as Leviathan, the Meteor Shower had been an exception until now.

I knew of no other way to deal with it other than to slice it apart in a single strike with a powerful aura.

However.

"...Mom."

Only after more than 1,000 cycle.

I felt like I finally knew how.

"I'm… I'm okay."

I muttered, looking straight up at the host of the Meteor Shower staining the night sky.

"I'm not scared."

– Twinkle, twinkle, little star.

"I'm with you, Mom."

– How I wonder...

"When I'm with you, Mom, I'm not really scared."

The siren wailed.

"Actually, I'm more scared when you cover my eyes."

The siren wailed.

"So it's okay if you don't cover them."

The siren wailed.

"I want to keep looking at your face, Mom, until the very end."

The Meteor Shower trickled down.

The streaks of starlight that had been ceaselessly striking down, etching diagonal lines across the night sky, began to fall all around like hail.

Thud, thud, patter.

Small fragments made of starlight.

As the fragments of light rained down, something wrapped around my shoulder. I couldn't see its shape, but it had a contour similar to a human arm.

– I love you. My baby.

The starlight all melted away, and the night sky blurred.

– Mommy, really, truly loves you.

I held onto the invisible forearm.

"Yes. I love you too."

Click.

The siren stopped.

The pebbles that had fallen to the ground no longer emanated starlight. The night sky grew quiet, as if it had always been that way.

"..."

I bent down and picked up a pebble that had lost both its light and sound.

And I realized.

I must not use my invincible aura. And yet, I must put the anomalies to rest.

My route, which was extremely self-contradictory and at a glance seemed impossible.

I realized how I could walk it.

Footnotes:

Chapter 406

The Interpreter II

Sinnoa

In retrospect, I suppose I was a rather bland and unremarkable person for an awakener.

Let's imagine, for instance, that there was a Protagonist Certification Association for genre novels, and an interviewer there asked me a question like this.

‘Oh! A regressor! How wonderful. But just being a regressor isn’t enough to be competitive among protagonists these days, you know?’

‘The key is a unique skill!’

‘Setting aside regression, which every Tom, Dick, and Harry seems to have these days, what powerful ability is uniquely yours?’

Hmm.

Despite being a professional regressor who had been through over 1,000 cycles, if they were to ask me that, I really wouldn't have had anything suitable to write on a resume.

Time Seal?

‘That's certainly unique! But unless you get the other person's consent, it's useless.’

‘It's far from powerful. Man, this kind of thing isn't popular these days.’

A tremendous amount of aura?

‘Oh, I'll give you that. That is powerful. But reading your resume, it says you’ve entered an 'aura diet' phase…’

‘In the first place, aura isn't even a unique skill, is it?’

Interview result: Rejected.

That's right.

Except for the fact that my mentality was more flexible than anyone else's, and aside from my extraordinary love for the Romance of the Three Kingdoms, there was nothing particularly special about me.

But in a way, wasn't this also a tradition?

The cliché of the 'ordinary protagonist', which had long since devolved into an old joke. Perhaps the perseverance that had steadfastly preserved this beautiful culture like a fossil until now was the very identity of me, Undertaker.

At least, that's how it had been until now.

“I can hear the voices of the anomalies. It isn't just simple noise or static. I can decipher their screams just as if I were listening to a person's voice. Everyone, if you are with me, you will experience the days of conquering anomalies by devising highly sophisticated strategies.”

“Undertaker! Undertaker! Undertaker!”

“Wooooooah!”

“Hey, hey! We believed in you!”

Receiving the fervent cheers from the awakeners, I raised both my arms high. The shouting, of course, grew even more intense.

The Undertaker.

A successful debut as a protagonist, after a grand total of 1,000 regressions.

Sometimes, life was truly coincidental.

“Suppose I had the ability to understand the voices of anomalies from the very beginning. Say, from around the 5th cycle.”

“Hmm.”

“Then I probably wouldn't have been able to face the anomalies with the same mindset I have now.”

I was walking with Oh Dok-seo, Sim Ah-ryeon, Lee Ha-yul, and the kids from the Regression Alliance.

Crunch.

The asphalt gravel from the crumbled highway scraped unevenly under the soles of our shoes.

The cycle was the 1,022nd.

The location was the Japanese archipelago.

“Why? Wouldn't that have been better?”

Oh Dok-seo, shouldering a backpack, tilted her head.

“Being able to understand the voices of all anomalies is a huge advantage only you have, Mister. If you had acquired it in the early regressions, I think you could have greatly reduced all sorts of trial and error.”

“I wonder. Ah, this is the spot.”

The broken highway led to a tunnel, which was half-buried in earth and sand. I pointed to a patch of bare ground near the tunnel entrance.

“Everyone, grab a shovel and dig around here.”

“Hweeeh. W-why do we have to do this manual labor…”

Sim Ah-ryeon looked like she was about to cry.

But with Lee Ha-yul, who was much smaller than her, taking the initiative and starting to dig, she couldn't afford to slack off. Sim

Ah-ryeon also joined in the digging, whining as she followed us.

Soon.

[Ah.]

Lee Ha-yul's shovel stopped.

[Oppa. It's here.]

We immediately stopped working and gathered around Lee Ha-yul. After digging out a little more dirt, the thing we were looking for finally revealed itself.

It was the forearm of a child.

[It's an arm, not a foot.]

Lee Ha-yul muttered as if disappointed. To be precise, she wasn't speaking with her own mouth but moving the mouth of her maid puppet.

[It would have been easier if it was a foot.]

“You can't be full on the first spoonful. It's lucky we found it this quickly. Store it for now.”

[Okay.]

Lee Ha-yul lightly brushed the dirt off the child's forearm, then placed the remains into the refrigerated compartment of her yogurt cart.

We didn't have to worry about it rotting.

As you could tell just by seeing how its original form was preserved without a single insect bite mark despite being buried in the dirt, that was no ordinary piece of a corpse.

“Next is a tunnel 40km from here.”

“Hweeeeng. Guild Leader, I-I want to ride in the cart too…”

“Do you really want to take the ride from a kid with no legs?”

“B-but! She has the Director's special prosthetic legs equipped, so she has legs now! Guild Leader, you only dote on Ms. Ha-yul…”

“Sigh.”

The three of us, excluding Sim Ah-ryeon, shook our heads and headed for the next destination.

“Eh. W-wait for me! I'm coming too……!”

For a full fortnight, we scoured the Japanese archipelago.

Here, a left leg. There, a few fingers.

Like that, the corpse was assembled piece by piece in the cart's refrigerated compartment.

“Ha-yul.”

[Roger.]

After neatly arranging the scattered body parts, Lee Ha-yul drew out her puppet strings.

The puppet strings burrowed into the corpse like living parasites. Squeeze. Before long, the severed sections of the body were stitched together with the puppet strings.

[Complete.]

The corpse shot up to its feet.

If you looked closely, the severed sections were attached so cleanly you wouldn't even notice. Just like the marionette maid that Lee Ha-yul always had with her.

There was one difference from the maid puppet.

“Ugh.”

Oh Dok-seo was repulsed.

“They really messed up the face badly. What kind of bastard did this?”

Thanks to Ha-yul's puppet strings, the limbs were intact, but the face was so severely damaged that it was impossible to recognize.

If this had been before the fall of civilization, the kids gathered here would have gagged several times.

But now, since they observed corpses whenever they were bored, everyone just furrowed their brows a little, with no intense reactions.

“Ah-ryeon, it's your turn.”

“Mmm… Okay.”

Sim Ah-ryeon furrowed her eyebrows and opened her sketchbook. She seemed to have a lot to say, but her tone suggested she wouldn't complain since it was ‘the Guild Leader's request’.

“…”

However, once she actually began the task of drawing, the residue of emotion vanished from Sim Ah-ryeon's face completely.

“Please turn it around.” “Sitting pose.” “Please spread its arms wide,” and so on.

Sim Ah-ryeon constantly made requests in a low voice. Lee Ha-yul received those requests and manipulated the doll accordingly.

“Mm… Well, yes. I'm done drawing.”

Her tone was tinged with the sentiment that it wasn't particularly satisfying, but the quality was somehow acceptable.

What was drawn in Sim Ah-ryeon's sketch was none other than the full body of a child.

The ruined face was also properly ‘restored,’ and it was smiling brightly on the drawing paper.

“Yes. Good job. You must have had a hard time following us around, so rest for a while now.”

“Ah. Ehehe…”

When I patted her head, Sim Ah-ryeon smiled with a silly grin.

My heart ached at her smile, which seemed to say that this simple gesture relieved all her hardship.

It wasn't that I wasn't happy. It was just that I knew the ‘□’ cut out with scissors in Sim Ah-ryeon's heart was just as empty.

‘This is a problem I'll have to solve someday. Someday.’

For now, I had to focus on the anomaly in front of me.

I attached the portrait of the child drawn by Sim Ah-ryeon to the face of the corpse doll assembled by Lee Ha-yul.

Then I picked up a mask I had prepared in advance and covered the corpse doll's face.

The terribly mangled face and Sim Ah-ryeon's portrait were both swallowed and buried by the mask.

“Oh.”

Then, something amazing happened.

“Ah, Mister. It disappeared!”

Just as Oh Dok-seo said, the corpse doll wearing the portrait and mask had vanished in an instant.

It hadn't run off somewhere with footwork that far surpassed my own. It had literally just vanished in the blink of an eye.

Lee Ha-yul tilted her head.

[Was it eliminated?]

“No.”

I shook my head.

“Probably not. I'll be right back.”

[Be right back? Where are you going?]

Inunaki Tunnel.

Beneath it, a child wearing a plain white mask stood hesitatingly.

– Ah.

Has it spotted me?

The masked girl flinched and trembled, but spoke cautiously towards me.

– Uhm. M-mister.

“What is it?”

– I have to, um, get through that tunnel. It's too dark, so I'm scared to go alone. Could you possibly go with me?

“…”

I smiled.

“Of course. That's fine.”

– Ah.

“I was just about to cross the tunnel myself. Even if you're scared, I'll be by your side, so shall we go together?”

– Th-thank you!

“But this tunnel. There are a lot of rumors that ghosts appear here.”

– G-ghost!

The child was startled. Even though its expression was completely hidden by the plain white mask, I could clearly feel that it was terrified.

“That's right. Even if you hear a voice calling you, never look back. And you mustn't lose sight of me until we get out of the tunnel. Got it?”

– Yes, yes. I'll do that.

I held out my hand. The child then raised its arm and firmly grasped my hand.

We entered the tunnel.

Thump, the sound echoed longer than usual.

It was probably because a slightly smaller footstep, pitter-patter, echoed after my own.

– Euh…

“Are you scared?”

– I'm not scared…

This wasn't the first time I had entered the Inunaki Tunnel. It was probably the place I had spent the most time in during my life of regression, so it was only natural.

So, I was able to walk through safely.

The sections where a wrong step would plunge you into invisible water up to your head, choking you. The sections where your limbs would be torn apart. The sections where your fingers would be splintered.

“Oh. By the way, I never asked why you're trying to cross the tunnel.”

– M-Melt is gone.

“Melt?”

– Ah. It's the dog we're raising at home. It's really big. But a little while ago, it suddenly started barking a lot and disappeared inside the tunnel.

"…"

– If Melt is gone, my dad and I will be very sad. Melt will be sad too. That's why even though I'm scared, I have to cross the tunnel and bring Melt back!

"You must be scared too, but you mustered up the courage because you were worried your pet dog would be more scared. That's very brave of you."

– Hehe. Ah. I-I'm not scared!

Thump. Pitter-patter.

As always, the Inunaki Tunnel was terribly long.

It wasn't strange. A tunnel seen through a child's eyes was bound to be much longer than one experienced by an adult.

Why is it so rare to find an adult who will take the hand of a child when they muster a handful of courage and reach out?

– Melt shouldn't have gone far…

The masked girl muttered this the entire time we walked through the tunnel. It was partly to fight her fear, and partly because she was genuinely worried.

– There were flyers posted in the village, you know, asking to find lost pet dogs or cats.

"Is that so?"

– Whenever I saw those, I wondered what they were for. If Melt disappeared, I'd have to put up flyers too…

How long had we walked?

Woof!

The sound of a dog barking came from the other end of the tunnel. The child, who had been walking with its head down while holding my hand, was startled.

– It's Melt!

The child let go of my hand and, as if forgetting this was a scary tunnel, rushed towards the other end.

A faint light streamed in from the far end of the tunnel. The light settled in the puddles of water on the tunnel floor, then, Splash! it flew up with droplets of water at the girl's footstep.

– Melt! Melt! Melt!

The child kept calling its pet's name.

It seemed to harbor a slender hope that the dog would recognize it from that simple call, an expectation that a mere name would connect the two beings.

Woof woof.

Fortunately, it seemed to have recognized the voice.

To me, the sight of a puppy crying for its young master was completely invisible, but it seemed different for the masked girl.

The child plopped down at the end of the tunnel and hugged the empty air. As if the puppy that had been waiting for its master at the exit was right there.

– Thank goodness, Melt. I'm so glad. I'm glad you didn't go too far.

Woof.

– From now on, don't suddenly run off like that, okay? I was really scared. Let's go home quickly, Melt. Let's hurry home…

Woof.

And then, all sound ceased.

I exited the tunnel. The exit. The bushes were overgrown, and the concrete was broken. There was no sign of a puppy waiting for its master.

The child was gone too.

Instead, a mask lay on the ground. Beneath the mask, the picture Sim Ah-ryeon had drawn was pressed flat.

As I lifted the mask, I paused for a moment.

In the drawing, the girl was smiling. And next to the girl, something that Sim Ah-ryeon had not drawn was now there.

A large, brown-colored dog was drawn with a crooked crayon.

"…"

I carefully stored the drawing so it wouldn't get folded.

This time, there was no separate epilogue.

No. Not just this time, but the next time, and the time after that, there was no need to record a separate epilogue.

And that was only natural.

Because from now on, every story would become the epilogue of a certain regressor.

Footnotes:

Chapter 407

The Exhibitor I

Sinnoa

As I mentioned in the last story, I continued to travel around the world, ‘conquering’ anomalies as I went.

This time, let’s talk about something that happened in Busan along the way.

My colleagues in the Regression Alliance often expressed their gratitude to me.

The reason was simple. They said that my intervention, as a regressor, had changed their lives.

“Yeees. I'm so grateful that I feel like flaying you, stuffing you, and then enshrining you like a household god for the rest of my life.”

I’ll correct myself.

With the exception of personality-defects like Noh Do-hwa, ‘most’ of my colleagues in the Regression Alliance were grateful to me.

For instance, Lee Ha-yul.

[Yeah. It’s horrifying to think of a world without you, Oppa.]

Having returned to the Busan hideout after a long time, Lee Ha-yul philosophized while curled up in my arms like a squirrel.

[I probably would have killed the esteemed Mayor Jung Sang-guk and then neatly ended my own life.]

[The extermination of all traitors to the nation. It’s sad, but this was the mission given to me, Lee Ha-yul, the last proud descendant of the Deoksu Lee clan….]

And she really would have done it.

But, to put it another way, it meant that I had presented the choice of life to a Lee Ha-yul who was originally supposed to meet her end.

Though no one forced me to, I felt a certain sense of duty about this.

Of course. If you're going to force someone who wants to die to stay alive, shouldn't you take responsibility for their life?

I didn't mean I had to take responsibility for everything.

It meant I had to do just enough so that Ha-yul wouldn't give up on life, just enough to keep her finger from leaving the 'Continue' button in a game.

[…]

I had no intention of just dropping her into a hunting ground and abandoning her to grow on her own.

Nor did I have any intention of letting her dependency on me go unchecked.

[You mean I have to get stronger.]

That's right.

I taught her how to become stronger. I provided her with time to practice.

If there was a hole in her heart that was too difficult to bear, I would even enter her subconscious to reveal that '□'.

"It's hard to believe how things ended up this way, but every person in this world has a scar from having lost a being named Go Yuri. Ha-yul, you're no exception."

[…]

"The secret to the magic that makes people feel an instinctive fondness for Go Yuri, as if they've been brainwashed, lies here."

I used to think it was a simple brainwashing ability.

But not anymore.

"When people see Go Yuri, they feel the same emotion as if they've been reunited with a precious person they lost a long, long time ago. Subconsciously."

[Because she really is someone we lost?]

"Yes."

That was Go Yuri's secret. Her trick. Her method.

Anyone who saw Go Yuri felt a sense of 'longing'. They sensed a nostalgia for a time before the world had turned into a complete mess, before their own lives had been ruined.

It was a temptation that was difficult to refuse.

"But in my case, it went beyond just having a part of my past distorted. My past was thoroughly erased. It's literally a blank space, a void. That might be why I was able to remain relatively free from Go Yuri's brainwashing."

[…]

Nestled in my arms, Ha-yul tilted her head back and looked up at my face.

[That's actually a bad sign.]

"What do you mean?"

[Dad. If Go Yuri was a part of my life, even if I don't remember it, and my memories were distorted as that part was cut away.]

[The fact that your memories disappeared entirely.]

[Doesn't that mean Go Yuri was such a precious existence to you that simply cutting out a part of it wasn't enough, so everything had to be deleted?]

“…”

She was a sharp kid, as expected.

I gently combed through Ha-yul’s chestnut-brown hair. It was slightly curly, and Ha-yul liked it when I combed it this way.

“The fact that I have a wound I don’t even know about doesn’t necessarily have to be a bad thing.”

[Why?]

“You and I, Ha-yul. The members of the Regression Alliance. And even other people, it means we all suffer from the same void in our memories, doesn’t it?”

[…]

Lee Ha-yul rubbed her head against my chest. I, in turn, accepted Ha-yul’s childish affection.

‘However.’

All of humanity shared a common ‘□’. They had lost the being known as Go Yuri.

For that very reason, for some people, when they descend into a dream within a dream, a dream of dreams, a great void known as the subconscious world must unfold.

‘An Outer God is a being that corrupts all humans and twists the world. If that’s the case, has Go Yuri already devoured the people of Earth?’

It was at that moment.

“Ah, ahhhh.”

At the entrance of the cafe hideout, Sim Ah-ryeon, who hadn’t even washed her hair, stood with a trembling finger.

“G-Guild Leader is… again! Again, you just got home after so long and you’re only giving affection to Ms. Ha-yul…!”

Lee Ha-yul let out a scoff.

[The early bird gets dad’s lap.]

“I… I was awake too. If only I hadn’t been protecting the peace on SG Net until dawn, I could have done it!”

[That’s impossible.]

Lee Ha-yul said coolly.

[Ah-ryeon unni is a famous community addict.]

“My hair! C-comb my hair too, please!”

[You smell. Don’t come any closer.]

“What? W-what are you talking about? I only smell nice…. The faithful followers of the Eastern Holy State all like me. If my smell is b-bothering you, then it's entirely Ms. Ha-yul’s sense of smell that’s at fault.”

[Why in the world is this person a perfect woman when she’s cosplaying as a Saintess, but a complete mess the moment she comes home? I really don’t get it.]

Regardless of Lee Ha-yul’s laments, Sim Ah-ryeon squeezed herself in between us like a hedgehog and claimed her spot.

Ugh, Ha-yul let out a groan not with her voice, but with her entire body.

And yet, the fact that she only bickered with words and didn’t actually chase her away proved our Ha-yul’s beautiful nature. QED.

So what if she killed and tortured her family and carries them around as marionettes? Such things can happen.

It’s all the fault of Go Yuri, who implemented the Humanity

Affection Deficit Plan by drilling a □ in Ha-yul's heart. Mhmm.

"..."

Sim Ah-ryeon was staring at me intently.

Expecting this, I took out another comb I had brought separately and tidied her hair, and only then did her expression slacken into a wide grin.

"Ah-ryeon."

"Yes?"

"Are the preparations for the exhibition going well?"

"Yes!"

Ah-ryeon giggled.

"It's all thanks to you, G-Guild Leader."

The one and only person who was always elected with an overwhelming first place in the 'Shall we vote for the person in our Regression Alliance who might actually be an anomaly?' poll, a title acknowledged by herself and others.

Sim Ah-ryeon.

This ungrateful OldManGoryeo Villain whined that I only ever doted on Ha-yul, but that was, of course, fake news.

I could confidently say that if you searched the entire three thousand worlds, past life, present life, and next life, you wouldn't find anyone who put as much effort into caring for Sim Ah-ryeon as I did.

"A-a painting…?"

"Yes. I want you to paint funeral portraits for the anomalies."

The portrait painting project.

This too was part of the plan to rehabilitate the human enigma known as Sim Ah-ryeon.

As I mentioned when I dealt with the Inunaki Tunnel in a previous story, around this time I was taking Sim Ah-ryeon around and always instructing her to paint ‘portraits of anomalies’.

There was a deep thought behind it.

‘Ah-ryeon is, in the end, just a pitiful victim who developed a sickness of the heart due to that wicked Go Yuri’s mischief!’

The reason why Sim Ah-ryeon couldn’t find fulfillment in the real world and always escaped to the SG Net community to leech self-esteem from others.

The reason why, when I begged her to live in reality and even got her a job as a Saintess in the North, she would cry out, ‘This isn’t the real me,’ and act as a completely different persona, turning reality itself into a stage play.

The reason why, every time she saw me, she would exert a silent pressure of ‘ehehe’ and ‘If you saved me, I won’t allow you to run away,’ showing the very essence of a menhera.

It must all, all be the fault of the ‘□’ that Go Yuri left behind.

“Um…”

Hearing this assertion of mine, Oh Dok-seo tilted her head.

“Mister. Didn’t you say before that the reason anomalies are born is because people disregard their own responsibility and blame everything on others and the world? It feels like you’re doing the exact same thing right now, just swapping ‘blaming others’ with ‘blaming Go Yuri’….”

“The most recently uploaded chapter was 172 days ago.”

“Gyaaaaaaaaaak!”

Do not worry. The monster that threw my pure and innocent readers into the swamp of a hiatus has been vanquished by me, the Undertaker.

Anyway, the problem was the heart. A sickness of the heart.

But it wasn't as if I could bring Go Yuri over and plead, ‘Now, become one.’

What could I do to heal Sim Ah-ryeon, this troublemaker of the Regression Alliance, this one-of-a-kind villain who manufactured trouble like a perpetual motion machine, even just a little?

The answer.

‘It’s art.’

That was the tentative conclusion I reached.

‘Ah-ryeon dismisses all her activities in the real world as mere ‘pranks,’ but at least when she’s drawing, she’s more serious than anyone.’

That was the blessing Sim Ah-ryeon had received.

The fact that she could be sincere in at least one field. The fact that there was a point of friction where she could make her own self confront the world and clash with it.

And she even possessed a heavenly talent?

If this wasn't a blessing, what was?

‘Even though I can draw quite well myself, Ah-ryeon’s anomaly paintings… they have a power that’s difficult for me to express, moving and living with detail.’

Considering that I, a regressor, had invested easily hundreds of thousands of hours into painting, Sim Ah-ryeon’s sense was truly remarkable.

‘And yet…’

The product of that very talent.

Sim Ah-ryeon had never once revealed it to people under her real name, her true name.

Even when she occasionally posted doodles on SG Net, it was always under the nickname [OldManGoryeo] , the villain.

Or they were attached as uncredited illustrations to the guide posts uploaded by [The Librarian of the Great Library].

‘No. It’s not just her art.’

In the first place, how many people on Earth right now even know of the existence of Sim Ah-ryeon?

There were plenty of Awakeners who knew of the villain OldManGoryeo. There were even more people who worshipped the Saintess of the North.

Whether through infamy or fame, both ‘nicknames’ were receiving the most attention of the era.

But Sim Ah-ryeon?

“M-Ms. D-Dok-seo. Look at this. I’m sorry, readers. I’ve been cutting down on sleep to write and rewrite the manuscript, but I just can’t seem to get a satisfactory quality. I sometimes resent my own artisan spirit…”

“Hwaaaaaak! Mister! Ah-ryeon unni is tormenting me again! She’s reciting an old announcement I wrote and following me around!”

“…”

How many people, I wonder, truly know about Sim Ah-ryeon.

‘It’s probably just the members of the Regression Alliance.’

Whether it was the true Saintess residing in her home in Yongsan, or the fake Saintess coming and going from the palace in Pyongyang, both showed a strange similarity in that they were secluded from the world.

'That's why I'm going to make her debut! As the great artist Sim Ah-ryeon! The master of the art world who, following in the footsteps of Jackson Pollock and Willem de Kooning, has given birth to the Anomaly Expressionist style of painting!'

"?"

As if sensing my fervent gaze, Sim Ah-ryeon tilted her head. Then, thump thump, she returned with the comb and plopped down in front of me.

'Hehe.'

I smiled like a wicked young lady and combed her hair. Ah-ryeon-ah, soon the whole world will be cheering your name.

'Then you'll find joy in reality and stop putting on your mask-and-troll acts!'

"?"

At last, the long-awaited day of the exhibition.

We set up a temporary gallery in the Tower of Babel Plaza so that the citizens of Busan could come and go and view it comfortably.

Noh Do-hwa seriously questioned whether it was right to invest manpower in such a project, but faced with the great cause of normalizing Sim Ah-ryeon, even the great Director of the National Road Management Corps had to concede.

"What's this? An exhibition?"

"Wow, it's been a really long time since I've heard that word."

"Is it an event hosted by the National Road Management Corps?"

People who in the old days would never have given a second glance to something like an art museum, claiming it lacked dopamine, now looked around the gallery in twos and threes.

“Oh…”

“This has a certain vibe.”

“I know, right? It looks really esoteric, but it’s strange how you feel like you can understand what’s what.”

The choice of theme was also excellent.

In the exhibition hall, the visages of the anomalies for whom Sim Ah-ryeon and I had held funerals were painted in a vigorous style.

Anomalies, after all, were beings familiar to Awakeners and known to the general public through rumors. A field that held interest for everyone, regardless of class.

And yet, a genre that had never once been ‘properly’ established in art history was being created at the tip of Sim Ah-ryeon’s brush.

“Ah. Gremlin! I know this one! It’s a Gremlin!”

“Just looking at it makes me want to kill it…”

“Ahaha.”

“But what’s this masked kid here? Is this an anomaly too?”

“I don’t know. The esteemed Awakeners would probably know.”

Murmur murmur.

The number of visitors, which had been decent even during the early morning commute, had multiplied fivefold by lunchtime as word got out, and by the evening rush hour, the gallery was bustling enough to be completely full.

“Heh.”

“...I didn’t expect it to be this popular.”

On the second day, even Dang Seo-rin and Cheon Yo-hwa, who had each brought their executives, couldn't hide their surprise.

Looks of newfound respect focused on Sim Ah-ryeon, who sat at the counter with her head bowed low.

"The Teacher always protected and doted on her, so I just thought she was someone who was all about healing…"

It was only natural to be impressed.

The more types of anomalies a viewer was familiar with, the deeper and more they could see.

In other words, it was designed so that the more outstanding an Awakener was, the more immersed they would become in the exhibition.

'The response wasn't this good when people saw it as an illustration on SG Net.'

There was quite a big difference between a picture cut off by a smartphone screen and encountering the real thing.

Sim Ah-ryeon had even expressed 'Infinite Void' and 'Mastermind' as abstract paintings infused with expressionist techniques.

In front of that enormous canvas, even Cheon Yo-hwa couldn't help but linger for a long time.

"Hmm…"

Day four of the exhibition. Noh Do-hwa must have heard the rumors, as she somehow found the time to stop by.

After touring the gallery with my commentary, having taken on the job of a professional curator, Noh Do-hwa muttered.

"I see. I was wondering what kind of carefree art exhibition this was, but at this rate, it will be helpful for people to accurately perceive anomalies. This was meaningful…"

For even Noh Do-hwa, who had lived her life with a wall between herself and art, to evaluate it this way.

The exhibition project was, in short, a grand success.

– Anonymous: I don't think I've ever seen someone who can draw that well in my life

Anonymous: fr fr I thought modern art < this was just for clapping when a famous person takes a dump but my opinion changed a bit this time...

[Samcheon]WitchJudge: I was surprised too

Anonymous: Wow a comment from someone so esteemed in such a humble place;;

SG Net was also buzzing with talk of the exhibition.

"Hmm."

I looked down at my smartphone with a pleased smile.

That's right. Whether in reality or in the virtual world, it was fine even if she didn't draw attention as the villain OldManGoryeo.

Sim Ah-ryeon was overflowing with enough charm to capture people's interest.

Now, won't Ah-ryeon be able to escape, even just a little, from suffering due to the deficiency in her heart?

As I was feeling so thrilled.

"..."

Blankly.

Sim Ah-ryeon was staring intently at me.

Footnotes:

Chapter 408

The Exhibitor II

Sinnoa

The first-ever ‘Special Anomaly Exhibition’ came to a successful close.

It was a triumph that engraved the three-syllable name ‘Sim Ah-ryeon’ into the minds of everyone on the Korean Peninsula, Awakened and ordinary people alike.

“Artist Ms. Sim Ah-ryeon! Can I please have your autograph!”

“Me too! I was so deeply moved by your work, I can’t even pick a favorite!”

“Eh, ehehe. Yes...”

“Can we take a picture, Artist-nim?!”

“What? No. I’d absolutely hate that...”

“Eh.”

“Eh.”

Of course, the visitors all felt an instinctual sense, whether they knew it or not, that this artist might not be entirely sound of mind, but isn't that just how geniuses are?

A person's personality could be packaged in any number of ways. With titles like 'artist', 'genius painter', and 'mad anomaly artist' attached to her name, Sim Ah-ryeon's unique eccentricity was actually a charming point.

After all, the only people who would like someone for being perfect were Plato or Confucius. Unless finding joy in being adored by old men was your life's goal, a few moderate flaws in a person were like necessary breathing holes.

“Much like my own passionate love for the Romance of the Three Kingdoms is for me, the Undertaker.”

[Hey, Dad. If you have time to spout nonsense, hurry up and move the equipment.]

“Yes, milady.”

[Alright.]

Chastened by Ha-yul's retort, I sullenly directed the demolition of the gallery's temporary structure.

Now that the exhibition was over, clearing out the Tower of Babel Plaza was the natural course of action.

The plaza was also a place where some homeless people lived and food stalls thrived, so it wasn't good to monopolize it for too long.

“Ah.”

Just then, Sim Ah-ryeon came scurrying over from a corner of the exhibition hall.

“G-Guild Leader. Please don't clear it out yet!”

“Hm? Why? The exhibition ended today.”

“Well...”

Sim Ah-ryeon twiddled her index fingers.

“I-it's a secret!”

“A secret?”

“Yes, yes. There's something I want to show you, Guild Leader... Could you maybe leave it up without tearing it down for about a week?”

“Oh.”

I was a little taken aback.

“I think Director Noh Do-hwa is going to be breathing down our necks, asking what we're doing and telling us to clear out.”

“T-the gallery doesn't have to be as big as it is now! Just a space big enough for you and me to walk around is enough.”

“Hmm.”

If it was just that much.

“Wait. Let's see. You're saying it's okay to shrink it to about one-fifth of the current size, instead of using the whole plaza?”

“Yes!”

“Alright. Your Guild Leader will see what he can do.”

“Ehehe. Th-thank you. You're the best, Guild Leader...”

At Sim Ah-ryeon's strange request, the demolition work was halted immediately. The marionette labor corps led by Lee Ha-yul also trotted back.

“D-don't. You absolutely cannot enter the gallery until I say you can!”

“No one?”

“No one! It's a t-total secret. A super, super secret... If you try to peek behind my back, I won't forgive you, even if you are the Guild Leader...”

A threat from anyone else might have been different, but a threat from Sim Ah-ryeon was terrifying, so I quickly made myself scarce.

If anyone wishes to know the reason for my fear, please refer to the list of posts made on SG Net by [OldManGoryeo] and [Saintess of the North] in the slightly earlier episodes.

“Saintess, do you know anything?”

[No.]

I exchanged telepathic messages with the real Saintess, not the fake one, but I didn't get much.

[Ms. Ah-ryeon made me promise not to peek either.]

“She’s already been holed up in the gallery for four days without a word... I'm getting worried.”

After the demolition was postponed, Sim Ah-ryeon had surrounded the entire exhibition hall with a white tent. Then she went inside and started working on something with tapping and clicking sounds.

She had cut off all contact and communication with others.

Twice a day, when I placed a meal at the gallery entrance, a hand would shoot out from the tent as quick as a flash and snatch the meal tray.

The sliver of Sim Ah-ryeon's bare arm that I saw was completely covered in paint.

“From the looks of it, she’s clearly working on something else inside the exhibition hall.”

It was strange.

“But all the anomalies Ah-ryeon could possibly paint have already been completed as artworks. The exhibition ended well, too. What more could she be drawing.”

[Perhaps she is painting a piece she wants to show only to you, Mr. Undertaker?]

The Saintess said in a gentle tone.

[Ms. Ah-ryeon surely knows how much you do for her.]

[So I suspect she might be preparing a kind of thank-you gift.]

“My goodness.”

What a thoughtful gesture.

‘Ah, our Ah-ryeon is becoming more and more human! This Guild Leader is so happy I could cry!’

Tears were, in fact, streaming down my face.

[...You truly are devoted to Ms. Ah-ryeon, Mr. Undertaker.]

“Well, as an intellectual, I can't help but be moved, since I'm witnessing the evolution of an ape into a human in real time.”

[Pardon?]

“Yes?”

The promised week passed.

That morning, I was drinking a cafe au lait while brushing Ha-yul’s hair.

I was feeling a little lonely without the green-haired coffee thief who always appeared like a ninja to steal her share of caffeine, when.

Ping!

A notification popped up on my smartphone.

– Saintess of the North: Mr. Barista.

Sim Ah-ryeon had sent a message.

It was a private, secret message sent to the ‘Admin-Only Chatroom,’ which only members of the Regression Alliance could access, an internet chatroom we had set up using Seo Gyu's SG Net ability.

I skillfully turned on the one-on-one secret chat function and replied.

– ZERO_SUGAR: What?

– Saintess of the North: Respectfully, the preparations are complete. I request that Mr. Barista come alone to the designated place tonight at 11 PM.

– ZERO_SUGAR: OK

So the preparations were finally done.

'This is making me strangely excited.'

The thought that I might receive a proper gift from the green-haired coffee thief for the first time in my life mixed excitement and pride, creating a cocktail called fondness.

Ping!

– Saintess of the North: Furthermore, a strict dress code will be in effect at the location. Please refrain from using the seven-colored perfume you usually wear.

– Saintess of the North: I will see you tonight then.

I paused for a moment at the follow-up message.

First, I wondered what on earth was the correlation between a dress code and perfume.

But more than that, it was because an intangible sense of foreboding was creeping out from between the casually arranged words.

"…"

When night fell, I went to the exhibition hall.

The 11 PM of today felt quite different from the 11 PM of the past.

In the past, the dazzling modern civilization forced insomnia upon people, but now, the entirety of Busan was shrouded in quiet silence, except for the area around the casino.

"Ah."

That was why Sim Ah-ryeon's gallery, the only place in the area where lights swayed brightly, looked just like a bug zapper lamp or a fishing light on the night sea.

“W-welcome... Guild Leader!”

Sim Ah-ryeon was…

She was waiting for me at the entrance of the exhibition hall.

For someone who had mentioned a dress code in the chatroom, the great artist’s own attire was a mess.

Her whole body was splattered with paint, a complete disaster.

She had barely covered it with a doctor's gown, but even the white gown was stained with paint here and there.

However.

“Ah-ryeon, that thing in your pocket is...”

“Ah?!”

Sim Ah-ryeon hastily shoved the bridal veil peeking out of her doctor's gown pocket back inside.

“Th-this is a secret! A secret!”

“You’ve been saying it's a secret for a whole week, and there's another secret now?”

“Yes! Ugh, I-I was really pressed for time. It reminded me of my graduation exhibition deadline for the first time in a while. I don't have those dreams much these days, but before, whenever my condition got a little bad, I'd always have nightmares about my gr-graduation exhibition...”

Sim Ah-ryeon suddenly came closer and sniffed me. There was no context for it, but she often did things like this.

In the first place, overt ‘speech’ and ‘language’ didn't hold much meaning for Sim Ah-ryeon.

“Ah. Y-you didn't wear it... The scent.”

“I didn't realize you disliked that perfume. You never showed it before.”

“Hm? Oh, I don't dislike it. It's just that if you smelled like that today, Guild Leader, it might have been a bit of a problem...”

“Why?”

“What? Ummm. That scent is p-proof that Guild Leader is always thinking of Ms. Yu Ji-won in a corner of your mind, isn't it. Ehehe.”

Sim Ah-ryeon laughed as if she were embarrassed.

“So it would have been a d-distraction to viewing the exhibition. An interference with immersion. It's distracting. So I got rid of it.”

“...”

Question:

Does Sim Ah-ryeon dislike Yu Ji-won?

Answer:

No. That is impossible.

Counter-question:

Is there anyone in particular whom Sim Ah-ryeon dislikes?

Response:

No. That is impossible.

Interrogation:

Why is it impossible?

Reply:

Because while one can dislike cockroaches as a whole, to single out and hate or detest just one particular cockroach would be a very strange thing to do.

“P-please come in, Guild Leader. I worked really hard on this all night for a week! Ho-honestly, I think these are the masterworks of my life.”

Sim Ah-ryeon suddenly grabbed my hand and led me inside.

Into the gallery. Into a labyrinth of vision, blocked on all sides by temporary walls and white canvas.

“Ta-da, ta, ta-daaaa...”

The exhibition that had received nothing but praise from all walks of life, from the National Road Director to influential guild leaders, Awakened, and even ordinary people.

All the paintings in that place had been painted over in black.

Chaotically. Messily. Like graffiti.

The paintings that had so brilliantly depicted the anomalies were all ruined.

The works that some would have paid a fortune to add to their collections were gone, and in their place, hideously distorted ‘overpaintings’ were coiled.

“...”

My mouth went dry.

“What... is this, Ah-ryeon?”

“Yes?”

It was a natural question.

It was no exaggeration to say that the portraits enshrined in this gallery were originally the last treasures produced by the art world of humanity. And to think she had spent a week painstakingly ruining them like this.

But upon hearing my natural question, Sim Ah-ryeon made an unnatural expression, muttering, ‘Ummm’.

It was similar to before.

When I had asked ‘Why?’ about not wearing the perfume. In fact, her reaction back then was exactly the same as it was now.

It's strange.

Why does Guild Leader keep asking me things he already knows?

“Even if you ask... what it is. Well. I-it's how the anomalies look from Guild Leader's perspective... isn't it.”

My heart pounded.

I barely managed to calm the trembling of my tongue.

“You're saying this is how I... see the anomalies?”

“Yes.”

“Why do you think that?”

“Well... Because you have Complete Memory, Guild Leader?”

Sim Ah-ryeon tilted her head.

“M-memory is a form of association. It's not that different from sensation. An apple you see right now... and an apple you saw three years ago. From a person's perspective, it's all visual information.”

“...”

“But for normal people, the present perception is much stronger. O-of course. The thing in front of your eyes is clear, but the apple in your memory is blurry and indistinct... B-but! You're different, Guild Leader!”

Sim Ah-ryeon continued.

Like a university student explaining her work in front of a panel of judges. Like a curator leading visitors to the true meaning of a painting.

With conviction.

“They're both... the same... aren't they?”

“Ehehe.”

She laughed.

“Um, for exaample... Here! Here, the Ten Legs!”

The painting of the Ten Legs had also changed drastically from what I saw a week ago at the ‘Day Exhibition.’

In the portrait of the Ten Legs hanging in the ‘Night Exhibition,’ the corpse of Dang Seo-rin was depicted for some reason, her chest pierced and her limbs severed.

“B-because of the Ten Legs, something very precious to you died, didn't it, Guild Leader. Because you have Complete Memory. For normal people, the object in front of them is just the object in front of them... and memory is memory. Well, of course they can overlap, but the clarity and blurriness are so distinct that they can be separated...”

She brought me in front of the massive painting.

Sim Ah-ryeon brought her hands together, palms touching.

“But not you, Guild Leader. Y-you can't do that. Because you literally have Complete Memory... The present Ten Legs and the past Ten Legs are perceived as completely equal, ‘overlapping.’”

“...”

“I-I think it's amazing. Picasso's Cubism was an attempt to paint human perception by overlapping not just the present, but also the realms of recollection and prediction, but h-honestly, that was something imagined with the ‘head.’ It's not like the p-past, present, and future appeared to the artist with equal color and tone... It's a bit… lame. For a theme that pursued fundamental intuition, the m-method to reach it was ultimately intellect, not sensation. But... not you, Guild Leader! You're total human Cubism!”

“...”

“Wh-when you see one Ten Legs. Assuming this is the 1,000th cycle. You're looking at a whopping 1,000 Ten Legs at the same time! Weell. In most regressions, the behavior of the Ten Legs would have been similar, so even if it's 1,000, they'd probably blend into some clumps... Ehehe. I'm so jealous, Guild Leader.”

Sim Ah-ryeon squirmed.

“Guild Leader, you're a… a living, moving exhibition hall. You're different from the kids who just talk about how their intuition is special or whatever. You, Guild Leader, are, fwah. The real deal...”

“...”

“Umm. But it's strange. Why do you keep telling me to paint from ‘other people's perspectives’ and not ‘your own perspective’? Y-your perspective is so much. Soo much, a million, ten million times more interesting...”

My throat was parched.

My mouth had long since become a desert.

The thick saliva that pooled under my tongue felt not like the moisture I craved, but like a swamp pulling my tongue down.

“How...”

“Well, because I was thinking of you, Guild Leader?”

It was an immediate answer.

There wasn't even a need to finish the sentence, ‘How did you know?’

Because in Sim Ah-ryeon's mind, my lines were already being completed automatically.

“Every single day.”

Skip. A conversational shortcut.

It was something that often happened when I was talking with Sim Ah-ryeon alone.

As I said, overt ‘speech’ and ‘language’ didn't hold much meaning for her.

“I… I'm actually always amazed by you, Guild Leader. You must see everything. You must be seeing it. How can you a-act so perfectly...”

“See everything?”

“Us, in our dead forms.”

“...”

“You can see them, can't you? Even now.”

Thump. Sim Ah-ryeon came closer.

“L-like being decapitated. Or having our limbs torn off by an anomaly. Bloodstains. All those things, all those memories, you must see them clearly, right before your eyes.”

“...”

“A-amazing, Guild Leader! Actually, your acting skills might be your most amazing talent, even more than your intuition...”

Fumble, fumble.

Sim Ah-ryeon took something out of her doctor's gown pocket. The bridal veil she had crumpled up earlier.

It was the veil from a Saintess's habit.

“U-umm. Sooo. Ah. There.”

Sim Ah-ryeon unfolded the veil this way and that before placing it on her head.

Click, clack.

She walked down the gallery corridor, and in the very center, beneath the largest painting, Sim Ah-ryeon knelt down.

Artwork Title:

‘World Tree Udumbara.’

On the painting where vibrant petals should have been dancing wildly.

Brushstrokes were painted over, and the ‘corpses’ of Sim Ah-ryeon were drawn, her limbs all twisted like dead trees.

Like an afterstory of Sim Ah-ryeon, fallen to corruption while fending off the Monster Wave.

“…”

I could recognize it.

No. In this world, only I could immerse myself in the true meaning of the masterpieces in this ‘Night Exhibition.’

“Every time you brush m-my hair, Guild Leader.”

Sim Ah-ryeon, kneeling with her back to me, murmured softly.

“I can feel it. So many... emotions. Sadness. Resentment. Sorry. Gratitude. Really, really dense emotions...”

“…”

“So I thought. Ah, come to think of it. I must have been active as the Saintess of the North in the Final Defensive War. Since the Eastern Holy State would have participated. Then I would have worn a Saintess's habit... The sight of me becoming corrupted. I couldn't let the believers see that, right? Ah, so I'd wear something like a veil that covers even my head. So.”

The shoulders of the kneeling Sim Ah-ryeon, her back turned to me, trembled slightly.

“Ehehe. I thought, this is probably what I looked like at the very end! What do you think? Am I right?”

“...”

“G-Guild Leader, now…”

Sim Ah-ryeon smiled.

“Brush… my hair, please.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 409

The Exhibitor III

Sinnoa

Reminiscence.

I am always thinking about how I can be truthful to all of you.

I must confess now, there was a rather desperate reason why I hired the ‘ghostwriter’ known as Oh Dok-seo.

Was it merely to subjugate Infinite Metagame? That was part of it, but that wasn't the only reason.

I was fundamentally unsuited to writing the story of my own life.

I couldn't be any other way.

Far down the street, the back of someone you know is walking. So you quicken your pace and call their name.

“Ah.”

That person turns around.

“Undertaker. What a coincidence. Are you going somewhere?”

A daily occurrence. A normal reaction. A natural response.

However, for me, who possesses the [Complete Memory] ability, such a thing never happens.

That person.

"Ah" "Vice Guild Leader?" "Undertaker" "I knew you'd come" "Why are you so late?" "I've been curious since we first met… what is that staff?" "What a coincidence" "Hm? Oh, it was you? Sorry. I was lost in thought for a moment" "What, that outfit again? I told you not to wear it because it's so dreary" "You really are always wearing a barista uniform" "Are you going somewhere?"

They look back at me. They keep walking, as if they didn't hear. They smile brightly. They blush and grin. They snort as if it's absurd. They playfully jab my side with their elbow. They clasp their hands behind their back.

Now, after more than 1,000 regressions.

There are over 1,000 versions of you.

"…"

Complete Memory.

The coexistence of the past and the present.

Within the scene that unfolds before my eyes like a kaleidoscope, I am like an archaeologist, brushing away the sands of the past to separate them from the present.

I snatch up 'this cycle'.

How can I possibly convey this feeling to you all?

I select the most appropriate vision that fits the context of the present moment.

In a way, you could say that I immersed myself and 'acted' as the me of this regression.

It is so natural to me that there are many aspects that are, conversely, difficult to explain.

"…"

Sometime ago.

"Mister. I'm sorry, but this is… unusable."

Oh Dok-seo said, picking up my manuscript.

Yes. Originally, I had no intention of leaving the novel's writing entirely to her. I had planned to help with a significant portion.

What Oh Dok-seo was holding was my first draft.

“What do you mean, unusable? Why?”

“Well… for a single line of dialogue, there are a thousand lines overlapping. Also, at this point in the novel, we should be telling the story of the 20th cycle, but there’s dialogue that appears much later, around the 400th cycle. If it’s like this, the readers can’t follow.”

“But Dokseo.”

I said.

“This is the truth, for me.”

“…”

Oh Dok-seo’s expression distorted.

“If my truthful world seems bizarre in your eyes. Then perhaps I really have already degenerated into an anomaly.”

“…”

A long silence followed.

Oh Dok-seo took off her hat.

“…No.”

She opened her laptop, unclasped her hands, and looked straight at me.

“That’s not it. Mister, you just became an awakener with an ability called Complete Memory. You just rolled through hundreds of regressions because you didn't give up, and the result of that is becoming an anomaly? I can never accept something like that.”

“What are you trying to say?”

“I’ll edit it for you.”

Oh Dok-seo put on her glasses.

It was a tool she only wore when writing her novel alone, saying for some reason that she didn't like showing her face with glasses to others.

“There’s no reason anywhere for you to lie to the readers, Mister. Just tell me things as they are. Instead, I’ll edit it in my own way—as much as possible, as sequentially as possible.”

“…”

“You said I’m not just the priestess of Infinite Metagame, but your priestess too, right? This is perfect. That’s originally the role of a priestess, isn't it? An intermediary. To interpret and translate the language of a god.”

I am always thinking about how I can be truthful to all of you.

“Let’s share the truth.”

“…”

“Your truth is your own, Mister. I’ll also be faithful to my truth. The friction that arises between the two, the narrative errors, I’ll take full responsibility for all of it.”

That was my editor.

That was the solution Oh Dok-seo presented.

“But… okay. I finally understand.”

“Understand what?”

“I was curious how you could tread the same path hundreds of times without getting tired. Where that mentality came from.”

A bitter smile crossed Oh Dok-seo’s lips.

“From your perspective, Mister, the same route isn’t all that bad.

Why? Because it’s easier when people’s reactions are the same. It eliminates the ‘need to distinguish only this regression from the hundreds of other people’.”

“…”

“Of course, since you're human too, there must be times you get tired. At those times, you create a ‘regression that will never overlap with other regressions’. Well. Either way, there’s a common point in making the other person’s reaction into ‘one’.”

I nodded my head.

“But there is one problem.”

“Hm? What problem?”

“Didn’t we decide that I would be in charge of the descriptions of you?”

“Ah. Um. In that case, just try to follow the way I wrote the novel.”

Oh Dok-seo shrugged her shoulders.

“It doesn’t really matter if you lie a little to the readers about me, right? I’m just an editor, anyway. Originally, I’m a presence that shouldn’t even be revealed at the forefront of the novel.”

“Hmm.”

“In the Regression Alliance, I’m a bit of a clown anyway. I don’t really have any desire to show my true self to the readers.”

“Will you be okay with that?”

“Yes. That’s what I want.”

And so it was.

“I will never let you be treated like an anomaly, Mister.”

Oh Dok-seo’s eyes shone with a red light.

“I’ve decided. In the novel I’m going to write, all the story titles will end with ‘Ja’.”

“Ja?”

“Yes. The character for person, 者. In the end, this will be a story of a person, a story of a person meeting another person.”

“…”

I held back a smile at that grandiose declaration.

“For something like that, it seems you haven't followed it very well.”

“Huh?”

“Like ‘The Monad’ (單子). Or ‘The Potato’ (감자). In the first case, it’s the character for son (子), and in the second case, it’s just pure Hangeul.”

Oh Dok-seo’s head tilted.

And her lips parted.

“What are you talking about?” “Ah, jeez. That was like a short story collection! Make an exception!” “I never wrote a chapter like that?” “Potato (Gamja) was a title that omitted the ‘si’ from Gamsija (Watcher). And it was a pun that meant potato at the same time. In reality it’s Potato, so I wasn’t wrong anyway” “The character for son is similar to the character for person, so shouldn’t it be fine?” “Sorry, mister” “I didn't understand what you just said” “What did you mean?”

“…”

I smiled.

“It’s nothing.”

“Honestly, Mister. As if it’s not enough that you have the protagonist attribute, you’re always muttering nonsense or talking to yourself.”

“…”

Reminiscence.

To me, a reminiscence was the same as the present.

Life was always an epilogue.

——Every time I faced the Ten Legs.

There, I saw not only the teeming tentacles but also the figures of my comrades.

There was Dang Seo-rin, her head severed. There was Old Man Scho, his chest pierced. There was Yu Ji-won, who had pushed me aside and died in my place. In all sorts of ways, my comrades who had died in each cycle were collapsed at the tips of the tentacles, under the grasp of the Ten Legs.

“Undertaker…” “Doc!” “Your Excellency,” “Run” “At least you” “I’ll cover the back!” “Please, my last words” “We’ve been annihilated” “Vice Guild Leader!” “Sorry” “For getting you caught up in this” “Another failure” “The defense line,” “…” “I’m sorry” “Will you tell the next me?”

This world hated humanity.

The anomalies were insulting humans.

They were even desecrating the deaths of humans.

I could not forget.

I could not run away.

I simply could not forgive.

I had been seen through by Sim Ah-ryeon.

A secret that only Oh Dok-seo had known. A truth that I had even told Oh Dok-seo myself first, Sim Ah-ryeon had figured it out entirely on her own.

It was a surprising thing.

But for some reason. In a corner of my heart, there was also a feeling that it was ‘natural’.

Sim Ah-ryeon ate human emotions. As a joke, I had described her a few times as ‘the bird that drinks poison’, but in truth, she was closer to ‘the bird that drinks emotions’.

Before Sim Ah-ryeon, every human could not help but reveal their true, bare face.

For example.

– Can I take a picture? Miss artist?

That visitor’s request, which sounded perfectly ordinary on the surface, might have sounded completely different to Sim Ah-ryeon’s ears.

Because the color changed depending on what kind of emotion was held.

Was it pure fan adoration? Did they want to brag to someone? Was it to spread her personal information on SG Net by pretending it was a mistake. Was it lust?

Whatever it was, Sim Ah-ryeon ‘felt’ it.

Since Sim Ah-ryeon’s intelligence was by no means low, she could also guess the events that would follow based on the emotions she felt.

So she answered.

– Pardon? No. I absolutely hate the idea…

– Eh.

– Eh.

The reaction was misaligned.

A frictional sound. Noise was generated.

An irreparable gap had opened up between the world Sim Ah-ryeon perceived and the world people walked in.

It was the same when having a conversation.

– Hahh, i-it was really tight. It reminded me of the deadline for the graduation exhibition for the first time in a while. I don’t have those dreams much these days, but before, whenever my condition got a little bad, I always had, had nightmares about the graduation exhibition…

Even when the other person was quietly listening to her story, Sim Ah-ryeon could actually see the other person’s emotions ‘reacting in real time’.

So from Sim Ah-ryeon’s perspective, a ‘person who quietly listens without a word’ in the truest sense did not exist.

Instead, it was like this.

– Hahh, (Why is she moaning) i-it was really tight. (What was tight) It reminded me of the deadline for the graduation exhibition for the first time in a while. (Graduation exhibition?) I don’t have those dreams much these days, but before, whenever my condition got a little bad, I always had (Condition?) ha-had nightmares about the graduation exhibition…

Therefore, she couldn't help but stutter.

Because the other people were constantly questioning her back with their emotions. Reacting. Too quickly.

Matching that tempo, Sim Ah-ryeon was swayed this way and that by the ever-changing context, repeating her words as if rambling.

Now, a certain contradiction would be understood.

Q. Why does Sim Ah-ryeon not stutter at all when she is playing the part of the Saintess of the North?

A. Because she does not need to answer the other person sincerely. Without needing to have a ‘conversation’, she just needs to perform the role given to her.

It was similar in essence.

The me with Complete Memory, and Sim Ah-ryeon who lived by drinking emotions, we were both detached from the world.

…People might blame Sim Ah-ryeon, asking why she doesn't wash her hair, why she walks around so messily.

But Sim Ah-ryeon herself would probably want to ask the complete opposite.

‘You all are leaking emotions everywhere, you know?’

Washing one’s hair and dressing neatly.

That was, in essence, the act of covering up one’s appearance because you ‘want to look good’ to others, because you ‘don’t want to be criticized’.

But before Sim Ah-ryeon, there was no use in covering anything up. Everyone was, in a sense, walking around stark naked.

Our values were different.

Our perspectives were different.

So, it was perhaps natural that my most secret truth was seen through by Sim Ah-ryeon of all people.

Because we were two of a kind.

“Ehehe…”

Rustle.

While I was combing her hair, Sim Ah-ryeon, with her back turned to me, laughed softly.

“I-it’s nice…”

I didn't ask, what is?

Sim Ah-ryeon was responding ‘it’s nice’ to my own feeling of seeing her as a kindred spirit.

Unlike people who live bound by words and sentences, between the two of us, language was always nothing more than a secondary tool.

“When did you notice?”

“Ah. Uum. Th-that, Guild Leader… You don’t feel lust under any circumstances.”

“?”

This time, an unexpected answer came back.

“Lust?”

“Yeees… I-it’s strange, isn’t it. So I thought about it. I mean, every time you see people, you see piles and piles of corpses layered on top of them… There’s no way something like lust would arise.”

“…”

“Because you are a normal person, Guild Leader.”

A bitter smile formed on my face.

It was truly difficult to hide anything in front of this child.

With this, not only my attribute of ‘monologuing’, which I had disguised under the pretext of the conventions of genre fiction, but even the cliché of the ‘asexual protagonist’ had been seen through.

“People… are really strange, aren’t they.”

“Please try to understand them.”

“Yes. But, it’s a problem you can solve by just imagining it simply, isn't it? You remember everything perfectly. Then how would the world look. You drink emotions. Then what would happen… I-it's so easy."

Sim Ah-ryeon leaned the back of her head against my chest.

"O-only you did it, Guild Leader. That."

"…For me too, only you have been like this. They are truly wonderful paintings. Thank you."

"Ehehe."

"Still, Ah-ryeon-ah. There are many times when people don't know unless you tell them."

"Even though you knew, Guild Leader?"

"That is…"

"I don't really need other people."

Sim Ah-ryeon looked up at me.

"I am… happy. Guild Leader."

"…"

"The exhibition. It was nice to hold it after a long time. But those people just revere me after seeing my paintings, right? Uum. I mean, Guild Leader… it wouldn't matter if I could never paint for the rest of my life, right?"

"That's right."

"Yes."

The combing stopped.

It wasn't me who stopped. Sim Ah-ryeon had leaned completely against me, so I could no longer comb her hair.

"You don't have to try to fill the hole in my heart, i-it's okay, Guild Leader.”

From under my chin.

Sim Ah-ryeon was looking up at me.

“It’s not because I have a deficiency in my heart… or because I have a memory of losing someone. Th-that’s not why I like you, Guild Leader.”

“…”

“I like you because you are you, Guild Leader. Whether I can’t draw, or I cause trouble… it doesn't matter. Just like how I am still me to you, Guild Leader.”

Sim Ah-ryeon raised both her arms and wrapped them around my neck. And she buried her head in my chest.

“Aside from the two of us, h-honestly, no one will understand this exhibition but…”

In the quiet night of the exhibition hall.

Beneath all the frames stained with anomalies. In the middle of a gallery where the thousands upon thousands of deaths I had witnessed were all listed.

Sim Ah-ryeon smiled.

“I think it’s truly… beautiful.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 410

The Exhibitor IV

Sinnoa

Wouldn't it be fair to call this a confession already?

“…”

I took a short breath as I combed Sim Ah-ryeon's hair from behind.

This was the reason why.

How in the world could I ever leave a child like this and go somewhere else?

In a world contaminated by Infinite Metagame and turned to dots, in other words, during the destruction of the 135th cycle, Sim Ah-ryeon hadn't abandoned me, even though I was nothing more than a mere ‘NPC’.

“Ah-ryeon, the Guild Leader is—”

And so, I opened my lips, intending to give an equally sincere answer to this child's most genuine confession. I opened them, but…

Sim Ah-ryeon, who was sitting with her back to me, had her head tilted like the Leaning Tower of Pisa.

“Ah-ryeon?”

I held her shoulders to check on her.

“Zzz...”

This kid, she was dozing off.

She was even drooling waterfalls to boot.

“Ha.”

A disbelieving laugh escaped me.

No way. It’s not like she’s some hard-of-hearing protagonist. How can she just say her piece during a heartfelt exchange like this and then immediately fall asleep?

Even the gentle Guild Leader was getting angry now.

“You little rascal. You really just live however you want, don't you. You little troublemaker.”

“Ube-eb, bee… uhehe...”

I poked her cheeks over and over, but Sim Ah-ryeon's sleep phase wouldn't budge from the ‘deep sleep’ stage.

The reason was easy enough to guess. For a whole week, she hadn't rested, painting endlessly without a care for her clothes getting dirty. How could her mental state possibly hold up?

She could maintain her physical vitality by casting self-heals. Thanks to that, she had completed a quest that would make anyone in the art world faint just hearing about it, ‘Preparing for Two Consecutive Exhibitions’.

But the vitality of her mind was another matter entirely.

Sim Ah-ryeon had been running on the high of her healing abilities, painting nonstop for a week without sleep. It wasn't normal.

She probably held on through sheer grit and willpower until I came to see her exhibition, and the moment she thought, ‘Ah, the Guild Leader has seen everything now,’ the rubber band in her head must have snapped.

“Uhehe, Giiild Leeder...”

“Yes, yes. The Guild Leader is right here.”

Pat, pat.

I set the comb down and stroked Sim Ah-ryeon's hair with my hand. I had cleared my schedule anyway, so I planned to stay by her side until the OldManGoryeo herself woke up.

——Thump.

Just then, I heard footsteps coming from the gallery entrance. It was a little strange.

I had hung a ‘No Entry’ sign at the entrance. The time had already passed midnight. There shouldn't be any citizen audacious enough to attempt a theft right under the nose of the Tower of Babel.

‘Did a drunk from near the casino wander in by mistake?’

Step. Step. Step.

The footsteps grew closer. Soon, they would round the corner and I would be able to see who it was, so I prepared to give them a warning in advance.

“I don't know who you are, but this is a restricted area for the general public. I'd appreciate it if you would head back out...”

“Oh my.”

Thump.

One of the person's feet peeked out from around the corner. Then their lower body, hidden by a long skirt. Their neat upper body.

And their pink hair, which cascaded down like a weeping willow.

“I'm sorry. I heard this exhibition was a nighttime exclusive, so I was under the impression the closing time was at dawn. Did I get the information wrong?”

“...”

My whole body froze.

Go Yuri.

The scent of apples, so rich it felt like it would sweetly pickle my very brainstem, was approaching from the gallery corner like a shadow.

Step. Step.

“This one has had its frame torn off. Because there was no intention of preserving or managing the work later, because the plan was to use it for a single exhibition and then discard it. To not frame it and expose its bare face entirely... How wonderful.”

“...”

“An exhibition that contemplates how much a single frame can interfere with immersion. Of course, the perfume of Miss Ji-won might be seen as a distraction. The artist thought only of the Guild Leader for a whole week while painting, so they must have thought, ‘I wish the Guild Leader would also set aside their thoughts of someone else for a moment and look only at my work.’”

“...”

“It's an entirely reasonable transaction.”

I carefully shifted Sim Ah-ryeon, holding her tightly in my arms.

Of course, I never took my eyes off Go Yuri. I watched with maximum vigilance, so as not to miss a single movement, no matter how subtle the sign.

On the other hand…

“Aha, this one is Miss Seo-rin. And this one… could it be the death of Miss Yo-hwa? My. She was always a good painter, but for her skill to improve this much. Mmm. It's magnificent... As expected of love and death. No matter how the history of human art changes, these two themes remain endlessly potent.”

She strolled nonchalantly through the midnight gallery, stopping at each piece in turn as if they were bus stops.

90 minutes passed.

In the end, I had no choice but to open my lips.

“Why did you come here?”

“Because I heard a wonderful exhibition was being held.”

“Is that really the only reason?”

“For now, yes. To not only love someone's life, but to love even their death. To see their very existence as beautiful. Sincerely, sincerely, sincerely... Opportunities to witness the works of a master painter like that don't come around often, you know.”

“...”

“I enjoyed them very much.”

Bow.

Go Yuri bowed deeply before me, or rather, towards the both of us with Sim Ah-ryeon.

“If this world were a single work of art, and only beauty existed within it, then one could say that all the time a certain regressor has repeated over and over existed solely for this one moment.”

“...”

“They were masterpieces that would not be an exaggeration to praise as such.”

It was high praise.

But there was no way those words of acclaim would reach Sim Ah-ryeon's ears.

It wasn't because Ah-ryeon was asleep.

It's just that Go Yuri's voice never reached anyone in the first place.

Not curses, not praises, not even a simple everyday greeting.

She was an existence that simply returned an optimized response according to what the person facing her ‘wished’ for.

That was Go Yuri.

“But you and I both know, Doc. That the world cannot be described as simply beautiful.”

However.

I alone was the exception.

“Yes.”

For some reason, since the 1,000th cycle, I had become able to hear the anomaly's voice. I had also figured out the strategy that Go Yuri's words change to match her conversation partner.

That's why a trick like this was possible.

“…”

I looked around.

The gallery at night. Here, a monument of corpses built from my deaths from the 1st cycle to around the 1,000th was on display.

Without rushing, slowly, I connected ‘myself’ to the deaths expressed in all the paintings. I immersed myself.

Starting from the 1,083rd cycle and going in reverse order—— to the 5th. To the 4th. And finally, to the 1st cycle I had seen in Cheon-hwa's dream.

[Complete Memory].

This ability, which for me was both a lifelong curse and a blessing, became the teeth of over 1,000 keys.

Click.

The enigma named Go Yuri. I slowly aligned the tumblers on that single lock.

“Go Yuri.”

“Yes.”

“Why did you erase your own existence and fall into being an anomaly?”

“…”

The next moment.

Screeeech. As if a key and lock were grinding against each other, ‘voices’ ricocheted from the canvases scattered in every direction of the exhibition hall.

“What are you talking about?” “I have never fallen into being an anomaly” “Mr. Undertaker” “My” “Yes? Miss Cheon-hwa?” “Of course, it's for the sake of humanity” “That's sad…” “Your Excellency Undertaker” “Ahaha, I've finally been caught!” “There is none” “Don't you actually already know?” “I am human, just as you see” “That's interesting” “I have never mentioned the next teacher to the young lady” “With me” “Guild Leader” “Voice” “Being able to forget can sometimes be a blessing” “This was the only way” “The fact that distinguishing between anomalies and humans is extremely ambiguous” “That is your ego” “Let's become one” “Doc” “Can you hear me?”

The voices echoed endlessly.

They rained down like bullets on a battlefield.

But I didn't lose my concentration.

On a normal day, I might have, but here, with just a glance, the records of my deaths spanning 1,000 cycles were on display.

A child was asleep in my arms.

This was the temple that Sim Ah-ryeon had built for me.

Here, it was possible for me to maintain myself, continuously, without a single skip.

Therefore, I wove all the hopes and wishes of every cycle into a single thread, a single timeline, a single key, and reached it.

“What are you talking about?” “I have never fallen into being an anomaly” “Mr. Undertaker” “My” “Yes? Miss Cheon-hwa?” “Of course, it's for the sake of humanity” “That's sad…” “Undertaker-nim” “Ahaha, I've finally been caught!” “There is none” “Don't you actually already know?” “I am human, just as you see” “That's interesting” I have never mentioned the next teacher to the young lady” “With me” “Guild Leader” “Voice” “Being able to forget can sometimes be a blessing” “This was the only way” “The fact that distinguishing between anomalies and humans is extremely ambiguous” “That is your ego” “Let's become one” “Doc” “Can you hear me?”

I edited them.

“My” “voice” “Can you hear me?”

I answered.

“Yes.”

I broke the curse.

“I can hear you. Clearly.”

Go Yuri's lips closed.

“……” “……”

The countless paintings, the countless Go Yuris, all fell silent at once.

Screak. The grinding noise subsided. The key had been inserted all the way to the end of the lock. And all that remained was a single result.

“…”

Unlock.

The tinnitus faded.

The shadows that had been wailing in the abyss of pandemonium, crying for me to look at them first, to understand them, also disappeared.

I looked at the one person.

I was wishing for an answer.

And Go Yuri could not refuse my wish.

She was that kind of being from the very beginning.

She was.

“…It's taken a long time.”

She smiled.

“Humans aren't beautiful. Not even you, Undertaker. You throw everything away and go on a vacation just to wipe away the stains on your heart.”

I drew in a breath.

“When I go on a vacation cycle, Ha-yul kills herself. Yo-hwa becomes a mad necromancer. Seo-rin becomes a lonely dictator. My other companions also end up in unhappy lives. I leave, knowing all of this.”

“But, that is a temporary measure for you to remain human, Doc.”

“…The moment I think that the lives of those children are all my responsibility, I would try to take responsibility for all of humanity, and I am not a god. I would surely break and shatter someday.”

“And yet, some would call your method cowardly.”

“What's important is victory. Having come this far, I have no choice but to win. For that, I changed the way I live, and I even threw away the way I think.”

“Indeed, those are correct words.”

A fine line appeared on Go Yuri's lips.

“To know how to abandon oneself. That is the minimum requirement to walk the lonely path of this world stained with emptiness.”

“…”

“It's not enough to simply be prepared to abandon yourself. If it were a problem that could be solved with such resolve, no one would have suffered.”

“After devising the best possible way to abandon yourself, can you truly go through with it?”

Step.

Go Yuri walked past me with her hands behind her back.

Slowly.

“You asked why I abandoned myself. The answer to that question is very simple.”

“…”

“It is, of course, because my goal is to save people, not to give birth to a one-of-a-kind Outer God named ‘Go Yuri.’”

Surely the Doc, if no one else, would understand my heart, is what she seemed to say.

The sweet whisper dug into my ear.

“Ah. It would have been nice if I were a slightly more perfect being. God Go Yuri! Hiyah! I will take responsibility for all of you—like this. Ahaha.”

“...”

“But I am not a god.”

Thump.

Go Yuri's footsteps stopped behind me.

“I don't ask for much. It's just that I was born as this kind of person in this kind of world, and things just happened to turn out this way. Just like you, Doc.”

“You are.”

Go Yuri had said.

That if this world were only beautiful, then thousands of cycles would have been worth it for the sole reason of holding Sim Ah-ryeon's exhibition.

The world was not beautiful. This world hated humans. There were only humans who were born of that hatred.

That is why, if I could reach the single question and answer I was about to speak, then those thousands of cycles would have been worth it.

“Who are you?”

Go Yuri leaned in and whispered.

“I am a reincarnator.”

It was a revelation like a lightning strike.

“A human who is always born again.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 411

The Reincarnator I

Sinnoa

——I don't remember my first life.

That's because I don't have a good memory like you do, Doc. Ah, of course, I did have a chance to improve it, but I naturally refused.

A Complete Memory Ability, you ask. Ahaha. What kind of curse is that, who in the world would want to receive such a thing?

…It's faint, at best.

There are two scenes that I can barely recall.

There was a playground in my neighborhood. A playground covered in sand. Yes, it was an old one.

I would meet with children whose faces and names I didn't know there during the day, and we would part ways in the evening.

Then the void arrived. And around the time civilization was ending, a thought suddenly occurred to me.

But, that wasn't actually true.

I had joined the resistance in Busan. Of course, I was a non-combatant, not a combatant.

Ah. For your reference, a massive organization like the 'National Road Management Corps' obviously didn't exist back then.

There was no such thing as an 'awakener' either. Strategy guides hadn't been discovered like they have been now… and people with strange abilities hadn't been found yet.

But then, a man who was leading a part of the resistance at the time was about to pass by me when he suddenly stopped.

The man's rank was much higher than mine. I was a non-combatant, while he was a combatant, and on top of that, he was in charge of the most dangerous reconnaissance team.

The man spoke.

I don't remember his exact words.

As I've told you, my memory is terrible compared to yours, Doc.

But I probably said something like this.

Honestly, it was absurd.

Who would remember a childhood like that?

I can guarantee you that a person makes far more friends before the age of 12 than they do after the age of 12.

It's just that we parted after playing just once at the playground. We parted after kicking a soccer ball on the field. We parted after throwing the winter snow.

You just can't recall their faces or names.

I just ended up smiling vaguely.

It was an era where you couldn't be comfortable.

The day the hordes of aberrations, though back then we just called them monsters, finally arrived. Anyway, on the day the stain of the Void reached Busan and everyone fought a desperate battle.

That man fought without giving up until the very end, gathering everyone, combatants and non-combatants alike.

I lost an arm too.

Or was it a leg? Perhaps both.

Just as my eyes were getting so heavy they were about to close, in the distance, in the middle of a swarm of countless monsters.

The man who had acted like he knew me, saying we were from the same village, was fighting while bleeding from his entire body.

As I closed my eyes, I wondered.

That was my first life.

A scene I no longer remember.

And…

"——And that man, was you, Doc."

I was at a loss for words for a moment.

"What?"

Go Yuri smiled faintly.

"So, in a way, we were actually 'childhood friends'. Ahaha. Isn't that funny?"

"…"

"My second life was a little later. When I was born, oh my. The Void had already arrived and my parents had already fled to Busan, you see."

Despite my question, Go Yuri quietly continued her story. Slowly, as if not blaming a child who couldn't keep up with her footsteps.

"My parents ran a bakery."

Busan. A bakery.

"But the world was so broken. You can't afford to leisurely run something like a bakery. Just like me in my past life, my father went to war as a combatant and my mother as an assistant... and both of them passed away."

Go Yuri’s expressions were varied.

She would sigh, then she would smile, and then she would rest her cheek on her hand.

The night gallery.

A one-person play flowing softly in an exhibition hall where hundreds of regressions were displayed.

“At a young age, just as all the children in Busan did, I went to war as a child soldier.”

“…Jeong Seo-ah.”

I said, as if spitting it out.

“The bakery owners have a different child in each cycle. One of them…”

“Yes, that was me.”

A bright smile.

“It didn't have any special meaning. Even if it was the body I was reborn into, as I said, the timing was far too late.”

“…”

A world she was born into too late.

An era where there was no longer even a chance for salvation.

“I showed combat power that was no different from my first life, and so I was eliminated. Hah. It’s embarrassing… Someone like me is disqualified from being a Reincarnator.”

Was it her first battle?

Go Yuri, no. ‘Jeong Seo-ah’ was killed in action.

Just before her eyes closed. She saw it then, too.

Far away, at the final defense line, she saw the figure of one person fighting in the middle of a battlefield where bullets rained down.

The man who was a ‘childhood friend’ in her previous life and a distant ‘superior officer’ in this life was being pierced through the chest by a tentacle, breathing his last.

She suddenly thought.

Why was she living a life like this?

What is life?

From her third life onwards, her memories truly started to become vague.

“I didn't want to forget the 1st and 2nd lives, so I diligently took notes and such. But from the 3rd, how should I put it? Ummm. It became hard to feel any meaning,”

Go Yuri said.

“I was continuously born as the child of different parents, as a different person.”

Reincarnation.

She was born in Japan. She was born in Germany.

Reincarnation didn’t care about nationality. However, the era was relatively fixed.

Based on the point when the Void arrived, the earliest she could reincarnate was 20 years prior.

Go Yuri couldn’t understand why she was repeating this reincarnation so many times.

To consider herself a Buddha or the Dalai Lama, she had never received any sort of enlightenment or anything of the sort.

She just kept on living.

“In any case, we have to stop the end of the world, don’t we?”

She vaguely set a purpose for her life.

“I… that is, ‘Jeong Seo-ah’ died. But when I went back to Busan after reincarnating again, my parents were perfectly fine.”

Of course, Jeong Seo-ah’s parents didn’t recognize her.

In the place she should have occupied, another child, a new ‘Jeong Seo-ah’, existed.

Nevertheless, to her, those two were still her parents.

“With each reincarnation I repeated, the number of people who were my parents, my family, and my friends gradually increased.”

Their nationalities were different. Their statuses were different too.

The degree and color of the love she received were also different.

“Still, they were all very precious people.”

“…”

“Did you know? I was even born as Ms. Noh Do-hwa’s younger sister once.”

“What?!”

Go Yuri covered her mouth with her hand.

Ooh-hoo-hoo.

A delighted laugh escaped.

“That surprised you the most.”

“N-no. But still. I’ve never heard that National Road Management Corps Director Noh Do-hwa had a younger sister…”

“Of course not, Doc.”

Go Yuri’s head tilted slightly.

“When you are born again, when you reincarnate. The ‘me’ of the past life disappears.”

“…”

“Miss Noh Do-hwa. She was really kind. She was very cold to other people, but, at least to me, her younger sister. She became a prosthetist for me, who had suffered from a disability in my legs since birth.”

“What…?”

“When I became the child of Ms. Adele and Mr. Emit.”

Shock followed shock.

Like a wave.

“I felt a little sorry.”

“Old Man Scho’s, child? The two of them didn’t have any children...”

“Even so, I was an adopted child. Both of them poured out more love than I deserved on young me. However, during that time, I was desperate to stop the end of the world one way or another.”

“…”

“I was confident, too.”

She had already experienced hundreds of reincarnations.

Go Yuri was fluent in numerous languages. She had reached a level of knowledge and a realm of experience that an ordinary human would find difficult to achieve.

“Gathering funds was easy. So was gaining power. I poured all the resources I could possibly use to prepare for the destruction.”

"..."

"My parents..., Mr. Emit and Ms. Adele worried about me. Still, I persuaded them and headed to the Korean Peninsula by myself... and died trying to block the advent of the Outer God 'Taegeuk'."

Go Yuri looked up with a blank gaze.

"When I looked for them in my next lives, Mr. Emit and Ms. Adele. They never adopted a child again."

"..."

"And for some reason, whenever the time for Taegeuk's advent came around, the number of times the two of them came to Korea on business trips increased."

A small murmur.

"As if their lost daughter was there."

"..."

"Isn't it strange? Neither of them should have any memories of a past life."

Go Yuri said.

"The Schopenhauer couple started coming to Korea. Noh Do-hwa-ssi's younger sister was gone, and the reason she wanted to become a prosthetist was gone too. But from the next life on, she always became a prosthetist."

"..."

"If a child was born under different conditions at a different time, with a different gender, the name would likely change. But the bakery owners always named their child Jeong Seo-ah."

Go Yuri turned to look at me.

"Why, do you think? Doc."

“A hole… in the heart.”

I barely managed to say.

“The Void.”

“Yes.”

Go Yuri nodded.

“I was someone’s most precious child. Someone’s most precious younger sister.”

“…”

“When I was alive, when I was people’s irreplaceable confidante and family. Those people were happy because of me. Even Miss Sim Ah-ryeon, who is lying on your lap there.”

A smile formed on Go Yuri’s lips.

“You see, I’ve been born as a child with cerebral palsy quite a few times. At that time, Miss Ah-ryeon was my unni.”

“…”

“Her younger sister couldn’t speak well. Couldn’t express herself. Couldn’t move her body. So Ms. Ah-ryeon, she would always draw various pictures in a sketchbook, and she would show them to me and play with me.”

She was happy.

The fact that in a past life she had been a mastermind wielding great power behind the scenes of the government wasn't very important. There would be a next life anyway.

“Ta-da, ta, ta-daaaa…”

In front of her eyes, her unni.

No, if you considered the actual length of time she had lived, she was just a kid who was overwhelmingly younger than ‘her’.

In any case, the person who was her unni in this life spread open a sketchbook and, ehehe, she laughed.

“H-how is it?”

It was good.

Though she couldn’t speak.

As she conveyed a sound closer to a cry than a voice, uh-oo-uh, Shim Ah-ryeon smiled as if troubled.

A slightly tearful face.

“I-is it good? I, if you could just... even without words. It would be really nice if I could understand you...”

You had a talent.

Hundreds, no. Thousands. She, who had now lived a number of lives where counting them had become meaningless, could say for certain.

This unni’s talent was enormous.

It wasn't an empty compliment. She had no memory of seeing someone who could draw as well as she did. At least among the currently living painters and aspiring painters, she was the best.

However, even a person like this dies.

It wasn't the fate and lesson of humanity that everyone dies someday.

Monsters that no one at the current point in time could even imagine would appear, wield an unreasonably absurd violence that made it impossible to resist, and kill everyone.

“Haaah. I, it would be nice if I could be sick for you instead... S-sorry. That unni is the only one who’s okay…”

This… shining talent before her eyes.

This painter who could become greater than anyone.

…This unni who, for the sake of one younger sister who was lying on a sickbed for her entire life and dying lonely without a single friend, would run to the hospital as soon as school was over to show her pictures.

She will die.

And, herself too.

"…!"

From a distance, a voice was heard.

Her unni was crying.

Severe cerebral palsy. On top of that, stained with complications. The fact that she had endured for years up to this point was because of the 'Reincarnator's' superhuman mental strength.

"…T-Teacher! My sister… i-is. My sister. Please, please……!!"

A life that did not last long.

As she felt the sensation of it being cut off, as she eavesdropped on her unni's faintly audible cries, she thought of something.

Ah.

I wanted to save children like you.

Sorry.

I'm sorry, unni.

For not being able to save you.

I'm sorry for being born like this.

“Doc.”

“…”

“Have you ever thought about it? Why would someone who lived an ordinary life suddenly want to draw?”

Still.

Go Yuri was looking up at the painting.

“Despite having other amazing talents. The ability to organize citizens in an apocalyptic world and operate a wide-ranging government, why would she choose the route of a prosthetist of all things?”

“…”

“Why do people often feel like they’ve lost something even when living an ordinary life. Why isn’t there a precious someone by their side? Why do they feel like they’ve lost their life, when they possess the treasure that is life?”

“…”

“Why did she awaken an ability to feel other people’s emotions without words?”

Go Yuri turned around.

Our gazes met.

“Doc. According to a certain myth, the guidance of destiny plays a part when a person chooses a profession. It’s a theory that says regardless of what you did in this life. What you will be ‘possessed’ by is already decided.”

“…Karma.”

“Correct.”

Go Yuri smiled.

“Karma. Cause and effect. Usually, it’s the concept that this life is decided by what you did wrong, or what you did right, in your past life... But I… I think the complete opposite.”

In your past life.

What did you lose?

What kind of hole was bored into your heart?

□.

“I am the one and only reincarnator.”

She was someone’s loss.

“I am the life before the life that decides what people like, and what they dislike. I am the starting point of all routes.”

She was someone’s precious person.

“I am...”

She was.

“The cause that awakened the awakeners.”

She was the first awakener.

Footnotes:

Chapter 412

The Reincarnator II

Sinnoa

‘What is life?’

I had lived thousands, tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of lives.

Or maybe even millions.

I repeated more lives than anyone else. I was born as a child with full-body paralysis, and I was born as the descendant of royalty.

And yet, life always remained a riddle to me, a reincarnator.

‘Why am I… constantly suffering in a world where destruction is already a certainty?’

‘Perhaps.’

‘Maybe this place isn’t reality, but my own personal hell from the very beginning.’

My own existence. The self that was a precious family member to someone would inflict a scar upon that family of a past life each time I was reincarnated.

A void would open up.

A □ was pierced through them.

‘...Perhaps… is my existence something that only hurts other people.’

And so.

I even tried running away until the very end on purpose.

At this point, I had already reached a stage that an ordinary human could not dare to fathom.

With all my knowledge, experience, power, and wealth, it wasn't difficult to take care of ‘my family’ even after the apocalypse.

Whether the world was ending or not.

I built a shelter or a bunker in the safest area in the world, and disregarding the survival of humanity, we lived together as a family for decades.

“Thank you. My child. Thanks to you….”

“Dad will always love you.”

Certainly.

When I chose to live like this, my family wasn't hurt all that much.

No □ was formed either.

This was because, in most cases, I outlived my family, so rather than inflicting a loss upon them, I was the one who inherited that loss.

It wasn't a happy ending.

It was a normal ending.

Just achieving a normal ending in this world, so terribly stained with the void’s poison, was a tremendous accomplishment in itself.

For a while, the reincarnator pursued only normal endings.

It couldn't be helped. Living for an impossible goal was just too difficult and exhausting.

‘Ah.’

There was a side effect.

‘They don't... awaken.’

It was a natural principle.

The reincarnator bit their lip firmly.

‘The people who lost me in a past life live with a void in their hearts in the next. But, thanks to that, they awaken.’

‘On the other hand, those who didn't experience any particular sense of loss... are just ordinary people in their next life. And continue to be ordinary people.’

In other words.

‘When the void arrives and monsters swarm, they are just ordinary people, people who will die much, much more easily than awakeners.’

‘Just... ordinary humans. The kind who will die without being able to utter a single word or scream.’

That was the price of a normal ending.

It was the result of a wish to simply spend time with my precious people, casting aside both the world’s destruction and humanity’s salvation.

People were brutally murdered by monsters. Unable to even resist. My families from past lives, from tens of thousands of lives, who had bid me farewell with gentle smiles.

“...”

In the ruins of a certain collapsed city.

I had arrived as quickly as possible, but the person who was my father in a past life was already dead, crushed by a building.

The reincarnator gently held the corpse’s hand and quietly closed their eyes.

‘This is cruel. Truly.’

This world hated humans.

And among them, it particularly hated me.

‘...I have to raise awakeners.’

The reincarnator opened their eyes.

‘As much love as possible. I have to become an irreplaceable, precious existence to them.’

‘That way, when they lose me. And the more horribly I die...’

‘The probability that the person will awaken a powerful ability in their next life increases.’

The hesitation was brief.

Even in the time I spent hesitating, people were dying.

‘The power to fight back against the monsters.’

‘A hope for survival in a world like this.’

It was simple. The more powerful awakeners that appeared, the greater the chance humanity had of winning.

Even now, humanity held an unbelievably advantageous position compared to the ‘first life.’

Although it was merely like the score of a soccer match, that was once a crushing defeat of [100:0], had only just changed to [100:1].

‘Everything is statistics.’

‘I must become a precious person to people. So precious that they can never lose me, an existence more fatal than their own death.’

‘And then...’

‘I must die as miserably as possible.’

I put it into practice immediately.

It felt like imagining a small button inside my head, then lightly pressing it.

Time passed.

“Aaaaaaaah! Ah! Aaaack!”

Someone was wailing before my eyes.

It was my ‘older brother’ in this life.

“So-someone... Somebody please! Please help me! My sister, ugh, my little sister! Please help me!”

His name was Lee Baek.

He had strayed a bit when he was young, but he became more and more diligent as he grew up.

In place of our parents who passed away early, he took on all sorts of part-time jobs to support me, his younger sister.

That sister. The one and only family member he had left was now dying, crushed by the debris of a collapsed building in Seoul.

“Oppa....”

“D-don't talk! You, don't talk! Hey! Over here! Is anyone there?! Please come here! Help me! There’s someone here!”

What is a person?

With my entire lower body crushed by a block of concrete and my shoulder pierced by a rebar, was I, now more red than flesh-toned, still a person.

“I'm sorry... oppa....”

“No! So-ah! No! Aaaaaaaargh! No, no! Don't close your eyes! You can't close your eyes! H-hey... Over here! Ah, here! Help me! Someone, someone!”

I'm sorry.

I died. I was born into a new life. And so, after settling down to some extent in my next life, I went to visit the outskirts of Seoul.

I checked Lee Baek's ability.

'An ability to make his voice louder?'

The so-called Lion's Roar.

'Ahh, I see. Did he think he couldn't save his sister because his voice didn't reach anyone? That can't be the reason.'

Lee Baek's life was ruined.

A life that had already gone astray. After his parents died, he began to get involved in crime, spreading the germs that had infested his own life to others.

He didn't ask for anyone's understanding.

Because when his own life was being ruined, no one had asked for his.

'It's not a very useful ability... Hmm. No. It could be relatively useful for commanding a large number of allies on a battlefield.'

'Next.'

It was like a lottery game. Like gacha.

'Next.'

The reincarnator, like a scientist with the entire Earth as their laboratory, carefully bestowed □ upon people.

Naturally, high-rank awakeners and low-rank awakeners were sorted out. The latter were not worth a second thought.

'Next.'

High-rank awakeners.

These ones required special management.

‘Next.’

Come to think of it, there were countless ways to become a precious person to someone. It didn't necessarily have to be as family.

A friend. An understanding soul. A companion.

‘Next.’

Jeong Ye-ji, who would later be called by the title [Saintess], was special in that sense.

After becoming her family member and dying, I checked on her later, and what do you know? Jeong Ye-ji had mastered [Telepathy].

The reincarnator clenched a fist in their mind at that moment. My goodness! Telepathy.

It was a jackpot. Dopamine rushed through me like someone who had just poured hundreds of thousands or millions of won into gacha and got an S-rank for the first time.

My dear unni was so foolish.

It wouldn't have been Ye-ji unni's fault that her smartphone had disappeared somewhere right when her family member was dying, so she couldn't send an SOS signal to anyone.

‘Next.’

In the next life, the reincarnator moved near Jeong Ye-ji and purposely became her childhood friend.

Gaining her affection was easy. People with a □ pierced in their hearts felt a very easy pull toward the reincarnator whenever they saw me.

It was natural. It was a reunion with a family they had lost to death.

‘Next.’

Jeong Ye-ji's childhood friend died. The friend from the same school with whom Jeong Ye-ji read books and shared her heart died. The friend Jeong Ye-ji met up with occasionally to chat and laugh with died. Jeong Ye-ji's, Jeong Ye-ji's, Jeong Ye-ji's....

The results were astonishing.

‘Excellent.’

Telepathy. Clairvoyance. Time Stop.

‘A desire to be able to report to someone without any tools when a family member is dying.’

‘A wish to watch over everyone, because a friend was kidnapped and tortured to death without my knowledge.’

‘A hope that it would be better if all of this just stopped.’

SSS-class, confirmed.

‘The more a person aches.’

‘The more they cherish someone.’

‘The more talented a person is at the pain of loss.’

A powerful awakener was forged.

‘Interesting.’

However, there was a limit to awakening as well.

For example, in Jeong Ye-ji's case. She no longer knew any other way to fight against the wound in her heart beyond ‘stopping time.’

This was a result verified over dozens more attempts.

‘If so, couldn't I create a reincarnator like myself someday?’

A faint flutter in my heart.

The emotion named hope, which I had let go of long ago when I discarded my human heart, lit up like a candle.

‘If one can stop time, they might be able to repeat time. Yes, I'm sure of it.’

‘I want to turn back the past. I want to start over. Isn't this kind of wish a pretty universal desire for humanity?’

‘There must be someone out there who will reach that point. Yes, it would be strange if there weren’t.’

Next.

‘Where might you be—?’

Next.

‘Is there anyone who will swim with me through this shattered world of destruction? Anyone?’

Next.

‘No, no! It's troublesome if you try to overcome the scar so easily. Why are you trying to somehow stand up on the scar that is me? You have no talent.’

Next.

‘No... Hmm. But it’s also troublesome if you crumble under the loss and your heart dies completely. That's a problem.’

Next.

‘Please feel the pain.’

Next.

‘But please do not break.’

Next.

‘Painfully. So painful that you want to die, you want to curse the world right now for losing someone precious.’

‘But I still want you to live more earnestly than anyone else. I still hope you will decide to save the world.’

Next.

‘It’s troublesome if you are satisfied with saving just one precious person. Is there no one who will think of the world? Of humanity?’

Next.

‘Is there really no one? Someone like that.’

Next.

‘Why?’

Next.

‘When even I can do it...’

Next.

‘Ahaha.’

Next.

“...”

Your wish.

I made your wish… come true.

You all said it.

Please let me be rich in my next life, or… Let my voice reach everyone around me in the next life, or… I wish time would just stop in the next life, or…

I made your wishes—come true! I did!

Yes. Scars remained. A stain in your heart that could never be washed away no matter how you lived this life. The poison of the void remained, I admit it.

But, how can a wish be granted without anything in return?

It's only natural that there's a price. Besides, you don't even remember the price you paid. You remain ignorant of what happened in your past life, of how much pain you were in.

I, in fact, granted your wishes.

I didn't leave a scar.

I said I didn't!

“…”

It was a natural principle.

“Mmm.... Every time I leave a small void in someone, one forms in my heart too. A tomb of the exact same size.”

I lost my parents.

I lost my family. They were precious people. They were childhood friends. They were friends. They were all truly precious people.

□. □. □. □. □. □.

□. □. □. □. □. □.

□. □. □. □. □. □.

□. □. □. □. □. □.

Now, if I look inside my heart.

“There are only holes everywhere.”

The result of hundreds of millions of tombs, dug by hundreds of millions of people, all piled up inside my heart.

“This can hardly be called human anymore.”

What is life?

“…”

What is a human?

“Am I… a human?”

Probably not.

“Then it would be necessary to separate the two. Acknowledge the void in my heart, and isolate it completely.”

“Oh my. It's a kind of Wirianchihyeong1, isn't it?”

“Even if I isolate it, how do I do it? This is my heart. If it were an arm, I could at least cut it off, but I can't cut out my heart.”

“Because the moment I cut out my heart—”

“I would truly become a monster.”

“Ahaha. You’re already a monster!”

“Knowing full well that people will suffer.”

“Approaching them for that very suffering.”

“Dying.”

“And killing them.”

“Now, just walking down the street, everyone is family from a past life, you know? The whole world is my graveyard.”

“Congratulations.”

“This is the scenery you wished for, isn't it?”

“You reap what you sow.”

“Hey.”

“Just a moment. This kind of conversation has been repeated for too long, too familiarly. It's a meaningless flow.”

“It's the trace of a being who has come to regard digging into their own wounds as the only proof of their humanity. How pitiful.”

“Feeling pity is part of the template.”

“What wonderful self-awareness. And so—”

“I have a brilliant idea.”

“Ah.” “Ah.” “Ah.” “Ah.”

“Not all minds are the same. Without even going as far as Freud, isn't the concept of the ‘unconscious’ very familiar to people?”

“Consciousness.” “Unconsciousness.”

“The me of the conscious.” “The me of the unconscious.”

“There is a possibility.”

“Um, excuse me.”

“Carl Jung advocated for the concept of the collective unconscious.”

“The idea that humans do not exist as individuals but always as a group, and that ‘memory,’ which is formed using the human brain, can in fact be accumulated collectively.”

“Like DNA.”

“Existing within the individual, but the individual is merely one of many nodes—”

“Interesting.”

“Excuse me?”

“The voids piled up in my heart have certainly reached a level that can be classified as humanity's collective unconscious. After all, my wounds are the wounds of humanity, aren't they?”

“How interesting.”

“In that case, if I reincarnate more, much more from here on, leaving scars in the hearts of all humanity and accumulating them as voids in my own heart?”

“Wow. It’s a cemetery for all of humanity!”

“Let’s make it.”

“Shall we make it?”

“Let's just make it.”

“Let's isolate it.”

“Hey. I-it hurts.”

“…” “…” “…” “…”

“I don't want to do this anymore.”

“How is this... saving the world? It's strange. Originally, even if they died at the hands of monsters. Everyone... Mom, too. Dad, too. Father, too. Mother, too. All of them. They died as humans.”

“What is an awakener? What is a superhuman? An ascendant, or whatever they're called...”

“They're monsters.”

“While claiming to fight against monsters, I'm creating them. I am. The monsters.”

“By bewitching people. By speaking out as if I'm a precious person, just as I please.”

“Like a changgwi2 joining a procession of corpses.”

“I want to die.”

“…” “……” “…” “……”

“Everyone has come to hate the world.”

“Everyone, they hate it, because—”

“It was taken from them. Their precious existence. Me. There's no way they would love a world that took me away.”

“It's not that the world hates humans.”

“It's that humans hate the world.”

“Because of me.”

“……” “…” “……” “…”

“Someone like me should not have been born. As soon as I was born, I should have died.”

“A miscarriage. Of course they would be sad if they miscarried, but that sadness would have been better than the wound I would inflict.”

“I'm tired.”

“I don't want to. I-I don't want to do it anymore.”

“I don't want to be born.”

“Please save me. I'm sorry, oppa. I'm sorry. Mom. Dad. I'm sorry... Sorry. Forgive me.”

“Please. Someone.”

“Please kill me.”

“……” “……” “……” “……”

“There seems to be no particular problem.”

“Yes. It's a flow that has always existed.”

“Humans have a nature akin to that of a carnivore. It is the instinct to feel as though they are absorbing life when they dig into flesh dripping with juices.”

“However, in the modern era where hunting has decreased, and violence and murder are forbidden, people's opportunities to dig into the flesh of other beings have been extremely reduced. So as an alternative.”

“They eat their own flesh.”

“The contradiction of regarding self-slaughter as one's own life.”

“Interesting.”

“The civilization of cannibalism.”

“Whether you are human or not is not important at all.”

“The billions who have died so far.”

“No. I have to multiply it by the number of times I've reincarnated. Billions multiplied by billions, that's the weight of the lives that have been lost until now.”

“Can those people be saved?”

“Can they be rescued?”

“That is the only thing that matters.”

“Because—”

“What humans desire is not a human, but a god.”

“A god does not cry.”

“A god does not regret.”

“A god is not human.”

“Therefore.”

“The next life.”

“Yes.”

“The next life.”

“Next.” “Next.” “Next.” “Next.”

The reincarnator was born.

The reincarnator was always born.

“Ah.”

And every time I was born, I witnessed the sight of someone looking down at me.

The first memory.

The person looking at me this time was a man.

“Aboob abooobooboo bueeeh.”

“…”

The boy scrunched up his face foolishly. It seemed he was trying to make me, a newborn baby, laugh.

The gesture was familiar.

His face was also familiar.

‘Reconnaissance Team Leader.’

Because no matter how many reincarnations I repeated, he was the one who always fought at the final defensive line until the very last moment, despite having no abilities whatsoever.

Beaming.

“Huh? Oh, oh, they smiled! They smiled!”

The boy chattered excitedly. It had been a long time since the reincarnator had equipped a smile that could evoke affection from anyone. It was only natural for the other party to be excited.

‘It’s this person this time.’

I think he was my childhood friend in my first life.

‘What kind of wound will you receive?’

And…

What kind of wound will I receive?

Again, I live.

A life destined for death.

Footnotes:

1 - This refers to a specific type of exile punishment from Korea's Joseon Dynasty. A political offender was confined to a designated location, and their house was surrounded by thorny bushes to prevent escape or contact with the outside world.

2 - In Korean folklore, a Changgwi is the ghost of a person who was killed by a tiger. This ghost becomes enslaved to the tiger and is forced to lure other humans to their death to serve its master.

Chapter 413

The Reincarnator III

Sinnoa

Snap.

The Reincarnator's Arabian Nights came to an end right there.

The midnight exhibition hall, which had a thousand deaths on display, was once again wrapped in silence, much like a portable radio that had suddenly powered down after its batteries ran out.

“Go Yuri? Why did you suddenly stop talking?”

“…”

Go Yuri lifted her head.

A gentle smile was drawn upon her lips.

“No reason. It’s just that Ms. Ah-ryeon, nestled in your arms, Doc, seems to be starting to have a nightmare.”

“Ah.”

“This place is a temple built for you, Doc. Thanks to it, you succeeded in receiving my voice. But now that you’ve heard ‘this much’ of my story, the reception should be clear even when you are outside.”

“Reception.”

“Yes. You could call it the way to tune into the radio channel that is me.”

The hem of her purple skirt flowed down.

Go Yuri stood up, letting the night air spill off her like a diver who had just broken the surface, shedding water droplets.

“This is the end of the prologue.”

She was looking down at me.

“Doc, please take Ms. Ah-ryeon to her lodgings. After she opened such a wonderful art exhibition for us, it would be sad to let her sleep on this hard floor, wouldn't it.”

“And you are...”

“I will be waiting.”

Shhh.

Go Yuri’s finger crossed her lips. She winked playfully with one eye.

“Please don’t ask where. We will be reunited when we are meant to meet, in the place we are meant to be.”

“…After hearing a story like that, you expect me to just wait quietly?”

“Yes. I’m sorry. Hmm, I don’t particularly intend to torment you, Doc. It’s just that in order to continue what comes next, you will need a resolve of your own.”

Resolve.

I had always considered my own resolve to be stronger than anyone’s. But the person before me was a reincarnator who had lived through billions of lives.

I couldn’t help but pause at the sheer weight that word must carry.

“The next time we meet, we will no longer be able to stop. We won’t be able to go back, nor can we take a single step backward.”

“...”

“Therefore, Doc. Please, take a long ‘vacation’. Enjoy it until you have no regrets left.”

“What is going to happen to me?”

“My salvation.”

Go Yuri’s smiling eyes widened.

“The promise will be fulfilled.”

“Promise…?”

“Please enjoy your last vacation. Ah, and please don’t worry about me. I’m used to waiting. Very much so.”

“How can I possibly do that after hearing all this—”

“Ahaha. Please, trust me. Hmm, although if we only consider the absolute numbers, you’ve only just passed 1,000 regressions, Doc, so you can’t be compared to me. Still, I believe you are the only one on this earth who can understand my familiarity with waiting.”

“…”

“Well then, goodbye. Until we meet again.”

Tap.

Go Yuri took a couple of steps back, then elegantly gathered the hem of her skirt and bowed like the daughter of a nobleman.

And without adding another single word, she left the exhibition hall alone.

Tap, tap, tap… Tap.

I immediately followed Go Yuri, holding Sim Ah-ryeon in my arms. Truly, immediately.

Therefore, when I turned the corner of the gallery, I should have seen the back of Go Yuri, who could not have gotten far.

But she was not there.

Not in the exhibition hall’s corridor. Not at the exit. No matter how much I scanned the city under the dark night sky, Go Yuri was nowhere to be seen.

There was only the chirping of insects like crickets.

“...”

“Uuumm. Guild Leaderrrr...”

The sleepy mumble of a frail, young child snuggled into my arms, digging into my chest as if there was a burrow, a □, carved out just for her.

By my side, there were many children whose four seasons were always winter.

I stroked the child’s head.

Go Yuri had disappeared.

Even when I inquired with the Saintess, she could not trace any sign of the disappearance.

[I'm sorry. As per your instructions, Mr. Undertaker, I had been deliberately averting my gaze from her, to ensure I wouldn't pry, not even by chance.]

[It seems she has vanished from the soup kitchen that was operating in Daejeon as well. There are no witnesses. I have no excuse.]

“No, it’s alright. I was the one who ordered you to never monitor Go Yuri until now. I’m the one who should be sorry for the sudden confusion.”

Where could she have disappeared to?

If I searched the entire world, could I find her somewhere?

‘No. That would be impossible.’

Go Yuri was a reincarnator. I was a regressor.

For the two of us, ‘disappearance’ was not merely a spatial concept.

A temporal disappearance was also entirely possible.

‘The next cycle.’

I will be waiting, she had said.

Until when?

‘Until I myself am satisfied. Until I have enjoyed this world without a single regret and can let it all go.’

It would be fine if it took a hundred years. It likely wouldn't matter if it took a thousand.

‘Because Go Yuri had already waited until I could receive her voice.’

Could my entire life have been a period of waiting for someone else?

“…”

“Huh? What is it, Mister. Why are you staring at me with that face?”

“It’s nothing.”

“Aha. You’ve fallen for my deadly charms, haven’t you? My, my. I suppose it can’t be helped to fantasize about a great author. But don’t get too close, okay? You might just melt like the wings of Icarus.”

It was a strange feeling.

Until now, I had always waited for others, but I had never been the one waited for.

Because I was a regressor.

I knew who they were and what their futures held, with a semi-omniscient point of view.

That's why I knew all too well.

"Dok-seo."

"Ung?"

"How is it? Is the writing going well?"

Dodododo, Oh Dok-seo covered her ears with both hands and ran off somewhere. The moment I had pronounced the 'wri' in writing, she was already in a cheetah's stance.

I let out a bitter smile.

'I can wait. As long as it takes.'

Still.

'I would be happy if you could catch up as soon as possible.'

Of course, I was strong.

I could wait forever. I had built up the fortitude to endure that waiting.

But even the best-made structures eventually rust.

Even if one were to befriend that rust and call it a form of elegance, one could not deny the fact that the steel bars within were silently corroding away.

'Go Yuri was waiting for me.'

Her words were certainly right.

The only person on this earth who could understand the heart-wrenching nature of a reincarnator's wait was, regrettably, a single regressor.

"Now, now. Dok-seo."

"Aaargh! I can't hear you! I can't hear anything! Guarantee the author's human rights! Guarantee them! Guarantee them! An author is not public property but a privately existing human being! A human! A human!”

Normally, I would have retorted with something like, ‘Well, aren’t readers private human beings too?’.

But this time, I simply stroked the back of Oh Dok-seo’s head.

“…?”

Oh Dok-seo, who had been protesting with a ‘grrr’ in a hedgehog’s stance, cautiously lifted her head.

“Uh, Mister?”

“Mm.”

“What’s wrong?”

Looking up at my face, Oh Dok-seo’s expression grew even more anxious. Her red eyes trembled, unable to find a place to rest.

“Are you… going somewhere?”

As expected. She was a sharp kid.

I crouched down to meet her gaze at eye level. And then I smiled.

“Mister doesn’t really know either.”

“…”

“Even though I’ve lived for so very long. There are still so many things in the world that even Mister doesn’t know. But you know that Mister cares for you a lot, our Dok-seo, right?”

“Don’t go.”

“I’m leaving Ha-yul in your care.”

“…”

“Ah-ryeon too. And Yo-hwa. The other children as well. If Mister isn’t around, you have to be the center for everyone, Dok-seo. Can you do that?”

“Why, why are you saying things like that? You’re not really disappearing, are you? Right?”

She was just a child.

Children this young had died over 1,000 times. Perhaps billions of times. Perhaps billions of times that.

I had to save the children.

It wasn't some grand feat. There are more people than one might think who would disregard their own lives to save a child in danger right before their eyes.

‘Let these children have a continuation of their epilogue.’

My work was not fundamentally different.

‘I don’t care if it’s a world full of sorrow. That is something to think about when the time comes. But to die for such absurd reasons. Something like the void, or aberrations.’

‘They cannot be allowed to die for such things.’

The world was sickeningly full of such occurrences.

‘If that’s the case, then it’s the world that’s wrong.’

People called such a world nature, reason, the Dao, the path.

In other words, a Route.

Now, I could fully understand the words Go Yuri had left me with.

– What reason is there that a single human cannot change that path?

I agreed.

Therefore, in the next cycle. The 1,085th cycle.

Go Yuri was not at Busan Station.

As soon as I broke through the tutorial dungeon, I cast aside my contact with the Saintess and headed for Onyang, Asan, in South Chungcheong Province.

Go Yuri was standing in an old inn in Onyang, in room 202 on the second floor, a place where the murky, cream-colored paint was peeling off in patches like dead skin.

"..."

Seeing me enter through the open door, Go Yuri's eyes widened as if in surprise.

An inn room. In that place where a nameless mother and son had withered and died like old trees, Go Yuri had been looking up at a red flower just moments before.

"Oh my."

Her voice was one of genuine surprise.

"How did you do it in just one cycle?"

"It was a simple problem to solve if one thought about you and me. You, the reincarnator, chose me, and my title just so happened to be the Undertaker."

"..."

"In the end, you were thinking of a way to die yourself. But for beings like us, death is not a simple end. To truly reach the end, to see the end of the Route, the ability itself needs to be eradicated."

"Brilliant."

Go Yuri smiled.

"Yes. That's right. Therefore, Udumbara. I need a 'reset button' that can erase all of an awakener's abilities."

“So you deliberately aimed for the time when Ah-ryeon held her art exhibition. That girl, Ah-ryeon, possesses the same ability as Udumbara. Your very visit to the exhibition was a hint in itself.”

“Ah, that’s wonderful.”

Her smile deepened.

“I thought it would take you three regressions at the very least. Honestly, I thought you would miss it for about ten regressions. To think you reached the correct answer in a single regression. You truly are something else, Doc.”

Go Yuri crouched down on the floor.

She then reached out and caressed the wrist of the child who had starved to death. A string of prayer beads, a little too large for a newborn’s wrist, was wrapped around it.

Clatter. Clatter.

“We were originally twins.”

“…”

“One of them was me.”

On the bodies of the mother and child, crimson flowers bloomed here and there, like red spider lilies.

Like the banks of the river in the underworld.

“My mother, of course, tried to feed both of us children equally. But I, even as a newborn, was sentient. So I steadfastly refused.”

“…”

“Then she had to feed the other child, right? She had no choice. She kept fussing, hoping I would eat at least a little, but the child acted as if the two of them could only live if she sacrificed herself, and in the end… she was the first to die.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes. As you can see, it was a fate they would have met all the same, even if I wasn't there.”

Hup, Go Yuri pushed herself up from her knees.

“Isn’t it strange? I wish she had eaten something. If she didn’t like porridge, if she didn’t like milk, if she didn’t like tap water, then I wish she could have eaten my thoughts as her mother instead. My love and my worry.”

“…”

“And from that, a tree that could eat even life and abilities was born. As for why it had to be a tree, well, hmm. I suppose I was envious of a life that could survive on just sunlight and water.”

Having said that, Go Yuri wore a smile that was both bitter and satisfied, like a theater owner who had just revealed the entire backstage of a play.

She was like an examiner giving a perfect score to a candidate who had reached their destination without a single error, like a professor who had just read a flawless graduation thesis.

However…

“For a long time.”

“…?”

“There was a point I always found strange.”

My part of the answer was not yet finished.

“I don’t know if you remember, but when I first met Oh Dok-seo, you were also in our party.”

“Oh my, yes, I remember. It wasn’t that long ago, was it? Although I can’t recall it as perfectly as you can, Doc.”

“At that time, I barely managed to persuade Oh Dok-seo and had you expelled from the party.”

Go Yuri let out a small laugh.

“Expelled from the party, you say. That’s a good cliché. Now it’s your turn to regret chasing me out and become obsessed, Doc.”

“It was on a sloping road.”

“Pardon?”

“After being expelled from the party, you walked down a sloping road. It was a single path. So if I had waited a little longer, I should have seen you walking up the next hill, but you never appeared.”

“…”

“After going down the hill, you vanished. There was nowhere else to go. Like a mirage.”

It was the same this last time.

Sim Ah-ryeon’s exhibition hall was located in the very center of downtown Busan, in the Tower of Babel Plaza. There was no way I wouldn't know the geography of that place.

And yet, just by turning a single corner in the gallery, Go Yuri had evaporated without a trace.

How?

Was it because Go Yuri was a being who walked through dreams? Because she was an aberration? Because she could brainwash humans into not perceiving her?

But Go Yuri was not a brainwasher. According to the revealed truth, she was merely the one who had lost all of humanity.

Go Yuri was human.

In that case, the conclusion became simple.

“You were the one… you were the teleporter all along. Go Yuri.”

“…”

“That’s why you disappeared on the sloping road, and why you vanished from the exhibition hall. The reason you sometimes don't get caught by the Saintess's Clairvoyance is simple too. You just teleported beyond the range of her vision.”

The inn grew quiet.

“I rushed here as soon as I cleared the Busan Station tutorial dungeon. And yet, you were already here before me.”

“…”

“There is only one answer. The ability user that Old Man Scho had been so desperately searching for. The person who can teleport is you.”

Silence.

“Perfect.”

Go Yuri’s lips slowly parted.

“Yes, Doc. I am the very awakener of teleportation that you have all been looking for.”

Footnotes:

Chapter 414

The Reincarnator IV

Sinnoa

The Teleportation ability user.

Go Yuri.

"…"

As I processed the business card that had been summarized into two lines in my head, a myriad of emotions washed over me.

Of course, it was clear that she had countless other abilities hidden beyond [Teleportation].

If an Awakening was the howling sound of wind rising from the □, the bottomless abyss, bored into a person's memory—

Then the billions of holes drilled into Go Yuri's heart would be a cluster of Awakenings in and of themselves.

But among them, [Teleportation] was an ability that I, that Old Man Scho, that we had longed for so desperately.

We searched and searched and ultimately couldn't find it, so wasn't the Inunaki Tunnel what we secured, thinking we should at least prepare a passage for swift movement?

The very reason I had made the Inunaki Tunnel my base as a regressor.

It was partly for convenience, but it was also a show of my own resolve to never forget Old Man Schopenhauer's 'wish'.

"…This might sound like a complaint. But may I say something?"

"Oh, please do, Doc."

Go Yuri smiled brightly.

“In the first place, just having a proper ‘conversation’ like this is a joy for me. Ohoho. I don’t know if you can read my expression but… Believe it or not, I am very happy right now, you see?”

“…Why didn’t you save Old Man Schopenhauer?”

Those words slipped out of my mouth.

“You could have saved him. Yes. Old Man Scho probably wouldn’t have been able to tell who you were, or even if you were human. But you could have silently moved Madam Adele and placed her beside the old man. Wasn't something like that simple for you?”

“…”

The smile on Go Yuri’s face slowly settled, calm like matcha powder.

“Why didn’t I save him when I could have? That is what you’re asking, I see.”

“Yes.”

“Hmm.”

After pondering for a moment as if she were in a bit of a bind, Go Yuri did something completely unexpected.

She suddenly began to take off her top.

“…?!”

I reacted faster than thunder, immediately turning my head away.

For the record, I felt no lust whatsoever.

As I have confessed to you all, I, the Undertaker, always sensually perceived the ‘state of the other person in the regression where they met their death’.

In other words, Go Yuri’s head, which I had cleanly sliced off in the 89th cycle, was also being broadcast 24/7 on the Undertaker's special broadcast channel.

To add to that, it wasn't just the visuals that were reproduced. The audio was also implemented in ultra-high quality. This meant that Go Yuri's head, severed by my blade, was cheerfully smiling and saying 'Let's become one'.

It would have been more surprising if I had felt any lust.

"Hey, what are you suddenly—"

"It's okay."

What? What is okay?

I'm not? Not okay at all?

"You can look now, Doc."

"…"

The moment I opened my tightly shut eyes.

I was once again met with a completely unexpected sight and was at a loss for words for some time.

Normally, Go Yuri never exposed any bare skin.

Even when she was handing out food at the soup kitchen wearing a green apron that said 'Romance of the Three Kingdoms', her entire body was meticulously covered in cloth.

Therefore, it would be fair to say that this was the first time in my eons-long life as a regressor that I had witnessed Go Yuri's bare skin, but there was no bare skin to be seen.

Her back, with a pronounced spine.

Black markings, packed so densely that no skin was visible.

[Lee So-young/6/17/13:59]

A name.

[Kim Ha-neul/11/2/22:45]

[Mateusz Kowalski/5/20/23:56]

[Park Jin-woo/3/12/08:21]

Names.

Like epitaphs.

[Jeong Da-yeon/1/6/10:18]

[Han Yu-jin/12/14/15:27]

[Shin Ye-rim/8/8/19:12]

[Kang Tae-hyun/5/20/23:56]

[आयशा ख़ान/7/19/14:44]

[Choi Min-seok/9/25/17:03]

[Люсия Ромеро/11/3/18:18]

[Yoo Seo-yeon/7/3/06:35]

[2/28/12:00/ماركو بيانكي]

[Moon Chae-won/10/10/09:09]

[Nguyễn Thị Sophia/8/16/20:25]

[Jo Eun-bi/12/21/16:45]

[Омар Эль-Саид/6/5/00:02]

[Jang Eun-seo/7/27/20:40]

[9/1/14:11/נואה סמית]

[Noh Hyun-woo/5/13/05:25]

[Анастасия Волкова/10/31/03:03]

[Yoon Ha-rin/10/31/03:03]

Names and dates.

Words written in the smallest possible size that a person could discern with the naked eye.

On her back. On her arms. On her waist. Over her entire body.

“My memory isn’t as good as yours, Doc.”

Go Yuri said, her back still turned to me.

“I just wrote down as much as I could remember.”

“…The anniversary of their deaths.”

“Yes. It’s the time when my precious people die. Though it doesn’t mean much if the butterfly effect is too strong.”

Rustle, rustle.

Go Yuri pulled her clothes back on. I silently watched as the cemetery composed solely of letters was covered up.

“It’s a kind of ritual. They are all precious to me, but for the ones who are especially, especially precious, I try to recall that life again each time I write their name.”

“…”

“Then, sometimes when I’m looking in the mirror. Oh. Why did I write this person’s name?”

Go Yuri tilted her head.

“—and. There are times I can’t quite remember. It happens more often than you’d think.”

“…”

“When that happens, I stop writing that person’s name and the anniversary of their death from the next life onward. It’s like tossing a memo file into the trash can, poof.”

My lips would not part easily.

Regarding the method to escape from that cemetery of oblivion, even if no one else in the world knew, I, of all people, could speak of it with certainty.

I was also more aware of that method's side effects than anyone.

“Complete Memory.”

“Yes.”

“…But the Complete Memory ability requires one to bury their own senses in a tomb as the price for mourning others.”

“Yes.”

“The two of us reflect the end of the Route that each of us can reach.”

Go Yuri turned around and looked at me.

A smile still lingered on her face.

“Every ability is a blessing and a curse at the same time. But the human heart is a bit sly. It always envies what it doesn't have.”

“…”

“I also thought about it a lot. Hmm, for example. Miss Lee Ha-yul is a very precious person to you, isn’t she, Doc? But after hundreds of regressions, what if you could no longer remember Ha-yul-ssi.”

“…”

“I think you would be sad.”

That’s right.

“So, Doc. Please, I hope you won’t consider the ability you have a curse.”

In that moment, I realized.

“You chose not to obtain the Complete Memory ability on purpose, just so you could say those words to me now.”

“…”

A slightly surprised expression.

And then, a smile once more.

Her gentle gaze lingered on my face. It was the look of someone who understood that the other person had grasped her intention, and who, in turn, fully understood that they had understood.

After taking back the breath I had exhaled into the air, Go Yuri murmured quietly.

“Mr. Schopenhauer only awakens his regression ability upon losing his wife.”

“…”

“I tried various methods. At one point, I even tried to pioneer a Route by selecting Mr. Schopenhauer as the ‘protagonist’ instead of you, Doc. But he is, crucially, mentally weak.”

A regressor’s greatest weakness.

“He only awakens as a regressor upon losing his wife. But once he loses his wife, he can no longer become happy enough to continue living as a regressor.”

“…A dilemma with two choices.”

“Yeees. It would be so convenient if I could just find him a suitable new love. Really, Father is so devoted and romantic, it's quite troublesome.”

Go Yuri covered her mouth and laughed.

“On the other hand, you were the best, Doc.”

“…”

“Your ability—to be honest, it was nothing special. It was F-rank. Ah. Originally, you were a completely ordinary person with no abilities, Doc.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes. But your mentality—hmmm, your mentality. It was so incredible, it made me wonder how a person’s will could be so strong. Of course. Your will was so sturdy that even as awakeners started to appear, you were always the one commanding the reconnaissance team of the Final Defense Line.”

“Hm.”

I couldn't relate to that.

Because it was a ‘past I could not remember’.

But Go Yuri, as she talked about me, seemed, how should I put it, a little more excited.

“I became your precious family member and died once, and surprisingly! This person. In the next life, he was still a non-ability user. My goodness. Does that even make sense?”

She seemed happy somehow.

I had no choice but to let her continue.

“I was a truly perfect younger sister, you know.”

“You were?”

“Yes. And you were the perfect older brother. The people in the reconnaissance team were so envious when they saw us siblings.

Hmm, even now, when you're with Miss Lee Ha-yul or Miss Sim Ah-ryeon, or Miss Oh Dok-seo, you exude a very warm atmosphere that makes others quite envious. But I don't know. If they had seen the two of us siblings, they might have thought those other relationships were just lesser versions. That thought just crossed my mind."

"Hey, no matter how you put it. Isn't that a bit of an exaggeration?"

"If you realized just how much of a doting fool you can be, you would probably be extremely embarrassed yourself."

"…"

I had my own suspicions about my doting tendencies, so I quietly shut my mouth.

"We were such close siblings. And you were in so much pain when you saw me get abducted by the void and die as if being tortured, my limbs torn off by a monster."

"…"

"But when I went to find you in the next life, what do you know? This person. He hasn't Awakened at all…!"

"Hmm."

"D-don't tell me, all that doting on his sister was a lie? An act? Oh my god. How dare he deceive the eyes of a reincarnator like me. This is unforgivable. This time, I will become someone far, far more precious than a sibling from a past life and make you Awaken…"

Finding something amusing, Go Yuri chuckled to herself.

"I think I got competitive. Probably."

"…Sorry for being so indifferent."

"What? No, no. I thought so too at first, but the truth was different."

Go Yuri looked at me.

“Doc. Do you have any idea when or how you first Awakened?”

“No. Not at all.”

“It was when you heard my story.”

Story?

“You see. After trying to trigger your Awakening about 6 times and getting nowhere, I confessed everything in a fit of desperation. I came out as a reincarnator.”

“Ah.”

“So my plan was probably to just complain, saying things like, I've never met anyone like you, why on earth won't you Awaken, was your affection for me a lie, but…. As you listened quietly to my story. Well, you, Doc——”

I'm sorry.

I’m sorry for not remembering.

Sorry for not remembering you.

“You started to cry.”

“…”

“Ahaha. I was so flustered, you know? You just held onto me and kept apologizing, saying you were sorry, truly sorry. I was wondering why this brother of mine, this person, who had remained so resolute even when the defense line fell and the citizens all died, was suddenly acting this way…”

At that moment.

“It’s embarrassing, but tears fell from my eyes too.”

"…"

"Ah. The truth is, I wanted to hear an apology. I realized it then."

Go Yuri reached out her hand.

Her palm caressed the regressor's head.

"The human heart is such a sly thing, isn't it? It's only natural that you all don't remember me. To want an apology for the oblivion of a past life, not even the present one, it's all a mess."

"…"

"It wasn't [Complete Memory] from the start. It was just, your memory got a little better. It was already good to begin with. To be honest, it's hard to call it a meaningful Awakened ability. Hmm, FFF-rank."

However.

"I think I just wanted to be a little spoiled by you, Doc."

There must have been many reasons.

In the name of finding an SSS-class ability user, she had treated her precious family members like gacha pulls. Furthermore, she distributed happiness and pain as if to lab rats to maximize the rank of their Awakening.

Atrocities that would have made the her from her first life faint in shock. Vile acts that would have her berating, 'How can you still be human after doing that?'.

Before she came to completely hate herself, while the her from her first life still remained, even if just as a vestigial organ, right now.

"I thought, maybe it would be okay if it was you, Doc—"

She took a gamble.

"No more reincarnating. Well, in reality, I kept on reincarnating and reincarnating, but the game of using my reincarnation to awaken people is over.”

This is my last life.

“I decided to make this person, this man, my final destination.”

Fix the Route.

Suppress the butterfly effect.

Select the people to save and the people to abandon. Among them are numerous S-class ability users. Abandon them.

Set ‘the Undertaker’ at the very center of the Route.

Simultaneously calculate the movements of billions of people to create the ‘optimal Route’. I must create it. I can create it.

Change Uehara Shino’s location. Adjust her to appear at the Busan Station Tutorial Dungeon instead of the original Seongsan Ilchulbong tutorial dungeon.

Change Saintess Jeong Ye-ji’s location. In order to alter her walking path so she isn't swept away when the void appears in Seoul, a certain amount of groundwork is required, and carrying out this groundwork will cause the paths of three S-class awakeners to collide. Ignore it. Force it through.

“It was hard, but…”

The reincarnator realized. She had thought that time was the only resource she was given in infinite supply, but in reality, the resource she lacked the most was time itself.

“I was happy.”

Despite using her teleportation ability to somehow create an optimized path, the best possible Route, schedules that had to be ‘abandoned’ inevitably arose.

The farther one was from the Korean Peninsula, the more strongly this phenomenon occurred. It couldn't be helped. The Undertaker, located at the center of this Route, lacked the teleportation ability.

Abandon. Abandon. Abandon. Abandon.

As it neared completion, from a distance, it was a world where ‘most of the ability users were strangely concentrated on the Korean Peninsula’.

But the reality was the complete opposite.

It was a world where ‘most of the ability users outside the Korean Peninsula had been abandoned’.

For example, the location of Leviathan’s appearance changed with each different Route. She fixed its location to a middle school girl living in a certain village in Seoul, on the Korean Peninsula.

The best of worlds.

The worst of calculations.

A possible world where the best and the worst coexist, all for a single person.

“I’m sorry, but this was the best I could do.”

Go Yuri held out her hand.

“Doc. You may not remember, but the two of us, a very long time ago, a really long time ago, we made a promise.”

“…What kind of promise?”

“I asked you, Doc.”

Can you save me?

“And you answered, Doc.”

I will. No matter what.

“Now, I will ask you one last time.”

To renew an old promise.

“Will you save this world, and me?”

The regressor did not hesitate to take the reincarnator’s hand. Then, he covered their joined hands with his other one.

Humans had two hands.

They could overlap two resolves upon a single promise.

“I will.”

“…”

“No matter what.”

A smile slipped from the reincarnator’s lips.

“Let’s become one, Guild Leader.”

When he opened his eyes the next moment.

The regressor could finally remember everything that had happened in the 1st cycle.

Footnotes:

Chapter 415

The Regressor I

Sinnoa

When do you all experience déjà vu?

Is it when the sunlight pours down on the street, causing the asphalt's outline to crumble into a hazy mirage?

Is it when a red peony falls, its petals scattering in every direction?

Is it when you climb the stairs of some old public office or school, only to find the hallway completely empty?

I will confess first. I, the Undertaker, experience déjà vu 24 hours a day, for all 1,440 minutes and 86,400 seconds.

『Oppa, please wake up. It's morning.』

『...Hey. I'm genuinely curious. Why do you insist on that same greeting every single morning? I'm already awake, you know.』

『I'm sorry, brother, but I have my own aesthetic principles. They say learning begins by imitating the masterpieces.』

『?』

Therefore, even when a scene that should have been a 'nonexistent memory' suddenly flowed by like a dream, and even when an intense sense of déjà vu washed over me, I was not particularly flustered.

I was used to the feeling.

Of course, perhaps it was not simply a matter of familiarity.

Squeeze.

The warmth of Go Yuri, who was holding my hand tightly beside me, soothed my heart.

“This place is...”

“As you can see. It's the time when we were siblings.”

“Is this inside your dream? Did you invite me into your dream?”

“No, Guild Leader. For beings like us, there is no such thing as a 'dream'. There is only a void I artificially created in imitation of a dream, a place called the 'world of unconsciousness'.”

“You too…?”

“Yes. We are already anomalies. We only imitate humans, love humans, and act for the sake of humans.”

“...”

The scenery before my eyes transformed rapidly.

The landscapes scattered into pieces, each flowing at its own arbitrary speed. Each one held a lifetime of Go Yuri, contained within frames made not of space, but of time.

That's right. The two of us were walking alone through an exhibition hall titled 'Her'.

“The 'red flesh' that you occasionally witnessed, Guild Leader, is the conclusion where my identity as an anomaly completely devoured my identity as a human.”

“The conclusion.”

“Yes. It's because I lost my family every time I was reincarnated. Because I wanted to become someone precious to them again. It is a mass of flesh, consumed by desire, that merely struggles to become 'one' with whatever it comes across.”

Go Yuri murmured.

“My ugly and filthy end. An anomaly known by the name of Reincarnator. A forgotten god of false happiness.”

“...”

“Everyone swallowed by the red flesh remembers me and becomes my family. Within the flesh, they each dream their own separate dreams of being with me for all eternity.”

Then, something came to mind.

“That's just like my ability, [Time Seal].”

“That's correct.”

Hehe, Go Yuri let out a small laugh.

“You, Guild Leader, can only grant people a single day of happiness. But I can make them dream of their happiest lifetime, an entire life spent with the one being who filled the emptiness in their heart more than anyone else and made their life happier.”

“A superior version, is it?”

“Perhaps.”

The scenery within the frames changed again.

In those scenes, the 'Go Yuris' were continuously dying. After becoming someone's precious person, they would deliberately orchestrate the most harsh and miserable deaths for themselves.

“Guild Leader. You may have noticed by now, but my 'human self' barely exists anymore.”

“...”

“Even now, Guild Leader, you are taking the countless, echoing screams from thousands upon thousands of paths, and from within that noise, you are barely managing to connect words and sentences to create 'my voice'.”

It was true.

“Every human is like that to me.”

“Yes. I'm happy. That you continue to treat me as a human even after knowing what I am now.”

Go Yuri smiled brightly.

“It was because I knew you were that kind of person that I decided to entrust myself to you.”

“Entrust yourself?”

“Hup.”

There was no answer.

Instead, there was a hand pushing me.

Into the frame of a dream within a dream. Into that well of the abyss, where Go Yuri's lifetimes were swirling in pieces.

“…?!”

It was a blow I took while completely off guard.

I desperately reached out my hand. Though I had already been pushed and had fallen into the massive frame, I somehow succeeded in grabbing its edge.

Just like a castaway hanging precariously from the edge of a cliff.

“You…?!”

“Ahaha. You were fooled, Guild Leader. This is the price for neglecting the precious people around you and letting your heart be captivated by an anomaly like me.”

Unlike me, who had tumbled completely inside the frame, Go Yuri was looking down at me from above.

Smiling cheerfully. In a squatting posture.

“You could have chosen to subjugate me after hearing my story, Guild Leader. You could have treated me as a monster, then simply urged me to commit suicide by getting infected with Udumbara.”

“…”

“You're a greedy one, Guild Leader. But I don't dislike that kind of greed.”

It makes me feel a sense of kinship.

Go Yuri added.

She reached out her hand and began to peel my fingers off the edge of the frame.

One by one. One by one.

“You can still back out now, you know? If you fall into my dream like this, truly, truly terrible things will unfold.”

“…‘No matter what happens,’ is what my past self swore. For what it's worth, I pride myself on being a man who keeps his promises.”

A smile lingered on Go Yuri's lips.

She lowered her head.

“You are even more foolish than I am.”

My ring finger, the last one clinging to the frame, was gently bitten between Go Yuri’s front and bottom teeth—and she pulled it away.

“Have a good trip.”

With those last words, I fell into the abyss.

My surroundings grew dark. Rapidly. The only light was from far above, seeping out from beyond the frame where Go Yuri's shadow flickered.

A small whisper echoed in the darkness.

“My precious.”

And then, hell began.

Go Yuri's life unfolded.

“Ah.”

The first life.

Confirming that the life of the reincarnator she had told me about in reality as a 'story' was being reproduced exactly as it was, I sensed that I was seriously screwed.

Even that castaway on Mars, who famously declared something along the lines of 'I'm screwed, and then I'm even more screwed,' would surely offer me some unwitting sympathy if he saw the situation I was in now.[1]

“You want me to live it, from the very beginning? The life she walked as a reincarnator…?”

My head felt dizzy.

The situation was so absurd that a laugh escaped my lips.

Humans often let out a laugh as a defense mechanism when faced with a disaster they can't possibly resist. Laughter was a form of human magic, as ancient as language itself.

“...A life worth hundreds of millions, billions of years. This is a problem on a whole other level than when I lived Cheon Yo-hwa's life. This is…”

“Hey, Ms. Su-yeon! What are you doing over there! The monsters will be swarming in tomorrow. Get a move on and carry those sandbags!”

“...”

A foreman at the Final Defensive Line ordered me, and I had no choice but to obey.

In an instant, that foreman achieved the feat of imprinting his authority upon a reincarnator and regressor.

'To think that the phrase, ‘let's become one’ meant something like this.'

The years flowed by.

Sometimes quickly. Sometimes slowly.

The end came easily and swiftly. In 'this world,' which could truly be called the first round, or rather, the round before the first round, the Final Defensive Line was breached with laughable ease.

'A world where not a single Awakener exists, aside from the reincarnator.'

What kind of hard mode was this?

The 'monsters' that pierced through the Final Defensive Line were not merely the infinite horde of the Monster Wave.

Ah———ah—ah-ah-ah———

Above the battlefield.

A single 'witch' was singing there. At a glance, she looked human, but the reality was completely different

——Ah-ah—ah—ah——ah——

What looked vaguely like a witch's hat was made of living, squirming hair.

All over her body, 'eyes' and 'fingers' bloomed and snapped off repeatedly, as she spewed forth songs stained with curses and resentment that a person's ears could not dare to contain.

I couldn't help but mutter unconsciously.

“Dang Seo-rin...”

“It's Hecate! The witch! Hecate has appeared!”

But the soldiers who participated in the battle, the civilians classified as support personnel, and the boy soldiers were different.

They did not know the name 'Dang Seo-rin'.

'Hecate?'

Just as I did not know the name of that anomaly.

“Retreat! Retreat! Don't listen to the song! You must not listen to the song!”

“Ah, ahhh...”

One of the soldiers exposed to 'Dang Seo-rin's' song suddenly opened his mouth with a blank expression. From that opening, the same rhythm as 'Dang Seo-rin's' scream began to play out a cappella.

Bang!

A discipline officer pulled out a pistol without hesitation and shot the soldier. The soldier fell immediately.

– Ah, ah, ah.

However, only the soldier's body had fallen.

The soldier's head remained, suspended by itself in 'mid-air', singing the a cappella chorus.

“Hyaaaaargh!”

A comrade next to him, horrified, swung his sword, struck the head, and sliced it off, and only then did the song stop.

“Don't listen! Do not listen! Keep muttering anything in your mouths! You bastards! Mix in some noise! Don't focus on the song!”

“Ah ah ah ah ah.”

“Ah ah-ah ah-ah ah.”

Bang! Bang!

The discipline officer's pistol spat out sharp reports all across the battlefield.

I, who was there as a combat support personnel, could only stand there, aghast.

The final form of 'Dang Seo-rin', called by the name Hecate, was shocking enough, but an even more detailed point struck me with horror.

'They're using guns!'

Chekhov's Gun. It was one of the anomalies that had inflicted the most damage upon humanity.

If a gun so much as appeared once, that gun would someday be used, creating a 'decisive scene'.

For most humans, the most decisive scene was a moment when their own life was on the line. In other words, if one were to use a firearm, the user's life would inevitably be put in grave danger.

'No... But, it's true. In a world this broken, they're not in a position to be picky about using firearms or anything else.'

In the first place, the soldiers seemed to know nothing about Chekhov's Gun.

'The experience points.'

They were desperately lacking.

'Strategies against the anomalies. Knowledge. No, even the Awakeners who could use that knowledge to change the tide of war... are gone.'

There was nothing.

– Ahahahahahahahaha.

At that moment, the soldiers who had just lost their heads and fallen began to rise up from all over the front line.

– Ahahahaha.

– Ahahahahahaha.

– A ha ha ha ha.

Just like zombies.

– A thing, formless yet complete.

– Born before heaven and earth.

– The way that follows nature.[2]

The resurrected zombies danced and pranced, forming their own circle dance. If their neck was broken, they chanted the Tao Te Ching with a broken neck, and if they had no head, they struck their own corpses with a sword, keeping rhythm with the surrounding zombies. You might know them as the Jiangshi.

– The way that follows nature.

– Man follows earth, earth follows heaven.

– A ha ha ha ha ha.

In an instant, dozens of circle dances formed on the battlefield. Strangely, the endlessly surging horde of monsters never touched those circle dances.

Mixed in with the other soldiers, I retreated, glancing back.

"...Yo-hwa."

In the middle of the ever-growing circle dance.

Someone dressed like a shrine maiden was there, letting out an endless stream of laughter—A ha ha ha ha—and conducting the procession of corpses.

Next to me, a soldier muttered bluntly.

“Fucking necromancer...”

“...”

“Platoon Leader. We have no more room to retreat from here. The other units are probably in a similar situation.”

“For now, just evacuate the civilians.”

“To where, sir?”

“Back. Unconditionally back.”

“Understood.”

A soldier grabbed my shoulder and pulled me.

“Go. Quickly.”

“...”

I tried to hold my ground, but I was pushed away too easily by the soldier's grip.

It couldn't be helped. The current 'me' was too weak.

The moment I stepped back like that, Splash.

“…?”

I heard the sound of water.

I looked down, and a puddle had formed even though it had not rained.

No. That was not a puddle.

“Ah.”

From the entire ground, the 'water level' was steadily rising.

Leviathan.

Yu Ji-won.

“...”

But the soldiers, who were busy fighting a bloody battle to hold the front, and the civilians, who were moving to the rear even as they foresaw their own deaths, paid no mind to the puddle soaking their feet.

They did not know.

The fact that this water, too, was an anomaly.

“...No way.”

“What? Ms. Su-yeon?”

The foreman moving with me asked with a tired face, but I couldn't bring myself to answer him.

It wasn't as if the foreman was expecting a proper conversation either. For that to happen, even the civilians were rarely in good shape.

Humanity was exhausted.

In the face of an annihilation that offered not a sliver of hope.

Ah—ah-ah—ah———

In the sky of the battlefield, a song that tore people's sanity to shreds rang out endlessly.

A ha ha ha ha ha.

On the ground, corpses formed circles as if holes had been punched here and there, endlessly dancing a circle dance that insulted life.

Splash. Splash, splash.

And even on the ankles of the humans who retreated to escape them, an anomaly that mimicked 'water', an anomaly that mocked the most fundamental 'life' of this planet, seeped in.

No Awakeners existed.

Only the Fallen Ones, no.

Only the Outer Gods who borrowed the bodies of the Fallen existed.

"..."

That was the first cycle.

Not the epilogue, but the prologue.

Humanity's starting point.

Footnotes:

1 - Direct reference to the protagonist of Andy Weir's novel The Martian and his famous opening lines.

2 - The phrases chanted by the zombie-like soldiers are lines from the Tao Te Ching, a classic Chinese text. They are philosophical verses describing the nature of the Tao/Dao (the Way). In order, they are:

- "A thing, formless yet complete." (유물혼성, 有物混成)

- "Born before heaven and earth." (선천지생, 先天地生)

- "The way that follows nature." (도법자연, 道法自然)

- "Man follows earth, earth follows heaven." (인법지지법천, 人法地地法天)

Chapter 416

The Regressor II

Sinnoa

The world had ended.

It was the 2,230th destruction.

‘So this is the life Go Yuri has walked.’

Each time the world fell, I was born as a different person, with a different status, to a different family.

However, the landscape of ruin was always similar.

In a world where the Outer Gods sang their songs and harvested screams, where rainwater and dampness rose from the underground to soak everything, I stared blankly at the gray sky and let out a single breath.

“Ah, this isn’t easy… really.”

– Ah ha ha ha ha ha.

Snip. My head was severed by an anomaly.

This was a world where a regressor did not yet exist, a world that still had to endure a number of apocalypses equal to the sands of the Ganges before one could even try to exist.

It was the end of the ‘first cycle,’ a conclusion I had already repeated for the 2,230th time.

A regressor and a reincarnator.

What is the biggest difference between the two?

As the Undertaker, the first witness in human history to have experienced both, I could answer with confidence.

‘The boundary of the self is blurry for a reincarnator.’

How should I put it?

For a reincarnator, the boundary stone between ‘me’ and ‘others’ trembled like transparent jelly.

“Um, excuse me. Leader…?”

“Yes, Ms. Sim Ah-ryeon.”

“Why are you being so kind to me? O-of course, I’m grateful for the food you brought me. Really, truly grateful… But why for me?”

Take, for instance, Sim Ah-ryeon before me now.

During the nights of the One Thousand and One Nights, which already felt like a distant past, I had also experienced a ‘reincarnation’ where I was born as Sim Ah-ryeon's younger sister, just as Go Yuri had told me in a corner of the exhibition hall.

Perhaps that was why.

I just couldn’t feel like Sim Ah-ryeon was a stranger.

“Hm. It’s because you don’t feel like a stranger to me.”

“E-excuse me?”

“Ms. Ah-ryeon. When I look at you, I feel at ease for some reason.”

A smile.

I smiled to convey my feelings just as they were.

“Uh, uhehe… W-wow. That’s… kind of embarrassing.”

Sim Ah-ryeon, though flustered, nibbled on the digestive cookies I had secretly brought from the stockpile, like a hamster.

And it wasn't just Sim Ah-ryeon.

“All clear.”

The soldier who saluted me as I walked down the corridor of the underground bunker built on the Final Defense Line.

“Leader!”

The woman who cautiously approached to hand me a piece of fruit while I was patrolling the civilian sector.

“We have finished preparing the ship to set sail for Jeju Island. We can begin the operation anytime upon your command, Your Excellency.”

The executives of the Final Defense Line with whom I held strategy meetings.

‘They are all my family.’

Others did not feel like others.

And they, in turn, did not feel that I was a stranger to them.

‘Ah.’

That was it.

‘A regressor is ultimately an individual who endlessly relives their own single life.’

‘On the other hand… a reincarnator is a being who becomes a different person each time, destined to live and interact with other people.’

Here is a hypothesis.

There is a person A and a person B. The two were originally different people.

But let’s assume that one day, person A gains a strange ability. They are conceived at the exact same moment as B, are born to the same parents in the same environment, walk the same path in life, and live the exact same route.

In that case, is A a different being from B? Or are they the same person?

‘You can’t distinguish them.’

A reincarnator, especially an infinite one like Go Yuri, was such a being.

The inseparable one.

Her personality changed with every reincarnation. The way she treated people changed as well. It was only natural. How could one maintain the exact same personality when everything, down to their DNA, was different?

I had no choice but to accept it.

This process of becoming less of an ‘I’ and more of a ‘we’ the more I lived, the more I died.

To accept my existence as the ‘Red Flesh’.

“…Ahaha. I see now.”

In the deepest part of the bunker.

‘I’, who had already become the one and only dictator of the Human Allied Forces and the head of the Final Defense Line, muttered alone in my private room.

“It wasn’t that she desired to become one. It was because they were one from the beginning, and she was simply returning to that original state.”

Rumble!

At that moment, the underground bunker shook.

The meteor shower that the Outer God ‘Hecate’ had spread across the night sky had simultaneously bombarded the Earth's surface.

Feeling the vibrations that were literally turning the planet to ash, incomparable to any nuclear explosion, all over my body.

My current life came to an end.

The hours of destruction passed.

'Now, I think I can finally, completely understand Go Yuri's thoughts.'

I had already gone through hundreds of thousands of reincarnations.

In that time, Go Yuri must have already had a faint, yet somewhat certain conviction.

'I will one day, inevitably, transform into an anomaly.'

It was a constant.

What final conclusion this world would reach was still a mystery. Whether it would be a bad ending for humanity, a normal ending, or a happy ending they had never even dreamed of.

However, regardless of where humanity's route was destined to lead, the ending for Go Yuri, the reincarnator who was 'one person and everyone's person,' was already decided.

'The worst Outer God.'

When the 'Red Flesh' eventually arrives, people will not feel disgust. Nor will they harbor any hostility.

On the contrary, they would surely welcome it.

'A longing for a lost existence. A nostalgia for the happiest life. An end for all of humanity that is far, far happier than this hellish world…'

That kind of conclusion.

‘The One.’

Despite knowing full well that such an ending awaited, the reincarnator could not stop reincarnating.

‘Because the moment I stop, humanity loses its one and only chance to stand against the anomalies.’

Therefore.

‘I must separate my human self from my anomaly self in advance, only then can I cleverly avoid the catastrophe foretold in the ending.’

A clear realization dawned.

‘But how do I separate the [human Go Yuri]?’

It was simple.

‘…If there was someone who could [remember] all the memories of my life as a human, every single sorrow and every footstep.’

Complete Memory.

‘If I could find such a person. Create one. Become one with them, and make them experience a life as me—’

The Undertaker.

“…”

Myself, and at the same time, another.

“That’s right.”

A smile spread across my lips.

“It’s what I’m doing right now.”

The process of the operation.

Phase 1: Reincarnation.

Repeat reincarnations until this world becomes strong enough, until humanity can stand against the anomalies, and create awakeners.

Phase 2: Corruption.

At this point, Go Yuri is already suffering from the side effects of reincarnation to an irreversible degree.

She falls into the form of the Red Flesh and becomes ‘a single Outer God’ that collects all of her families, corrupting into The One.

Phase 3: Murder.

In that state, spray Go Yuri with the [Udumbara] virus. Eliminate the ability of reincarnation.

Furthermore, use [Time Seal] to completely erase the existence known as Go Yuri from this world.

Phase 4: Replacement.

However, the memories and experiences of Go Yuri’s life as a human are transferred directly to the ‘regressor’ Undertaker.

The Undertaker possesses Complete Memory. Even if he experiences hundreds of millions, or billions of reincarnations, he can still maintain his humanity, and remember.

Thus, the regressor Undertaker, having experienced the entirety of the Reincarnator Go Yuri’s life...

‘Can remain a Go Yuri who is more human than Go Yuri herself, an even more human Go Yuri.’

Shudder.

My shoulders trembled.

A light thrill.

‘From a being fated to become an Outer God to save humanity… I will remove the parts that have been corrupted into an anomaly, and leave only the humanity.'

Like a rocket jettisoning its booster.

After eliminating the void that drags humanity into hell, restore a world where humans can live as humans.

There will be no more anomalies there.

Including the final fate of the Red Flesh, the reincarnator herself.

"Aha."

What a magnificent plan.

What an… elaborate suicide.

'Go Yuri, and at the same time, the Undertaker.'

'The Undertaker, and at the same time, Go Yuri.'

Indeed.

'The declaration to become one was not an empty boast.'

Now, only one question remained.

'And so, I, who will inherit all of the memories and personality of the reincarnator Go Yuri, and also continue to possess the existence of the regressor Undertaker…'

In a world where humanity has finally achieved victory, how should I live?

"…"

I didn't know.

There was no way to know.

Because even the reincarnator and the regressor, who had lived countless lives, had never lived a life 'after the happy ending.'

An unknown territory.

“…For now, I must focus on living out Go Yuri’s lives.”

After all, that in itself was no easy task.

As I spoke my monologue, the surface world was once again turned to ash by Hecate, the price for failing to control the variables this time.

The 93,248,578th death.

The 93,248,579th life.

‘What if I try to reverse my thinking?’

Hecate was brutally powerful.

To not only command all the celestial bodies of the solar system as if they were her own limbs but also to be able to summon a meteor shower at any time and call down a meteor strike. The power balance was insane.

‘But the me of now can construct a strategy with much more flexible thinking.’

Because I had lived as Go Yuri.

Because she was the very person who had worried more than anyone about her own future of falling into an anomaly and how to pass on her human self, I was able to reach a certain idea.

‘I’ll deceive Hecate.’

If I deceive her, then how?

‘By making her mistake herself for a human!’

A shocking reversal of perspective.

It was an idea that, had the other reincarnated selves heard it, they would have clapped their hands wildly, saying, she’s crazy, isn't she insane.

‘Hecate is, in the end, a shooting star.’

‘That’s why Hecate has the property of responding to people's wishes. Let’s use this property.’

‘By selecting one [sacrifice] who wishes to live as a human and die as a human more than anyone else.’

A sacrifice.

Later, the term would be changed to ‘miko’ because it sounded bad, but to be perfectly honest, the term ‘sacrifice’ was more fitting.

‘Make that sacrifice wish. If I can make them pray to the stars in the sky, to let them live as a human and die as a human…’

‘Wouldn’t that work?’

My heart pounded.

‘That terrifying Outer God. Hecate. I’ll make her mistake and misunderstand herself as a mere human, and what’s more, make her believe it herself!’

It was a kind of experiment.

Go Yuri, I, feared the conclusion of becoming an anomaly more than anyone. So it was only natural to attempt the humanization of an anomaly.

“Who would be most suitable as the sacrifice?”

Go Yuri thought.

‘…’

I, the Undertaker, living the life of Go Yuri, could already guess the conclusion of this project.

“The desire to live as a human is an exceptionally tricky one. Ordinary people don’t really feel such a desire. Hmm. On the contrary, when does one become captivated by such a peculiar desire…”

It would be when their humanity has been desecrated.

“They would have to be brutally killed by an anomaly.”

And they couldn't die instantly.

“As slowly as possible. Yes. They must die slowly, so they can fully realize what an insulting death they will meet.”

Dying alone would not be enough.

“Ah. And their family must also die in the same way. Because sometimes, people become more enraged by what happens to their family than by what happens to them.”

The candidate for the sacrifice must be a more brilliant human than anyone.

“It must be someone who lives with a more harmonious family than anyone. From now on, whenever I reincarnate, I must always remember this point. If I see an angle, I’ll attempt it.”

…

“Hmm, this person is a little.”

…

“This person too. A failure. As I thought, perhaps the human heart is bound to flow more towards simply wanting to get stronger and take revenge, rather than the desire to survive as a human.”

…

“Ah.”

…

“Found her.”

Dang Seo-rin.

“Her taste is… Harry Potter? That’s perfect. As it happens, Hecate’s manifested form resembles a witch. Hmm. I think the compatibility will be good!”

I see.

“Now let’s set up the plan. I’ll aim for a reincarnation where I am born as the youngest in that person’s family, and pioneer a route.”

So that’s how it was.

“I’m confident in my ability to die tragically. The only question is whether Hecate will fall for my trap—”

Time passed.

“Success!”

Go Yuri cheered.

“Success…. It’s a success! My god. No way. I… I did it! Ahhh, ah! I! I! Hecate! That, that cursed Outer God of the night sky! The destruction that masqueraded as merely granting humanity’s wishes! I! Ahhhhh!”

Go Yuri lamented.

“I… did it. Everyone. Mom. Dad. Everyone! I…. N-no, it's not. Now. I must research the methodology more thoroughly, so that this miraculous route can be reproduced again.”

Dang Seo-rin was already a dead existence.

The Lesser Anomaly known as ‘Nut’ that I knew was merely a remnant of the shattered pieces of the Outer God Hecate.

The living hell where the night sky would unfold and a meteor shower would fall whenever a human, consciously or unconsciously, made a wish, was no more.

Now, only a void meteorite would occasionally fall to the surface on a cycle of 7 years, or 1 year at the shortest.

Compared to the hell that Hecate had created, a meteorite ‘or something’ that fell here and there like a regular event was nothing.

“Ah. Hmm…. I see. The fact that the family runs a flower shop was an absolutely essential condition. It makes sense. A state where the family’s dream has come true would be far more ideal and fitting for a harmonious scene. This is a problem I can always solve by secretly manipulating the variables.”

Time passed.

“The wish only becomes stronger when Ms. Dang Seo-rin has at least two younger siblings. A sense of responsibility as an older sister? I’m not sure… but this is also fixed.”

Time passed.

“—It’s done.”

Time passed.

“June 15th. The family of Ms. Dang Seo-rin, who runs a flower shop in Busan, will be massacred. The family composition will be as it is. Ms. Dang Seo-rin will die last. Wonderful.”

The reincarnator had pioneered the route.

“From now on, no matter who I am born as, or what life I live, I must absolutely make this ‘June 15th’ incident happen.”

Dang Seo-rin’s death was confirmed.

“…”

The reincarnator, Go Yuri, felt a slight sense of unease for some reason.

It wasn't a feeling of guilt towards Dang Seo-rin. Feelings like apology were like the wallpaper that constantly lined her heart.

“Aha.”

Rather than that.

“So now, no matter what person I reincarnate as, I must… absolutely protect the timeline related to Ms. Dang Seo-rin?”

The route was fixed.

The reincarnator’s schedule, which had been virtually free to do anything, had become bound by a slight lack of freedom, as if wrapped in a weak chain.

Just as a certain regressor’s calendar had been packed solid for a full seven years.

That was the source of the discomfort.

“…Hmm. Well, if it can prevent Hecate’s living hell, it’s a price I must naturally pay.”

The reincarnator treated the light chains on her wrists and ankles as a trivial obstacle, no.

Rather, she treated them as a medal for the great achievement of tearing apart the Outer God Hecate.

And…

“…”

Splash.

Go Yuri looked down at her feet.

Leather boots. Because Go Yuri knew full well that what looked like a puddle was in fact the blood of an Outer God, and because she hated to be touched by even a single drop of muddy water, she always wore leather boots.

“Leviathan…”

Looking at her reflection in the puddle, Go Yuri’s, my lips, muttered.

“Couldn’t I offer a sacrifice for this one too, in the same way?”

Clink. Clank.

It seemed as though the sound of chains could be heard from somewhere.

Footnotes:

Chapter 417

The Regressor III

Sinnoa

Clank.

I infiltrated the cult and adjusted the timeline so that the ‘Cheon Yo-hwa’ twins would be born.

After the twins were born, I periodically approached them and influenced their way of thinking.

So they would function as sacrifices offered to an Outer God, yet still yearn to be free humans.

This route required 13,160 lives.

Clank.

The separation of the Outer God Taeguk was complete.

The Outer God could no longer manifest its original form or exert its power. This phenomenon, in which an Outer God was alienated from its own self, was concisely named an Outer God.

This route required 214,734 lives.

Clank, creak.

I grasped the nature of the Outer God, Monster Wave. It was a legion that endlessly swallowed death to expand itself.

From this anomaly, I separated the ‘ability to endlessly recover,’ the so-called ‘Heal’ ability. Severed it. Made it independent. I separately conceived an anomaly called ‘Udumbara.’

This route required 3,478,238 lives.

"…"

I looked down at my own hands.

"There isn't enough time."

One might ask how a being who is both a reincarnator and a teleporter could be short on time, but it was the truth.

'A newly reincarnated life, at its longest, is only about 40 years. Usually, it's between 20 and 30 years.'

'In a mere 30 years, I have to implement every single strategy I've uncovered so far into reality.'

There was a limit to being overworked.

'On Monday, I have to infiltrate the cult and gain the trust of the leader as a follower. On Tuesday, I need to go to Turkey and lay the groundwork so that Monster Wave and Udumbara can be separated…'

'On Wednesday, it's tutoring for the Cheon Yo-hwa sisters again. I have to cancel Seo Gyu's trip to Japan so he doesn't get caught in an accident. And if I leave things alone, Noh Do-hwa will die in a traffic accident next Thursday.'

And, and, and.

"I can't save everyone."

The butterfly effect of the optimal route.

When I, when Go Yuri, chose a specific route, it affected the world in one way or another.

As a consequence, children who would have been born in other routes were not born in the current one.

Like Jeong Seo-ah.

"…I have to discard what must be discarded."

I had to save what must be saved.

And so, it was decided that tens of billions of beings who once were, and could have been, born on this earth would be erased from history.

"…"

Then one day, when I encountered the Monster Wave, I was faced with a bizarre scene.

– Ugh, uh, uh, uh, uh.

– Su-yeon unni! It's me, unni!

– So there you were?

The Monster Wave, a mixture of the dead.

And there, I saw the faces of people who had certainly never been born in the current timeline, my younger siblings and relatives.

"Ah."

I let out a bitter smile.

The candidates who had been dropped from the reincarnator's ark of time. The traces of past lives.

"So those people also appear as anomalies."

No wonder.

I had thought that the number of anomalies was greater than the number of humans.

Now I saw that even the lives from past incarnations that failed to be born in the 'current world' were turning into anomalies.

"The more I repeat this life, the number of souls falling into that procession of the dead will grow exponentially."

But if I quit reincarnating, the probability of humanity's victory itself would become slim.

Could there be a shittier game than this?

“Ah, this shitty game! I’m not playing!”

Whoosh.

A girl threw her gaming console. She was the girl who had become my older sister in this reincarnation.

Her name was Oh Dok-seo.

“Unni.”

I said gently.

“That console is expensive, you really regretted it last time when you threw it and it broke.”

“I don’t care! It’s not fun!”

Little Oh Dok-seo threw a tantrum.

I laughed emptily in my heart.

‘My god. To think the day would come when I’d be born as Oh Dok-seo’s younger sibling.’

Regardless of my thoughts, the work Go Yuri had once undertaken proceeded as planned.

“Hey! Read this!”

Oh Dok-seo had a talent. A talent for writing.

“Ah, damn it. Why isn't anyone reading this…!”

Oh Dok-seo had no talent. She had no talent for selling her writing.

“It’s because your writing always makes the characters miserable, they only interact through twisted emotions, things don’t get better even when they do interact, and in the end, they all fall to ruin together?”

“Th-that’s what makes it good! That’s it!”

“I guess it’s not to people’s taste.”

“Hmph.”

If Go Yuri had not been born as her younger sister.

That is, if the reincarnator did not exist in the world.

Oh Dok-seo would have given up her dream of being a writer around the age of 20. Despite preferring works that were darkly twisted, the person Oh Dok-seo herself was not that gloomy.

Decent social skills. Quick-witted. Above all, the tenacity to see her tasks through to the end.

She would have found a job that suited her and continued her life as a reader, simply enjoying works that fit her niche hobby.

“But I like it. Your writing, unni.”

“Huh?”

“Your writing. When I read it, it’s so transparent, it feels like I’m looking at beautifully carved ice.”

“…”

But Oh Dok-seo’s life was twisted.

It was decisively altered from the moment she met Go Yuri, the reincarnator, me.

“R-really? Then… Should I submit it to a contest?”

“Yes! Unni. I’ll help you as your most dependable reader and editor!”

“Uh, oh. Um, uh…. Okay!”

Oh Dok-seo had a younger sibling.

“Wow! This character, the Count, is amazing! Hmm. For sure. There’s a cliché in novels that a beautiful girl deserves to be saved, but this novel asks if that cliché can be ethically permissible when pushed to its absolute limit! That’s the theme.”

“Ah, uh-huh. Yeah… That’s right.”

Her sibling was so beautiful and kind, and so smart, that she understood the lines Oh Dok-seo wrote exactly as Oh Dok-seo intended—or perhaps even more deeply and broadly than Oh Dok-seo’s own desires.

“Unni, I also love the parts in your novel where you describe the scenery! Hmm, it’s like the objects are alive and squirming like tentacles.”

“T-tentacles?”

“Yes. In the novel, the characters are like dead objects, and the objects are like living characters. Describing them that way adds a special flavor to the reading experience!”

“Oh…. Y-you really get it.”

Her sibling was so considerate that she elevated the ‘techniques’ Oh Dok-seo had attempted, consciously or unconsciously, in her writing style into a firm ‘method.’

It was simple advice from a being who was both a reincarnator and a regressor.

And it was more than enough advice to sharpen the tip of a young child’s pen.

Oh Dok-seo was rejected from the first contest. But there were five hundred readers in the world who were disappointed by her rejection, genuinely disappointed.

It was a feat accomplished at the tender age of 14.

“Unni. Don’t you think this sentence would have more flavor if you fix it like this?”

“Ooh! You’re right! Kyaaa, as expected of my little sister. There’s really no editor like you.”

“It’s because your writing is beautiful, unni. I can’t help but get interested and keep looking into it.”

“Hee-heehee! You’re so sweet with your words, too! Hwaa, how did such a pretty sister get born into my family…? My friends’ siblings seem totally different. I’m the chosen one…”

“Ahaha.”

Oh Dok-seo’s talent began to bloom.

Oh Dok-seo became happy.

The flower that had never been able to bloom in other timelines, in hundreds of millions of past lives, blossomed magnificently under the care of the reincarnator-regressor.

Oh Dok-seo became happy.

Her work was published. The desolation melted into Oh Dok-seo’s lines was a potent poison, but humanity’s stomach had always been good at gulping down even opium and mercury, calling them medicine.

She became famous in an instant.

An older high school sister as the author and her younger sister as the editor, I mean, what kind of crazy combination was that?

It was a combination that reporters, if they were in their right minds, couldn’t possibly ignore.

The conscientious reporters who did raise an issue, asking if they weren’t exposing the children to the media too much, were gifted with single-digit page views for the day.

“Ms. Author!”

“Praise me more.”

“Legendary Writer-nim!”

“More.”

“The grace and blessing of humanity in this era, to whom Shakespeare is but a mere mortal, the Great Author Oh Dok-seo-nim!”

“Uhehe.”

Author Oh Dok-seo produced a great number of readers.

Among them, there were three stalker fans who could be definitively labeled as villains.

The three were originally separate individuals who would have never crossed paths.

But for some reason, perhaps because someone had adjusted the ‘route,’ the three met. And upon meeting, they realized they could share their own evil.

“Huh?”

Evil was fast.

Perhaps if evil hadn't been so fast, the world would never have become like this.

“My… sister?”

She lacked a sense of caution.

It was because of the whispers of someone who had always grown up right beside her.

“Th-that’s… a lie, right?”

The criminal group of three stormed the author’s home.

But ‘by chance,’ the author was not at home. ‘By chance,’ the beautiful younger sister, who had been widely reported in all media as having lived as an irreplaceable reader and editor since childhood, was at home.

A bit of coercion. Resistance. An argument. Insults.

The criminals lost their reason at the provocations that seemed to pierce right through all three of their psyches and subconscious minds.

And so, Oh Dok-seo lost her sister.

“…”

Oh Dok-seo lost her only editor. She lost a teacher who was younger than her. She lost a friend. She lost a family member who would always play new games with her when they were released.

Oh Dok-seo lost the very first reader of her writing.

By the hands of the readers of the outside world who had made her happy, by anonymous readers.

“…”

Oh Dok-seo should have stopped writing.

However, Oh Dok-seo’s resentment was far too complex. To hate the novel itself, the most precious being to her was also connected to the novel.

She resented the readers. But to resent the readers, the most precious being to her was also a reader.

She didn’t want to write.

But she knew that only while she was writing did her sister’s trace remain in her sentences.

Oh Dok-seo’s soul was torn.

A gap formed in her torn soul.

It was a gap like a ravine.

This world is made of wind, and each and every human is a ravine hanging on the edge of a cliff, so whenever the wind blows, a unique scream rings out from the crumpled place on the cliff.

That scream was called an Awakening.

“Hey, you.”

“…?”

To Oh Dok-seo, writing was a wound. And Oh Dok-seo came to regard beings she could only meet through that wound as true humans.

The reason was simple.

“You’re my sister, right?”

“…”

Because the most precious person to her was always found not in her current life, but in the lines of an epilogue that had already passed.

“How…?”

“I can read it. It’s a completely absurd story. But for some reason, when I read it, I can feel that this really happened.”

Even though they had never met in this life, the other person was staring at me with conviction.

“What are you?”

“…”

Go Yuri had been flustered.

I, too, was flustered.

‘Didn’t Dok-seo originally read my life story as a novel? But… at first, she read Go Yuri’s story, not mine?’

I was about to ask myself why when I suddenly realized.

‘Ah.’

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame.

The Outer God that must have squeezed into the gap created in Oh Dok-seo’s soul.

‘From the very beginning, that The Admin of the Infinite Metagame thing… confessed that it couldn’t distinguish between Go Yuri and me.’

A cold chill ran up the back of my neck.

‘Just like, the me of now.’

‘Is Go Yuri, and at the same time—’

‘The Undertaker who has inherited Go Yuri’s dream, her humanity.’

If so, then naturally.

‘Dok-seo can read not only the life story of the Undertaker but also the life story of Go Yuri, earlier than anyone, like a prophet.’

Not right now.

Oh Dok-seo’s prophetic ability was slow.

The Oh Dok-seo staring at me now had only read the connection from a past life, the timeline where we were born as family just once, as a ‘novel.’

‘But…. if enough time passes?’

She would be able to read all of these events as a story.

No.

She would one day be able to seal all of these events in the form of a story.

Footnotes:

Chapter 418

The Regressor IV

Sinnoa

Tick.

The time had come.

The time was finally ripe to pose a certain question to all of you, a question that I had kept endlessly hidden throughout this entire story.

Who is the 'I' in this story?

You all have likely considered 'I' to be the 'Undertaker' this whole time. That was only natural, since the Undertaker was the protagonist.

However, at the same time, you are all aware that the one who refined the Undertaker's tale into written sentences was, in the end, 'Oh Dok-seo'.

– Writer: Undertaker.

– Editor: Oh Dok-seo.

If the agreement Oh Dok-seo and I had made beforehand had actually been carried out, our respective roles would have been revealed right from the novel's description.

In this story, 'I' was the Undertaker.

And, at the same time, 'I' was also Oh Dok-seo all along.

Every story is an imitation of a dream. It was the act of dreaming a dream someone else had, but in the form of a book.

Just as I was currently dreaming Go Yuri's dream, Oh Dok-seo was peeking into the dream of the regressor known as me.

"Dok-seo."

"What's this, why the sudden change in your tone."

"There is something I must tell you right now."

I firmly grasped both of Oh Dok-seo's hands.

She flinched, startled. As the one experiencing Go Yuri's reincarnation, I was the young daughter of a European noble family in this life.

But I cast aside the speech patterns of this life. I cast aside its facial expressions too. For the first time, I completely ignored the rule of strictly adhering to the reincarnation of 'Go Yuri'.

"Uh, huh?"

"You probably won't understand right away. But, someday, you will inevitably read my diary in the form of a novel."

"I've already read that..."

"No."

I shook my head.

"Living as your younger sibling was, from my perspective, no different from an extremely brief flicker. I will spend hundreds of lives with you, and I will spend billions of lives without you."

"..."

"I am living this present moment to console a certain lonely person."

I told her the story.

It was a very long story, but I knew Oh Dok-seo well, and I also knew how to prepare the tale in a form she could easily digest.

It took several weeks for Oh Dok-seo to devour the entire story, suffer from indigestion, and finally, with difficulty, open her lips.

"From me, what... are you hoping for?"

"I am in the process of carving out and severing the only humanity from the vast anomaly named Go Yuri."

Separation. Isolation.

Fundamentally, it was the same as the strategy Go Yuri had employed against the Outer Gods.

"I'm sorry, but it seems I must entrust the same task to you."

"..."

"There is no need for an anomaly called the Undertaker to exist in this world."

I said.

"He has grown too immense. He was already a being where hundreds of regressions' phantoms coexisted with every step he took. Now, billions of reincarnations are mixed in as well. For humanity to treat him as just another human, he has come too far."

"Then?"

"Please leave only the traces of the Undertaker's life as a human in this world."

That is my end.

"Go Yuri handed herself over to me. I, too, will hand myself over to you."

"..."

"Please remember the Undertaker as a mere human. Remember him as a strange man who was just a bit mentally tough, had an extraordinary memory, and liked old classics like the Romance of the Three Kingdoms."

That's right.

It was a measure for someone who could fall into being an anomaly at any moment to desperately be remembered as a human.

"How you will describe me as a person. I will leave the judgment of me entirely to you."

"To me...?"

"Yes."

Go Yuri had said.

That for beings like us, the important thing is how much of yourself you are prepared to discard.

The anomalies discarded nothing.

They forced themselves upon this world. They crushed even the universe's physical laws with their own rules. The anomalies were beings who always cried out 'me', 'me', 'me'.

Therefore, the way to not become an anomaly was simple.

It was to not monopolize the way you understand yourself, but to hand it over to others as well.

Mugan stopped being an anomaly the moment I began to call her Cheon Yo-hwa. Go Yuri went beyond a name and handed her very life over to me.

"It might sound strange right now. But that's because you are, in fact, my shamaness."

I smiled and patted Oh Dok-seo's shoulder.

"Gods exist to be swayed by their shamanesses."

"..."

With this, the outline of the plan for how to seal myself after isolating Go Yuri was revealed.

Of course, there was a prerequisite.

'Admin of the Infinite Metagame.'

That unprecedented last-hitter, always eyeing an opportunity to bewitch Oh Dok-seo and snatch the fully prepared meal.

'I have to make sure to subdue him and get a declaration of surrender. That's the only way he won't be able to interfere with Oh Dok-seo's sealing process.'

Fortunately, the role of subduing Admin of the Infinite Metagame had been taken care of by the 'future Undertaker' and the 'past me'.

The repeating time of the world.

Everything was inevitable.

'Go Yuri must have planned it this way, for this route to come to be, even before my first regression began.'

A three-legged race.

'And from now on... I'll have to adjust things so that the prologue of the novel Oh Dok-seo will read begins not with Go Yuri, but with the Undertaker's story.'

It was an easy task.

'All I need is for the Admin of the Infinite Metagame to judge that the Undertaker is a much more dangerous element worth paying attention to than Go Yuri.'

In other words.

'After adjusting all the schedules and entering the main route in earnest, Go Yuri will refrain from intervening in the world's destruction as much as possible.'

It was a kind of camouflage tactic.

I'm not actually dangerous.

No, I am dangerous, but as long as you don't provoke me directly, I don't plan on acting out from now on.

But if you do touch me, smack! I'll have to punish you?

Then Admin of the Infinite Metagame's attention would naturally be drawn to the regressor rather than the reincarnator.

Because it's wiser to focus on eliminating the regressor, who is an immediate thorn in the side, than the reincarnator who has no intention of making a move right away.

"Ha."

A laugh escaped me without me realizing it.

'Isn't that the exact position I remember Go Yuri being in?'

Thinking about her grand strategy also provided the answer to why Go Yuri had reacted so sensitively to the arrival of Leviathan.

'I, the Undertaker, must one day cast aside my aura and find my own method of conquest.'

'But the 664th cycle is too early. The Undertaker is somewhat lacking in experience to decide to abandon his aura.'

'Until he has gained enough experience, it's inevitable that he will have to rely on his aura to survive.'

Go Yuri's so-called [Regressor Maker].

The nurturing of the regressor needed to proceed step by step.

It would have been problematic if he realized the truth of Leviathan too early, and troublesome if he realized it too late.

'For one person?'

I faced the next lives.

'Could she have been this devoted?'

I lived everyone's lives and watched over everyone's lives.

I experienced silence through a groaning throat in the lowest basement, and I spoke with a commanding voice from the highest skyscraper.

I lived as a beggar, sitting on the edge of a roadside ditch, relying on a single bowl to beg. To a legless beggar, the depth of that ditch was a valley.

On a street where dust had swallowed the air, I held out my hand toward tourists.

All lives were wretched in the face of destruction.

'The reincarnator was not a being who was merely sad.'

I walked on, firmly grasping the hands that rose like prayers in each and every one of those lives.

'Humans are strong.'

I saw a flower that bloomed in the ditch. I saw the red of its petals, unerased even though it was covered in dust.

'Behold. Even when the Outer Gods who insult the world cackle and make a mess of everything, a single reincarnator and a regressor from among humanity have walked this far.'

Let's go.

'Dok-seo I know you will be sad.'

Let's keep walking.

'I am sad too, for it feels like I am leaving and burdening you with this entire story and all its regrets.'

The Cheon Yo-hwa sisters were born.

I was the sisters' mother's childhood friend. That mother died early, and before she died, she left me with the words to please take good care of her children.

These children would later be possessed by Outer Gods and end up slaughtering countless people.

But these children, smiling before my eyes right now, would come to love a certain man, and eventually come to accept even the world in which that man existed.

'But you are a strong child.'

Dang Seo-rin was born.

The human who originally possessed Dang Seo-rin's body had died. However, an Outer God who inherited Dang Seo-rin's memories accepted being human, without even knowing that it was an Outer God itself.

She would one day sing a lullaby that puts other anomalies to sleep, despite being an anomaly herself. Walking alongside a single man.

'Don't collapse from sadness.'

Yu Ji-won did not commit suicide.

Originally, Yu Ji-won had ended her own life after murdering her parents and her grandmother, who had dementia, on a terribly rainy day one summer.

She had courage. In addition to the courage to treat every being in this world as an insect, she had the courage to dismiss even herself as one.

I was once born as Yu Ji-won's younger sibling, but surprisingly, the young Yu Ji-won at that time secretly strangled her newborn sibling to death, avoiding their parents' eyes.

It was because there was no need to add one more person to this hell.

'It's alright if you forget everything. That would be one kind of ending too. But if you cannot forget, if you absolutely cannot accept it. Become strong.'

To prevent Yu Ji-won's suicide, another's breath was needed under the night sky of the monsoon rains.

'You must become so abundant that you can still be you even after giving yourself away.'

I could see the path.

On this route, there was Dang Seo-rin, and there were the lives that died to allow Dang Seo-rin to be born, and there was Jung Ye-ji, and the souls sacrificed to bring about Jung Ye-ji, and there was Noh Do-hwa, Cheon Yo-hwa, Yu Ji-won, Lee Ha-yul, Sim Ah-ryeon, Yu Ji-won, so many people.

"..."

Go Yuri looked back at me as she walked.

A smile. Her face was smiling.

I was the same.

'What I want to leave you is not sadness, but the strength to keep walking even while reading all these wounds.'

Go Yuri believed in me.

I believed in Oh Dok-seo.

And…

"Abeub, abububu, bueeeh."

Now, it was my turn to believe in myself.

"Oh? Oh, oh, she smiled! She smiled!"

Tick.

Looking up at the 'I' who was looking down at the 'I' born as their younger sibling.

I opened my tender lips.

Yes, Mr. Undertaker.

Welcome. It's good to see you again. I'm sure the current Mr. Undertaker understands that it's also always possible to say, nice to meet you for the first time.

I will be erased from this world.

It's the fulfillment of the wish you once so desperately wanted, so please be happy.

Ah. No. I'm joking! It’s just a joke.

I've lived a strange life. I ended up living it.

Before you entered my dream. Hmm, yes. It wasn't that you entered, but that I tripped you into it. But please forgive me, as that was my own way of hiding my embarrassment.

Anyway.

Before entering that place, you asked. Why I didn't save Mr. Schopenhauer.

I'm sorry.

Actually, it was on purpose! Of course, everything is the result of my deliberate choices.

Mr. Undertaker, you were a perfect candidate in many ways. To the point that I was inwardly convinced that I had finally found a shaman just for me.

...However, humans can't always be strong.

Even Kafka, whom you like, said it. The reason Alexander the Great could advance was thanks to the existence of the walls of India that he could point to with the tip of his sword.

If you can't see it, you don't aim for it. You give up.

Humans have a sad nature, so it seems they often don't even try to take on a challenge if the goal isn't vividly visible right in front of them.

That's why I created a milestone for you named 'Schopenhauer'.

From now on, or rather from hundreds of millions of years ago, from the very moment you met me, Mr. Undertaker, your destiny as a regressor was sealed, and you will walk a single, long route.

It will be hard. You will be sad.

But, if the goal is visible before your eyes. You possess enough strength not to give up.

Yes.

The corpse of Schopenhauer, who just committed suicide because you couldn't save him, is precisely the milestone I have gifted you.

A mark you can never turn away from, showing you why you started walking this path and what must be waiting at the end of this route.

Emit Schopenhauer.

Please save my father one day.

I expect you will pour out complaints that this is harsh and cruel. I will accept them.

In return, I will be subjugated by you.

Stained by the red flower of the Udumbara.

And if necessary, through the Time Seal that I created for you for this very moment.

I will be erased. Leaving behind billions of family members here, along with a soul deleted from billions of routes.

In this world, only you will remember me.

And to walk this entire path, to pierce through the un-washable wound in your heart, the void, there is just one. A condition is needed.

Please love me desperately.

And, please forget me.

Please love other people who are not me.

The fact that you loved me, and the fact that I loved you.

The memory of you hurting me, and the memory of me hurting you, forget it all.

Forgetting even the fact that you have forgotten.

Please continue to live.

...At the end of this ending, there are bound to be aftereffects.

This world, having avoided destruction, will find it a little more... difficult to remember other precious beings.

Memories will become a little more unstable.

It will become a little more difficult to properly look at someone.

Of course. Because the existence known as 'me' has punched a hole in people's hearts.

But, if that is the price.

If this is the only price that must be paid to stop this absurd destruction, I will gladly bear it.

I have been very rude.

Please understand that this was the best that a child who suddenly died one day, only to open her eyes and find herself living another life, could do.

I love you.

Mother. Father. Everyone.

Did I do well?

Did I choose… the right person.

I loved.

I gave up many things. I lived a life where I had no choice but to give up. But still, there was one thing I did not discard until the very end.

That it was good to have been born, even into a world like this, I can now be grateful for it from the bottom of my heart, sincerely.

Farewell.

.

.

.

.

.

.

Tick.

June 24th, 12:00. The regressor encounters 'Hecate' Dang Seo-rin at an intersection in Busan.

An exodus of refugees from all over the country to Busan.

Worldwide daily death toll: 51,956,792.

June 22nd, 14:20. The regressor reunites with Yu Ji-won at a roadside rest stop in Seocho-gu, Seoul.

The main forces of the Korean Peninsula's military are annihilated by the Ten-Legs.

Worldwide daily death toll: 124,956,792.

June 21st, 13:00. The regressor encounters prosthetic doctor Noh Do-hwa, who was evacuating patients against attackers at the National Rehabilitation Hospital.

Worldwide daily death toll: 319,956,792.

June 18th, 20:00. The regressor enters the Baekhwa Women's High School Tutorial Dungeon. Encounters Cheon Yo-hwa on the distorted timeline of Infinite Void.

Worldwide daily death toll: 771,221,328.

June 17th, 16:00. The regressor makes contact with the one known as the 'Saintess'. The Regression Alliance is formed.

June 17th, 14:10. Emit Schopenhauer dies in a cafe in Busan.

June 17th, 14:00. A large-scale Void White Night occurs south of the Han River in Seoul, on the Korean Peninsula.

June 17th, 14:00. Small-scale Voids, so-called 'Tutorial Dungeons', occur simultaneously all over the world.

Worldwide daily death toll: 1,649,857,026.

June 17th, 13:59.

The regressor regresses.

.

.

.

.

.

.

April 29th, 16:00.

Oh Dok-seo awakens.

.

.

.

.

.

.

Tick.

.

.

.

.

.

.

April 29th, 16:00. Oh Dok-seo awakens.

May 7th, 17:11. Oh Dok-seo dies.

April 29th, 16:00. Oh Dok-seo awakens.

May 7th, 19:20. Oh Dok-seo dies.

April 29th, 16:00. Oh Dok-seo awakens.

May 8th, 04:44. Oh Dok-seo dies.

April 29th, 16:00. Oh Dok-seo awakens.

May 8th, 04:44. Oh Dok-seo dies.

April 29th, 16:00. Oh Dok-seo awakens.

May 8th, 04:44. Oh Dok-seo dies.

April 29th, 16:00. Oh Dok-seo awakens.

May 8th, 13:10. Oh Dok-seo dies.

April 29th, 16:00. Oh Dok-seo awakens.

May 9th, 08:36. Oh Dok-seo dies.

.

.

.

.

.

.

April 29th, 16:00.

Oh Dok-seo awakens.

.

.

.

June 17th, 13:59.

The regressor regresses.

Footnotes:

Chapter 419

The Possessor I

Sinnoa

Oh Dok-seo.

The miko of Admin of the Infinite Metagame.

And also, the miko of the regressor.

A reader who had observed the entire life of the regressor.

And also, the author who had put the regressor's humanity on display.

"Haaaah... I'm so bored..."

"Isn't there a single fun novel out there?"

"Really, all authors should just be locked up in a back room and forced to do nothing but write."

"If they just published three chapters a day, their income would triple, wouldn't it? Hmm. Why has no author figured out this simple calculation? Are they all liberal arts majors..."

First Ability.

'The Slowest Prophet'.

Oh Dok-seo could foresee the calamities of a world that would begin its full-scale destruction in seven days.

This prophecy was embodied in the form of a novel.

"Hm? Did I favorite something like this?"

Once Oh Dok-seo started reading a novel she liked, she had a tendency to read straight through it, even if it meant pulling an all-nighter.

However, she had a strong habit of putting aside works that hadn't accumulated a decent number of chapters, letting them bulk up until they were ready.

"Oh. This one has quite a few chapters."

Furthermore, from Oh Dok-seo's perspective, the prophecy was nothing more than a mere novel, so it was impossible for her to accept the prophecy as a ‘prophecy’.

"This will be my daily bread for today."

Hence, [The Slowest Prophet].

A blind woman who acquired the prophecy faster than anyone else but could not recognize its precious value.

A Cassandra who prophesied everything but could save nothing, an Epimetheus who could only leave Pandora's box unattended.

"Huh?"

"...What's this? It's the first time a character's name in a novel has overlapped with my real name. Even the surname is the same? Ugh. The hanja... is identical, too."

"..."

"Huh?"

Condition cleared.

Oh Dok-seo finished reading the entire prophecy. And at the same time, she became certain that the character named ‘Oh Dok-seo’ in the story was identical to herself.

May 1st.

At this point in time, Oh Dok-seo was among the very fastest of all humanity, not just the prophets, to realize her own awakening.

"What is this... Is this… for real?"

"Sixteen billion? Ha, sixteen billion people die in a single day? Uh... W-wait a minute! June 17th, that's right around the corner!"

"No way."

"..."

"Everyone dies...?"

First Ability.

Unlocked.

‘The Fastest Prophet’.

"Wh-what do I do?! Crap. What, what am I supposed to do! I'm just an ordinary person!"

"Gasp. That line just now sounded a bit like a protagonist's."

"But, damn it! What am I really supposed to do?!"

"And why did this Undertaker guy entrust such an important mission entirely to me?! ...Ah. It was because he needed a prophet who awakened earlier than his own regression point to save Old Man Scho..."

"N-no. But still. How...?"

Second Ability.

‘Absolute Defense’.

Oh Dok-seo had a tendency to treat all events occurring in this world as stories within a ‘work of fiction’.

Even if a nuclear bomb were to go off inside a work of fiction, there was no way a real person would be exposed to radiation.

Therefore, Oh Dok-seo could declare any physical impact inflicted within the work of fiction as ‘null’ within her vicinity.

"...It works?"

"Wow, I'm a superhuman too! Status Window!"

"Hmm. No status window. Right, I remember it said the status window was a trick by some Outer God called Admin of the Infinite Metagame..."

But that was all.

[Absolute Defense] did not have a long duration.

At this point, it lasted for about a minute at best. No matter how much she trained, it would be difficult to dramatically increase the defense barrier's duration.

It was an ability that was ambiguous to a fault.

"Wait. I'm her miko, so shouldn't I be able to see the status window freely? Ah. She's sealed in the laptop, right."

"...I need to get the laptop. At this point, Admin of the Infinite Metagame is the safest Outer God. The only one who can't bring harm to humanity."

"Where on earth could it be—"

[Hello there?]

"It was my laptop!"

"No, no. Come to think of it, this laptop first appeared in the tutorial dungeon. That means there's a high possibility it belonged to someone summoned at Busan Station..."

"I'm part of the Busan Station family too!"

[I see. So my miko whelp was already enjoying a social life of her own by chattering away to herself even back then.]

[I suddenly feel the urge to strangle my past self for choosing a moron like this as my miko, thinking, ‘A habit of talking to herself, what a perfect trait for a protagonist!'.]

"Oh, she really has that sarcastic, white-haired, red-eyed noble lady attribute, just like I saw in the novel..."

"Ah. More importantly, I need the rest of this story! You have to tell me what happens later!"

[Yes.]

"Oh."

"..."

"Hmm. I see."

"We're screwed."

"Right. First, I think I need a power-up. Ah, my status window! Give me my status window!"

[I do not mind giving it to you, but are you sure you will be fine?]

"With what?"

[The more you rely on my power, the more you become a 'character in a work of fiction'. Because I am the Outer God who governs works of fiction.]

[Your special status stems from the outrage of dismissing this world as a mere novel.]

[From the moment you begin to treat yourself as a character in a novel, your Ability will weaken accordingly.]

"Oh..."

"No. Wait a minute. Miss God. Couldn't that, somehow, be resolved?"

[Somehow?]

"I just need to get stronger and beat everyone up, then I can just make this novel into ‘something that never happened at all’, right."

[...]

"I… I think I know why that Undertaker guy passed the final baton to me."

"I don't need to use all sorts of strange and mysterious methods to eliminate my own anomaly, like the regressor or the reincarnator in this place."

"I. Only I, at this point in time, no matter how powerful I become… the very moment I wield that great power to go on a rampage ‘so that the events of the work of fiction do not occur’, I will lose that power."

"It's only natural."

"Because the time that unfolds in that place where nothing happened will no longer be a novel, but only ‘reality’."

"Am I wrong?"

[No.]

[You are correct. You have seen through it quite well for a beginner with no experience whatsoever.]

"The other mikos... the sacrifices, the stronger they become, the more they are contaminated by the Outer Gods. They themselves degenerate into an anomaly by the name of the Fallen or Corrupted."

"This contradiction. The trap of becoming stronger to defeat anomalies, only to become closer to an anomaly the stronger one gets, is what ultimately drove the world to ruin."

"Both the reincarnator and the regressor."

"That's why they had no choice but to reach the conclusion of sealing themselves away."

"But not me."

"I still have the time to set everything right. It's only about a month, but…"

"Until the day June 7th arrives, I can get stronger however I want. Without thinking about the consequences. Without worrying about corruption."

[June 17th.]

"..."

[It is June 17th, not June 7th. You are truly terrible at remembering numbers. Are you even confused about such an important date?]

"Sh-shut up! Anyway!"

"...Until June 17th, I can just get stronger without worrying about any side effects or aftereffects."

"And..."

[I will seal everything so that none of it ever happens.]

"Seal..."

"Yes."

"This novel. The hundreds of regressions and hundreds of millions of reincarnations that were said to have happened in this novel."

"I will seal that time."

Second Ability.

Unlocked.

‘Absolute Seal’.

"Demoting the story in the novel to just a story in a novel. Connecting with reality."

"If that's my ability, I'll give it a try."

[...]

Third Ability.

Writing a Side Story.

Oh Dok-seo is, for all intents and purposes, a writer who holds absolute ability in composing the life story of another.

Before her eyes, all human beings are demoted to ‘characters’.

Therefore, Oh Dok-seo can empathize with any character from any regression cycle and act as if she has become that person.

For it is only natural that an author can immerse themselves in their characters.

[Why?]

"Hm?"

[You must know, having prophesied this far. In truth, there are no longer any obstacles that will stand in your way.]

"..."

[The reincarnator.]

[The Prometheus who shared the ‘fire’ known as awakening with the fangless and clawless humans so they could stand against the Outer Gods, has crawled into the regressor's subconscious and memories on his own.]

[The regressor.]

[He, who inherited the reincarnator's will, willingly chose to become a mere character in a novel and entrusted his entire humanity to you.]

[Outer Gods like Infinite Void and whatnot are not even worth a first glance. You will one day be able to demote even them to mere elements within a novel.]

[Just as I did in my prime.]

"..."

[Is reality not worthless?]

[At least, you do not feel any particular value in reality. You are the type to think of works of fiction as a more truthful world.]

[That is why you are my miko.]

[Go on and demote the reincarnator and the regressor to characters in a novel.]

[Furthermore, adjust the difficulty so that the void poison can wreak a moderate amount of havoc and anomalies can roam about.]

[You can become the one and only god of a new world.]

"But then I'd be ignoring the Undertaker's feelings."

[...]

"You're an anomaly, so you probably wouldn't understand."

"To hand over the achievements one has made, the story one has built, a domain that one can decide and monopolize for oneself, to another person."

"That is the most noble thing for a human."

[I cannot understand.]

"Of course you can't understand. Because you have never been someone's child, nor will you ever be a parent."

[...]

"Children can understand their parents' stories from their own perspective."

"Yes, parents willingly permit the outrage of letting those far, far younger children judge their own lives."

"A king to his people."

"A friend to a friend."

"A buddha to a buddha."

"A person does not judge their own story entirely by themselves. No, they can make the decision not to judge it."

[That is why you people are weak.]

"That's right. But then why are you almighty Outer God who has become so strong, currently living as a small-time VTuber with a single viewer on my laptop?"

[...]

"People don't hand over judgment because they can't become strong."

"They just hand it over because there is an existence they hold a little more precious than themselves."

"And as it happens, I'm the type of person who considers myself to be a moderate piece of trash."

"So to the guy who handed over the right to decide his entire life to trash like me, I'm thinking of betting my entire life on him as well."

[Where are you going?]

"Yu Ji-won."

Third Ability.

Unlocked.

‘Writing the Main Story’.

"The most powerful person at this point in time. Leviathan invaded this world several years ago."

[That is correct. It is just that Yu Ji-won, who was chosen as the sacrifice, is sealing the anomaly with her longing for the so-called ‘Mr. Matiz’, the one and only humanity that exists in her heart.]

"I need to meet that person first and ask for her cooperation."

[Because she is the strongest?]

"Yes. And above all else... Just as you said, Yu Ji-won only has eyes for ‘Mr. Matiz’. If I just mention the keyword ‘Mr. Matiz’, a serious conversation and cooperation will immediately become possible."

[So you are saying that even you, in your current state with no experience points whatsoever, can get her to join your party just by clicking the ‘Recruit’ button.]

"Status window. And turn on the map, too."

[Very well.]

"First, I'll recruit Yu Ji-won as a companion. Next is Lee Ha-yul. She's probably confined in Busan right now, being called the child of a concubine. I can just go and drag her out."

[And after that?]

"The Saintess. Before the Great Void known as the White Night occurs in Seoul on June 17th... what is this? Its name keeps appearing in the story, but there are no specific details?"

[...]

"Anyway. The Saintess is already in an awakened state before the White Night occurs. She's a little slower than me, but it's still a sufficiently early point in time. It was emphasized that the Saintess has a consistently logical personality, so if I speak calmly, I can persuade her by any means."

[Next?]

"I have to crush Cheon Yo-hwa's cult."

[Even if it has been split in two, it is still at a level capable of summoning an Outer God to the mortal plane. Are you saying that you, who has just awakened, will crush the worst pseudo-religious cult on the Korean Peninsula with a hastily assembled party of heroes?]

"Yes."

[Is that possible? You will die.]

"If I die, then you tell the me of the next life how I died, in text."

[Ha? The next life... You are not a regressor. You merely have the attributes of a book possessor. If you die, it is the end.]

"I suppose so."

"—But what will happen when the Undertaker, who regressed on June 17th, looks around the Busan Station tutorial dungeon and sees that I'm not there?"

[...]

"The moment the Undertaker determines that I have died, he will move on to the next cycle. It's only natural. The feelings the old man has for me are real, after all."

"The story hasn't even begun yet, and a child named Oh Dok-seo has died. From the old man's perspective, it's a situation that he cannot allow, cannot accept, and cannot forgive."

"That's why I can be sure. If I die, the regressor will definitely move on to the next life."

[Even if you, in the next life, having received the strategy guide from me, fail again and die.]

"He'll just regress again."

[Until you, having inherited the experience points from your past life, become strong enough—]

"To reach June 17th. The Busan Station tutorial dungeon. The starting point, the prologue."

[In effect, you become no different from a regressor.]

"That's right. Because there's a grateful existence who regresses solely for me."

[Ha.]

[The reincarnator to the regressor. The regressor to the possessor. And the possessor, in turn, entrusts her fate to the regressor.]

"Do you get it now? You anomaly, this is humanity."

[If humanity were filled with only people like you, the Outer Gods would never have descended in the first place.]

[Very well.]

[The end of this story, I have become curious to see it myself.]

[I shall witness your deaths to my heart's content. My worst miko.]

"Yeah. I'll probably get strong after rolling around for about 10 turns? I can't be compared to that old man who's practically a non-ability user."

"I'll be fighting with a status window, an inventory, and even a map turned on. Wow, what an easy win!"

"A mode that was Very Hard difficulty for the reincarnator became Normal for the regressor! Which means for this body, a possessor, it's finally on Easy!"

"It's so... Easy."

[Hmph.]

[Well now.]

[I wonder if it will truly be that easy?]

"Hm?"

And so.

Epimetheus blossomed into Prometheus.

Footnotes:

Chapter 420

The Possessor II

Sinnoa

Every plan had been perfect.

Or at least, it had certainly looked perfect right up until I, the Undertaker, got my ass kicked.

'Go Yuri. The one who fell into becoming the worst anomaly while trying to save humanity.'

'She now exists in my complete memory as a [human] who has lived through billions of lives.'

Naturally, my memories were on an entirely different dimension from other people's memories.

"Oh my."

"Oh dear, oh dear."

This difference in dimension was made abundantly clear just by looking at the Go Yuris right before my eyes, all chattering away, bustling about, murmuring here and there, chatting incessantly, testing the very limits of onomatopoeia in real time.

"We've truly become one now."

Over there, a Go Yuri.

"But wouldn't it be rather burdensome for Mr. Undertaker if billions of us were all stationed in the Busan Station Tutorial Dungeon?"

Here too, a Go Yuri.

"It's a grand human gathering."

"Yes. It would be more appropriate if only about one person appeared at a time, while the rest remained in the unconscious world of dreams within dreams."

"Then we need to decide who will stay in Mr. Undertaker's reality."

"A lottery? Or perhaps a tournament?"

"Fairness or dopamine, that is the question."

"Truly a difficult problem..."

It was nothing short of a Go Yuri chaos party.

"Could you all be quiet? You're making my head spin."

"Yes." "Yes." "Yes." "Yes."

The Go Yuris obediently replied.

While the Go Yuris suddenly began holding a dice-rolling tournament competition at the edge of my vision, with billions of participants in the main event, I calmly looked around.

At the waiting room of the Busan Station Tutorial Dungeon.

'As expected. I don't see Dok-seo...'

This was the 1,085th cycle.

In the previous cycle, I had experienced every single moment of Go Yuri's entire life, one by one. I had literally walked the exact same life as her.

Now there was no meaningful distinction between Go Yuri's personality and mine. I was Go Yuri, and Go Yuri was me.

In this state, Go Yuri, who had existed with a clear physical form in reality, willingly became infected by 'Udumbara.'

Udumbara was the World Tree that erased the screams of all awakeners.

The ability called reincarnation that Go Yuri possessed was also removed at that moment, and at last the reincarnator finished her long journey and came to sit at the terminal station called 'me.'

Go Yuri. The reincarnator whose name in her first life had been Su-yeon succeeded in discarding herself, who had been contaminated by Void Poison.

'Now I just need to be sealed.'

My sealing method was much simpler.

'After Dok-seo finishes writing my entire life story, if I also get infected by Udumbara like Go Yuri did, everything will be over.'

It wasn't just me.

'Ji-won too, Yo-hwa too, Seo-rin too. No. I'll make Udumbara bloom fully across this entire world and all the awakeners...'

'Even the miku's who have become one with the Outer Gods, I'll infect them all with Udumbara.'

Then the Outer Gods, the anomalies that originated from the Outer Gods, and the awakeners who harbored the Void Poison called awakening.

'I can reset them all at once.'

The problem was Sim Ah-ryeon.

The ability Ah-ryeon possessed was fundamentally similar to Udumbara.

If Udumbara became massive enough to truly become a 'World Tree,' there was a risk that Ah-ryeon would also degrade to the level of an Outer God along with it.

'So I'll infect them with Udumbara little by little, divided across cycles. This way I can minimize the risk.'

A grand downfall.

While this epic of collapse continued, I, the Undertaker, had to remain until the very last moment to control any possible variables.

And beside me, Oh Dok-seo would diligently write the sealing tool called a novel to seal me away.

"...Why isn't she in the Tutorial Dungeon?"

As I was saying.

Oh Dok-seo, the person who had now become most important to my plan, was nowhere to be seen.

'There must have been some error.'

I desperately spun my positive thinking circuits.

'If I go to the next cycle, Dok-seo will appear with a ta-da! Yes! Of course she will.'

Next. The 1,086th cycle.

Dok-seo still wasn't there.

"..."

The 1,087th cycle too. The 1,088th cycle too. And the next one too.

Even the mental state of this regressor, whose only virtue was being positive about everything, naturally had no choice but to enter the five stages of grief.

"No. There's no way Dok-seo died. Why would she die in the first place? She just needs to not go anywhere dangerous and keep using her AT-Field at the right times and endure!"

Denial.

"Dok-seo! Wasn't it enough to just save Lady Adele and make contact with Old Man Scho? What kind of trouble are you causing before the regression starting point?!"

Anger.

"...No, is this the Admin of the Infinite Metagame's doing? Surely not. That's why I thoroughly crushed that bastard and even got a declaration of defeat and surrender. Still. What if Dok-seo fell for the Admin of the Infinite Metagame's whispers and decided to become the god of a new world?!"

Fear.

"Right. Our Dok-seo was a Noh Do-hwa supporter. I neglected the romance part where this old man gets all lovey-dovey with the National Road Management Corps leader too much. Dok-seo. Can you hear me? Are you reading my monologue? Ah, you must be hearing it! Ten cycles. Sure. I'll devote a full ten cycles to the Noh Do-hwa romance route. Huh! This is generous, completely generous! So our Dok-seo, don't do anything else and just save Lady Adele and come here. Okay? Sorry for always pressuring you to write. Our dear author. How about from now on you write just one chapter every ten years?"

Bargaining.

"....."

Acceptance.

"Right."

I had actually known.

"You couldn't accept it, could you."

That perhaps Dok-seo might react this way.

Having helped and watched over that child for countless tens of thousands of years, this was one of the scenarios I could sufficiently anticipate.

However, I hadn't considered this possibility very high.

The reason was simple.

"From your perspective, I'm still a future person you haven't actually met. A character in a novel. Nothing more than an unknown stranger."

Dok-seo was different from me.

The book possessor had a characteristic that was distinctly different from both regressors and reincarnators.

"You and I had no point of contact in reality."

Regressors continued to live by repeating their own lives.

Therefore, even if others couldn't remember them, regressors remembered the bonds and oaths they had made with others.

Reincarnators continued to live by repeating other people's lives.

Therefore, reincarnators had no boundary between self and others. You were someone I once was, and I was someone who would one day become you.

Possessors were different.

For a possessor, there was only one life. The self was the self, and others were others.

"At this point in time, you and I in reality haven't built up any connection. In terms of favorability, it's zero. Even if I generously inflate it, it would be hard to exceed fifty."

She read an interesting novel.

She picked up a mysterious prophecy book.

Even so, to risk her own death for some strange 'old man' who only appeared in lines of text, to move toward a 'happy ending' whose existence was uncertain.

"Would that really be possible?"

The probability was abnormally low.

If there was a gap in my judgment.

"...It's that you're a child far more abnormal than any probability. Dok-seo."

Once upon a time, Dok-seo and I had built a bond where we would think nothing of giving up our lives for each other.

Dok-seo didn't remember that. She had merely witnessed through sentences mixed with her own handwriting that such a thing had happened.

'With just that.'

With only that much, Dok-seo had decided to bet her life on me.

"....."

"An interesting miscalculation."

The one and only Go Yuri who had lifted the championship trophy in the tournament that recorded the most participants in human history smiled warmly beside me.

"Mr. Undertaker. You don't trust ordinary people's memory. Not because you look down on them, but because they truly cannot remember you."

"....."

"You don't expect the impossible from others. You don't arbitrarily expect things and don't arbitrarily get hurt."

Go Yuri said as if humming.

"That attitude is the very foundation of the posture that allowed you to get along with people. Therefore, you naturally didn't expect an impossible achievement from Ms. Dok-seo."

Go Yuri and I were similar.

We both knew well the sensation of hurt felt when others didn't recognize 'past life' or 'previous cycle' versions of ourselves.

"But it seems Ms. Oh Dok-seo was an error, an anomalous human that our attitude failed to account for."

"...Children really don't grow up or act the way I think they will."

"Indeed they don't."

Go Yuri chuckled softly.

"I was hard mode. I lived for eons so long that counting them was meaningless. Mr. Undertaker is normal mode. You lived for tens of thousands of years."

"Right."

"I wonder how many years Ms. Oh Dok-seo will live? Until she reaches that certain summer station on June 17th that will never end."

The cycles flowed on.

Each time they flowed, Dok-seo's name was recorded at the very top of the list of deaths I couldn't do anything about.

'Dok-seo.'

Once, I had hoped that child wouldn't have to bear all the wounds.

'You don't need to save me. This old man is truly satisfied just appearing in the paragraphs of text you'll read, just in the prologue of your story.'

Could my voice be heard?

Even if it could be heard, would it be understood?

"....."

I felt an intense ambivalence.

I hoped that the words I left here and now would be understood by that child someday, if not now.

I believed they would be understood.

But understanding my words meant that child would experience the same wounds I had.

I hoped those wounds wouldn't be too great.

'Do I want them to be understood, or do I want them to not be understood? Well. This is troublesome.'

In the end, my hope had only one destination.

'I hope you become strong.'

To walk strongly.

And strength was ultimately something that could only be obtained by oneself.

The 'prophecy book' and 'strategy guide' that Dok-seo would read contained my life story, my experiences, the record of the failures and mistakes and successes I had gone through.

That was all.

The only thing I could possibly give to this child called Dok-seo was my life.

'I can't become strong in your place.'

I tried though.

Even though Dok-seo kept repeating death until she reached that June summer, I couldn't just stand by and assume she would somehow become strong on her own.

'Could I develop a new time machine ability?'

I tried.

'The black sword that the National Road Management Corps leader made for me has properties that transcend space and time. With that, if I somehow cut out time... could I perform that ultimate technique?'

I tried.

"....."

For hundreds and thousands of years, Go Yuri simply watched in silence with a smile as I struggled to gain new wounds to help that child.

And then I realized.

"Shit. This isn't going to work."

I set down my cane-sword.

The 1183rd regression.

It was exactly one hundred cycles after I had lived through Go Yuri's life. The regressor still hadn't developed any ability to turn back time further.

Those who were destined to succeed will succeed; those who weren't, won't. No matter how desperately I struggled, I lacked the 'talent.'

"I told you, didn't I, Mr. Undertaker."

Go Yuri whispered gently.

"You seriously lack the talent to be wounded. Because no matter how wounded you become, you absolutely never give up."

"...I thought that was my strength."

"All strengths contain weaknesses."

A giggle.

"Originally you had only lost your fellow regressor Emit Schopenhauer. But now you're losing the possessor Oh Dok-seo 'pre-regression' every time too."

"....."

"But from Ms. Dok-seo's perspective it's the opposite. In a 'world without the Undertaker,' Ms. Dok-seo is aiming for a clear. Hmm. Now that I think about it again, maybe it's not exactly easy difficulty after all?"

It might be similar to the difficulty I experienced, Go Yuri breathed.

"Aha. I might be witnessing a brand new possibility."

"What?"

"Like this, Mr. Undertaker keeps searching for someone to seal him away. Since Ms. Dok-seo failed, then the next one. The next one. The next one. But each time, other people somehow struggle to save Mr. Undertaker. As a result, everyone dies before reaching June 17th."

"....."

"So even though Mr. Undertaker regresses, the people around him gradually decrease. First Ms. Dok-seo. Then someone else. Then someone else again. And so eventually... you regress, but no one remains! My word. An ending where only one regressor remains in this world. And that's the result of all of humanity desperately struggling to save one single regressor!"

"....."

"But Ms. Noh Do-hwa will remain."

Go Yuri smiled brightly.

"Because that person will absolutely die trying to save you. She'll just keep living to kill you, left alone in the world."

"Indeed."

I gave a bitter smile.

"That would be the perfect bad ending."

"The destruction of everyone for one person. It's romantic. Mm, I don't think it's bad. If that's humanity's ending, I can accept it."

Go Yuri looked far into the distance at the sunset.

"Now you understand my gamble. Mr. Undertaker. Right now in the situation you're experiencing, I bet on your success in exactly the same way."

"Is that so."

"Yes. Thanks to Mr. Undertaker being competent, thanks to you not giving up, I didn't fail and was able to talk with you like this."

Go Yuri's eyes turned to look at me.

"What about Ms. Dok-seo?"

"....."

"Will Ms. Dok-seo be as competent as you? Will she not give up like you?"

The world perished. Again.

"By any chance, do you have any regrets about entrusting the end of this grand life to Ms. Dok-seo?"

"Mm."

Go Yuri's words were right.

At last, belatedly, I fully understood what state of mind Go Yuri had been in when she entrusted her ending to me.

"I don't regret it."

"Why?"

"No one has read my life story as thoroughly as that child. Everything I could give, everything I couldn't give, it all depends on that child. Even if Dok-seo fails, that would be... well. From my position it would be something to feel sorry about, but I wouldn't resent it or regret it."

"Absolutely?"

"Absolutely."

She lived diligently.

She tried hard.

She didn't give up.

"I'll just wait."

Waiting.

To wait for someone.

That was something quite unfamiliar to a regressor like me who had lived longer than anyone.

A regressor was someone others waited for, not someone who waited for others. It was because I knew exactly what events would unfold going forward.

Where I go, who will be there.

If I go there, someone will survive.

If I don't go, someone will die.

A regressor has a kind of omniscience.

I was an existence that always urged myself forward to get as quickly as possible to the people who would be waiting for my arrival.

Unless you were a regressor-failure like Old Man Scho who just went 'ah, I don't know, anyway if you guys don't do it I'm quitting, good luck' to the world.

'But... I see.'

I understood now at last.

"Waiting isn't so bad either."

"Ahaha. Right?"

"Yeah."

What state of mind had the regressor Emit Schopenhauer been in when he took his life over a thousand times?

Was it stubbornness? Obstinacy? Guilt over finding peace before leaving his comrade behind? Love for his wife? Desperation?

There would be many reasons, but among them I finally guessed there was 'faith in me,' 'support,' 'waiting.'

"If I had given up, Old Man Scho would have understood. Well, we wouldn't have even had a chance to talk though."

"Yes."

"But if he could have somehow received news of my giving up through some miraculous method, Old Man Scho would have felt... sorry toward me, I think."

"Yes."

"We're all pretty much the same."

"Because that's what people are like."

I waited.

At the end of a perishing world, a world without you, I waited for you.

I waited.

I waited.

"....."

"Oh my."

One day.

"Ms. Yu Ji-won died."

"So she did."

"It's strange. There should be a resolve in Ms. Yu Ji-won's heart, a vow more solid than anything, that she absolutely won't die before reuniting with Mr. Matiz no matter what happens."

"....."

Something had changed.

"Yes, Ms. Yo-hwa's death has been confirmed. Hmm. No Void occurred at Baekhwa Girls' High either."

"What's going on?"

"It means the Void that was originally scheduled to occur at Baekhwa Girls' High was triggered early, somewhere else. But it didn't go as planned and the whole party died."

"....."

"But Mr. Undertaker. Haven't you noticed another strange thing?"

"What?"

"Ms. Jeong Ye-ji's telepathy."

"....."

"The messages from the Constellations. We're not hearing them, are we?"

The world continued to repeatedly perish.

People died countless times, and you were included in those predetermined deaths.

The state of the world that 'you' had changed was completely different from the history of regression I had experienced, and even I, who possessed so much experience and 'knowledge of a regressor,' was helpless.

As a result, the situation had worsened even more.

However.

"She's coming."

That too was part of the waiting process.

"One step at a time."

I couldn't hear or see it.

"To this place."

Just as I had done for Go Yuri.

Oh Dok-seo.

When I turned around, that child was approaching my waiting.

Footnotes:

[x] Not sure if anyone noticed so far but AT Field is a direct reference to Absolute Terror Field from Evangelion.

Chapter 421

The Possessor III

Sinnoa

Waiting was the sound of footsteps not yet heard.

"The trail ends here."

"Yo-hwa's cult headquarters, I see."

"Judging from the footprints... hmm. Three people. Ms. Yu Ji-won, Ms. Jeong Ye-ji, and Ms. Oh Dok-seo."

"The crutches would be Ha-yul."

"If it were me, I'd have made Ms. Ye-ji the command center and kept her in the rear. Mm, did they judge the combat power was insufficient for that?"

"...At this point in time, the Saintess's [Time Stop] is weak as can be. But they'd need to mobilize even that level of power to annihilate a cult along with an Outer God."

"Ahaha. What absurd recklessness. Ah, is this why veterans enjoyed watching newbies? How interesting."

Waiting was a message being typed.

"It's Ms. Dok-seo's corpse, Mr. Undertaker."

"....."

"Don't make that sad face. This is the first time across hundreds of cycles that she's reached 'a death that at least left a corpse behind.' To fight an Outer God and leave an intact corpse, isn't that quite an achievement?"

"An intact corpse? Only half of it is left."

"Yes. Whether a corpse is intact is determined only by whether the deceased's will was left behind or not, and ta-da."

"What's that?"

"How unexpected. It's a suicide note hidden in Ms. Dok-seo's corpse♪"

"....."

"[To Mister.]"

[Sorry.]

[If you're reading this letter, it means I'm already dead.]

[Ah, I've always wanted to write a suicide note like this—]"

"That's all there is. The rest of the letter was cut off and disappeared somewhere!"

"....."

Waiting was…

[Ah, I've always wanted to write a suicide note like this. Writing it myself is way more fucking fun than I thought. You should try it too, Mister.]

Just like the sound of a bell that didn't ring.

[Actually, if I die anyway, you'll just defer the ending to the next cycle, so I'm not really thinking much about it.]

[I wondered for a moment whether I should feel sorry about my death.]

[But I've decided not to be sorry.]

[You don't really try to think about the world that remains after you die either, right? You don't pointlessly stress over areas you can't control.]

[I thought that was your attitude.]

[So, if it's good, I'll also—]

A night that was not night.

Though not visible before my eyes yet rising before them, the sound of a fountain pen scratching beneath some lamp.

[So.]

It continued.

[If it's good, I'll try to learn it too.]

The void that exists in this world. The emptiness.

The path cut off before me. The route.

[To me, you're a human being, never a god. Sorry, but I don't have the slightest desire to worship you.]

[A life mortgaged to worship someone is too devastating, isn't it?]

[You have your own life.]

[If the answer you've reached at the end of that life is this moment, if it's to seal Go Yuri and isolate even yourself in lines of text.]

[I'll acknowledge it.]

[But there's no reason anywhere that it should be the end of my life too.]

Breath into a breathless letter.

[I told Ji-won unni and Ye-ji unni too. About your scenario.]

[No comment on how they reacted. That's something you can find out by digging through the unnies' corpses and farming their wills.]

[But just between us, those unnies' personalities are really fucking awful. Why the hell did you form a hero party with people like this??]

[This is why your life went to shit. You idiot.]

Laughter onto a blank page without laughter.

[I persuaded Cheon Yo-hwa.]

The letter gradually grew longer.

[I persuaded Sim Ah-ryeon.]

The locations where Dok-seo's corpse was found, the places where her companions' corpses appeared, began to change little by little each time.

[Go Yuri thought the only solution was to make Hecate into a 'human' called Dang Seo-rin.]

[I respect that judgment.]

[But it's not my judgment.]

[I haven't lived that far yet.]

There were cases where corpses continued to be found at specific points for hundreds of cycles.

[I can't live the same life as Go Yuri. I'm not a reincarnator. I'm not a regressor either.]

[As a regressor, you might have understood the reincarnator Go Yuri's method, fully accepted it, and then agreed.]

[Even while abandoning your own love.]

[But I can't.]

[I can't live that far. Even if I want to, I can't.]

[I'm going to test my own life.]

[Your life without Dang Seo-rin is incomplete. If you consider that incompleteness itself to be beautiful, I'll tell you that my aesthetic is different.]

Gunshots without gunshots continued.

[I'll save Dang Seo-rin. I'll save the Princess of the Night.]

Hecate was an anomaly that even a reincarnator and regressor couldn't dare guarantee victory against in a direct confrontation.

The domain she inhabited was the entire night sky, and all the planets and starlight that moved across the night sky were no different from the witch's limbs.

Hundreds and thousands of corpses lay scattered.

And then.

[I saved Dang Seo-rin.]

Direction was born in the sound of footsteps.

[As a result, Seo-rin ended up becoming an ordinary person without any abilities. I don't know if you'll like a Seo-rin who isn't Hecate.]

[That would be your life.]

[I saved the person I wanted to save, and I don't think your consent is necessary.]

Thud. Thud.

The footprints always disappeared at some midpoint. However, the direction the footprints continued was all too clear.

Toward Busan Station.

Toward the Tutorial Dungeon.

To the terminal of reincarnation where the reincarnator finally arrived, to the starting point of regression where the regressor first began.

"Hee. How curious. How did she subdue Hecate? I'm very interested."

"...She's a child who started with both the reincarnator's strategy guide and the regressor's strategy guide. Her conditions were much better than ours."

"Even so, it's amazing. It's a great achievement."

"Yeah. Well done."

Time flowed.

An era flowed.

Eavesdropping on the waves of those footsteps, I suddenly looked up at the sky.

'Did I perhaps become arrogant?'

The sky was like my only refuge as the Undertaker.

At least when looking up at the sky, I could turn my gaze away, even a little, from the countless corpses preserved in my [Complete Memory].

Like meteor showers, the corpses of raid members falling, only the starlight made of human lingering thoughts, desperate hopes, and will adorned my sky.

"I think I lived a righteous life."

"Yes. I think so too."

"But the world I think of myself, the self I think of myself... perhaps I unknowingly forced it on the children."

"Because you believed."

"That eventually if they were wounded like me, they would reach the same conclusion as me."

"Yes. Mr. Undertaker. Isn't that belief itself beautiful?"

Waiting was continuation.

"The world and self that I think of. The world and self that others think of. Two routes overlapping to form one path. I think that's the only beautiful thing in this world stained with Void."

"....."

"We two are beautiful."

Waiting was showing yourself.

"Only we two in this universe are beautiful."

Waiting was accepting even your misunderstanding as understanding.

"You and I understand each other perfectly. We pursue exactly the same purpose. We overlapped our footsteps. Is there any more supremely pure beauty, any miracle, that exists in the world?"

"....."

I thought there wasn't.

"Perhaps we were wrong."

"Why do you say that?"

"We just happened to become a reincarnator and just happened to become a regressor. Between just us two who happened to exist like that... the most beautiful thing in the world couldn't possibly be established."

"....."

"If it's the most noble beauty, surely even if you're not a reincarnator or regressor, anyone should be able to grasp it."

The letter continued.

The footsteps continued.

"I ultimately understood my story in my own way, and I still believe without doubt that it's right, but..."

"But?"

"Dok-seo has the right to judge my story. She's watched my story more closely than anyone."

If you compare life to a work of art.

Oneself would be both the author and reader of one's life.

However, in a true sense, the 'first reader' could only be one's own child.

"My unavoidable decision might have seemed like an absolutely unacceptable sacrifice to Dok-seo."

"....."

"The conclusion I reached, that she had already fallen into an anomaly with no way to help it and could only seal herself away, might be a wrong answer that Oh Dok-seo must correct."

"That child lacks experience points."

"It doesn't matter. We're all the same."

"....."

"I intend to offer myself so that Dok-seo can judge my life."

I looked back at Go Yuri.

Under the night sky, I cast my gaze at the finisher who had 'understood' all humanity by living through billions of lives in their entirety.

"Haven't you ever thought this sometimes?"

"What thought would that be?"

"Even if we reach an ending, would that really be the end of this world? Perhaps the Void will appear again anytime, a hundred years later, a thousand years later, and 'destruction' will repeat as if it's nothing. Won't it push the world into Void once again?"

"....."

"By that time, Go Yuri, you won't be in the world, nor will I. Without the miracle that is you. Without the miracle that is me, people will have to fight against destruction again."

"It's a terrible scenario."

"But even there, the strategy guide left by a reincarnator and regressor will remain as traces, and the children of Oh Dok-seo's children will exist."

"....."

"I believe I'm right. Still. But Oh Dok-seo can think I'm not right. Thinking about it now... to give Dok-seo that spare room in life."

The void.

"Passing her blank pages where she can write the story about me herself might have been the best choice in my life."

"....."

"O God."

For the first time, I spoke the name of God. Not mentioning Jesus and Buddha and Mo Gwang-seo as a joke, but in a true sense, while looking at the reincarnator who had become my god.

"Please let fortune accompany that child's future."

"....."

"May that child someday accept that I simply did my best in my life."

"....."

"Not a life that's always in pain and twisted by the fact that someone isn't in this world."

I prayed.

"May it be a life that smiles happily with every step walking their own path."

"Ah."

"May that child also someday be able to hand over their own correct answer to another child as a wrong answer."

"....."

"I earnestly pray."

Go Yuri was silent.

That expression twisted for the first time.

In a direction it had never twisted while living billions of lives. Into a face never remembered in my memory.

"I..."

[I figured out how to bloom Udumbara.]

"I'm too late to become human."

[The conditions were incredibly strict. But it's not so impossible that I can't implement it at all. Ah-ryeon unni got a bit weird, but well. That person is always weird.]

[So.]

"I came this far. I threw away all my abilities just to remain human to you. But, is my sacrifice wrong?"

[I'll subdue the Monster Wave.]

"It's not that it's wrong."

"...Will Ms. Oh Dok-seo. That self-proclaimed possessor who's only just started toddling, be able to find a better solution than me?"

"I told you. Your life isn't an answer key. Countless wrong answers are recorded in the search for the correct answer. Looking at the same correct and wrong answers, Oh Dok-seo can reach a different conclusion."

"Mr. Undertaker. You reached the same conclusion as me."

"As I already said, Go Yuri. Not all humans can be like me."

"So I—"

"So I will choose Oh Dok-seo."

[Mister. But why is there so fucking little strategy information specifically for the Monster Wave??]

[The Ten Legs are a type of Hollow, and the Monster Wave is a gathering of Hollows. I understood the fact itself that if you hold memorial services and funerals for each one, it can be cleared.]

[But fuck, isn't this method too difficult?? It's a strategy that only works for someone like you who can 'bring to mind' dead people as if they were living humans right before your eyes.]

[In my opinion, this is too specialized a method.]

"If they enshrine someone like me as a god, the only things left in these children's lives will be regret and sorrow, days of blaming themselves."

"....."

"The same goes for you."

[Thinking about it, the Hollows caught in the Monster Wave are all missing persons, right? Hollows who lost even the bereaved who should hold their funerals.]

[But can't the 'state' also hold funerals jointly for those kinds of deaths? Originally?]

"I don't want Dok-seo to live a life of always regretting because of me. Feeling sorry about me, gathering only with people who feel sorry to me and praising each other as true humans."

"....."

"I'm asking what you hope your children will become. Go Yuri. My god."

[I plan to make Ji-won unni the Undertaker.]

"...Of course."

[Ji-won unni is a priestess of Leviathan, and Leviathan is originally the concept of a 'state' corrupted into an anomaly, right?]

"Of course, I want them to be happy."

[Then Ji-won unni is an agent of the state. In the world of anomalies, she'll be treated even more as such.]

[Naturally, a funeral where Ji-won unni serves as the Undertaker will have the character of 'a funeral jointly held by the state,' I think.]

"I lived diligently for that."

[Isn't it interesting? That Yu Ji-won, a person who cannot be anyone's bereaved and cannot mourn any single person's death, is paradoxically the only human who can hold funerals for all people.]

[It'll be difficult, but I'm going to try.]

"It was a life lived only for that."

"Then you too should open your understanding of yourself to others."

"....."

"That's the only way for us to become happy humans."

I've thought for a long time.

[Hmm. I wonder how delicious your coffee is for the novel to keep going on and on about coffee.]

What is the world? What is life?

[I want to look forward to it, but what if I expect too much and then it's actually not that great when I drink it? I feel like I'll be disappointed, so I'm deliberately trying to lower my expectations.]

[But it's a special cup from a barista who's lived thousands of cycles, so shouldn't I look forward to it a lot? If something exists somewhere in this world with a taste that transcends my consideration, my kind heart, wouldn't that be you, Mister...?]

[Expectations are absent. Expectations exist. Ambivalence is absent and exists. Existence is absent. Absence exists.]

[That rhyme was sick.]

At some point, I thought that I, who had lived more lives and received deeper wounds than anyone, was qualified to define the world and life.

However, I realized after entrusting the ghostwriting of my autobiography to the child called Oh Dok-seo that I too was one world and one life to someone.

The world and life continued like that.

'Chase after me, Dok-seo.'

No.

'Move forward, Dok-seo.'

Your path.

Though you were born slower than me, your steps are faster than anyone's.

Walk stepping on the failures I experienced, the strategy guide I created, my life story.

My life was originally for others, but now it's also for you.

Therefore I wait.

"....."

I simply waited.

"....."

The waiting room of the Busan Station Tutorial Dungeon.

The people who had been summoned to the tutorial along with me were not visible. Fairy No. 264 didn't appear either.

'It's not the Void.'

I realized it as soon as I regressed.

This place was no longer the Void defined under the name of Tutorial Dungeon. It was just an ordinary concrete building from which people had disappeared.

'Someone isolated all the people who should have been summoned to the Tutorial Dungeon somewhere else, and put even the Tutorial Fairy to sleep by some method.'

The Busan Station waiting room was vast and quiet.

Lighting played a major role in that quietness. All the windows, entrances, and gaps through which light could pierce through were covered with thick curtains.

It was dark.

In such a colorless cemetery.

Creeeak.

Slowly, a door opened.

As the curtain was drawn back, faint light began to seep out. The light became a carpet.

"Who did you think would save you, Mister?"

Thud.

With the sound of footsteps.

"The Saintess?"

A voice flowed down whitely.

"Dang Seo-rin? Cheon-hwa? Yo-hwa? Sim Ah-ryeon? Lee Ha-yul? Noh Do-hwa? Yu Ji-won?"

Thud.

"Go Yuri?"

Thud.

"No."

I turned toward the footsteps and voice.

There, Oh Dok-seo's breathing existed.

Dok-seo's hair was long, unlike the her I had known until now.

The color was different too. She had let down long black hair.

"Surprisingly, you never expected it at all."

Chew chew, pop.

Dok-seo burst a cheap bubble gum. She had always failed when trying to make a bubble, but somehow this time a proper bubble had formed.

After smoothly wiping away the gum that had exploded properly for the first time.

"Me."

Dok-seo took out scissors from inside her clothes. The haircutting scissors sparkled silver as they drank in the light seeping from that door crack.

Snip.

Hair scattered in pieces.

As it fluttered, the hair gradually became dyed red from the tip of the scissors.

Soon Dok-seo had long hair. She had returned to being the red-haired girl I knew.

Grinning.

Dok-seo took out a cap and covered her head. Then she spun it around to face backward.

"—I am your salvation, Mister."

She was my epilogue.

The writer who would record the correct answer called me as a wrong answer.

Thus, the being who would connect all wrong answers into one correct answer.

The child I had always waited for.

The person I loved.

Footnotes:

Chapter 422

The One Who Was a Partner

Sinnoa

There was a man named Emit Schopenhauer.

"..."

Schopenhauer opened his eyes.

He didn't bother with something trite like "an unfamiliar ceiling" or anything of that sort.

To be perfectly honest, this German old man was about as far removed from that venerable tradition passed down from the days of Evangelion as one could possibly get.

"I've regressed. Again."

His murmur, so familiar that he could practically recite the concrete patterns on the ceiling by heart now, drifted up like stale smoke into that well-known space above.

The time displayed on the wall clock read 13:58:33.

The old Baekje Hospital building.

While his wife was supposed to be attending some academic conference in Seoul for several days, Schopenhauer found himself too restless to just sit cooped up in a hotel room.

Strangely enough, he was seized by a peculiar feeling that he had lost something in this Korean neighborhood, and that he absolutely had to find that missing item somewhere.

Schopenhauer was a man who lived on impulse.

Even though advancing age had reduced his testosterone secretion, endless strength training and Schopenhauer's characteristic energy had somehow led him to the far edge of the Korean peninsula.

Busan.

"Ah hell, I should've just stayed in Seoul."

Schopenhauer grumbled as he pulled out his smartphone. Without even looking at the number pad, he skillfully placed a call with his left hand.

There was no need to look.

"Emit? What's going on?"

He had never bothered to memorize the digits, but the motion had become familiar after thousands of repetitions.

"I love you, Adele."

"Huh?"

Smartphone performance these days was truly incredible. He could hear his wife's expression souring in real time through the phone line.

Schopenhauer found himself laughing.

The eternal repeating ten-minute life of a regressor. Time that had transformed from a straight line into a wagon wheel, or rather an extremely tiny hamster wheel.

In this hell, this was the only moment when he could let laughter seep into his breath.

"What? Can't I say I love you?"

"No, you're not Emit, are you? A man who's never said such words in his entire life suddenly acting like this? Did you get yourself a French mistress or something?"

"The coffee here is disgustingly terrible. Drinking it made me suddenly want to brew you some good coffee."

"I do like your coffee, but I prefer tea, you know that."

"Tea is healthier than coffee, I'll give you that. Still, can't quit caffeine though. Hell no. It makes all the difference when working out."

Completely pointless conversation.

No grand narrative about how the world would end, how monsters would run rampant, how both she and he would soon meet their deaths.

Nothing of the sort.

"Look, I get that you love exercise, but take it easy. You just had inflammation in your wrist the other day."

"Injuries are badges of honor."

"Oh my. If you earn any more badges, you'll end up a complete idiot, old man."

That was what he liked.

That was enough.

Glancing reflexively, Schopenhauer looked back at the cafe's wall clock. He wasn't sure if it was some recent youth aesthetic or what, but it was an electronic clock with raw bright red fluorescent lamps embedded in it.

'About ten seconds left.'

The red numbers counting down the remaining time until the only being on this earth that he loved would meet her death.

"This won't do."

"What won't?"

13:59:52.

"Next time, I'm definitely dragging you to the fitness studio. You're always holed up in the study reading books, that's why you have a turtle neck."

"Dream on."

13:59:59.

"I hate exercise."

14:00:00.

"I love you, Adele."

"..."

End.

Schopenhauer closed his eyes. Firmly, he pressed the call end button. His left hand holding the smartphone trembled slightly.

That trembling was probably the last heat remaining in the heart of a husband burying his wife.

'What topic should I talk about next time?'

He had already discussed too many things. But there existed someone for whom the topic of conversation didn't matter.

Something that nullified all other existence.

Love. Love, love.

'Oh God.'

A person's lifetime wounds, experiences, judgments, all ravenously absorbed like nutrients, blooming humbly toward the sun that had cast light into his valley, a single flower.

A crimson red spider lily.

'Why have you inflicted such a trial upon a mere human?'

Beneath the bare valley of a desert where nothing remained except a single cluster amaryllis.

The old man was drying up.

'Will the day come when I tire of this love?'

He had never once thought his love was insufficient.

After all, he had died. He was dying. He would die.

For the sole sake of that sixty-second moment conversing with her, Emit Schopenhauer could throw away everything.

'Can I continue like this forever...?'

But the old man had seen far too much to carelessly speak of eternity.

For him, the phone call with his wife was nothing less than a resurrection ritual.

Because he, as a regressor, died, his wife could come back to life. They could talk again.

In this world overflowing with countless awakening abilities, absurdly enough, resurrection and time machines were the only things that didn't exist.

The only passage was death.

For a regressor, death was the only ability that could pierce through a world marked as unbeatable.

'Has that bastard Undertaker still not given up?'

He couldn't know.

Still holding the smartphone from which the call had already ended in his left hand, Schopenhauer searched for a memo pad.

While thinking of his comrade.

'Is it the thousandth cycle? The two thousandth? Maybe it's passed three thousand. Common sense would suggest he gave up too.'

Emit Schopenhauer was afraid.

'Nine times out of ten, he must've been infected by Udumbara and released the authority of regression from his own hands.'

'Then is this world just endlessly repeating June 17th after losing all its regressors...?'

He was afraid to confirm it.

'Even in a world where that bastard existed, we ultimately couldn't find a way to save the world.'

He was afraid to face it.

'How could I possibly do anything alone in this goddamn world full of monsters?'

So he turned his back on the world.

To revive his wife, to escape the tragedy of confirming his comrade's fate, Emit Schopenhauer had imprisoned himself in an eternally repeating ten-minute world of his own making.

'If this is humanity's conclusion, then God, why did you create this world in the first place?'

Schopenhauer began making cafe au lait.

Still believing in the slim possibility that his comrade might not have given up yet, wanting to believe there was still hope for salvation in the world.

He offered the scent of coffee to death.

'Why?'

That was when it happened.

Vrrrrr.

He froze.

Schopenhauer whipped his head to look at his left hand. Then with an expression of disbelief, with gray eyes, he looked at his smartphone screen.

It was vibrating.

The smartphone. With vibration.

[Adele]

Displaying a profile picture of her smiling brightly.

"..."

Vrrrr, vrrrrr.

The smartphone's vibration didn't stop.

Having grown so accustomed for so long to only making calls, the old man who had never received one felt his hair stand on end for a moment.

'A call is coming?'

And from his wife who should already be dead, consumed by the void.

Then was this a call from the afterlife?

"..."

Should he answer? Or not?

Schopenhauer was well aware that anomalies occasionally played such tricks.

Though this was the first time such an incident had occurred during thousands of regressions, wasn't it the nature of those monsters to mock humanity with unpredictable pranks?

It might be a ploy to toy with the heart of someone who had just been separated from their beloved.

No, it was surely a ploy.

"..."

Even so.

"...Hello?"

He had no choice but to answer.

The voice that flowed from Schopenhauer's lips was so thin it surprised even himself.

Neither the wit he had feigned for pleasant conversation nor his ingrained courage could be felt at all.

The old man's voice sounded exactly like a child who had tried to whistle and failed.

"What do you mean, dear?"

Even that voice momentarily stopped.

"Why would you suddenly call and then hang up on your own? Huh?"

It was strange.

He couldn't breathe properly.

"If you're going to blurt out things you've never said in your entire life and then suddenly hang up like that, shouldn't I be worried?"

"..."

"Listen, you're not trying to kill yourself right now, are you?"

At that question, Schopenhauer's voice barely regained its breath.

"No. No, it's not that."

"Then why did you do it?"

"Well..."

Both Emit and Adele, when they were much younger than now, in a past when the two didn't know each other, had each separately attempted suicide.

It wasn't particularly unusual. In his view, the universal language of all nations wasn't music, but suicide: that is, the soundless scream.

"No."

So when Schopenhauer was exposed to his wife's intuition, he had no choice but to look at himself.

'Am I really trying to commit suicide...?'

She was right.

"..."

He had died before. He was about to die now. He would continue to die after.

The person closest to that story should be her, yet somehow it felt impossibly difficult to tell her this story.

Something boiled in the middle of his throat.

What remained in his heart, the residual heat of life that even he hadn't thought would remain to this extent.

"Where are you right now?"

His beloved had ears that could hear soundless screams.

"Right now, I'm in Busan."

"Busan? Wait. That's really far. Hang on."

"No, you have that academic conference, you said you had to attend. Is Seoul okay right now?"

"I don't know. Something big seems to have happened, but what do I care? Do I need a train ticket to get there? Or should I get a plane ticket? Where exactly in Busan are you?"

Schopenhauer was afraid.

Was this a dream?

He had often thought about it for a long time.

He and his wife had never actually come to Korea. They were in their German home.

He had woken up a bit late and came out to the living room, and what do you know, his wife who was supposed to be on a business trip to Korea was sitting right there in the living room eating breakfast.

"Adele, why are you here? Didn't you go to Korea?" he would ask.

"No, I missed the flight. I'm just going to go in a few days," she would say.

Then he would cry and embrace his wife. Thank goodness, Adele. Thank goodness. Thank goodness you didn't go there..

Such thoughts. Bone-deep delusions.

When that imagination returned to reality, Schopenhauer could barely continue speaking.

He should tell her she was a monster, coldly hang up the phone.

But he couldn't bring himself to end the call.

"Be careful coming."

That was all he could manage to say.

"Be careful on the road, and there will be a lot of strange things happening. Don't help other people, just come straight to me. Got it?"

"Okay. See you in a bit."

Click.

The call ended.

"..."

The time had come.

Now the moment to die had arrived.

14:09:45.

A clock that only repeated the past. The baroque spiral that had whispered someone's epilogue forever was slowly approaching the Maginot Line.

To add even a bit of human warmth to that endlessly repeating spiral was the cafe au lait on the table in front of him.

14:09:55.

It was time to die soon.

Undertaker. If that fellow regressor hadn't given up yet, he could finish the tutorial dungeon in ten minutes and arrive here.

The moment that would determine whether there was one regressor remaining in this world or still two was ticking closer.

"..."

The future.

"..."

With these old hands that held nothing but this mobile phone.

He had to decide the future.

'Do I have the right to do so?'

It was a question he had already passed.

'Do I have the power to do so?'

Again, a question he had already passed.

'Do I want to?'

Who did he want to wait for?

"..."

Schopenhauer waited for Adele.

She said she would come.

She was coming, and she would come.

'Ah.'

Because he could wait for one person, Schopenhauer could finally accept time.

'Was I still alive, even now?'

Tick.

14:10:00.

The cafe door opened.

It was a familiar man's shadow.

"..."

"..."

He had become a bit more dependable than Schopenhauer's memories, a bit more solid. For reasons unknown, he also seemed a bit more relaxed.

He had thought such a day might come someday, but now that he faced this day, his mouth wouldn't quite open.

Perhaps it was the same for the man.

The man didn't offer any greeting. He simply pulled out a barista apron from behind the counter seat, put it on, and began making coffee.

Skilled hand movements.

The way he separately heated the milk, his skill in handling the tools, was extraordinary. At least the him that Schopenhauer remembered hadn't been this skilled as a barista.

Thunk.

The man placed a cup of coffee on his table.

It was cafe au lait.

"Please drink, old man."

German.

"..."

The person he had always had to initiate Korean conversations with was now speaking to him in German with pronunciation indistinguishable from a native speaker.

Time had no form. Yet time was someone's barista outfit, German pronunciation, and the aroma of a cup of cafe au lait.

Time had no form, yet it flowed while embracing all clothes, voices, and scents.

Old Man Scho took a sip of the cafe au lait containing time.

"Ha."

Laughter came out.

The man was also smiling.

"How is it?"

"Fuck me, it's damn delicious."

"I thought so."

Listening to the laughter flowing like background music in the shop, Schopenhauer once again savored time.

It was delicious coffee.

Footnotes:

TL Note: IT’S BEEN A WHILE BUT HE’S BACK

Chapter 423

The One Who Was a Skeptic

Sinnoa

There was a person named Yu Yeong-hee.

She was a philosophy professor, or rather, she had worked hard to secure a full professorship in the philosophy department, but ended up as an ordinary person who never ascended to that throne even as she became an old woman.

That ordinary person was called a part-time lecturer.

The failure of this arduous journey proved the fact that reality and games are different.

Looking at her background, she had followed the tech tree of university in Seoul, graduate school at Seoul National University for her master's, and graduating top of her class with a doctorate from a prestigious German university.

If this were a game, she would have been treated as a great scholar who steadily leveled up, but for some reason, in the land of games that was South Korea, she had to face the cold assessment of "Oh my, your tech tree is all over the place? Looks like a ruined character?"

Professor Yu Yeong-hee, a philosopher whose papers were actually cited more frequently abroad than domestically, had no choice but to be repeatedly frustrated in the competition for full professorships, losing to characters who had taken the clean tech tree of Seoul National University, Seoul National University, Seoul National University.

"So this paper is really going to be a huge hit, I'm telling you!"

Even past the age of sixty, Yu Yeong-hee's passion for academics had not dimmed, and one of her life's pleasures was occasionally meeting with friends to chat about philosophy.

"Nietzsche originally wanted to write about Kant for his doctoral thesis. Ultimately, the series of flows from Kant to Schopenhauer, from Schopenhauer to Nietzsche, completed a distinctive metaphysics."

"..."

"Eternal recurrence isn't an idea that just popped out of nowhere, it's a metaphysical conclusion that necessarily derives from accepting Kant's premises. This paper will be a masterpiece that clearly points out this flow that has been far too neglected until now. You know? The world is repeating itself."

Yu Yeong-hee's close friend, an academic colleague who had likewise spent her entire life rotating through part-time lecturer positions, fell silent.

And she set down her friend's masterpiece, that is, the epoch-making paper that was supposed to turn the philosophy world upside down.

"Yeong-hee."

"Yeah?"

"This is the paper you wrote when you got your doctorate."

Sixty-three years old.

Yu Yeong-hee had dementia.

Time passed.

Curiously enough, only part-time lecturer Yu Yeong-hee's time gradually stagnated.

No one, that is, about 99.99 percent of humanity, had any interest in what kind of life this ordinary person named Yu Yeong-hee had lived or what kind of academics she had devoted herself to.

"Hey you fucking bastard! You do it!"

"Aaaaah! Aaaaah!"

Therefore, it was statistically natural that her son and daughter-in-law also belonged to that 99.99 percent.

'The kids are fighting again.'

As her dementia worsened, Yeong-hee stopped receiving even part-time lecturer work.

Originally from a family with nothing, with nothing to their name, yet thanks to her shining talent and the nation's support, she had become reborn as a scholar.

It was an achievement that could barely be accomplished even if a person bet their entire life and all their fortune. Therefore, Yeong-hee had devoted everything to academics.

In return, she had no money.

"What am I supposed to do! Huh?! What do you want me to doooo!"

"Aaaaaaaah!"

What little money she had saved was rapidly depleted.

The son who was supposedly taking care of her wasn't even her blood relation. He was an orphan she had adopted before divorcing some man back when she was younger than now.

'Noisy. My ears hurt.'

Yeong-hee stared blankly at her son over there, screaming and shouting at his spouse, hitting and being hit back.

In that face, she also tried to trace the features of the person who had once been her husband, Jo Yeong-su, who might be anywhere now.

The features wouldn't quite come together. They didn't resemble each other at all in the first place.

'It would be nice if they didn't fight. It's too noisy, I can't read my books.'

Yeong-hee grumbled.

'No, but then again, children are supposed to grow while fighting. The more they do that, the more I need to hold the center of the household properly.'

Heave-ho, Yeong-hee stood up. Then she pulled out a suit from the wardrobe and dressed herself smartly.

When she came out to the living room, her son, already exhausted from the marital fight, looked at her.

"What? Mom, what's with you again?"

"Huh?"

"Why are you wearing weird clothes again?"

Yeong-hee blinked. She was a bit flustered.

"I have to go to work. I have a lecture today."

"No, what lecture?! Mom, you got fired! Four years ago already!"

"Fired? Who got fired? I have a Kant lecture today. It's right before midterms, so I need to give the kids some hints about the exam questions."

"Aaaaaaaah! Get out! Get ouuuut!"

Well, I mean, if I tell you to leave, you should leave, what a sight.

Yeong-hee felt so exasperated she wanted to give her son an earful, but strangely she didn't have the energy for it. She just sighed and quickly left for work.

While waiting for the green village bus on the hillside neighborhood, Yeong-hee suddenly looked up at the blue sky.

'Where was I trying to go? Ah, school.'

Yeong-hee quickly returned home. Because to go to elementary school, she absolutely had to ride her bicycle.

'I could walk but that would take two whole hours!'

Yeong-hee loved her grandfather. She felt that grandfather loved her too. That's probably why he had given her a bicycle, a pretty red bicycle, which he never bought for any of her other siblings.

"Huh? Where's my bicycle?"

Yeong-hee was slightly flustered. The bicycle should have been parked in the house yard, but no matter how much she searched, she couldn't see it.

"Sniff."

She felt sad.

Yeong-hee dearly loved the grassy scent that suddenly came on the wind when she rode her bicycle across the summer dirt roads, that damp grassy smell.

"Why isn't it here? Did grandpa take it? Why isn't it heeere..."

Just then, she heard a voice from behind.

"Grandmother."

"Yes?"

"What are you doing there?"

When she turned around, her granddaughter was staring at her from the boundary of the front gate.

Her pretty granddaughter. The most beautiful child in the world. The person who felt most like family even though they didn't share blood.

"Oh my, Ji-won!"

"Yes, grandmother."

Her granddaughter, Yu Ji-won, bowed her head politely.

"It's hot out. What are you doing outside instead of staying inside?"

"I was looking for your little sister!"

"Pardon?"

Ji-won tilted her head.

"My little sister, you mean?"

"Yes!"

"Excuse me, but grandmother, I don't have a little sister. My parents have only one child, which is me."

"No, you do!"

Yeong-hee's voice rose without thinking. Goodness. No little sister. Her granddaughter was truly truly kind, but sometimes she said scary things.

"There's So-won. So-won. Yu So-won. Your little sister. She can't even walk properly yet!"

"..."

"Our So-won hasn't been around lately. Oh my, your father must have abandoned her. Right? What should we do? Your father and mother must have abandoned So-won. What should we do, Ji-won..."

Yu Ji-won's face as she looked at her grandmother was expressionless. Always.

She examined Yeong-hee with eyes devoid of emotion.

"That's a nice suit."

"Hm?"

"My grandmother is quite stylish. Are you going to give a lecture at the university?"

"Ah, a lecture! That's right! I have a lecture today!"

"Oh dear. It's gotten quite late. At this rate, you'll be tardy. I'll escort you, so please follow me."

"Okay!"

Yeong-hee took her granddaughter's hand and crossed through the front gate, humming cheerfully. She wanted to skip a little, but her body wasn't cooperating today, so she just hummed with her mouth.

The school was right around the corner. Really in the blink of an eye, having crossed just one alley, she arrived at the lecture hall.

Even so, wasn't this a bit too fast? Yeong-hee tilted her head slightly in puzzlement.

"Is this the school, Ji-won?"

"Yes. A school is a place where there are people seeking learning and people imparting learning. Therefore, this place is a more excellent school than anywhere else."

"Ooh."

My goodness! How can our granddaughter be so smart!

Who did she take after? Her father was smart when he was young, but he drinks too much. Her mother's a gambling addict too. Hmm, she must take after me.

What was that called again? Ah, atavism!

"Atavism!"[1]

"Yes, I'm originally rather intelligent."

"Hehe."

"Mr. Matiz, are you there?"

Knock knock.

Ji-won knocked on the door of the lecture hall. Soon after, a shabby door opened.

"Oh, Ji-won. And, um."

Inside the lecture hall stood a solid-looking man. Was he a student? A teaching assistant?

These days at universities, teaching assistants changed so frequently it was hard to remember faces. In the old days, there were many young people who dug deep into their studies for five or six years.

Ji-won went to the man and whispered.

"I'm sorry. I'll ask this of you again today."

"No, what's there to be sorry about? I like studying with grandmother too. Honestly, she's incredibly smart."

"Yes, though unfortunately other people don't seem to recognize that fact."

"?"

Yeong-hee, standing one step away from her granddaughter and the man's whispering, just tilted her head back and forth.

She was about to feel left out since it seemed like she was being excluded, when the man spoke to her very politely.

"Professor."

"Yes?"

"Please wait just a moment. The classroom preparation isn't quite finished yet. I'm sorry it's hot, but if you wait just two minutes, I, your teaching assistant, will get it cleaned up nicely."

"Hm? Ah, yes. Alright, please do."

A moment later.

"Please come in, professor."

The lecture hall definitely had a table and chairs. There was even a plastic whiteboard.

‘Huh, but isn't it a bit small?’

"Did the size of the classroom ever matter for learning, grandmother? Weren't philosophers originally people who couldn't afford to rent space and taught while wandering building corridors?"

"...!"

‘That's true!’

Thinking about it that way, Yeong-hee actually got excited. It felt exactly like returning to those days when, even without money, they would gather in one corner of the campus and discuss academics endlessly for four or five hours.

‘No, it was those days.’

"So, from Schopenhauer's perspective, this thing called time has no beginning. No starting point. It's like reading a book, you know? You can read a book from the beginning or just randomly flip to the middle, right? For Schopenhauer, time is like that."

"Oh."

"This is also discussed in Kant's philosophy. Human intellect cannot determine whether time has a beginning or not. But Nietzsche is different! From Nietzsche's perspective, within the limits of human intellect, the only diagram of time we can imagine is circular! It's cyclical. Repetition. That's why it's eternal recurrence."

Her granddaughter Ji-won and the male teaching assistant listened very diligently to her class.

Sometimes they debated. Sometimes they argued heatedly.

Yeong-hee occasionally got confused about where she was, but strangely enough, when discussing academics, her mind became bright and clear.

She was happy.

"I'm learning so much from you, professor."

"Hehe."

Yeong-hee also liked the man before her.

His name, for some reason, she couldn't remember. But then, she had never been good at remembering people's names since she was young.

"You're as wonderful as our Yeong-su."

"Yeong-su?"

"Yes, Yeong-su. My husband."

College student Yu Yeong-hee smiled gently, intoxicated with happiness.

"I smoke cigarettes, you see. But I deliberately didn't carry a lighter around."

"Why not?"

"So my husband would light it for me without being asked. I'd pretend not to notice, like oh? I didn't bring my lighter? Then Yeong-su-ssi would come over and quietly light it for me. I strangely really liked that."

"..."

"But I quit smoking after we adopted a child. You don't smoke, do you?"

"No, I don't smoke."

"That's good! Cigarettes are really bad for you. I was a chain smoker myself, but smoking makes your head all foggy, you know."

Yeong-hee giggled.

"Mr. Yeong-su must be busy these days, he hasn't been coming home at all. I'm worried. That person has perseverance but no business sense, so if I leave him alone, he's destined to starve to death..."

"Grandmother."

Ji-won took her grandmother's hand.

"Yes?"

"It's time to leave work now."

"Oh my? Look at me. I must have made the class too long! But you know, classes that are exactly three hours long have no warmth. If you have something to say, you should keep going for five or six hours. That's the spirit of academics."

"Ahaha."

The man laughed.

"Please come again, professor."

"Yes! See you next time!"

A few days later.

Her son and daughter-in-law.

The father and mother were nowhere to be seen.

"?"

Yeong-hee tilted her head back and forth and asked her granddaughter if she knew where her father and mother had gone.

Then Ji-won answered calmly.

"They went to Japan for missionary work."

"Oh, did they?"

"Yes. They said they finally got work from the church and left quickly. Mother went with him too. They're keeping in touch by phone occasionally, so don't worry, grandmother."

"Oh my. But they should at least tell me before they go. No wait, when you're young, you're supposed to travel abroad and such. That's good. That's really good."

It really was so good!

She had been quite worried lately because her son and daughter-in-law had been fighting so much inside the house. She was afraid they might end up divorcing like she did.

A stable income leads to a stable mind. If they got work and their wallets became full, the fights would decrease too.

"Hmm hmm."

Feeling so good, Yeong-hee wore jeans for the first time in a while.

Until recently, the jeans hadn't fit well because she had gained some weight. But not this time. She successfully put on the pants cleanly.

'That's right, it's me!'

Today was the day she had a date with Yeong-su-ssi, so she paid special attention to her outfit.

When she looked in the mirror, instead of the weight she had gained, only a gaunt body was reflected. It seemed there was no need to diet.

'Cigarettes... huh, where are the cigarettes?'

She searched for a long time and turned the wardrobe inside out, but couldn't find a single pack of cigarettes.

A poor college student. Still, from Yeong-hee's perspective, having invested her romance in a pack of cigarettes, she felt slightly anxious.

'Ah, but I'll be late for the appointment! I'll buy cigarettes later. I need to leave quickly!'

She rushed to leave, but Yeong-hee tripped over the junk from the wardrobe she had turned inside out and fell.

"Ow!"

It hurt.

Still, Yeong-hee resolutely stood up. Actually, today she had a feeling, or rather a certain conviction, that Mr. Yeong-su was going to propose to her.

'For the past few months, he hasn't been spending money on dates. That man. He's got something up his sleeve. Why is he saving money?'

Hehe, Yeong-hee laughed. Even though her fallen knee hurt so much, she was happy.

'Should I play hard to get?'

No matter how poor, she was an intellectual. Wouldn't turning him down once be the proper role-play?

'But what do I do! If he really proposes, I think I'll cry.'

Tears actually came out. Yeong-hee had difficulty distinguishing whether the tears came from her knee hurting or from happiness.

Whimpering, crawling on all fours, Yeong-hee finally made it out of the house.

Today. It had to be today. There was a reason she absolutely had to go out today.

"Ah."

That reason was right now walking down the neighborhood alley, the gray asphalt road crumbled by the traces of time.

"So-won!"

"..."

Pause.

The woman who had been walking demurely down the alley stopped.

The woman turned to look at Yeong-hee. Surprise spread across her beautiful face.

Regardless, Yeong-hee brushed off her knees and quickly ran over to tightly hug her second granddaughter.

"Oh my, So-won! You were alive. Right? You were alive."

"..."

"I, right? I thought your father and mother had abandoned you! Right? You were such a well-behaved child. You were so kind... You suddenly disappeared, you know? How worried I was."

"..."

Hesitantly.

The woman carefully hugged Yeong-hee.

And stroked her grandmother's shoulder with her cheek.

"I'm sorry, grandmother."

"Hm? Sorry for what?"

"For not visiting you often."

"Oh my. As long as you're alive! As long as you're alive, that's enough, child. Our So-won. How did you grow up to be so pretty? Hmm?"

"..."

"Such a pretty child. A beautiful child... What right do they have to make your life so hard? Why torment a child, torment her. Wicked people."

Stroke.

The woman, Yu So-won, Yeong-hee's second granddaughter, stroked her grandmother's back with slender hands even more slender than the grandmother's.

That touch was good. It was gentle. Yeong-hee smiled broadly. Her mom and dad always scolded her for crying and then laughing, but she seemed to do that every day these days.

"Grandmother, where were you going?"

"Hm? Me? Work! Going to school to give a lecture!"

"Oh my. That's right. Grandmother, you were a very famous scholar. If it's not rude, may I come along too?"

"Yes!"

Yeong-hee took her granddaughter's hand and cheerfully went to work. The granddaughter she thought she would never see again had grown up so beautifully!

She was truly happy.

"It's me."

"Yes, please come... Huh? Professor?"

"I'd like to audit today too."

"..."

"She's also my grandmother, you see."

The man looked at Yu So-yeon.

'Oh my.'

It was just a brief exchange of glances, but Yeong-hee, who had embodied the three sacred treasures of dating experience, marriage experience, and divorce experience, could sense it in that moment.

'What do I do?! Our So-won likes that teaching assistant!'

It was quite troublesome.

'Ji-won likes him too! Yeong-su! What should I do about this?!'

Sisters attracted to the same man. This was practically an old drama she had only heard about in rumors.

She even felt a vague sense of betrayal. She had thought he was just a kind teaching assistant, a young person with an academic passion unlike today's youth.

This backstabbing!

Yeong-hee's expression suddenly became stern as she stared at the man.

"Hmm..."

"?"

"You. I'll be watching."

"???"

Of course, they couldn't talk for long.

Yeong-hee was a part-time lecturer. She had work to do, and she had to proceed with the class quickly.

It sounded truly ridiculous, but…

"So, if the world is repeating itself, that ancient debate, that is, the question of whether humans have free will or are mechanistically determined, is instantly resolved!"

"Wow."

"Because if I perform some action now, and the world repeats, what we've thought of as the horizon of the past is actually also the future. Our present determines the future, and furthermore, even the past!"

"..."

"Why is all of human life determined materially? And yet why do humans still feel their actions are free? This contradiction that seemed utterly irreconcilable is solved quite cleanly just by presupposing the repetition of time!"

For the first time, Yeong-hee liked her profession, that is, the title of part-time lecturer.

For some reason, lecturing about time with one man and one granddaughter before her made her feel that way.

"Determinism and free will theory actually coexisted all along. Nietzsche knew this. Then there's one remaining problem. If you determine your entire life yourself, if the present, future, and even the past are all being determined and determining at this very moment... will you accept such a life, or not?"

From some point on, Yu Yeong-hee's time had been stagnant.

But mysteriously, when looking at that man, and from the moment she reunited with her granddaughter today, she felt time flowing.

"Hehe."

She…

Yeong-hee loved Yeong-su.

She loved Ji-won and So-won.

There was much sadness, but much love too.

The girl was truly happy.

Footnotes:

1 - Atavism is the reappearance of a lost ancestral trait in an organism, like a human baby born with a tail or a horse with extra toes, due to the reactivation of dormant genes from distant ancestors, offering evidence of evolution.

Chapter 424

The One Who Was a Returnee

Sinnoa

There was a man called Hong Bi-cheong.

Hong Bi-cheong was an islander born in Ulleungdo.

Even on the island, his family was particularly poor, so from childhood, Bi-cheong's stomach was often empty.

Growing accustomed to dyeing his hungry stomach with the blue of the sky and the blue of the sea seemed like an inevitable fate for Bi-cheong.

'Is there any meaning to my being born?'

A martial arts novel he stumbled upon by chance gave young Bi-cheong a temporary signpost in life.

'Murim! Chivalry! That's right! Isn't this the very value a man should pursue after being born into this world!'

It was hard to see it as the correct meaning of life.

But to a child in the first place, especially to someone like Bi-cheong who suffered from hunger-induced blueness like a chronic illness, whether meaning was right or wrong didn't matter.

'A single sword! In this age of chaos, the only thing a great man like me can rely on is the sword!'

Every so often, there were those who felt the world around them like a vast ocean from the moment they were born.

They had to grab onto anything within reach, whether it was a ferryboat or a piece of driftwood. Otherwise, as humans who didn't know how to breathe underwater, they would only drown.

"Wait, Cheong-ah. What are you doing holding that staff?"

"Martial arts training! I'm going to become the greatest master under heaven, Mother!"

"Has he gone mad...?"

From birth, Bi-cheong was a castaway, and what he held in his hands was a wooden sword.

No, it was a stick too crude to even call a wooden sword. But young Bi-cheong roamed the mountains daily, training his eye to recognize which random piece of wood was the 'greatest sword under heaven.'

"Cheong-ah, did you finish your homework before doing this nonsense?"

"I'm on the verge of entering the pinnacle realm! Mother! Only by breaking through this barrier can I finally stand tall as a swordsman in Murim!"

"Oh my, our family has been cursed..."

Actually, Bi-cheong's mother's words were wrong. The family had been poor from the start, and there wasn't even room for more curses to creep in.

"I thought he'd do this for about two weeks then quit, but it's already been six years. Six years. He's insane."

"Since he likes swords so much, shouldn't we send him to a kendo dojo or something?"

"I wonder if there even is a kendo dojo in town..."

His mother struggled and struggled to find someone to bring in. There was no place nearby that hung up signs for Haedong Kendo or Daehan Kendo to do business, but there was an old man who supposedly learned the way under someone in his youth.

"What do you think, child? How about learning the sword properly from him?"

"Hmm."

Slide.

Young Bi-cheong examined the 'master' candidate his mother had brought. His gaze was extremely arrogant.

"About that level, I suppose..."

"?"

Bi-cheong's age was thirteen.

It was his second year of middle school.

"A small fry who barely touched first-rate, if that. He's someone who should be learning the sword from me instead. Hmm, not particularly to my liking. But since Mother worked hard to bring him, I suppose I'll take him as my disciple."

"??"

That day, the instructor with certification on Ulleungdo cursed furiously about what kind of mother and son these people were and left.

"You little brat! Living like that, what are you going to eat when you grow up! Huh?!"

"Mother. Making a living is important."

Bi-cheong spoke gravely.

"But soon an unprecedented age of chaos will descend upon the world! Now is the time when martial heroes must each build up their strength in preparation."

"What are you building up on this tiny island?"

"The Heavenly Demon of the chaotic age fears water. Like the Mongols of long ago, powerful on land but uncomfortable crossing seawater. This Ulleungdo is a natural fortress. The final bastion where the Dragon King of the East Sea resides, which even the Heavenly Demon dares not covet."

"Oh god! Damn it! I should just die! Oh! Heavenly Lord! Please just don't let that child starve to death!"

Not long after, Bi-cheong lost his mother.

It was difficult to scientifically determine how much influence Bi-cheong's insane existence had on his mother's lifespan.

Neither Bi-cheong nor his mother herself could know that the scientific cause of her death was lymphoma.

"Mother!"

Bi-cheong's tears scattered dramatically.

"I'm sorry for being such an unfilial son who couldn't serve you devotedly! Please watch over me from beyond the heavens! The filial piety I couldn't give to Mother, I will someday repay to the world through chivalry!"

For a mother who had already married into a poor island family, lost her husband to become fish food, and raised her child alone, this would be maddening, but unfortunately, the dead have no mouths.

Bi-cheong devoted himself to training.

"Dad, what's that person doing over there?"

"Shh. That's our neighborhood's famous lunatic. You must never acknowledge him."

Training!

"Why does that man always work out with weird Chinese songs playing on the radio?"

"You don't even know 'Men Should Self-Strengthen' (男兒當自強)? Haven't you seen the Wong Fei-hung movies?"

"What's that, you nerd."

"Wow. This is seriously not my fault."

Only training!

"I have no idea how that man stays alive without working."

"I observed him carefully for a whole day last time. You know the vegetable garden in his yard? He grows stuff there and strangely, the vegetables look really good."

"Does he have a talent for farming...?"

"So what. He only grows enough for himself."

One day, Bi-cheong met an immortal-like old man in his dreams.

—I am the 260th Sect Leader of Mount Hua Sect.

—I believed there was talent in the East capable of continuing Mount Hua's lineage, and now I see it is indeed you.

—I shall pass on to you the true teachings of Mount Hua!

Gasp.

Bi-cheong jumped up in shock. His whole body was drenched and his hair stood on end.

After a long while, he lamented.

"Huh! What a fateful encounter!"

In a word, it was a pipe dream.

After finishing his ritual cleansing (he had to walk quite a bit since the public bathhouse was in town), Bi-cheong bowed nine times toward Mount Hua in the west.

From that day on, whenever Bi-cheong dreamed, he continued his training within Mount Hua Sect.

"I merely thought it sufficient to wield a sword as one great man. But now that I've inherited the sect's lineage, I can't help but call myself 'this seat'!"

"Hey, what's that old man saying again?"

"I don't know. Just quietly pass by..."

Bi-cheong.

As time passed, he became a man who would buy a noble title from the Sirland Duchy and claim to be nobility.

He had never once been respected by another person. It was natural.

Bi-cheong was poor. He was strange. In the Korean Peninsula to begin with, the very mindset of dedicating one's life to the 'sword' was as alien as seeing an extraterrestrial.

"Hmm."

And then the Void arrived.

"So it begins."

Ulleungdo trembled in fear.

Thanks to the barrier called the East Sea, Ulleungdo's chaos was somewhat orderly. It didn't seem likely that the mayhem happening on the mainland would easily cross the sea.

Bi-cheong, now the Sword Marquess, seemed to be three or four steps removed from the anxiety that had swallowed the island.

"It's about time to leave my hermitage."

His eyes gleamed sharply.

"Eh? What, where are you going?"

"Murim."

"Crazy bastard. Do you know what kind of chaos is happening on the mainland right now? If you go, you'll die. People are dying in droves!"

"Murim."

"..."

"Only the rivers and lakes of Murim."

"Fuck."

The captain of the shabby boat cursed. He vowed to treat the customer before him not as a human but as a living piggy bank that had promptly paid thirty million won in full for the boat fare.

"I'm only taking you because I have relatives I have to pick up from the East Sea. Got it? I have absolutely no intention of docking anywhere else, so get lost on your own."

"That will suffice."

"Crazy old man. What shit luck..."

Creak, the waves rolled.

Let's pull in a different story for a moment.

The fate waiting for the Sword Marquess after coming to the mainland would generally be something like this.

—Oh my, lord Sword Marquess! We've been waiting! Please let us serve you, come this way!

The Undertaker waiting at the East Sea port would prostrate himself before the Sword Marquess and take him to Busan in the blink of an eye.

—Hmm. The ability to grow crops? After seeing nothing but people spouting nonsense all the time, seeing something like this is actually refreshing...

—I look forward to working with you in the future, elder...

A national-level dictator would respectfully address this shabby old man as 'elder' and treat him well.

—Ah. Found you, Grandpa!

—Hm? You know me?

—Of course. I know you well! I'm Oh Dok-seo, and there's a flower you need to grow, Grandpa! It's called the Udumbara, and you're the only one in this world who can mass-produce it! Come quickly, quickly!

—Now wait. This one has things to do...

—Ah, damn! Without Grandpa, the world will end!

Some girl wearing a hat would pretend to be close, hook her arm around the Sword Marquess's side, and drag him off somewhere like a kidnapping.

Truly strange fates.

Befitting the Sword Marquess, who had been evaluated as an eccentric by the world his entire life, the story destined for him was also quite peculiar.

But today, the Sword Marquess escaped that fate.

No, actually, regardless of what fate he was invited to, the final destination the Sword Marquess's blade aimed for existed separately.

When the world had perished after time passed.

Whether that destruction was the 100th, the 1,000th, or the 2,000th, it had absolutely nothing to do with the Sword Marquess.

"Hmm."

Busan, where the final defense line had been annihilated.

The puppet army commanded by Ha-yul had been destroyed without a single body remaining. The witches of Samcheon World could no longer soar, and the warriors of Baekwha Girls' High could no longer advance.

The command staff including the Undertaker had also been killed in action.

Now on the earth, there remained only the flower garden bloomed by the Saintess of the North. The largest garden in the world.

This was the world of the epilogue.

The land of destruction where time no longer flowed.

"At last, the time has come."

Right there, the Sword Marquess walked.

The Sword Marquess, holding a fake sword made of aluminum, crossed the battlefield alone.

—Uuuuurgh, ugh.

—Hee hee hee hee hee.

In the epilogue world, only beings with frozen time were crying and giggling with abandon.

Strangely, they didn't rush at the Sword Marquess when they saw him.

Though they should have been the ones who hated and envied living life more than anyone, they passed by as if they couldn't perceive the Sword Marquess at all.

After trampling the earth with the old man's worn weight, the Sword Marquess finally reached the great enemy he had targeted.

The prey he had aimed for from the start.

For decades, since he realized this world was an age of chaos, the opponent he had constantly marked with his blade was only one.

"Heavenly Demon."

"..."

Thud.

The being summoned by the Sword Marquess's voice turned around. Beautiful pink hair fluttered.

"This one has been waiting for you."

"..."

Glance.

The one called Heavenly Demon looked down at the old man's feet.

The footsteps continued from Busan's Tower of Babel. At each and every one of those footprints, silver-colored grass that had never existed on earth before had been crushed.

"...Stealth grass."

The being with pink hair murmured.

"Grass that vanishes from not only human perception but also from anomalies' recognition. A poisonous plant that even Ms. Ye-ji's Clairvoyance can't detect."

"You knew I would come."

"Yes. Because you almost always do."

"How cunning indeed."

In the middle of the battlefield.

On this land where destruction had already been confirmed, without anyone watching, two beings faced each other.

"Normally I'd play along appropriately, but today I'm also a bit serious, so I have no choice but to ask seriously."

"Good. I permit your question."

"Why do you call me Heavenly Demon?"

The Sword Marquess snorted.

"This heaven. As the demon who corrupted the human heart, all of it originated from you, so how could I not call you Heavenly Demon?"

"..."

"Buddha refers to one who attains enlightenment and exists on their own. Buddha refers to one who is not bound by the wheel of time but raises time itself. Heavenly Demon, Demon King. Mara Papiyasas was originally a phantom of time that tempted Buddha trying to escape from time, so it is the name most fitting to call only you in this world."

"Ahaha..."

The Heavenly Demon laughed softly.

"You knew I refrain from crossing the sea, so you deliberately stayed in Ulleungdo."

"That is correct."

"Though not as much as guns, swords are also weapons that anomalies like to inhabit. Therefore, a fake sword, not a real one. Something both humans and anomalies can't help but look down on as your weapon."

"Precisely so."

"In the end, aura is also a kind of anomaly. Therefore, you never relied on aura from the beginning."

"You know well."

"To kill me."

The Sword Marquess drew his sword.

He discarded the sheath. It had served its purpose.

"Today, here, evil shall perish."

The Heavenly Demon's eyes narrowed.

"I'm human. All humans, in fact."

"Then I must cut down a human."

"I am the enlightened one. A returnee, a Buddha."

"Then I shall cut down Buddha."

"I was your daughter."

"Then I will cut down my own child."

"I'm strong. And even if you kill me, that won't be my end. This isn't the first time we've had this conversation, is it?"

"That would be so."

"No one will acknowledge your struggle. They can't see it. They won't remember it."

"A martial hero does not seek understanding."

The Sword Marquess raised his sword.

"In heaven and earth, I alone am the honored one."

"..."

"This one is the greatest under heaven, the greatest of all ages, the Marquess protecting Yuldoguk, and the direct disciple of Mount Hua Sect's 260th Sect Leader."

The Sword Marquess stepped forward.

"And I am one human born as a mother's child."

They clashed.

The Heavenly Demon was indeed mighty. No human or demon would be sufficient to stop the Heavenly Demon.

But the bloody battle continued all day long.

Every time the Sword Marquess stepped on the ground and shed blood, flowers bloomed in those places.

Though the Saintess of the North had already made the entire world her garden, contaminating it with the Udumbara world tree, somehow, in the places touched by the Sword Marquess's footprints and blood, the Udumbara rotted and died.

Instead, plum blossoms bloomed.

The Twenty-Four Plum Blossom Sword Technique.

In the blade consisting of twenty-four forms, the Sword Marquess imbued time one by one.

One. Plum blossoms bloomed in the ditch that had been infected by Udumbara.

Two. The plum petals scattered like butterflies, dancing and spreading gradually to the surroundings.

Three. The plum blossoms covered the Udumbara with their fragrance.

Four. The petals rode the contaminated world tree from root tip to branch tip, pushing forward as if slicing living flesh with a blade to draw blood.

Five. The plum blossoms covering Busan's world tree drank the falling sunlight and shone brilliantly.

Six. The massive plum blossoms that had now replaced the world tree scattered and scattered again from the world tree's branches cast over the earth.

Seven. The falling petals were numerous and dizzying, but it signified not the chaotic age's full bloom but the end of the chaotic age.

Eight. The petals fell like rain. Nine. The petals tore into nine streams and flowed into the entire world.

Ten. Because the life of a petal was to bloom life while killing itself.

Eleven.

A fragrance that would not disappear even after winter passed.

Twelve. And so, each time the Sword Marquess swung his sword, plum blossoms bloomed from a single ditch.

Thirteen. They spread across the earth.

Fourteen. They clustered in the sky.

Fifteen. Finally scattering across the world.

Sixteen. Forming an endless flower rain.

Seventeen. Just the shadows cast by the petals formed a green river current.

Eighteen. Beneath the flowing current, even the deepest roots of the Udumbara world tree rotted coldly.

Nineteen. The world gladly became drunk on that fragrance.

Twenty. The Sword Marquess felt the fragrance he had bloomed permeate his old bones.

Twenty-one. Finally, even the butterfly dance of the petals that had first formed the ditch subsided.

Twenty-two. The Sword Marquess felt that the blue of the waves that had dyed his heart since childhood no longer felt cold.

Twenty-three. The waves now carried the petals, rolling far, far away.

Let the blue fly. Let it fly high.

Soar into the blue.

And so.

Twenty-four.

The Flying Blue Style.

Ten Thousand Miles of Plum Blossom Fragrance.

May the fragrance of plum blossoms flow for ten thousand miles.

The beginning of that fight, the end of that fight, the multitude of people had no way to know.

No one even knew his name.

At the end of the epilogue. In formless time, he was fighting.

Though it was always a fight that ended in defeat.

In the time crumbling with the fragrance of petals, because the old man always believed in victory.

The waves carrying red flowers were no longer lonely.

Footnotes:

Chapter 425
The One Who Was an Impostor

Sinnoa

There was a person named Kurosawa Touka.

"Touka-chan! Mom's heading out!"

"..."

Sadly, the population that still called her by that name had become an endangered species, with only one person left in the entire world.

In fact, just a few months ago, that population had numbered two.

There had been a woman named Sena. Kurosawa's girlfriend.

And at the same time, the girlfriend of three other women as well.

In her bedroom, Kurosawa muttered while staring down at her smartphone.

"That beastly woman..."

No matter how much she thought about it, this was a breach of contract.

Who could have imagined that her first ever same-sex lover, her first lover period, would turn out to be not a bipedal mammal but a quadrupedal reptile?

So this is why people hate Reptilians. As a member of humanity, Kurosawa had gained a profound lesson.

"And I was the fourth one at that...!"

Even harems had limits.

Who on earth would care about the fourth heroine? If you asked Japanese people to name the fourth most popular political party in this country, they'd answer "Um, the, Communist Party?" in an uncertain voice.

Moreover, when evaluated as a heroine, Kurosawa Touka herself came with a truly splendid array of tags like #mentally-ill, #gloomy, #dark, #jealous, #shut-in, #no-friends, and so on.

She might enjoy cult popularity among the extremely small minority who were afflicted with the incurable disease of sub-heroine worship, but even with their support rallying from their own little league, her chances of winning the election converged to zero.

So Kurosawa chose the method that defeated politicians typically select.

"I'm going to become a shut-in."

Withdrawing from society.

Actually, Kurosawa had expected her choice would create social ripples. After all, wasn't she a victim of a four-way same-sex love affair who'd holed herself up in her room?

And the reaction from those around her was.

"Ah. So it's finally happened."

"?"

Kurosawa's mother accepted her daughter's shut-in declaration with a completely calm face.

"Sure. Rest up. Rest all you want. But after six months pass, you'll need to either return to school or start a part-time job."

"?"

"If you don't get a job, I'm kicking you out of the house. Touka-chan."

"??"

Not the slightest hint of panic!

It was as if, based on physiognomy, she'd determined it was her child's natural destiny to evolve into a room-dweller, as if she'd predicted this situation years ago.

That's right.

Unfortunately, for parents on the Japanese archipelago raising kids these days, shut-in NEETs were no longer an unfamiliar alien species.

The older generation that had been caught off guard and helpless against the "living like human garbage" lifestyle had lost the survival competition and devolved into extinction.

Now only parents who had learned, in a young and MZ way, how to "counter the living like human garbage lifestyle" remained.

"Touka-chan! Mom's leaving for work, so come out and say goodbye! If you don't, no meal money today!"

"I-I'll see you later."

"Yup! Starting two months from now, you'll need to get a job. Better start preparing yourself mentally."

"But Mom, you have plenty of money..."

"That's my money, not yours, isn't it?"

"..."

"The value of labor is sacred. You'll understand once you work. Oh, I'm late for my meeting. I'm off! Love you! Touka-chan!"

Smooch, after planting a kiss on her daughter's cringing cheek, her mother rushed out in a flurry.

Ugh. Left alone, Kurosawa rubbed her cheek vigorously and couldn't help but realize.

'Mom's mental strength is way too strong...'

Today too, Kurosawa retreated dejectedly to her hideout, defeated by the combat power of a single-parent household career woman, former underground idol and current VTuber agency employee.

"Hah."

A two-and-a-half-pyeong private room.

Even the sigh she'd just exhaled had nowhere to escape and circled in the air, but Kurosawa had never once thought this room was cramped.

Was it because of her experience during high school when she'd run away from home and hung around with the Toyoko Kids members, falling asleep curled up back-to-back with each other in tiny hotel rooms?

–Anonymous: This is dangerous. The "Rumored Flower" was delivered to me too.

Or was it because whenever she turned on her smartphone, she could easily feel connected to a much wider world?

–Anonymous: Rumored Flower?

She couldn't tell which it was, but today too, Kurosawa casually took the bait on the message board.

–Anonymous: You don't know? It's a flower that gets delivered randomly anywhere via international shipping, with the sender even paying for delivery.

–Anonymous: Isn't that an urban legend? Can't trust what someone says without proof.

–Anonymous: Look, idiot.

Not long after, a photo was uploaded.

Looking at the image, Kurosawa muttered unconsciously.

"Eh? What is this flower?"

It was a red flower too beautiful to exist in reality.

Kurosawa always thought she had absolutely nothing in common with her mother except for their appearance, but there was one thing.

They shared a hobby of liking flowers and plants.

"Red spider lily... no way. A peony subspecies? No, no. It's too thin. And why is there purple mixed into the petals? Eh. This is definitely an AI photo, right?"

The opinions of the message board users were generally similar.

–Anonymous: Again... Don't you ever get tired of this?

–Anonymous: Stop forcibly importing memes popular overseas like Italian brain rot. It's neither funny nor moving.

–Anonymous: That's impossible. Yesterday a VTuber publicly said on stream they received the "Rumored Flower" too, so it's been noisy everywhere.

–Anonymous: Don't spread around what was said in a members-only stream!

–Anonymous: After animals, now plants. I laughed seeing the thought process of these idiots.

She felt slightly intrigued.

Kurosawa soon browsed various communities using search terms like "Rumored Flower" or "Udumbara."

She even logged into X for the first time in ages, having cut herself off from it completely when she broke up with her girlfriend.

"Wow. What the. It's actually famous?"

Indeed, perhaps she'd been a bit late to the news, as the "Rumored Flower" was already a hot topic everywhere.

"It doesn't seem to be AI... I think."

She murmured.

"Too many different angles for an AI photo. There are quite a few people who've shown their faces to verify it... This is really strange."

Normally, this would be the time she'd dive into the ocean of the internet and devote all her energy to slandering VTubers from rival companies to the agency her mother belonged to, her mother didn't know about this.

"But this flower is so pretty..."

For some reason, Kurosawa found herself focusing all her attention on finding information about the "Rumored Flower."

It was as if she'd been enchanted.

'There must be kids like me who are interested in this.'

She put down her smartphone and turned on her computer.

She dove a bit deeper into the information ocean. Feeling around the tip of the iceberg, she descended to its base.

A little trick she'd learned during her days as a runaway youth.

'Ah, this refreshing sensation.'

It was time to return to being Kuro, the internet detective.

How many hours passed like that?

–Anonymous: They say it's international shipping, but apparently all the sending locations are from Korea.

Found it.

–Anonymous: Korea?

Kurosawa held her breath and tapped away at her keyboard.

–Anonymous: Yeah. Busan in Korea specifically. My lover is Korean, so I asked a local to check, and they found an identical-looking flower at a flower shop somewhere in Busan.

–Anonymous: Proof photo?

–Anonymous: That's impossible. More importantly, it seems like a big-shot Korean politician is involved in this. The mayor of that city called Busan. It's shadier than I expected.

"A politician?!"

What is this? This is really an urban legend.

–Anonymous: I don't understand. Why would a Korean politician be delivering flowers to Japanese people?

–Anonymous: Agreed.

–Anonymous: Maybe it's a bioweapon terror attack or a cult or something?

–Anonymous: As far as I know, no cases of harm have been confirmed. It's too early to be certain, but I think it's safe to say there's no adverse health effects.

–Anonymous: Do you know which flower shop it is?

A slight time lag.

–Anonymous: Dang Flower Garden.

Another time lag.

–Anonymous: It's not just being shipped to Japan. America and China have it worse. Cases are being reported simultaneously all over the world.

–Anonymous: In my personal opinion, the phenomenon itself of fresh flowers spreading this quickly without going through quarantine is strange.

–Anonymous: So my conclusion is that while they look like fresh flowers, they're actually artificial flowers.

Artificial flowers.

Even though they're this beautiful, they're fake flowers?

–Anonymous: Literally the Rumored Flower. No, the Phantom Flower Udumbara.

"..."

That was the end of her information gathering.

"Hah."

Thud. Kurosawa collapsed her upper body onto the table, powerless. The energy she'd spent investigating non-stop for hours had vanished somewhere, and a deep sense of exhaustion wrapped around her entire body.

"So they were just artificial flowers that looked like fresh ones... What a garbage ending."

So that's all it was.

A bitter smile emerged from somewhere.

'It's an ending that suits a person like me perfectly.'

She had no dreams.

Despite having a parent who'd lived harder than anyone searching for their dreams, she herself felt like the wick of a candle that had already burned out despite never having blazed.

She'd wondered if something might change if she experienced love. Thanks to that, she'd probably gained a relationship experience that would never be ordinary, but had her life changed because of it? Well.

Garbage.

'I'm hungry.'

She wanted pizza.

Recently, the genes inherited from her mother had started preparing a rebellion in her belly fat, going "Hmm, the previous owner would burn calories practicing dance and singing around this time, but the new owner doesn't?" But still, pizza was hard to resist.

She ordered Domino's Pizza with the money her mom had deposited that morning.

After a while, confirming that the delivery person's presence had faded, she opened the front door and.

"...?"

Next to the familiar pizza box, an unfamiliar box sat there alone.

"What? Mom's package?"

Can't be helped. Just as she was about to perform the ultra-premium act of filial piety of bringing her parent's package inside herself, Kurosawa's hand froze.

[Dang Flower Garden]

Because those characters were unmistakably written on the box.

"....."

Thump thump thump thump.

Her heart pounded like crazy.

She'd have to start part-time work soon, so she couldn't completely forget how to talk to people, which is why she'd deliberately cultivated a habit of talking to herself, but right now even that habit had its pause button pressed.

"Eh."

Kurosawa quickly brought the box inside as if someone might see. Thud! Then, belatedly realizing she'd left the actually important pizza outside, she hurried to bring in the pizza too, thud.

"Eh."

Pizza wasn't good when it got cold. Hardened pizza cheese was truly the worst crime imaginable. But was pizza important right now?

"Eh."

Kurosawa quickly grabbed scissors and carefully tore through the cardboard box with a crunching sound. Carefully, so that whatever might be inside wouldn't get damaged, with trembling hands.

"Ehhhhhhhh?!"

And she saw it.

"No way?!"

There, a single red flower.

It was modestly inserted in a transparent plastic bottle.

"No way! No way, no way! This can't be! Wow. Is this real? Is it really a fresh flower?! No, no. They said it was artificial."

She touched it.

"It's a fresh flower?!"

She smelled it.

"It smells good! Eh, amazing! What! Did they forcibly add fragrance? No, but... This can't be. I've never seen a flower with a scent like this before!"

It was a perfume crafted from seven colors, a fragrance that had once been permitted to only one person in this world.

But the current Kurosawa couldn't possibly know that.

"Woooow..."

She placed it on the table and, forgetting to eat the pizza, Kurosawa stared blankly at the Udumbara.

"So pretty..."

Why was it?

"Ah, right! A photo! I need to take a photo!"

From the moment she first encountered it in a photo on the internet today, why did her heart keep fluttering whenever she looked at this flower?

"...Huh?"

She didn't really know.

It felt like something very sad had happened.

She'd gone missing somewhere. She'd be unable to meet her beloved mother again. Forever, forever.

Unable to meet forever.

"..."

Unable to say sorry or thank you.

Even though Mom said those words to her every day.

Unable to give back anything similar.

"Um, uh... If I do this, the photo..."

No one could save her.

Even if they wanted to, it was too late.

She wanted to become someone who wasn't embarrassed to say "I love you" to her.

That feeling.

That truly strange feeling, Kurosawa Touka felt it.

"..."

She put down her smartphone.

She took one photo, but didn't brag about it anywhere. Come to think of it, all the friends she could have bragged to had disappeared anyway.

'My flower.'

Kurosawa stroked the petals.

'It doesn't even exist in the world. People call it fake, artificial. But still... this is a flower that came to me. So I can call it whatever I want, right?'

For some reason, Kurosawa felt like she knew the name of those red petals.

'Touka.'[1]

That day.

"Mom."

"Mm. I saw the pizza box, so on days when you eat such heavy food, it's better to exercise. Otherwise you'll gain weight in an instant."

"I want to return to school."

"..."

"And I'm going to study abroad in Korea."

"Eh?"

"Ah, actually I don't necessarily need to study abroad. Um, if you want to work part-time in a foreign country, exchange study is the most convenient. Or I could just get a work visa and go, that's fine too."

"Eh?"

"There's a flower shop there that I really want to work at. I didn't know either... but if it's work related to flowers, I feel like I could really focus on it."

"Eh."

"But first I'm going to check if the flower shop I want to work at actually exists. So I bought a plane ticket to Korea. Departure in one week. Ah. My savings are really in danger now..."

"Ehh."

"If it doesn't work out, I'll just debut as an idol like Mom did when she was young. Your agency is recruiting VTubers this time, right? How about a mother-daughter VTuber? This could really work."

"Eh?"

Kurosawa Touka didn't know.

That she wasn't the only person who had found a red flower in front of their front door, there were several others as well.

One week passed.

Time moved forward.

That day, no one died from their head exploding because they foresaw a future they couldn't handle.

That day, Kurosawa Touka pulled her hood down low and boarded the plane while avoiding eye contact with the flight attendants as much as possible.

That day, the mother saw bright red petals falling in her traveling daughter's room instead of a single plum blossom blooming, and went "Huh?" tilting her head.

That day was…

June 17th.

Footnotes:

1 - The name "Touka (灯花)" uses characters meaning "lamp/light" and "flower," which becomes significant when she names the Udumbara after herself.

Chapter 426

The One Who Was a Reincarnator

Sinnoa

There was someone called Go Yuir.

"Wow, how can someone's name be Go Yuir!"

"?"

"Really. Don't you think Mother was too much? Naming the first child one and the second child two just because they're part of the Yu generation. Her naming sense is practically from the Joseon era. At least it's fortunate the hanja characters are different."[1]

"??"

"But I like it. My brother's name. Go Yuir (高曜日). It can be read as a quiet day, or it can be seen as a high and shining day."

The neighborhood hospital. A funeral.

Yuir, who had been silently handling his mother's funeral alone as a middle school student, was quite flustered.

"Brother...?"

"Yes."

"Uh, sorry, but noona. Anyone can see you're older than me. Aren't you a high school student?"

"Ah! Every time I hear brother call me noona, it makes me so happy. Please call me noona just ten more times from now on."

"..."

If you had to pick just one thing you shouldn't do at a funeral without hesitation, the answer should be resurrection.

However, young Yuir had just realized that 'a mourner you've never seen before claiming to be your younger sister' should also be included on that list.

"Don't be too flustered."

The person before him smiled brightly. It was a smile terribly bad for the heart.

"I'm not talking about this life. It's a connection from our past lives."

"Ah, that kind of setting?"

His mind and body quickly regained stability.

After all, anyone born in South Korea would automatically develop immunity the moment they received information that the other person was a cult member, even if they had none before.

"Ahaha. Brother's expression is amusing."

...But the other party seemed to be quite skilled.

Despite sending out a look that openly treated her like a lunatic, she didn't panic at all and sat down calmly at the funeral altar.

Even if there were no mourners right now, this was extremely rude.

"Excuse me. Sorry to say this when we've just met, but please leave now. If you don't, I'll call someone."

"Don't feel lonely because there are no mourners. One person will come in 3 minutes."

"Excuse me?"

"They're a colleague from the hospital where Mother used to work long ago. The next one will be in 16 minutes. And then in 60 minutes."

"..."

It was true.

"Oh my, Yuir. I saw you when you were just a baby, do you remember this lady?"

"Yes. Of course I remember."

"How did you grow up so properly!"

"Thank you so much for coming to visit."

"..."

What's more, the self-proclaimed younger sister who suddenly appeared naturally greeted the mourners together with him as if it were natural.

But there was something even stranger than that.

It was the fact that both Yuir himself and the mourners felt the sight of this woman bowing beside him infinitely 'natural'.

"Excuse me."

Eventually, after the promised 60 minutes had passed, Yuir had no choice but to ask carefully.

"Noona... Who exactly are you?"

"Oh dear. That's a question with so many possible answers, and yet no answer is possible."

"..."

"It's okay. We have time. No one will come to mourn until tomorrow morning."

The other party smiled gently.

"Shall we talk slowly?"

Yuir suddenly thought that smile was very beautiful.

Time was passing.

Her name was Go Yuri.

"Wow, how can someone's name be Go Yuri!"

"Mr. Undertaker, to remember the line you heard when we first met and come back later to use it as revenge, you're being too petty."

"..."

The honorifics mainly used were 'guild leader' or 'Mr. Undertaker'.

Unfortunately, the Yuir of this timeline hadn't formed a sibling alliance with his younger sister from childhood and committed all kinds of bizarre acts, so he had no immunity to otaku culture at all.

For an ordinary person, just hearing the pronunciation of 'brother' would naturally twist all the energy channels in their body as if they had encountered a spell from the Necronomicon.

For him to re-enter subculture would require time, a great deal of time ahead.

"Moreover, whether we were siblings in a past life or whatever, here you're older, aren't you? Even if you use honorifics, I should be the one using them to you..."

"Urgh."

"?"

"Ah, I'm sorry! Mr. Undertaker. I inadvertently faced the sight of Mr. Undertaker using honorifics to me with brother's face and brother's voice, and my stomach secreted spinal fluid causing a reflex reaction."

"..."

"For my mental health, could you speak casually to me? Oh. And I won't call Mr. Undertaker by your real name whenever possible."

"Why is that?"

"Haah. Mr. Undertaker occupies a really, extremely important position in my master plan. I need to keep your real name hidden as much as possible."

"...Weird girl."

Time was passing.

"Mr. Undertaker, you can do it! Fighting!"

"Kuaaaaa."

"Even when I wasn't born as family, Mr. Undertaker was accepted into medical school. Rather, after losing me as a younger sister, a period of wandering appeared in Mr. Undertaker's timeline and you fell behind. Haah. This younger sister's heart aches... Mr. Undertaker. Please remember the academic passion of your past life, past past life."

"So you're saying it's because of you in the end! I stopped studying from sixth grade of elementary school!"

"Ahaha. That's why I'm making an after-service visit to help like this, isn't it? Come on, if you memorize just a little more, even a perfect score on the college entrance exam isn't a dream. Fighting! Fighting!"

"Give me back my life! Give it back, you culprit!"

Time was passing.

"As I mentioned before, to infiltrate Cheon Yo-hwa's cult, your college entrance exam score is very important. It's a fact no one knows, but the cult leader here has a bit of an education complex."

"...I see. So creating Baekwha Girls' High as an educational foundation wasn't simply for the cult's future. There was also a personal desire?"

"That's just how the world works."

"Huh? What? Why did you pronounce that strangely just now?"

"Geez. This is why muggles are..."

"?"

Tap tap.

– Younger sister (?) / Go Yuri: How are things these days?

– Younger sister (?) / Go Yuri: I think it's going well, but I'm a bit anxious because there's no contact. Is everything alright?

– Me: It's fine. Everything's going well.

– Younger sister (?) / Go Yuri: That's a relief then! You're so reliable as expected. I'll visit you soon.

Ding dong.

"Huhaa. Oh no, this is terrible."

"What is?"

"I just pressed the doorbell, but the button must be stuck because the bell keeps ringing!"

"No. You're a teleporter. Wouldn't it be much more convenient to just move directly into my room here instead of the neighborhood alley?"

"Hmm. I tried that before."

"You did?"

"You cried and begged me to please respect your privacy. I also saw something I really didn't want to see."

"..."

"And I don't dislike it. Walking even a little and knocking on that person's door. It feels like I'm visiting, it's romantic."

"Romantic."

"First, let me praise you. You did very well! The work of instilling humanity in Yu Ji-won here is really difficult. Thanks to what happened this summer, later on..."

Ding dong.

"Eh?"

"Mm."

"Oh, it's Ji-won. Was today's visit scheduled?"

"Sorry, I forgot to tell you. She said she made too much food and would bring some over."

"This is terrible! If Ji-won discovers that Mr. Undertaker and I are alone together right now, she'll kill me and then the world will end!"

"No, there's no way..."

"Yap! Teleport."

"...She uses it well at times like this."

"Hmm. You were a bit slow opening the door today. Mr. Matiz. I thought I heard some conversation from inside just now, was someone here?"

Time was passing.

And.

"Oppa. Wake up. It's morning."

"...I don't know why I have to see your face right in front of me the moment I open my eyes. And I also don't know why I have to hear such a weird alarm sound."

"Oh my. Can you really afford to be so relaxed?"

"Mm?"

"Tomorrow is finally D-Day."

"...Ah."

That day was approaching.

"Yes."

Summer.

D-Day.

June 17th.

"It's regrettable, but tomorrow is the day Mr. Undertaker and I must part!"

"..."

Their time together was preparing for a funeral.

That day was full of strange things from the morning.

"You want to take the train down?"

"Yes. From now on, we might be indebted to this space hundreds, maybe thousands or tens of thousands of times. While you still haven't lost your memories, I think it would be good to take a tour in advance."

"..."

"Come on, Mr. Undertaker."

Yuri extended her hand.

"Mmm. Mr. Go Yuir."

"..."

"Let's go together."

They walked.

Throughout the walk, Yuri held his hand making him feel embarrassed, but in fact there was no reason for Yuir to be embarrassed.

No one was watching them.

No, not even the sound of a 'third party's' footsteps could be heard on the path where Yuri and Yuir were walking.

"Is this also a trick you orchestrated?"

"Yes. Only on June 16th, if I manipulate this and that, I can make the number of pedestrians on this path exactly zero."

"An amazing coincidence."

"Yes! That's why I specifically set the execution date for tomorrow. I really wanted to travel to the destination like this at least once without using teleportation."

"..."

Just like an ordinary human.

From leaving home to arriving at the station, passing through the ticket gate, boarding the train until arriving in Busan.

The two really didn't encounter anyone at all.

Although the world still needed a bit more time before its destruction, it was as if only the two of them were previewing the destruction and walking through it.

"Now that I think about it."

Busan Station waiting room.

Yuir asked her why she had orchestrated their 'first meeting' at his mother's funeral of all times.

Then Yuri gave an awkward smile.

"You were too young then, weren't you? Ah, from my perspective you're still very, very young though."

"So?"

"No matter how mature Mr. Undertaker was from childhood. The task of greeting mourners alone. That's absolutely not an easy thing for a middle school student."

"..."

"People have moments when they wish someone would be by their side. Once, long before now, Mr. Undertaker confessed that you were very lonely and had a hard time back then."

Yuir wanted to ask.

Then do you also sometimes wish someone would be by your side?

"But now you'll remember that day completely differently. Even though it's a sad day when you held Mother's funeral..."

"It's also the day I met you."

"Yes. Isn't it mysterious?"

Grin.

"The way people comfort people isn't ultimately about making sadness disappear. It's simply about adding another memory to it."

"...I see."

"Yes. I'll disappear someday, and Mr. Undertaker is also destined to lose all memories. Nevertheless, before that day arrives, I wanted to give you as many happy memories as possible. Ah."

Souvenir shop.

While looking around a shop where the owner was also 'coincidentally' away, Yuri pointed at something.

"This. The price is incredibly cheap but it's surprisingly pretty."

It was a silver bell.

Since it wasn't a recent product but was released quite a while ago, the price was cheap and there was some dust on it.

Yuri had discovered a product with exactly 2 remaining in the corner of the display.

"Do you like it?"

"Yes!"

Yuir silently picked up the product.

And after placing a ten thousand won bill on the unmanned cash register, he returned to Yuri.

She tilted her head.

"This is?"

"A gift."

"Oh my."

"Since it's the last day, it would be better to give you something more wonderful... But anyway, you've experienced all the luxuries I can't even imagine through countless reincarnations. So."

Squeeze.

While placing the silver bell in Yuri's hand, Yuir covered her hand with his palm.

"I'll give this as a relic of this place that will become our graveyard."

"..."

"According to your 'plan', someday I'll forget you."

"Yes."

"I swear here on this spot."

Casting a glance at the one remaining silver bell in the corner of the display, Yuir looked at her.

"Tomorrow. The day when everything ends and everything begins. Even if I forget you, I will definitely, no matter what happens, take that remaining half of the silver bell."

"..."

Yuri's eyebrows slid together.

"I'm sorry but that's impossible. I've become an irreplaceably precious existence to Mr. Undertaker and so the moment I disappear, Mr. Undertaker will be reborn as an unprecedented multi-awakener. It's all destined fate."

"Right. It would be impossible."

The strength in their clasped hands didn't weaken.

"So this is a kind of test."

"A test?"

"If tomorrow comes and I don't have the silver bell, then what you judged 'impossible' is truly 'impossible'. Everything will flow according to your plan. Both you and I will simply disappear leaving only traces behind."

However, Yuir said.

"If I don't forget."

"..."

"If I've forgotten you but still hold this toy that has no sparkle or nobility in my hand. Couldn't that be seen as a very small miracle?"

If such a thing happens.

"It brings hope."

"..."

"Even if it's a very small hope, it doesn't matter. I hope you'll think, even just a little bit, that something you considered impossible might perhaps be possible."

Silence continued.

Yuir let go of her hand. Left alone, Yuri's hand still held the silver bell he had given her.

"...Yes."

Squeeze.

Yuri took that shabby inventory item. That one bell remaining at this edge-of-the-earth station, unable to endure the person who would believe in it in this world.

She clasped it with both hands and held it against her heart.

"I'll believe."

It was a promise.

"I'll wait."

An oath where the hour and minute hands overlapped to become one.

"Forever."

And then emptiness arrived...

.

.

.

.

.

.

"I am Mister's savior."

Toward the hour and minute hands that had crossed.

"Come on, Mister!"

The second hand, always the youngest and fastest, extended its hand.

While smiling broadly.

"Now let's go save Mister's love together!"

And time arrived.

Footnotes:

1 - Sino-Korean uses 일 (il) for 1, 이 (i) for 2. In Korean culture, each same generation name has a letter assigned to it in each family, in this case “Yu”.

Chapter 427

The Savior Ω I

Sinnoa

The old Baekje Hospital. Café.

Emit Schopenhauer was in high spirits.

Partly because he'd just enjoyed a delicious cup of coffee, but more importantly, the loveliest wife in the world was approaching in real time.

"Now then, Embalmer. I simply must ask because I'm dying to know. Exactly how many cycles have you gone through?"

His voice naturally took on the color of a cheerful rhythm.

To be honest, this whole situation felt like a dream to Schopenhauer.

How could he not be happy when he'd just achieved the most important bucket list item of his life?

"Well, let's see. The cycles I actively went through myself are roughly around 2,000. But if you add them all up, it easily exceeds 3,000."

"Oh."

Schopenhauer's voice remained leisurely soaked in the melody of a happy march.

"I figured I'd gone through at least a thousand by the time I died. I suppose the density of time was somewhat different between you and me."

"That's right."

"How long did you live per cycle?"

"Hmm."

"You don't need to give me an exact number. I'm guessing you lived about five years per cycle..."

"Well, the calculation isn't too far off. About twenty years."

A pause.

"Twenty years?"

"Yes."

"..."

Schopenhauer's gaze slowly turned.

The table across from him.

There sat a man sipping his already cold café au lait. From a first-person perspective, the Undertaker. From a third-person omniscient author's viewpoint, a man called Go Yuir.

"Hmm..."

Schopenhauer set down his coffee cup.

Something trickled down the back of his neck.

A secretion commonly known as cold sweat, designed to be released from the Homo sapiens body primarily when detecting that one is utterly screwed.

"What an amusing joke. If that number were true, wouldn't that mean the equation of 3,000 cycles multiplied by 20 years holds? Haha. Roughly 60,000 years old, you say."

"Ah. It's not quite that much. I took vacations and such. The most recent 1,000 cycles or so, the world ended early. It's 50,000 years old."

"Hmm."

The cold sweat wouldn't stop.

"By the way, old man."

"Y-yes?"

"In human relationships, there must be proper courtesy. That's a fact stated in the words of Confucius, whom you loved so much."

"That's right?"

"The foundation of courtesy is showing respect to those who have gone ahead of you, and in East Asia, that respect is simply expressed through honorifics."

"...And?"

"Might I ask how old you are, old man?"

"..."

Thunk.

Go Yuir set down his porcelain cup and smiled brightly.

"Emit Schopenhauer."

"What?"

"Your tone. Don't raise your tone."

"..."

"Even if I've aged, I've lived at least fifty thousand years more than you."

"....."

"Now then. Who's the youngster here?"

Schopenhauer felt his vision grow distant.

This was a nightmare.

"Come now, swing it properly."

"Ack!"

"I don't have high expectations for you. I'm only asking that you swing the sword correctly. Weren't you supposed to be a swordsman? Are my expectations too high?"

"Ack! No, sir!"

"Your sword path is crooked. Again. You got it wrong again, so repeat it 5,000 more times."

"Son of a..."

"Son of, what? Since my colleague abandoned the world, I've aged all alone and my hearing has dulled. Speak loudly so these old ears can hear you."

"No, sir! Aaaaaah!"

People whispered as they passed through the plaza.

"Mom, what are those people doing?"

"Shh. Be quiet!"

It was still June. A time when civilization was less destroyed and more in the process of being destroyed.

There were still pedestrians walking the streets of Busan. Having to strip to the waist and drip with sweat in front of such ordinary people was killing Schopenhauer.

But the balance of the world must always be maintained.

"Tsk, tsk. Calling yourself a swordsman when you can't even use a sword properly."

Someone's death became someone else's life.

The Undertaker, swordsmanship instructor, was savoring being alive in real time.

"Huh? Like this. Huh? I said swing it like this. Ah, really. Is this difficult?"

"Fuck, it's damn difficult! You bastard! How am I supposed to catch up to a crazy person who's been swinging a sword for tens of thousands of years?!"

Schopenhauer burst out shouting. He still vividly remembered getting beaten for about five minutes after doing this earlier, but he couldn't hold it in.

The Undertaker replied indifferently.

"Then you shouldn't have kept regressing for tens of thousands of years."

"..."

"Do you know why I trained with the sword? Old man. It was all so that in the distant future, when you joined the Regression Alliance, I could personally master and pass on the strategy guide to raise you into the ultimate swordsman. With my heart for you and my faith in you alone, I picked up the sword. And you're saying this is difficult? Good grief. This is why trusting people is utterly useless. What can I do if you say you can't do it? I'll just have to break the sword, I suppose."

"You... son of a bitch..."

Schopenhauer despaired.

No matter how he rebelled, there was no way to win this war of words.

Justification, skill, logic. He was getting crushed in every aspect. There was simply no way to counter the argument of "if you don't like it, you shouldn't have regressed."

"Mister!"

A girl with red hair wearing a cap backwards came running with quick steps. It was Oh Dok-seo.

Paper cups sloshed in both of Dok-seo's hands.

"Here! I got you a caffeine booster!"

"Ah. Thanks. You're the only one I can count on, Dok-seo."

"Right? Yay!"

Clap! Dok-seo jumped and high-fived the Undertaker.

On the surface, an innocent girl.

But Schopenhauer never let his guard down.

Over the past few days, he'd painfully learned that behind that pure smile lurked a streak of madness no less than the Undertaker's.

"Actually, at this point in time, there aren't any Regression Alliance members with deep ties to Mister, right? Cheon Yo-hwa and Dang Seo-rin were originally people Mister should have saved, but I did it first. Mister must be very proud of me, but at the same time, part of your heart must feel like you've been NTR'd..."

"Exactly right."

"But don't worry! Mister! I have absolutely no intention of stealing your heroine candidates! Rather, I'll support you with all my power from the front and back so that mister can NTR me!"

"You... What taste..."

"Ehehehehe."

"Ahahaha."

Crazy bastards.

Something more flowed out from Schopenhauer's head, which already felt like it was losing its mind. Humanity. Or perhaps his soul had taken a leave of absence.

Listening to these two regressors and possessors converse in real time caused his SAN 1 value to plummet.

He'd tried to understand them, but the only truth he'd gained from that effort was that these creatures were human grimoires that drove the reader increasingly mad the more deeply one understood them.

"But how long are we going to keep training that mutt No-sc ho? That old man washed out in the early cycles. Won't we have to invest hundreds more cycles in training if we want to use him now?"

"Well, whatever. It's no big deal."

Really crazy bastards.

Schopenhauer's hand trembled as he swung his sword.

Just one week had already brought this much suffering, and they expected him to repeat this for hundreds of cycles, averaging twenty years per cycle? Was this hell?

'These aren't humans. They're monsters wearing human skin. Only I, who maintains my humanity despite being a regressor, can be the one to subjugate them.'

"Hm? Trainee Schopenhauer. There's no focus in your sword tip. Should I take this as a declaration that you don't want to go home tonight and have dinner with Lady Adele?"

"No, siiiiir!!"

"Depending on your attitude, I can become either the King of Hell or Confucius. What kind of trainee do you want to be when you meet Lady Adele?"

"Wh-what kind of trainee?"

"Are you a No-sho Untermensch trainee who doesn't apply yourself earnestly to training? Or are you a properly squared-away Übermensch trainee, a stalwart of regression?"

Gasp, Dok-seo, who'd been slurping her bubble tea on the side, furrowed her eyebrows.

Her straw was trembling.

"Suddenly hearing that the family of the person I saved is Untermensch drains all my strength. What should I do? I have no strength or energy. At this rate, I might just throw away all my comrades and the world and record the fact that there existed a human who regressed for 3,000 cycles and publish it in Germany. I feel like I'm about to commit the greatest sin as an author..."

Bastards.

Tears welled up in Schopenhauer's eyes.

Actually, the tears Schopenhauer shed were closer to an exaggeration.

At least from the perspective of the Undertaker and Dok-seo, the ones who'd personally bled to forge the strategy routes themselves, it was rather unsatisfactory.

Nevertheless, the reason these two invested time in the shitty game of Swordmaster Maker while indulging the complaints of "kids these days and old folks these days" was simple.

"That old man's authority isn't strictly swordsmanship. It's the ability to cut anything."

"Yeah. Right."

Strategy meeting.

Leaving the old man Scho passed out at their feet after training all day, the Undertaker and Dok-seo were already discussing the next cycle.

"So far, what No-sho can cut is at most the physical reality of the present world. But if he follows mister's training and grows..."

"Looking purely at the authority's potential, he could eventually cut even abstract concepts."

Both of them nodded simultaneously.

"Isn't that a totally broken ability?"

"It is."

This was precisely why the Undertaker had never given up on his former comrade Emit Schopenhauer until the very end.

"Without having to rely on Leviathan's aura, the old man can fight anomalies essentially as if he were an aura user who'd reached the extreme limits of aura."

"Wow. If I had that kind of ability, I'd seriously bow three times a day saying thank you, Mr. Go Yuir. What's No-sho complaining about?"

"That's what I'm saying."

"Grrrk, hrrgh, kkk..."

Occasionally Schopenhauer convulsed even while passed out, but unfortunately, there was no one here to empathize with his suffering.

It hurt because he was an awakener.

"Haah."

Around the time the old man's groans subsided, Dok-seo stretched out both legs and looked up at the night sky.

"It's like... seeing Mister in person and talking like this really feels like a dream."

"...Does it?"

"Yeah. Well, from my perspective, Mister was a character in a novel. A prophet in a book of prophecy. So naturally it feels new."

Dok-seo spoke as if it were nothing.

"It's for moments exactly like this that hundreds and thousands of versions of me died..."

"..."

"Hm? Ah. You don't need to feel sorry. I did it because I wanted to. Rather, I feel bad that I died so much that I kept forcing those twenty-year cycles on mister."

Dok-seo giggled.

"You know what? Actually, Ye-ji unni and I teamed up to secretly peek at mister from the '0th cycle' days from afar?"

"My goodness."

"Even though my schedule was so packed I barely had time for it. I just couldn't help being so curious. What kind of person could it be? What kind of face would the regressor that the past versions of 'me,' the future me, tried to save with a strategy guide written in blood have..."

The night sky that inhaled Dok-seo's breath filled with a bit more moisture, and so the starlight exhaled a slightly more faint sparkle.

The oldest secret in life.

That the twinkling of the stars and the beating of the heart sometimes matched rhythms seemed to fascinate Dok-seo.

"So what was your impression after spying?"

"Ah, that's not him."

Dok-seo turned her head to look at the Undertaker. Her red eyes were a bit intoxicated by the stars.

"The person I want to save isn't that man."

"..."

"I didn't want to save Go Yuir who lost all his memories from thousands of cycles and finally returned to being an ordinary human. I wanted to save a human who walked forward while enduring all that time."

Swoosh.

Dok-seo stroked the back of his hand.

Originally, from the Undertaker's perspective, he hadn't thought much of it.

Even within the Regression Alliance, the Brats' Axis Powers consisting of Ha-yul, Dok-seo, and Ah-ryeon enjoyed considerable freedom when it came to skinship with the Undertaker compared to other members.

After all, their romantic possibilities had broken through the zero percent barrier.

"When I entered the Busan Station waiting room and saw mister for the 'first time,' I was convinced again. Wow. A completely different being from the person I'd peeked at a few days earlier was standing there, wasn't it?"

"..."

But…

'Wait a minute?'

Thump.

The Undertaker sensed something ominous.

'Hold on. Come to think of it, the Dok-seo of the past was a trash author who only kept abandoning her work. But the one before my eyes is a legendary possessor who personally realized a miracle comparable to Go Yuir or me... isn't she?'

The Undertaker had unconsciously been treating the Dok-seo before his eyes as just Dok-seo. The rice moocher who was part of the Brats.

But naturally, Oh Dok-seo from back then and the current Dok-seo held résumés of completely different density.

'The one who recruited all the key figures including Yo-hwa within just about a month, rescued Lady Adele, improved the Udumbara through the Sword Marquess, manipulated Jung Sang-guk, and shipped the awakening ability eraser not just nationwide but worldwide.'

In what way could this possibly be that trash author from back then?

In the first place, this Dok-seo before his eyes had originally had long hair until they met at the Busan Station waiting room.

She'd only performed the act of cutting her hair to still appear as "the Dok-seo the Undertaker knew."

In other words?

A monster who'd farmed experience points in areas the Undertaker didn't know about rather than the parts he did know. That was the current Dok-seo.

"I don't want an ending where Mister vainly loses all your memories and abilities. That's a different person from the mister I want."

Emotions that were hard to describe mixed and dissolved in her red eyes.

"So just like No-sho ran away through regression, I hope mister will abandon any thoughts of running away through salvation or sacrifice early on."

Squeeze.

Dok-seo's grip on the Undertaker's hand tightened a bit more.

"I want the mister you are right now."

In that moment.

'Wait, am I right now. Possibly...'

Inside the Undertaker's head, a very special type of siren that had never once been triggered by the person before his eyes began to ring violently.

'Am I being flirted with? By Dok-seo??'

Alias, Undertaker.

Real name, Go Yuir.

The crisis of a lifetime.

Footnotes:

1 - SAN is short for sanity, it’s used as a shorthand name for sanity based mechanics in games like for example a bar exemplifying how much sanity your character has left.

Chapter 428

The Savior Ω II

Sinnoa

[Dok-seo's Glare attack!]

[It was super effective!]

Spooked by Dok-seo's ominous stare, I hastily threw together whatever excuses I could find and fled without looking back.

A sigh escaped me naturally.

"Life sure isn't easy."

"Ahaha. You're breaking out in a cold sweat. Don't you think the guild leader overreacted a bit?"

Yuri said.

By the way, to mention it again, Yuri was currently equipped with a 24-hour stealth function. In the truest sense, she had become 'one' with me, so she was visible only to me in this world.

"Think about it. Ms. Dok-seo has always kept flirting on the tip of her tongue. Things like 'I'll save you' or 'Only I can understand you.' She's shamelessly been saying things with that kind of nuance all the time, hasn't she?"

The face smiling demurely before my eyes right now, the voice humming with interest, all of it was merely hundreds of millions of Yuris who had seeped into my 'memory' combining to form a single personality. In a way, it wouldn't be entirely wrong to say I was currently suffering from the ultimate dissociative identity disorder, what you might call multiple personalities. It just happened to have the rather trivial feature that the different personalities could communicate freely in real-time.

"So what? If Dok-seo was acting the same as always, where did that ominous feeling I had earlier come from? Was my intuition just acting up?"

"Oh come on, it's obvious."

Yuri laughed softly.

"Ms. Dok-seo hasn't changed. Then the inevitable conclusion is that what changed was Guild Leader."

"What?"

"Guild Leader, toward Ms. Dok-seo."

Yuri deliberately enunciated each syllable as if to leave no room for doubt.

"If you keep staying together like this, you might develop feelings quite different from before, so you sensed that somehow and ran away before that could happen."

"..."

But no matter how well you enunciate nonsense as 'non/sense,' it doesn't suddenly evolve into an apodictic proposition.

"Are you saying right now that I almost fell for that brat Dok-seo??"

"Yes."

"You've finally lost it, Go Yuri!"

"But think about it from their perspective. The people who fell for Guild Leader all started with the same trigger, when they had no hope at all and Guild Leader helped them."

The smiley emoticon on Yuri's face showed no signs of fading.

"Then wouldn't it be the same for Guild Leader? You were all set to wrap things up here. Dok-seo-ssi, whom you didn't expect at all, personally threw herself into helping Guild Leader for hundreds of cycles."

"..."

"When you save someone, they save you too. Ahh. It really is a proverb that's been passed down in the Void for ages."

"I've never heard of such a proverb!!"

Absolutely not, no matter what, I could never, ever admit it!

'Me getting butterflies over Dok-seo? Ha! This self-proclaimed little sister has really lost it. Oh Dok-seo? O-o-oh Dok-seo?! I'd rather date Inunaki Tunnel or Meteor Shower!'

"Guild Leader. I'm parasitizing your brain, so I can hear everything even when you say it in your inner thoughts."

"Respect my privacy a little!"

"Hmm. Well. From the moment you decided to seal your entire life story in a novel and reveal it to the world, hadn't your private life already gone missing?"

"..."

"And Inunaki Tunnel's essence is a young girl, and Meteor Shower's essence is a married woman comforting children. My goodness. I had no idea Guild Leader's tastes were so broad."

"That's just, it's just a figure of speech! I meant I'd rather join hands with anomalies than get butterflies over Oh Dok-seo!"

"You'd only hold hands? My goodness."

"I really can't say a single word to you!"

Yuri chuckled.

"Sorry. But I can't help it. It's a sibling's fate to catch each other's weak points and tease them until death."

"Eh, Undertaker-san?"

Someone called from behind.

Someone Japanese.

I turned around to see a person with black hair wearing an apron, arms full of boxes.

"Ah. Kurosawa."

"Yes, yes. Good evening."

Bow.

Kurosawa Touka, a girl more familiar to me by the slightly shorter nickname Kuro than her full name, hurriedly lowered her head. The work apron she wore had four characters printed on it.

[Dang Flower Garden].

This girl who looked a bit scatterbrained on the surface had, surprisingly, recently stormed into Seo-rin's flower shop alone and made a PR pitch about '108 Reasons Why Your Company Should Hire a Talent Like Me.' Dang Family Flower Garden, which had insisted on K-style nepotistic management, was moved by this new generation's passion. As a result, Kurosawa succeeded in claiming the title of the first foreign worker at Dang Family Flower Garden.

"Are you working this late?"

I smiled.

"It's quite late. Must be hard work for a part-timer."

"It's… It's not just a simple part-time job. I really, truly want to learn this and that from this flower shop. Um. Etto."

"Hm?"

Kurosawa put down the boxes. Then, even though she'd just greeted me, as if that wasn't enough, she bowed again at a 90-degree angle.

"La-last time, for bringing my mother to this village! I'm truly grateful!"

"Ah."

I smiled bitterly.

"Didn't you already come with your mother to say thanks before?"

"Sti-still. I haven't repaid my debt to Undertaker-san yet. Before I repay it, well. Even after I repay it, I need to keep feeling grateful."

Kurosawa's words weren't fast. She didn't seem like someone skilled at interpersonal relationships to begin with. She'd probably lived a life learning more about fermentation methods than methods of opening up her heart to others. Even so, Kurosawa was carefully stitching together the words she must have practiced in her mind countless times before running into me by chance.

"You see. Not long after we arrived in Busan, I heard about the chaos that broke out in Tokyo, and I was so worried. What if something happened to Mom, I thought I'd go crazy."

"..."

"But then I heard that Undertaker-san went to Tokyo and resolved all those things. I cried a lot then."

"Did Seo-rin tell you?"

"Dok-seo-san told me!"

"I see."

Of course, the reason I went to the Japanese archipelago wasn't to save Kurosawa Touka's mother, but to leave an impression on the key figures who would later form the Magical Girl Association. In other words, it was a favorability grind. Bringing Kuro's mother to Busan was just a 'side' quest I accomplished along the way. But every alleyway is someone's front yard. My side quest was inevitably someone else's main quest.

"Arigato Gozaimasu! Tha-thank you!"

"..."

The first thanks was in Japanese, the second in Korean that was still inevitably awkward.

Kurosawa under the night sky.

Suddenly, next to her...

Please give me good luck. Let me avoid all those 'chance misfortunes' like dying from a randomly falling rock.

A corpse, its entire body covered in monkey fur and turned pitch black, stood silently.

This too was a phantom visible only to my eyes in this world. In the distant past, from the moment I picked up the 'Monkey's Paw' in the 444th cycle, this was the fate of a girl named Kuro discovered at the entrance to Seongsan Ilchulbong Peak in Jeju Island.

I'm sorry for being born.

Mr. Monkey's Paw, please make me disappear.

The girl left those words in her diary as her last will before vanishing.

And now before my eyes, instead of an ominous furry corpse, there was a child bowing her head, covered in dirt and the smell of grass from working hard late into the night.

"I'm glad."

"? Yes?"

"Get off work quickly. I've kept a busy person here too long. Give my regards to your mother."

"Ah. Yes, yes! Have a good night!"

Even as Kurosawa left, she kept turning around from afar, bowing multiple times.

When her retreating figure melted into the darkness beyond the seventh streetlight, Yuri spoke.

"She's a good person."

"Yeah."

"The scenery of the route reached by the possessor and regressor joining forces. I think it's not bad."

The situation was much better than before. Even within an endlessly tight schedule, Dok-seo had delivered Udumbara to as many awakeners as possible before June 17th. This Udumbara itself was a subspecies improved by Sword Marquess. Originally, it would parasitize the user's body to grant immortal life in name only, but this Udumbara-Plum Blossom would transform into plum blossoms on its own after a certain period.

"Most of the Monster Waves have been repelled too."

Yuri, naturally reading my mind, chimed in.

"Though some minor problems remain. Those will naturally resolve once we completely subjugate the Great Voids."

"And the remaining Great Voids are..."

"One is White Night, which descended on Seoul not long ago."

Yuri smiled.

"And the other is Dream within Dream. The unconscious underground where I arbitrarily set up residence, borrowing the dreams of all humanity."

"..."

"It's my final sanctuary."

"As you all know, the old man's regression point is around 13:59 on June 17th."

Tower of Babel.

In the meeting room of the National Road Management Corps, established without fail in this cycle too, the members of the Regression Alliance each wore their own serious expressions. The one leading the meeting was Oh Dok-seo.

"And Seoul's White Night. The starting point of the Void descent that turned south of the Han River into a wasteland in one fell swoop is precisely the same day, June 17th at exactly 14:00."

"..."

"In other words, there's only a difference of one minute."

All the Regression Alliance members were listening to Dok-seo's words with utmost care. It was a scene that felt unbearably awkward to me, but for the other Regression Alliance members, this was actually more familiar.

'It's like.'

Glance.

In a corner of the meeting room that no one but me paid attention to, a reincarnator with pink hair stood silently.

'Just as the regressor called me received the baton from the reincarnator who once shouldered humanity's frontline.'

The era flowed forward like a river. Greedily, drinking up the reincarnator's soul and inhaling the regressor's blood. Licking up everyone's wounds without leaving a trace, without any blood, leaving only faint traces of the smell of blood scattered everywhere. Because of that, while time was a river, it wasn't water but a river made of blood at any moment.

"So my role, having prophesied the truth of this world before the mister, is simple. Pave the way before the old man regresses."

Still, this aged old woman had one final mission left before exiting from the era.

"One minute. We have to prevent White Night from erupting in Seoul within just one minute."

Seal all Voids at their source. Only then can the earth return to its original form with no one dying from anomalies.

"It's not just Seoul. We have to subjugate Dream within Dream simultaneously too. That way, within one minute, we subjugate the last Outer God, Go Yuri, who has secluded herself in everyone's dreams."

□.

"Only then will our world be truly liberated from anomalies."

"..."

"The reincarnator's hundreds of millions of years. The regressor's tens of thousands of years. My decades. All those years of toil rest on this one minute of subjugation."

"I have a question."

Ji-won raised her hand.

"I'm aware that a large-scale Void occurred in Seoul. And that it's called White Night. But what kind of Void is it specifically that we need to subjugate it in conjunction with Go Yuri's Dream within Dream?"

"It was an incineration."

The person in question, Yuri, answered. However, Yuri's words didn't reach the meeting. Therefore, Yuri could only participate in the meeting through my mouth. It wasn't strange. That was originally my role as a shaman (ZERO_SUGAR), connecting the divine Realm and human realm.

"Guild Leader is a regressor."

The traces of Go Yuri, the first human to reach the divine realm, spoke.

"The world always resets based on the regressor's standard. But it's not a perfectly flawless initialization. Time always leaves residue. Even if they can't perceive the fact that the world is repeating due to regression itself, faint, sometimes truly faint reverberations remain."

"I see."

Ji-won nodded.

"In terms of anomalies, things like the Infinite Metagame or the Mastermind. In terms of humans, things like prophets or possessors. As regressions repeat, residues that detect that fact accumulate."

"That’s right."

Go Yuri smiled gently as she looked around at her 'unnies.'

"Even for a regressor who's only lived tens of thousands of years, such residues accumulated. What about me, who's repeated reincarnation for over tens of billions of years?"

"..."

"Anomalies and awakeners who detected my reincarnation emerged, like Mr. Sword Marquess's case. Very occasionally. But over tens of billions of years, these occasional instances piled up until they became delusions."

It was troublesome for Go Yuri. The secret of reincarnation being discovered by anomalies was the first problem. And awakeners inferring the identity of the '□' pierced through their hearts, causing the abilities they'd painstakingly awakened to weaken, was the second problem.

"So I decided to gather all this temporal garbage and incinerate it all at once."

"Incineration."

"Erase the traces of the reincarnator itself. So that neither anomalies nor humans can notice. Thus, achieving my victory over anomalies and leaving humanity with an empty wound. That was the purpose of the incineration."

The location of that incinerator.

"South of the Han River."

The very name of that funeral.

"White Night."

Yuri smiled.

"The white night I spread out first to bring the world I dreamed of again and again down to earth."

Dreams and night.

Therefore.

"If White Night misfires, my entire plan collapses. I'll be demoted from just a reverberation remaining in dreams to an actual human who once lived in this reality."

"..."

A quiet air circulated through the meeting room. They fell silent for a moment at the reincarnator's scheme, who hadn't hesitated at any karmic killing to make her plan succeed.

"Right."

Oh Dok-seo nodded in an unchanged tone.

"So we need to prevent White Night from happening, and simultaneously subjugate the Great Void of Dream within Dream. Both are devices sealing the person called Go Yuri."

"In the next cycle?"

"Yeah. In the next cycle."

Dok-seo looked at me.

"And this will be the old man's final regression."

"..."

"No more regressions. No more reincarnations. No more humans toyed with by anomalies, no more earth stained by Voids."

However, Dok-seo said.

"I'm hoping for an ending where Yuri and Yuir still remain as humans in that place where all Void poison has disappeared."

"..."

"You can do it, right, old man?"

"Subjugate the double-sided Great Voids left by the first and final Outer God within one minute."

"Yeah."

"Simple enough."

I smiled.

"I'll show you a senior's skill, Dok-seo."

Current point in time.

The 3,558th cycle.

The regressor embarked on the final regression.

Footnotes:

Chapter 429

The Savior Ω III

Sinnoa

"Strictly speaking."

An old memory.

The first cycle that I had already lost within myself once.

Memories I had barely managed to reclaim by living through the Reincarnator's life exactly as it had been repeated.

"You can't really be called a regressor, Mr. Undertaker."

Yuri and I.

The two of us were the only rebels in the world, rebels plotting a revolution against a fate that had been sealed to end in destruction at the hands of anomalies.

"The only true, 100% pure regressor is Mr. Schopenhauer."

The places where we had our conversations were always back rooms isolated from time, stations where the train had stopped running.

Our language was always cautious, like spies who had infiltrated enemy territory.

"And yet, Mr. Undertaker, you're 'effectively' standing in the same position as a regressor. Isn't that fascinating?"

"Complete Memory."

"Yes, exactly. While this world repeats itself over and over, you simply don't lose your memories."

Go Yuri smiled.

"But to deceive the enemy, you must first deceive your allies. From now on, you'll masquerade as a regressor, believe yourself to be one, and fool both friend and foe alike."

"..."

"In the end, no one will be able to grasp your true identity. Even if some Outer Gods realize that the world is repeating, as long as they can't discern your true name."

True name in both senses.

My original name, Go Yuir.

My original fate, the one who remembers.

"You won't be conquered by the anomalies, doc. Never. Not unless you give up on yourself first."

"..."

"So then, Mr. Undertaker."

Yuri clasped my hand.

"We're the only people in this world who've allowed each other to be conquered."

"...Yuri."

"Yes, Mr. Yuir."

Clink.

The silver bell on her wrist cast a small shadow as it trembled.

"I've entrusted my name to you. And you've entrusted yours to me."

"And you know my identity, just as I will one day live through every moment of your life."

"We are one."

That promise.

"Let's save this world, together."

The silver bell swayed.

In the fate we had conspired against, the world was one that could only exist if both you and I were absent, or if both you and I were present together.

Our martyrdom together was thwarted.

The possessor who inherited our will declared that it was too early for our funeral.

I was merely an ordinary person born with the fate to remember and record the past, but now I thought I might try believing in the future.

True name, Go Yuir.

Alias, Undertaker.

Other aliases.

'Infinite Regressor', 'False Reincarnator', ‘Undateikeo’, 'The One Who Remembers', 'The Sealer of Time', 'The Strategist'.

Schopenhauer's workout partner. Ah-ryeon's guild leader. Seo-rin's gourmet tour companion. Yo-hwa's teacher. Seo Gyu's elder brother. Ji-won's chauffeur. Ha-yul's godfather. Bi-cheong's doormat. The benefactor of the Magical Girl Association. Dok-seo's co-author. Do-hwa's nemesis.

Called by many other names as well.

Someone's family member.

The false regressor was now entering his final cycle.

I opened my eyes.

'June 17th, 1:59 PM.'

Time limit.

'60 seconds remaining.'

The final strategy battle that would determine whether we could save the world completely or not.

I couldn't waste even a single second.

That's why it took not even a moment for me to assess the situation here at the starting point, the Busan Station waiting room.

"Mister!"

The waiting room was dim and gloomy.

The station had suffered a blackout, with all artificial lights extinguished.

It was a symbol proving that this place was no longer the regressor's exclusive domain, but had become a crossroads shared with the Possessor.

"Right away!"

No lengthy explanations were necessary.

Our operational schedule had already been mapped out to the second.

The fact that instead of 399 people randomly summoned to the Busan Station waiting room, our carefully selected strategy team members had taken their places made this abundantly clear.

And…

"..."

"..."

"..."

All the strategy team members were lying down in the middle of the waiting room with their eyes closed, having fallen 'asleep'.

It wasn't just Seo-rin, Ji-won, Yo-hwa, Ah-ryeon, Ha-yul, Gyu, and Do-hwa who had dozed off, the core leadership who had played crucial roles in the Regression Alliance up until now.

Sword Marquess, the Great Priestess, Manyo Neko, Nenet, and others, a considerable number of outsiders were also laid out in rows as if they'd been laid to rest in a communal cemetery.

"Hoeeek."

Around these sprawled people, hundreds of Tutorial Fairies had surrounded them, holding hands and dancing in a circle.

"Is that person the Secretary General that Secretary Oh Dok-seo mentioned, or is it?"

"That's right! No more talking, put him to sleep quickly!"

"Hihiek. There is no paradise in the place you flee to. I thought we'd barely been liberated from the oppressor's rule, but all that waited for us was just another form of violence...!"

Time limit.

50 seconds.

"Hush-a-bye, our baby."

"Mother is in the island's shade."

"Twinkle, twinkle, little star."

Song infused the fairies' dance.

An incantation, the most primitive emptiness for humans, a spell meant to bewitch and lure humans into the dream realm ruled by Baku.

An abrupt drowsiness tugged at my eyelids.

"Catch! Mister!"

Dok-seo threw something.

I snatched it from the air with a swift motion.

It was a silver bell.

"No-sho will join soon too! I'll wait here until that old man arrives and go in together with him! Don't worry! You go first, old man."

I didn't hear what came after that.

My consciousness had fallen into the emptiness disguised as a dream, thanks to the incantation woven together by hundreds of Baku all at once.

But I wasn't worried.

'I know, Dok-seo.'

Just as she trusted me, I trusted her as well.

Time limit.

40 seconds.

'I'm counting on you to handle that perpetually late old man.'

Dive.

And to the next stage.

'I'm leaving it to you.'

The scenery changed abruptly.

"You've arrived, Mr. Matiz."

It was some shabby alleyway.

Just like the '0th station' from moments ago, people were sprawled out in rows in this '1st station' alleyway as well, sleeping soundly.

However, Ji-won wasn't lying on the street but inside a car, sitting in the passenger seat herself, looking at me as I opened my eyes in the driver's seat.

"I've been waiting."

"Why didn't you go ahead?"

"How could I abandon the mission of waiting for Mr. Matiz on my own?"

Ji-won wore a faint smile.

"Everyone's already gone ahead and is waiting."

"I see."

"Yes. Since the flow of time hasn't slowed down enough at this location yet, I, who doesn't need to say much, took charge of this place."

She extended her hand to me.

"Your Excellency."

"..."

"I wish you a pleasant journey."

I took her hand.

It was cold.

Ever since that night when it seemed the rain would sweep away everything on the ground, the body temperature that the girl called Ji-won held had always been cool.

It was because she had hastened to prepare herself to accept another person's warmth.

"It shines so beautifully."

From beyond the car window, above the villas and multi-story houses lining the alleyway, the fairies were singing lullabies in chorus.

"Please go ahead."

Listening to the song instead of the sound of rain, I closed my eyes.

The hands we held curved slightly into a gentle arc.

The smallest circle permitted on this earth.

"Guiding the latecomers is my role too. Mr. Matiz, will you wait for me this time, instead of the other way around?"

Time limit.

30 seconds.

'Of course, Ji-won.'

Dive.

And to the next stage.

"..."

2nd station.

"...Teacher."

It was a classroom in some school, willingly soaked in the evening glow.

We had already rapidly approached a dream within a dream.

Time had long since become distorted, the second hand probably moving at a much slower pace than in reality.

Space had become just as strange, the classroom that existed not in reality but in a dream was warped in some indescribable way, making its size difficult to gauge.

Hundreds of people were slumped over classroom desks, sleeping.

Only one student with orange hair draped down was looking at me with an expression that seemed about to cry.

"I'm sorry, for forgetting."

"It's not your fault, Yo-hwa."

"But both unni and teacher..."

"We all just acted on our own and disappeared from your memory on our own. People who believe themselves to be clever tend to make a lot of mistakes."

Cheon Yo-hwa was regaining her memories.

Was it an achievement Dok-seo had accomplished while conquering the cult?

Or perhaps, as we drew closer to the great emptiness of the dream within a dream, the sediment accumulated there had 'flowed backward' and engulfed Yo-hwa.

'Probably both.'

Oh Dok-seo had persuaded Yo-hwa before June 17th arrived.

And thus obtained even the Baku, crafting a battle plan composed of just 60 seconds.

In the process of rehearsing to realize this operation that bordered on pure gambling, the Yo-hwa before my eyes must have grown accustomed to dreams within dreams countless times.

"I... it's okay if I fail."

"..."

"I'd rather hope the next cycle doesn't come. I've only just gotten my memories back this way, but if the wheel turns again, I'll become the me who doesn't remember you, teacher."

I don't want that.

Yo-hwa covered her face with her hands.

"Really?"

I patted my student's shoulder.

"I want to see you receive your graduation certificate and experience university life, Yo-hwa."

"..."

"It might not be particularly exciting. You've experienced too much already. But the experience of being able to call boring things boring isn't actually that bad."

I said playfully.

"And it would be troublesome if your trademark remains a sailor uniform forever. Don't you want to try some different fashion?"

"Uht..."

"This will be my last cycle."

The classroom bathed in sunset.

Even excluding the seats reserved for latecomers, there was still one empty chair there.

"I'm sorry for continuing to inflict wounds you couldn't remember."

"..."

"Your teacher was clumsy too. Immature. I wanted to do well, but there were many things I failed at. Will you forgive me?"

The birch forest spread out beyond the window swayed, a thousand white shadows melting into the redness.

"Yes..."

The song of that forest was the Baku's lullaby.

"Unni, please take good care of her."

Time limit.

25 seconds.

"Of course."

Dive.

And to the next stage.

"..."

3rd station.

It was not the red of evening but a more primitive red, a mansion drenched in blood.

Ha-yul.

A small-framed girl sitting in a wheelchair had her back turned, looking at the mansion.

[Why are you so late?]

A murder that hadn't occurred in this cycle.

But Ha-yul, already infected by the emptiness poison that had flowed back from the dream within a dream, seemed to find this entire scene familiar.

"The time here is slowed down quite a bit, you see."

[That's your entire excuse?]

"Sorry."

This mansion, which would have originally been located in Fukuoka in reality, had many parts distorted, just like the previous station.

The mansion was a chaotic mess of corridors, doorways, and staircases scattered about like the backrooms.

The people mobilized for the operation were dangling from the ceiling by puppet strings, sleeping in rows like meat in a butcher shop.

The blood flowing beneath them all came from a single person, Jung Sang-guk, Ha-yul's biological father.

[I was thinking about murder.]

As I approached her side, Ha-yul muttered while still keeping her gaze fixed on the slaughterhouse before her.

[If the world is repeating, then in the end, a single murder is no different from thousands, tens of thousands, eons of murders.]

[I hated Jung Sang-guk.]

[But was I hateful enough to kill him for eons, does a sin worthy of that much hatred even exist, I was thinking about that.]

Ha-yul looked up at me obliquely.

[And love too.]

"..."

[Oppa cherished me for hundreds and thousands of times. How can a person do that?]

"Didn't you love me just the same way?"

[I only did it because I couldn't remember. There's nothing difficult about that at all.]

"Even though you couldn't remember or know, once you loved someone that one time, you love them forever, repeating that love through eternity, isn't that wonderful?"

I knelt down in front of the wheelchair.

And matched my gaze to be slightly lower than Ha-yul's.

"I'm always cheering you on, Ha-yul."

[...Oppa.]

"Even when you're hurt, you're the kind of child who asks herself whether this wound should suffer eternally and answers 'no'."

[...]

"When you receive love, you're the kind of child who marvels at how that love reached eternity and rejoices at that miracle. Ha-yul, you have courage stronger than anyone and wonderful love."

Ha-yul was…

[...]

Crying.

She had a body where both crying and laughter were processed as silence.

Because the world couldn't hear those sounds, she had never cried with exaggerated tears meant for others, and never laughed with expressions meant to show off to others.

She had kept a tower built of crying and laughter purely for herself within her heart, and yet still permitted the footsteps of others to climb that tower.

The most beautiful tower in the world had always been built within the heart.

"When this is all over, become independent."

[...]

"Let's go on a trip together."

[Far away?]

"Very far away."

Ha-yul haltingly leaned forward, supporting herself on the wheelchair's armrests.

[Go ahead and wait for me.]

Thump.

The time one person had crossed was contained in a gentle weight that embraced my head.

From the tower of her heart, a soundless song.

A melody longing for that summer day was echoing.

[I love you, Dad.]

Time limit.

22 seconds.

"I love you too."

Dive.

And.

To the next stage.

Footnotes:

Chapter 430

The Savior Ω IV

Sinnoa

The 4th station.

"Ah."

It was a gallery.

"G-Guild Leader... Ehehe."

Once, in the plaza of the Tower of Babel, a makeshift museum of humanity's last art had been cobbled together from whatever materials were available, scraps gathered here and there.

But there was a difference.

Unlike the exhibition that had taken place in the distant past of reality, the exhibition spread before my eyes now was far more vast in its collection.

"Have you been waiting long?"

"Huh? Oh, no."

Sim Ah-ryeon, her entire body smeared with paint, grinned widely.

"By my reckoning, it's only been about sixteen days. Everyone else has already gone to the lower floors... I was bored, so I've just been painting!"

"I see."

"Hehe."

Ah-ryeon approached and wrapped her arms tightly around my waist.

Her paint-covered face rubbed against my coat.

A child who had been born into a colorless world seemed intent on transferring the only equation of color she allowed herself onto me.

"Since there's no one else around, this is really nice."

"..."

"Dok-seo told me. That I'm actually the same in essence as the Udumbara. Mm. While it's an objective fact that I'm as beautiful as a flower, being essentially the same as a plant is pretty weird to hear..."

I smiled.

Whenever Ah-ryeon clung to me like this, trying to infect me with her colors, I would usually brush her hair, but unfortunately, I didn't have my anti-Sim-Ah-ryeon tactical equipment on hand right now.

So I wiped the paint from Ah-ryeon's face with my coat. She flailed her arms, going ah, hwah, fluttering like a startled bird.

"But after coming here and remembering all sorts of things from the past... I understood a little."

"What did you understand?"

"To a flower, the world is just a few drops of water and a few points of sunlight. I think that's about all I want from the world too. In terms of humility, I'm similar to a plant..."

"That's a lie."

"Eh?"

"You don't just want water and light, you crave incredibly sweet nectar and the most pleasant sunlight. You little thing. The most greedy flower in the world, that's what you are."

"Ah, ah, aah."

Ah-ryeon was helpless against my cheek-squishing offensive.

"Mmm..."

A silly sound escaped from her mouth, something like hwihii.

"This is nice after all..."

It was the sound of her burrowing deeper into me, pushing a syringe all the way into my lungs.

"What is?"

"Why the old me, why 'they' would go so far as to kneel before Guild Leader, act like a saintess, and commit something tantamount to suicide. I understand now."

"..."

"I wanted to know."

Squirm.

The tens of thousands of works hanging in the exhibition hall, all the paintings that the artist Sim Ah-ryeon had created across past and present lives, began to drip colors like poorly applied paint, falling drop by drop.

"When I die. Even knowing I'm dying, struggling until the very end, I wanted to know what emotions Guild Leader would feel then."

"..."

"I wanted to know, I wanted to feel it. What color that emotion would be, I was so curious. Honestly, it was hard to resist."

"I'm always amazed by how consistently you treat me like an all-you-can-eat buffet, Ah-ryeon."

"I can't help it! Guild Leader is my water droplet and my sunlight."

"..."

Squirm, glurk. Squirm.

Viscous colors gathered around us, flowing through the gallery corridor.

"Most people probably won't understand. To a flower, water droplets and sunlight are prey. They're something to hunt... But they're also everything in the world. They're god."

Does a flower love sunlight?

"People will probably condemn a believer who devours the flesh of their god as blasphemous... But actually, isn't everyone like that? Everyone devours the juices of the world. Every single day."

Can one understand a flower's love?

"And yet... they live without even knowing what they like, or how they like it. Hwe. Strange people..."

"Your thorns are too poisonous."

"Ehehe..."

Ah-ryeon bit my nape with her teeth. It was neither an act of predation nor a gesture of intimacy.

A sunflower was tilting its head toward its sun.

"I won't die anymore."

Ripples spread from my shadow.

"Because now I know."

All the paint that had dripped from the gallery gathered into my shadow, forming black.

Not the black that was darkness because nothing existed, but the black that was darkness because everything overlapped.

Ah-ryeon's voice sent ripples toward my heart.

"For watering me every single day, without skipping even one day... For dropping sunlight into my shade every day, mm..."

Ah-ryeon looked up at me.

A smile, the smallest and most radiant ripple a person can spread into this void.

Without laughter in that place, the sky blue wouldn't have been so boundless.

"I was happy! G-Guild Leader."

Time limit.

21 seconds.

'I was happy because of you too.'

Leaving my heart with someone who didn't need an answer, once again.

Dive.

And on to the next stage.

"..."

It was the Underwater Shrine.

What should have been a dilapidated house located in Dongbinggo-dong, Yongsan, Seoul, but the place before my eyes was a mixture of that house and the undersea cafe of the Inunaki Tunnel.

"Welcome, Mr. Undertaker."

The Saintess sat neatly as always, no different from any other cycle, dressed in comfortable clothes suitable for activity.

"The floor I'm in charge of is the fifth layer of the mind realm. Since you've arrived here safely, you should be quite free from the time constraints outside now."

She immediately brought up the operation upon meeting.

I almost laughed.

Like the other companions, the Saintess must have had memories of past cycles flowing back, but this was so very like her.

"The children are each guarding a layer. Is this Dok-seo's thoughtful arrangement?"

"Yes. But it's also to prepare sentinels in advance in case anomalies appear blocking the passage midway."

Kyarururu.

No sooner had the Saintess finished speaking than a little girl ran through the eerily spacious Underwater Shrine.

Woof! Woof!

A large dog that had no form, only a shadow remaining, chased after and ran ahead of the little girl in play.

It was the primal spirit of the Inunaki Tunnel.

"...As you can see."

The Saintess cleared her throat.

"The closer we get to the divine realm of the dream within a dream, the more distorted the shape of the place becomes. Time is warping too."

"That's only natural. Go Yuri has relived the lives of hundreds of millions of people. Unlike ordinary people, time for her is endlessly layered."

"...Just like it is for Mr. Undertaker."

"That’s right."

"..."

"..."

The Saintess rowed through silence.

Each person was a ferryman of a boat facing a tumultuous sea. The tongue was the first oar cutting through those waves.

When the wordless wind couldn't push everything forward, everyone had no choice but to row their oar through their own waterway.

"Um, the Silver Bells..."

But the route chosen by this skilled boatwoman was in a direction even I found difficult to predict.

"Shouldn't I return them?"

"Pardon?"

Slowly.

The Saintess averted her gaze.

"They're proof of the promise originally made with Ms. Go Yuri, right?"

"..."

"I don't think it's right for me to have such a precious treasure."

And as the Saintess pulled down her sleeve, wouldn't you know it, there were the Silver Bells, jingling and sparkling.

'Good heavens.'

In other words, even though the Saintess had recalled the memories of the 267th cycle where she sacrificed herself to seal the outer god Nut...

Her first reaction wasn't an expression of gratitude or apology, but rather the question, 'These Silver Bells seem to have a rightful owner, don't they?'

It was truly extraordinary.

Even if the universe were endlessly vast, it would be hard to find a capital T this large.

"Please take them, Mr. Undertaker."

"..."

Leading with emotional appeals here would be the mark of an amateur.

As someone who had graduated with an A+ even through the advanced course of Saintessology 101, I needed to properly drive the opponent into logical confusion.

"I understand."

I nodded.

"But have you consulted with the Saintess of the 267th cycle before making this decision?"

"...Pardon?"

"No matter how memories reverse-flowed from the dream within a dream, they're ultimately nothing more than incomplete afterimages. Those Silver Bells are something I gifted to the Saintess of the 267th cycle, and the right to decide how to handle them belongs entirely to the Saintess of the 267th cycle."

"..."

"Can we truly say that the current Saintess perfectly represents the Saintess of the 267th cycle? Hmm. I'm only concerned whether you, Saintess, can freely dispose of a gift that doesn't even belong to you."

The Saintess made a blank expression.

"But I think it's disrespectful to Ms. Go Yuri."

"Go Yuri employed all sorts of means to awaken you as a powerful awakener."

The Saintess hesitated.

Beyond the Underwater Shrine, outside the undersea tunnel that surrounded it, the shadows of sleeping people were falling like fish shadows.

"When she became your younger sister and died before your eyes, she deliberately staged her death in an isolated warehouse, ensuring you couldn't contact anyone, making a show of it."

"..."

"When she became your childhood friend, your only close friend, the sole passage to the outside world, she carefully removed each of your fingers clinging to the cliff edge of the world. Meticulously."

I paused for a moment.

After letting the fish shadows cross our faces a few times.

"Is there really a need to be courteous?"

"..."

"If you feel you owe each other nothing, then in the end, you can only ask yourself what you want to do."

I smiled.

"What would you like to do?"

The Saintess closed her lips.

It was as if the fish shadows were opening and closing their mouths in her stead.

"...I received this without knowing."

"I gave it to you without knowing either."

"I think it was wrong."

"Even though it was a mistake made without knowing, it's difficult for you to forgive, is it? Yourself, Saintess."

"Yes."

"Your younger sister, childhood friend, best friend, they all committed wrongs while knowing."

"..."

"Will you be unable to forgive them?"

A brief silence.

"...No."

The Saintess shook her head.

"I... can forgive them."

"Why is that?"

"Because in the end, it was done for people. Not just in words but in actions. Not just with one life but by dedicating all their lives. Because they walked the path they thought was best."

"I see."

I nodded.

"Then please forgive yourself a little for the mistakes you made in the past without knowing."

"..."

"If Go Yuri can be forgiven, there's no reason you can't be forgiven."

I placed the Silver Bells the Saintess had removed back on her wrist.

"Ah."

"I hope that Ms. Saintess will be just a bit more generous toward your own ignorance, just as much as you are toward others."

"...Toward myself."

"Yes. There will be people who won't forgive. There will surely be moments where even you find it hard to forgive yourself. But even then, I will forgive you before anyone else."

"..."

"Just as you did for me."

Jingle.

I looked at her while covering the Silver Bells hanging on her wrist with my right hand.

"Will you accept it?"

"..."

Hesitation.

And then, firmly.

"Yes."

The Saintess smiled like a blooming flower.

"Remembering various cycles... I realized something."

"What is it?"

"That what I lack is courage."

The soundless clamor of the sea. Around the path laid on the uncrossable seabed, waves endlessly crashed.

If you only knew the way across, the waves were no longer drifting currents but merely waterways that stayed in place.

"Just waiting for something is meaningless. You have to approach first. Mr. Undertaker gave me that courage."

"Ah, then I'm gla—"

The current quietly resonated.

The fish shadows no longer passed long between the Saintess and me. The gap between us had become too narrow for that.

Just now, she had pulled on my wrist and kissed me.

"..."

I was so surprised my eyes widened.

Those widened pupils were clearly reflected in the pupils right before me.

Without withdrawing her lips, the Saintess...

[Just as Mr. Undertaker advised.]

...spoke only through the passage she had pierced with her own wound.

I felt the shadows of the waterways descending into the Underwater Shrine wrap around my consciousness.

[Yes, I did what I wanted to do.]

Time limit.

20 seconds.

[From now on, I'll be waiting for Mr. Go Yuir's answer.]

Dive.

[This time, I won't wait too long like before.]

[See you soon.]

And.

On to the next stage.

Footnotes:

Chapter 431

The Savior Ω V

Sinnoa

"Oh, you're here?"

"Oh, you're here?"

The 6th station.

That place was a flower garden.

A place where only the rustling of falling petals could be heard. The Garden of Fallen Flowers, where even in death the fragrance remained.

And the Dang Flower Garden, where Dang Seo-rin had spent time with her family.

Two landscapes overlapped.

"..."

Of course, the appearance was quite removed from reality.

The sixth layer of the heart. Now there was only one layer left until the dream within a dream's deepest layer.

If this place, which had no choice but to be thoroughly steeped in the Void Poison, resembled reality, that would have been more cause for concern.

"...Dang Seo-rin?"

But the scenery before my eyes seemed to transcend the simple dimension of "the space is bizarre."

"Yeah."

"Yeah."

Seo-rin, no.

Two Seo-rins answered simultaneously.

The situation was as follows. Different versions of Seo-rin were reflected on my right and left retinas respectively, cunningly overlapping at the center.

"A bit bewildering, right? I feel the same."

The Seo-rin on the right was tending to violets drooping their heads in the Garden of Fallen Flowers.

The navy blue shadow cast by the sunlight from the glass window caressed the withered and twisted petals, and that had now become the violet's new color.

"A bit bewildering, right? I feel the same."

The Seo-rin on the left was caressing a corpse pierced through by tree branches in the Dang Flower Garden.

The collapsed ceiling of the building. Starlight poured down endlessly. Seo-rin seemed to be holding a funeral service with the Milky Way of the night sky.

"..."

Overlapping yet not overlapping.

I could immediately understand what these two layers of scenery existing simultaneously meant.

"Seo-rin as a human. And... Seo-rin as Hecate coexisting."

"Right."

"Right."

The violet cast a shadow, and the corpse dripped blood.

""Originally, eliminating Hecate and leaving only human Seo-rin would be the route Oh Dok-seo has chosen until now.""

""But that brat, when it came down to the very end, I guess she changed her mind this time.""

""She's saying you should be the one to have the choice, isn't she?""

A hollow laugh escaped me.

"That's really... such a Dok-seo thing to do."

Seo-rin also giggled.

""Really, isn't she way too fourth-dimensional? Sometimes when I talk with her, I end up tilting my head like 'Huh?' 'Did I mishear something?'""

"Ahaha."

I laughed along with Seo-rin, but how could I not grasp Dok-seo's true feelings?

Placing one of my connections at each staircase descending into the dream within a dream.

This held meaning beyond simply handing over the choice to me.

'It must be a gift for me.'

That's right.

This current situation was truly like a dream for me as a regressor.

No matter how carefully I had crafted armor to protect my mental state, how could I not be affected at all while experiencing my memories with companions resetting with each regression?

I thought it foolish to develop the habit of digging into unavoidable sadness.

So I had simply applied ointment repeatedly to prevent flesh from forming over the wounded spots.

"I roughly get yours and Dok-seo's idea. In short, it's a golden axe silver axe operation."

""Hm?""

"Now I decide whether the Seo-rin I truly loved was the personality inherited by the Outer God Hecate, or the human Seo-rin. Then I just need to take one of their hands after making that decision, right?"

""Ahahaha. You got it!""

Day and night mingled in midair.

""Actually, Dok-seo was the first to come up with the idea, but I thought, what would be the point? No matter how much I thought about it, I could only see the ending where you'd choose both of us.""

"A cliché from folktales."

""I'm confident, you know. Whether I'm an anomaly or not, I'm confident you'll see me as Seo-rin exactly as I am.""

It was well-founded confidence.

Because the path we had walked, the countless cycles, the log of conversations we had shared, all provided the basis for her confidence.

"Then you'll understand this too."

I smiled.

"Seo-rin. Actually, the choice doesn't lie with me, it lies with you."

""Huh?""

Seo-rin tilted her head.

""What do you mean?""

"Seo-rin."

I looked at the Seo-rin on the right.

Still completely human, contaminated by the memories of an Outer God but not yet united with the Outer God.

I looked at the Seo-rin who was still alive on June 17th.

"Those memories you feel you've regained now are actually the past of some Outer God that replaced your soul."

"..."

"You don't need to unconditionally consider that as your life. No. It wouldn't be strange if you found it unpleasant instead."

"..."

"The massacre of your entire family was planned by a being called Go Yuri. You were forced to make a wish. And by the anomaly that responded to that wish, your life was completely mortgaged."

I spoke calmly to her eyes, taking care not to mix in any exaggeration.

"You have the right to reject this future, this past, all of it as belonging to someone else and not yourself."

"..."

Then I turned my head.

The Seo-rin on the left.

Still completely an Outer God, who had foreseen the end of being demoted to a human, but precisely because of that, could refuse that conclusion.

I looked at Hecate, who had not lost her name even on June 17th.

"Seo-rin."

"...Yeah."

"Guild Leader."

"...Yeah."

Hecate hesitantly opened her mouth.

"...Vice Guild Leader."

"Well. I don't know what it feels like for an Outer God to transform into a human. For someone who only responds to wishes to become the wish itself is a bit too abstract for a Homo sapiens like me."

"Ahaha. What are you saying? You're more anomaly-like than any anomaly."

"Wow. Then Samcheon World was ultimately an anomaly organization after all. The Guild Leader, the Vice Guild Leader. No, thinking about it, isn't Ji-won also the priestess of Leviathan?"

"Whoa. That guild dominated the Korean peninsula? And even our rival Baekhwa is the same? Korea's done for, seriously."

We laughed side by side.

"You can still refuse."

"..."

"From your perspective as a former Outer God, humans might be nothing but utterly insignificant creatures. Even if you refuse, I have no right to stop that choice."

"Why?"

"In the end, I'm Go Yuri's accomplice. I'm one of the culprits who dragged you as an Outer God down to earth."

"..."

She closed her mouth.

I waited until the silence melted into day and night. Only then did I ask the sun and moon.

"Will you accept being an anomaly?"

First to the sun placed on the left.

"Will you accept being human?"

Then to the moon placed on the right.

"...I, uhm, I."

Seo-rin, dyed in the sun's shadow, opened her lips.

"I don't think it's a particularly important question. After all, why. People's cells all get replaced, right? Anomaly or whatever, if it's my personality then it's me."

Treating an anomaly like mere cells?

No, well, cancer cells are still cells. It wasn't wrong, so a laugh escaped me unintentionally.

Seo-rin looked straight at me.

"If I deny these memories, I'll lose all the traces I walked with you, the traces I would have walked. I don't want that."

That was the human's answer.

I nodded and looked at the other side.

"..."

Hecate, soaked in the starlight of the night sky, opened her lips.

"What you said about humans being insignificant creatures compared to an Outer God's authority. You're wrong."

A smile hung on her lips, hehe.

"An Outer God has nothing but themselves. Most humans are like that too, but... at least the life I've lived and ended up living was different."

Hecate reached out her hand.

Squeeze. My left hand was grasped.

"Undertaker! I'm truly glad I got to know you as a human being!"

"..."

"I'm sorry for dying first. Thank you for keeping my promise every time. Every day, for trying to be by my side... Thank you. You are..."

Squeeze. My right hand was grasped.

"Go Yuir."

"Undertaker."

The left and right Seo-rins, which had been separated with a slight gap, simultaneously pulled me toward them.

""You have always been like magic to me!""

The sun and moon overlapped.

The rotten and crumbling fallen flowers accepted the crimson and bloomed fully, and the tree branches that had only corpses hanging on them were embroidered with petals and blossomed in full.

"When the latecomers come down, I'll follow along."

With a smile. Holding the earliest blooming flower that a human could produce, Seo-rin whispered right before my eyes.

It was a song that always flowed in my heart.

"By the way, I think Ha-yul is really pretty! Oh, but Oh Dok-seo is a bit… Sim Ah-ryeon too."

Time limit.

20 seconds.

"When today is all over, let's talk!"

Dive.

And.

To the next stage.

"..."

It was quiet.

The 7th station.

The terminal station.

Although time and space should have been mixed up more arbitrarily here than anywhere else, what spread around me was just the Tower of Babel plaza wrapped in silence.

"Hmm?"

Clang.

Noh Do-hwa, who had been working on something with tools, turned around.

Black eyes that weren't hidden even by deep dark circles scanned my face.

"You're here? You're ridiculously late..."

"Director Noh Do-hwa."

"Well, you'd call me that. Though it's a bit awkward since I in this current cycle haven't actually founded the National Road Management Corps or anything..."

"Where did the other raid members go? How about the Sword Marquess old man? Seo Gyu?"

Thump.

I approached her while looking around.

"And why is Director Noh Do-hwa standing guard on the most dangerous seventh layer?"

"It's difficult to answer when you throw multiple questions at once. You bastard."

"..."

It is Do-hwa alright.

"First, the other members are over there, peacefully knocked out inside the Tower of Babel, so rest assured..."

Clang.

Do-hwa hammered at her work.

"As for your next question. I don't understand it myself either, but it seems I have a trait that doesn't get contaminated by the Void Poison even if you drop me here in the dream within a dream..."

"What?"

"You didn't know? Well. Since this is the latest information we obtained while going in and out of here, it makes sense you'd be slow on the update..."

The corner of Do-hwa's mouth twisted.

"Oh Dok-seo said something. Ah. Apparently the very fact that I've never been corrupted throughout all cycles is considered like a trait in itself, so I don't seem to be affected by the dream within a dream..."

"Whoa."

An exclamation flowed from my mouth. I was genuinely surprised, for what it's worth.

Do-hwa continued hammering while speaking.

"Thanks to that, whether it's the sixth or seventh layer. I'm perfectly fine no matter how long I stay in the dream within a dream. So Team Leader Yu Ji-won, who has similar immunity like me, is in charge of the entrance to the passage, and I'm in charge of the exit..."

Thinking about it…

In the regression alliance that was almost entirely bustling with Outer Gods or priestesses of Outer Gods, Do-hwa had always performed the role of anchor.

And Do-hwa had never once betrayed her own humanity.

'...If there's something that doesn't change even while thousands of worlds repeat, then that's already no different from a law. She became a law that doesn't crumble even when entering the deepest void.'

It was truly a remarkable achievement.

But if I expressed my respect, only non-combustible trash would be discharged from Do-hwa's facial muscles, so I changed the subject.

"What have you been making since earlier?"

"Ah, this... Heu."

Do-hwa grabbed the work and showed it to me.

There were two things that looked like arms, two things that looked like legs, and one thing that looked like a head attached to it.

In short, it was a doll.

"It's you..."

?

"What?"

"You. You. Your alias is Undertaker and your real name is... what was it again? Anyway, both your alias and real name are fucked up."

"Is that a personal insult??"

"I've had my entire life insulted, so isn't this level of statement permissible? You bastard."

"No, anyway. Me? This doll?"

I had no choice but to look at her with a face containing 100% pure bewilderment.

"There's even not just one doll but two, three, four, five, six, seven... No. Really, how many are there? Why are there so many dolls?"

"It's a commission from Ms. Oh Dok-seo..."

Dok-seo?

"When this quest ends successfully, your body will be split into at least five or six pieces, so before that happens, she told me to use doll clone jutsu in advance to make Undertakers..."

"..."

"So I made them. Collaborating with your daughter Puppeteer. Well, there's still the ontological contemplation of whether this is really the Undertaker or not. Don't worry though. If I cut off the limbs prettily and attach them, it'll work..."

"What??"

"My ability is prosthetic production, isn't it? Originally it's an ability to replace lost limbs, but apparently the opposite is also possible. If I attach arms, legs, limbs, necks, and heads one by one to connect them, I can make them become the real 'that person'..."

I couldn't recover from the shock.

"Ah, no. Wait. There's too much to point out here. First of all, my legs? My legs are two. I'm not a centipede."

"I know that..."

"To replace all the legs of the dolls placed here with my real legs, I'd have to evolve into a human centipede, so by what means are you going to fill up all the materials!"

"Sim Ah-ryeon..."

Flinch.

"If you cut it off, get healed and it grows back, then cut it off again, get healed and it grows back, isn't that enough..."

Silence.

"No. Limbs aside. What about the brain?"

My earnest rebuttal.

"The head? No matter how amazing Ah-ryeon's healing ability is, regenerating even after the head is blown off is really not easy."

"Goodness. Who's extracting the head all at once? I'm not an idiot."

"Whaaat?"

"You just cut off the brain a little bit, heal it, cut it off a little bit again, heal it, and slowly do defragmentation..."

Silence.

"...Did Dok-seo devise this operation?"

"Ah, yes. She was spouting it with such a confident face like 'I saw it! The only happy ending I found!'..."

"Dok-seo!"

I cried out.

I could feel the gratitude and respect for Oh Dok-seo that had built up in my heart melting away like ice cream in Daegu during summer.

"So..."

Do-hwa smiled.

"Where shall we start cutting..."

"..."

"Arms? Legs? Or if your habit is to eat the bad stuff first when eating curry, should I start with the head..."

"..."

"Well, but rest assured. At least there's no doll for me."

Do-hwa whispered as if murmuring.

Cold sweat wouldn't stop running down the back of my neck.

"There's still some time left before the kids come down from upstairs anyway. I'll cut as prettily as possible, so you decide which part to cut first..."

"..."

Alias, Undertaker.

Real name, Go Yuir.

Perhaps Go/Yu/ir.

It was the greatest crisis of my life.

It was the moment I realized that for someone with many lifetimes, the greatest crisis of a lifetime also becomes many, a fact I didn't particularly want to realize.

Footnotes:

Chapter 432

The Savior Ω VI

Sinnoa

"Huu..."

The sight of my face dripping with cold sweat must have been quite the spectacle.

Do-hwa smirked, like someone who'd just returned from a pyramid tour with friends only to comment, "Hmm, is that all?" with a dismissive wave of her hand.

"The choice is yours in the end. This is merely the methodology that person Dok-seo proposed. You're under no obligation to follow it..."

"Then I refuse with every fiber of my being!"

"Well, do as you please. Though I'd personally like to see what kind of circus act you'll put on..."

Do-hwa set down her tools.

I swallowed hard. For her, it was simply a gesture signaling the end of her work, but from my perspective, where that doll looked like something akin to 'Artificial Human Undertaker Model 2,' I couldn't help but feel as though I'd just narrowly escaped being dunked into concrete, experiencing the thrill of a dramatic last-second escape.

"..."

"..."

With the sound of hammering gone, the depths of this Dream Within a Dream fell silent as a tomb.

4 a.m. Like stepping out to a convenience store and finding yourself at a concrete intersection devoid of pedestrians or vehicles, when the night sky holds its breath for just a moment.

Standing idly at a crosswalk alternating between green and red, the white silence between us hung in the air just as it did then.

"What are you thinking about so deeply?"

"Why don't you take a guess..."

"Well then."

I fumbled through the blank manuscript of white silence for ink-dark letters.

"I'd wager you're savoring a certain kind of joy."

"Joy? Hoh. Me, you say...?"

"Yes. The Director Do-hwa has always distinguished herself from her counterparts in other cycles. Always."

"..."

A sideways glance, Do-hwa looked this way.

Whether she did or not, I was organizing the manuscript of silence.

"But now, at this final of finals, all those past memories, all those future predestinations have been given to you. You've finally crossed the rapids of time that could never be crossed."

"..."

"Now you can denigrate all the versions of yourself from every other cycle to your heart's content. Only the self standing in this moment has achieved the ultimate victory, shall we say. So, yes. You are, in your own way, savoring joy."

"Heh."

A nasal sound slipped from Do-hwa's lips.

"Unpleasant bastard..."

"I'll take that as a compliment."

"Yes. That's right. Despite how I look, I'm in quite a good mood right now..."

I could tell the moment I saw her.

Even the great Do-hwa, no matter how much this was Dok-seo's request, couldn't possibly have participated in something as frivolous as the Undertaker Project without any reason whatsoever.

Just the fact that she teased me without any particular mockery, which for Do-hwa was genuinely normal communication, showed that Supreme Leader Do-hwa's satisfaction level had clearly hit at least 70%.

"I offer my condolences to my past selves. For tens of thousands of years, all I have are memories of work, work, work. Buried in paperwork..."

"Haha."

"Right now I'm in this strange place, so the memories are vivid at least. Once everything ends, they'll all become hazy..."

"Did Dok-seo say that?"

"Yes. That we should share our reflections [before the strategy], not [after the strategy]. Once Dream Within a Dream is conquered, even the memories piled up here like dregs will fade..."

Certainly.

This very magic that allowed everyone to recall previous cycles was itself a byproduct of Dream Within a Dream. In extreme terms, it was no different from the Void.

If the main body, the Void, were to be conquered, the byproduct would naturally disappear as well.

Woof!

A large dog came running from the entrance of the Tower of Babel.

Do-hwa knelt with practiced ease and stroked the large Maltese this way and that.

Huff, huff, huff.

Its tail wagged vigorously.

More pets followed the Maltese, wriggling closer.

Among them, one puppy trembled with its front and hind legs severely misaligned in height. There was also a cat with three tails sprouting from its rear, cracking like whips.

"Good, good..."

Hundreds of pets.

All children of a broken world with limbs somehow askew or damaged.

The pets I'd gifted in previous cycles, that Do-hwa had raised, and that the two of us had held funerals for together.

Once those children received even a single pat from Do-hwa, they immediately dissolved into ash.

"..."

Before long, only pure white ash fluttered through the plaza of the Tower of Babel.

Do-hwa brushed the ash from her doctor's coat and stood up.

"Awakener Undertaker."

"Yes. Speak, Director."

"Every time I killed you, you never once resisted but accepted death willingly. I'd like to ask why."

"Because I am the very one who dragged your life into this place."

The same answer as always.

Though the strata forming that answer had changed.

"Go Yuri arranged nearly everything for the sake of my fate. Nearly everything. However, even Yuri couldn't have foreseen that your existence would become this critical to my plan."

"..."

"Yes. You're also a case where you awakened due to a gap in your heart caused by Go Yuri. However, your ability isn't particularly impressive. [Protective Gear Creation]. In no scenario would you become the protagonist, or even a main character, with that ability."

In other words…

"You didn't join this story because of Go Yuri. Only I, the false regressor, caused you to bear all that suffering."

"..."

"Therefore, I bear responsibility. Unlike others, you at least have the right to kill me as much as you desire."

The corners of Do-hwa's mouth lifted.

"Even now?"

"..."

"If I say I don't like this ending, that the path you and Dok-seo created doesn't suit my temperament and I refuse it, what then?"

Do-hwa stepped closer.

"Still...?"

Her dry fingers grasped my neck.

Squeeze. Through the black leather gloves, a frail grip transmitted its pressure.

"Will you still die for me?"

I smiled.

"I'd accept it. But you won't be able to kill me anyway."

"Oh?"

The eye behind the monocle gleamed with interest.

"And why is that? Don't tell me you think my favorability toward you has maxed out enough to prevent murder? If so, I must tell you that would be a grave miscalculation..."

"It's not that."

As I answered, I thought.

Why did Dok-seo place Do-hwa at the final station?

Do-hwa herself responded with 'because of her Void affinity,' but Dok-seo had been the one persistently pushing ridiculous bait about an old-married couple or whatever nonsense.

As always, Dok-seo had given her a choice.

"Even if you kill me now, we'll meet again anyway. Here. Again. In the next cycle."

"..."

"And killing me then wouldn't be a 'new choice' from your perspective. You'd simply be retracing the choice your past self, your previous self made. And you..."

"I what?"

"Hate becoming a copy of yourself more than anything."

"..."

"How many times will you keep killing me? A thousand? Ten thousand? But eventually, an end will come, and the you at that end will make the choice to let me live. The person who remains in this world will be the one who made that final choice. Not you standing before me now."

"..."

"Only by sparing me here do you remain as the uniquely victorious one who survived to the end, a human freed from the shackles of regression. Noh Do-hwa. Therefore, you absolutely cannot kill me."

"..."

Slowly.

The leather glove formed of five distinct contours pulled away.

"To think you'd actually pull it off."

The sound that slipped through the withdrawn lips was closer to admiration, yet closer still to a curse.

"To publicly declare you'd save the world and then actually make it happen. Truly, astonishing."

"It wouldn't have been possible through my strength alone. It was possible because Yuri came before me, and Dok-seo followed after."

"...Those who've gambled and lost must accept the appropriate consequences."

Do-hwa removed her monocle.

"I won't bring this up ever again, so listen carefully..."

Thud. The folded monocle fell to the ground and rolled among the ashes.

A small rustling sound. It was the scream the monocle made as Do-hwa's shoe crushed it underfoot.

Do-hwa pulled off her gloves and tossed them aside.

"This is your victory. Undertaker."

"..."

"And this is my defeat."

Then she grasped my hand.

The back of my hand grew cool. It was because my lifted hand was brought close to Do-hwa's pale forehead.

"You were right and I was wrong. You were prudent and I was rash. My contempt was too premature to harvest the final autumn."

Squeeze.

With her head bowed, Do-hwa's face wasn't visible.

But she was expressing her emotions not through her face but through the pressure held in my hand.

"I pay my respects to everything you've accomplished. Even if my memories fade, the fact that a human like you exists will never be erased from my heart."

Emotion transmitted through bare hands scarred from countless hammer strikes and tool work.

"Claim your victory, Undertaker."

Humiliation.

"Seize your victory."

Disgrace.

"Having walked this far, you are more than deserving of victory."

Yet despite that, accepting defeat as defeat and treating victory as victory, offering mockery as the defeated.

With the same weight as that humiliation, merely changing direction, offering glory to the victor.

"May fortune be with you."

If this place were somewhere else, at the terminus of some remote route where victor and vanquished were reversed.

As if she believed without doubt that she would have carried out these same words.

"I apologize for killing you so many times."

If only human voices could be colored.

"In return, one wish."

Right now, Do-hwa's breath would surely be dripping with blood so cold it stung.

"Any wish at all. Even if it means tearing my soul apart, I'll grant you one wish."

A brief silence.

"Alright. I have a wish."

"...What is it?"

"After this is over, run for president."

"You fucking bastard. Do you really want to die?"

The rebuke carried genuine feeling.

I scratched my head.

"Hmm. With tens of thousands of years' experience governing a peninsula-scale organization, isn't letting such talent go to waste itself a national loss?"

"Really? Is that seriously your wish?"

"I'm joking. Even retirement denial has its limits. Ms. Do-hwa, it's time for you to step down from public duties."

I bent down and picked up the gloves.

After firmly fitting the gloves back onto Do-hwa's hands, I smiled faintly.

"Let's not live too far apart."

"..."

"Even if we don't need to be too close, we don't need to be too far either. When walking through streets bathed in evening glow. When taking a slight detour on the way home... Where you don't need to dress up specially but can meet just by calling..."

Where rain falls when it rains there too.

Where waves crash when they crash there too.

Where if the sun shines beautifully, its shadow falls upon you as well.

"I'd like you to be in such a place."

For someone, if the sunset is beautiful, it's because the roads beneath that crimson lead to neighbors' homes.

My western sunset needed your house facing the same direction.

"Will you do that, Ms. Do-hwa?"

"..."

Noh Do-hwa sealed her lips.

It was a long silence.

So that words flowing from her lungs wouldn't rise immediately through her throat but would circle her heart several times, steeping properly.

"Yes."

She nodded.

"I shall do so, Undertaker."

Immediately after.

"Mister!"

Screech.

A door materialized from empty air and Dok-seo burst through, shoving it open. Her face was flushed from running.

"Huff, everyone! Without exception! I brought them all!"

Beyond the door, I glimpsed flashes of Old Man Scho and the connections I'd passed on every floor up to now.

"I tried to hurry in my own way but, you know, the flow of time is so different that I'm not sure if the timing worked out— Huh."

Dok-seo, who'd been gasping for breath, froze.

Her gaze landed precisely on the scene where I was just fitting gloves back onto Do-hwa's hands.

"Haaaack."

Dok-seo covered her mouth with both hands.

"O-old married couple...?!"

"..."

"S-sorry! Mister! I was so tactless! Wow. I really should just die. Stupid Dok-seo! Idiot Dok-seo! Three minutes, no. Thirty minutes. No no, I'll come back in three hours!"

"..."

"Gasp. But wait, wouldn't that fill up the entire time limit right before the deadline? No, well. Whatever. The world's been destroyed countless times anyway, one more time won't hurt. Have a good time!"

Bang.

The door slammed shut.

"Ah!"

It opened again.

"J-just, don't mind me! Of course, I'll eventually see whatever happened here in the laptop manuscript! But really don't mind me! I know how to respect privacy, you know! You trust me, right? Then I'm off."

Bang.

The door shut again.

"..."

"..."

If the door hadn't opened from this side, it would have taken over three hours to clear up the misunderstanding, and the conquest operation would have been postponed to the next cycle.

What tremendous luck.

Footnotes:

Chapter 433

The Savior Ω VII

Sinnoa

I somehow managed to drag Dok-seo out despite her falling into a completely absurd misunderstanding.

It wasn't easy.

That shameless brat kept making suggestive expressions while desperately clinging to the doorknob in resistance.

"Hiiing... Mister, that's too much..."

Only after I finally gave her a good knock on the head did the 'Reader Oh Dok-seo' program in her mind get replaced with the 'Possessor Oh Dok-seo' program.

Grumbling all the while, Dok-seo woke up the awakeners who'd collectively entered sleep mode inside the Tower of Babel.

Shortly after.

"Hyung!"

The awakeners came pouring out in a rush.

Leading the pack was none other than our SG Man, Seo Gyu.

"Fuck! Hyung, thank you! Seriously, thank you!"

"Uh... why so suddenly?"

"I remembered! I got hit with flashbacks of being beheaded the moment the tutorial started, over dozens of times all at once!"

"Ah."

The veins bulging in Seo Gyu's muscles trembled.

"Those fucking fairy bastards! If I'd been a combat-type ability user, I would've dedicated my soul to beating the crap out of fairies for the rest of my life! Fuck!"

At those words, Yo-hwa, who'd followed Dok-seo to join them at Dream Within a Dream's deepest layer, reacted.

"Oh. Those fairies are all under my command now. Want to go one-on-one with me?"

"...No, no, Guild Leader."

Seo Gyu deflated instantly like a muscle after pumping.

It would be hard to criticize him for acting unmanly despite that fine physique when the trauma from the zombie kingdom founded by Elder Yo-hwa the Necromancer was probably quite intense.

"Meow! Undertaker!"

Patter patter patter, a blonde magical girl with cat ears poking out came running and dove for my neck.

"Well, well. Who do we have here?"

"Myahaha!"

From the Magical Girl Association, the guardian collective of the Japanese archipelago. A sunflower bloomed across Manyo Neko's face.

"Really, really thank you, nya! I just thought you were some strange person I met at the Inunaki Tunnel entrance! To think you saved my friend... that you saved Yō-meow. I only just realized, meow!"

"Uh, yeah."

I was slightly flustered.

It was common knowledge that Manyo Neko was the representative pro-Undertaker faction within the Magical Girl Association.

But across all cycles, Manyo Neko had never been this uninhibited with physical contact.

Our relationship always maintained a gap somewhere between friends and comrades, creating a pleasant draft whenever the two of us talked.

"Oya."

Laughter sounded.

The Magical Girl Association's leader, the Great Priestess, approached while covering her mouth with a fan.

That laugh had just flowed down along the fan's folded creases like water through a valley.

"Isn't it natural? To discover that what you'd dismissed as chance encounters were actually all part of an operation to save your irreplaceable childhood friend."

"...Um."

Obsidian Qin had also arrived.

Originally scheduled to be sacrificed during the Inunaki Tunnel exploration, but from cycle 146 onward her fate was altered.

Afterward, she came to shoulder one pillar of the Association alongside her friend.

Like Seo Gyu who'd survived from the 50th cycle onward, Obsidian Qin was also a survivor who'd belatedly escaped the schedule of extinction.

"Thank... you."

Bow.

Still wearing her trademark mask with the 'X' mark drawn on it, she let her black hair hang down as she gave me a respectful bow.

"Why the Inunaki Tunnel, judged to be a special-grade specter, disappeared before we could even begin proper exploration... I never imagined something like that had happened."

[Truly a peculiar fate, is it not!]

The armless swordsman.

Phantom Blade laughed heartily through telepathic magic rather than spoken words.

[Remembering when we sailed out to sea with lord Undateikeo and were attacked by aliens still chills my liver!]

"Their weakness was water. They melted like whipped cream when touched by water."

[Ah, I heard from lord Dok-seo. Heh. Truly. Meeting their end in the middle of the ocean to children whose weakness was water, there could be no greater foolishness than that.]

Tap.

Phantom Blade moved her scabbard with telekinesis to tap my forearm. It tickled.

[There were many comrades I wished to march alongside, but this is the Great Void. The expedition was composed only of combat ability users who could at minimum pull their own weight, I hear. Please understand.]

"What do I have to understand? I'm grateful you came at all."

[Lord Undateikeo is truly a samurai who has grasped righteousness!]

I continued exchanging warm greetings with various comrades one after another.

All were welcome faces, though occasionally there were some who stirred particularly deep emotions.

"U-Undertaker-san."

"Oh. Uehara."

"Was I... only useful in the early stages as a B-rank ability user and then discarded from the midpoint onward?"

"Pfft."

Sim Ah-ryeon, who'd been fidgeting nearby, openly burst out laughing.

Uehara Shino's expression darkened.

"Besides, our speech patterns are similar too. I stutter when I talk, and that one over there also..."

"No. You're just awkward when speaking Korean. Ah-ryeon over there is like that because humanity itself is awkward to her, so it's a different dimension."

"The reality that hierarchies exist even among awakening abilities is deplorable..."

For reference, Uehara Shino was a Japanese Communist Party supporter. She'd probably get along splendidly with a certain German-born old man.

Everyone was crowding around me, sharing retrospective memories that might be their last, when.

"..."

In the distance, I saw Lee Baek leaning against a wall.

Lee Baek. Lion's Roar ability user.

In the timeline where he lived alongside Go Yuri, he was an upstanding leader who'd filmed something like a National Road Management Director prequel.

But on my regression line, he was always the man stuck playing the 'early tutorial cancer character.'

"..."

Nod. Noticing my gaze, Baek gave a small bow of his head.

He couldn't bring himself to approach me directly to shake hands or voice an apology. Nevertheless, he wanted to participate in the final conquest battle to see it through.

That will could be felt in his eyes.

'Good expression.'

I smiled.

'Can a person change so much just from recalling memories of other cycles?'

How much time had passed?

The hubbub of chatter and the clamor of laughter had both grown relaxed enough to accept silence.

"Ah. Ahem, mic test."

Having rolled around like a balloon in a child's hands for hours, the air had grown full of vulnerabilities that Dok-seo slipped through as she grabbed a megaphone.

"Yes. Has everyone sufficiently caught up? Ah. I'm not some pervert like that Undertaker old man over there, so I can't perform absurd tricks like simultaneous foreign language interpretation. Please translate reasonably from the sides."

Laughter swept through the assembly.

"Hmm."

But then Dok-seo suddenly made a strange expression.

"Looking at everyone gathered like this, I'm newly reminded that I'm really quite a good person."

"?"

Question marks floated above the expedition members' heads.

"Even though I was born chosen as the protagonist, thinking about how I rolled through hundreds of cycles taking care of all these extras one by one, I wonder if anyone quite like me even exists..."

"?"

"This world owes a debt to the goodwill of the human being called me. That fact. The truth that this gathering was made possible by my treating all of you without any favoritism, I hope you won't forget even when the day comes that the Great Void is conquered and memories grow hazy."

"..."

Silence.

"What the hell is that serial abandoner babbling about?"

Finally someone couldn't hold back.

"Hey! LiteraryGirl! The sight of you calling in readers to beat them up after you went corrupt is still vivid in my mind, what kind of fucking goodwill! Goodwill!"

"You bastard! You're the one who wrote fanfic about Director Do-hwa under that ridiculous pen name Non-LiteraryBoy, right? You're the one who changed pen names!"

"Grrrr!"

"You said you couldn't do foreign languages but why did you run AOIM GPT to churn out translations and spread them around?! So we'd suffer too?!"

"E-even your view counts were always lower than mine. If I'd been the guild leader's ghostwriter, I would've cut the regression within 500 cycles... That's just facts..."

"There's suspicion that the Cheon Yo-hwa sisterly yuri novel that suddenly appeared anonymously on the SG Net novel serialization board in 806th cycle was your work."

"If you had time to shit out stuff like that, write the main story! The main story!"

Truly enthusiastic cheers like wildfire.

Dok-seo adjusted her cap with a huff and a smirk.

Damage taken: zero. She looked completely unfazed.

The thought process currently rolling around inside that skull was plainly visible without needing exploratory surgery.

She was probably absorbed in self-praise like 'Seeing how I drove both fans and haters crazy, I really do have the qualities of a superstar!' I'd bet my entire fortune on it.

"Life is suffering. If the fate of a writer is to be beaten by the ignorant nonsense of the masses, then I shall say to those base heavens that I loved my life as a writer..."

"Stop your bullshit!"

"We were the ones suffering because of a serial abandoner like you, you bastard!"

"But now the time has come to put an ending on the story of first draft Go Yuri, revision Undertaker, and editor Dok-seo. Let's go! My beloved readers!"

People threw rotten tomatoes and eggs, but those projectiles never made contact with the person called Dok-seo to create tomato-egg fried rice. Dok-seo didn't budge an inch and trudged forward.

The reason was simple. The [Absolute Defense] that had already reached the realm of a great immortal spat back all those projectiles.

The current Oh Dok-seo was invincible.

"Goodness..."

Dang Seo-rin, who'd stuck close beside me, let out a hollow laugh in disbelief.

"The final conquest battle. And she's probably the first in human history to ruin a morale-boosting speech like that..."

"She's probably thinking right now that she looks incredibly cool."

"Why on earth did the baton of world salvation get passed to a kid like that?"

"Who knows."

I smiled.

"Maybe because her talent for loving herself and the world surpasses anyone else's."

"..."

"Let's go, Seo-rin. We can't let your final concert be ruined."

"Yeah."

Thud.

I stepped forward.

Thud.

Seo-rin stepped forward. Ah-ryeon stepped forward, Ha-yul stepped forward, Yo-hwa stepped forward.

Thud.

Ye-ji stepped forward. Ji-won stepped forward. Do-hwa stepped forward.

Seo Gyu stepped forward, Baek stepped forward, Manyo Neko stepped forward, the Great Priestess stepped forward, Phantom Blade stepped forward, Obsidian Qin stepped forward.

Thud.

In Seo-rin's footsteps hung the night sky of Utopia.

In Ah-ryeon's footsteps were captured the Udumbara blooming at the ends of the earth.

In Ha-yul's footsteps, the puppet strings connecting humanity's final arks tied their knots.

In Yo-hwa's footsteps were white birch skins. In Ye-ji's footsteps was frozen white time.

In Ji-won's footsteps was seawater. In Do-hwa's footsteps were roads connecting to all the lonely cities of this earth.

Thud.

The extinctions humanity had endured, the deaths it couldn't endure, were carved into each and every one of those footsteps.

The screams that had been torn into thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of millions of branches, each creating discordant cacophony.

With me at the head, through everyone's footsteps taken with a thud, through the shadows of footfalls, they connected.

Route.

A single one.

"Mister."

We decided to call that lonely road 'time.'

"That's the main body of Dream Within a Dream."

The tip of Dok-seo's pointing finger.

There stood a glass monument split into a thousand, ten thousand branches, a gravestone transparent as a mirror, enduring as a massive citadel.

Carved into each of the hundreds of millions of glass facets were images of Go Yuri.

"...The tombstone of Time Seal."

"Yeah. It might even be the superior version of the ability you possess. Except that while you sealed other people, Yuri sealed none other than herself."

"I've explored Dream Within a Dream a few times too. I never saw such an absurdly massive tombstone then."

"Right."

Dok-seo nodded.

"That mirror cemetery. The kaleidoscope containing hundreds of millions of Yuri's disappears at exactly 2 p.m. on June 17th. By the outside world's standards, wait. Yeah. It'll happen 19 seconds from now."

"..."

"The White Night outside and this Dream Within a Dream's tombstone are linked to each other. While burning away every clue that might allow one to guess the Reincarnator Yuri's identity."

"What happens if we break that?"

That's when it happened.

"[The Corrupted Reincarnator] will descend."

It wasn't Dok-seo's voice.

I turned my head.

Dok-seo, not having heard that voice just now, was giving her own answer about something or other, but my attention was completely drawn forward.

"Guild Leader."

Go Yuri was there.

A phantom visible only to me.

"...You hadn't been visible for a while after entering Dream Within a Dream. Were you in a place like this?"

"I'm sorry. It wasn't intentional. It's no different from being forcibly dragged to where I should be."

"..."

"The [red flesh] Guild Leader occasionally witnessed. That's both the result of my existence becoming corrupted and an extremely, truly extremely weakened form."

"Weakened, you say?"

I couldn't help but ask back reflexively.

"That is weakened?"

"Yes. Though I may not look it, I'm an existence that accumulated the karma of an outer god in a human body, you know? Hundreds of millions of lifetimes. If I unleashed all hundreds of millions of abilities at once, well, things like the Outer Gods would have no choice but to collapse entirely."

"..."

"Except for the very minor drawback that the world I sought to protect would collapse along with them."

Yuri caressed the surface of the mirror-smooth tombstone.

"While crossing countless years, I sealed away my own abilities one by one."

"That's..."

It was a very familiar sound.

Yuri smiled brightly.

"Yes. Just like how Guild Leader restrains your own aura ability."

"..."

"In short, every single one of these countless split mirror surfaces holds the same status as 'the aura Guild Leader sealed,' each a vestigial organ from the past."

My mouth closed on its own.

"The traces of me as a human struggling to remain human. The traces of some ability I as a human once pinned my hopes on. If I'd been unable to give up to the very end and kept clinging to them, they would have certainly run rampant and led to corruption."

"..."

"The sum total of routes leading to bad endings."

Go Yuri turned to look at me.

No, not just me.

Dok-seo standing beside me. The members of the Regression Alliance. The hundreds of awakeners forming ranks behind us.

"Certainly, if you succeed in unearthing this tombstone and eliminating the 'corpse' that emerges, I'll truly be able to return to being human this time."

"..."

"But, is it possible?"

She, 'humanity of the past.'

Looked at us, 'humanity of the present,' and lifted the corners of her mouth.

"The traces of me sleeping in this tombstone possess no humanity. Of course. I scraped together every bit of humanity that remained, however faint, and handed it over to the me outside."

"...Truly a monster then."

"Yes. The noise, the dirge of some pitiful existence that eternally laments a world and human fate it could never save by itself, abandoning even its own self."

Yuri placed both hands neatly at her waist.

"So this is the final Rubicon River. Guild Leader. If you want to turn back, now is your only chance."

"..."

"It's a cemetery no one knew existed anyway. Once White Night erupts, it'll disappear forever without leaving even a trace. You can all just return like this and occasionally drop by Dream Within a Dream through the fairies, receive the memories of previous cycles like an IV drip, and live on reminiscing about your connections with each other."

"And you won't be there."

Go Yuri's eyebrows lowered.

"I consider that what remains in Guild Leader's memory was a sufficient lifetime. Still."

"Sorry, but…"

I grasped Dok-seo's shoulder.

"The child who inherited our legacy seems to think differently."

"..."

"Old Man Scho."

Thud.

Emit Schopenhauer stepped forward. A quiet footfall. In his hand was gripped a single nameless sword.

"Aye. You called?"

"Cut that thing down."

After that, words weren't necessary.

One sword stroke.

At a speed difficult to follow with the eyes, Emit Schopenhauer drew his blade, and slightly slower than the arc the sword traced, the crystal tombstone slid apart.

"Ahh."

Go Yuri too was cut along with the tombstone.

A crack traced across that slender smile.

"Truly, such incorrigible greedy ones..."

And then.

Bursting through the shattered mirrors with broken seals, red flesh surged forth.

Humanity's long nightmare had arrived.

Footnotes:

Chapter 434

The Savior Ω VIII

Sinnoa

The one who is reborn again and again. A reincarnator (還生者).

The one who deceives like an illusion. An illusionist (幻生者).

An existence where two meanings overlapped.

The prison she had sealed herself within was cleaved in two by a single strike from Emit Schopenhauer, the Swordmaster.

And then.

[Brother.]

The fragments of the shattered glass prison scattered through the air.

Before the mirror shards could even fall to the ground, something wrapped tightly around the nape of my neck.

[Go Yuir.]

It was Yuri's illusion.

The scent of apples rushed sharply into my nostrils.

A voice and gestures that Yuri must have been born with in some reincarnation embraced me from behind, whispering softly.

It wasn't just me who was experiencing this.

[Father.]

[You came all this way to find me?]

[Yo-hwa unni.]

[I'm so happy.]

[Ye-ji.]

The entire strike team.

Hundreds of illusions, hundreds of reincarnations that had sprouted from everyone's shadows were breathing sweet whispers, enchanting the strike team members.

Giggles scattered through the air.

"...!"

The sound of gasps being drawn in echoed unevenly from all directions.

A comfort overwhelmingly richer than any sense of duty to save this world. The sensation of the emptiness in their hearts, the one they'd been searching for since birth, being filled with warmth.

[Let's become one.]

No matter how firm their minds were, their brains melted dizzily at those gentle whispers.

Only ten seconds had passed since the glass prison shattered.

The battle hadn't even truly begun, yet the strike team was on the verge of being completely neutralized.

Groans burst like lumps across the battlefield.

"Ugh...!"

"Everyone, snap out of it! This is an illusion!"

[Ahaha. An illusion? Father, that's too much.]

"Ah, aah. Aah—"

It was hard to find any vitality in the voices of the awakeners trying to rally themselves.

Only then did I realize.

Even in her normal state, Yuri naturally maxed out favorability scores with people around her as easily as breathing, but even that was actually the result of Yuri exercising considerable restraint.

'Just hearing the voice feels like my nerves are burning up.'

For the reincarnator who had lost even the minimal will to remain human, there was no such thing as self-restraint.

Hungry, so she devours.

That level of instinct. With a desire no different from gluttony, the illusions of the reincarnator stroked the strike team members, caressed them, and pulled them close.

"Ji-won!"

In the torrent of pink temptation, there were only two people who maintained their sanity from the very beginning.

One was the legendary skeptic who had strangled the reincarnator when she was just a newborn baby, telling her not to live in this painful world.

"Yes. Mr. Matiz."

The other was someone who couldn't be satisfied with such illusions, someone who desired the one and only real Yuri in this world, the false Regressor.

Ji-won clasped her hands together in prayer.

At that moment, an aurora spread across the ground.

"Haa...!"

"Th-thank you! Team Leader!"

Poof! Pwoong! As the aurora's waves rushed all the way to the distant horizon, the sound of bubbles bursting echoed from all directions.

The seven-colored aurora swept across the ground, completely erasing the shadows cast by the strike team members.

When the shadows disappeared, the forms of Yuri that had been manifesting through them also faded away.

"Nice! Ji-won unni!"

Dok-seo shouted enthusiastically.

Just moments ago, she'd been drooling and delighted by Yuri's touch, but as befitting someone who was a true possessor, the evidence of that shameful display had long since been scrubbed away with the back of her hand.

"See that! As long as mental manipulation doesn't work, it doesn't matter if she's reincarnated billions of times, she's nothing! You pink tentacle brainwashing one-trick!"

"It seems this strike team has a culture where the leader-type humans voluntarily summon cliché anomalies..."

"Huh? What are you saying, old man—"

Dok-seo's words didn't continue.

"—? ...!!"

Her lips kept moving, but no sound came out. No, the entire battlefield had fallen completely silent.

"..., ...!"

"...!"

A soundless outcry.

It wasn't just voices, even footsteps couldn't be heard. Hundreds of awakeners were present, yet not a single breath could be heard flowing.

It was an eerily cold silence, but I wasn't flustered at all.

'It's one of Yuri's abilities.'

[Sound Seal].

Go Yuri, who had lived countless lives, possessed countless abilities.

Most of them, even Yuri herself couldn't clearly remember. Because she lacked the ability to remember everything.

Even if she couldn't remember them, the fact that the abilities existed was undeniable.

That's why Yuri in her prime didn't fight with the intention of 'I'll activate this or that ability.'

If she thought 'it's a bit noisy.'

Just that alone, and the sound would disappear.

A state infinitely close to omnipotence.

[..., ...!]

The seal on sound wasn't limited to just voices. The telepathy from the Saintess holding position in the rear was neutralized instantly as well.

The Saintess wasn't slow to catch on either.

[Everyone, please don't panic.]

The Saintess quickly grasped the situation and switched the method of conveying messages from 'sound' to 'text.'

[Currently, the enemy appears to have chosen a strategy of neutralizing us rather than attacking us directly.]

[However, we've prepared for every contingency.]

[Even if this is an unfamiliar battle, please trust the command and engage in combat.]

Tatatatatak—

Text appeared before my eyes in rapid succession without a hint of lag.

The Saintess was probably mixing in time stops herself, saving even the scraps of time wasted on typing.

[Please attach the puppet threads spread by Puppeteer Ha-yul to your wrists or forearms.]

[In case text transmission is also blocked, please combine messages according to the colors glowing from the puppet threads and act accordi■■■, ■■■.]

[■■■ ■ ■ ■ ■■■ ■■■—]

Bzzzzt.

The text became scrambled with black noise.

Soon, the text was completely cut off.

When I turned my head to look in the Saintess's direction, I realized no one was there.

But I felt someone gripping my other hand tightly.

"Mr. Undertaker."

Time stopped.

Before I knew it, the Saintess had approached right next to me and was holding my hand. Beads of sweat had formed on the brow of her face, which had maintained its expressionless mask throughout.

"What's happening? Ah, sound works here."

"If I stop time, it seems I can resist Yuri's authority to some extent. But I don't know how long even this will last."

"What?"

"Yuri has the ability of [Time Acceleration]."

The Saintess let out several groans as if the burden was too much.

"If I hadn't hurriedly stopped time just now, dozens of years would have passed in an instant by this place's standards."

"...!"

"No matter how slowly time flows in this dream within a dream, if decades pass, there's no answer. In the outside reality, White Night would have arrived, and our operation would have immediately failed."

This was insane.

The Saintess's arm gripping my hand was trembling with small aftershocks even now.

A nasal grunt. Even at this very moment, [Time Stop] and [Time Acceleration] were clearly fighting for dominance.

"Did Yuri have... this kind of ability too?"

"Something similar existed. But that was only accelerating the flow of thought at most. To actually speed up time itself like this... Ah!"

I immediately realized the cause of the abnormality.

"This isn't reality, it's Go Yuri's divine realm! It's no different from the depths of her dreams. So as a result, [accelerating the flow of thought] has become equivalent to [accelerating the flow of time]!"

"...The ability to dream faster."

The Saintess groaned.

"We misjudged. We formulated our operation based on the abilities Go Yuri possessed in reality... If your speculation is correct, Mr. Undertaker, those abilities will have become far more severe."

"Yes. But there's no need to panic. Originally, it's natural for Outer Gods to become more powerful in their own divine realms."

"That's also… true."

Bzzzzt.

The Saintess's voice became distorted with noise.

What she'd just said was also fragmented. Like 'that's/also/true.'

Even she, the most powerful awakener, was gradually being pushed back. By the nightmare of red flesh. Humanity's oldest dream. By the authority of the Outer God, the reincarnator.

"Regression might be the right answer in the current situation."

The Saintess spoke with difficulty, grinding her teeth.

"Since we've scouted the enemy's true strength, this cycle had meaning too. Leaving the strategy to the next Ms. Dok-seo and Mr. Undertaker might also..."

"It's always an available option. But we can't presume that the data from this cycle will only flow in our favor."

The reincarnator Yuri also had abilities like [Memory Reading].

"No matter what operation we devise, the moment we make contact with the illusions manifested from the shadows, our side's information immediately leaks to theirs."

"Ah..."

"The reason the reincarnator is sealing sound and text first and accelerating time also stems from that. After completely reading through our operation, she's chosen the most efficient route."

"Counter-strategizing our strategy..."

Truly the worst possible enemy.

"Retreating here won't give us any answers."

It wasn't for nothing that we'd reached the conclusion that Yuri needed to seal herself.

Even if all of humanity except Yuri united, opposing this reincarnated monster would be hopeless.

The reincarnator couldn't even carelessly commit suicide.

For her, suicide was the start of another life, and at the end of that beginning, an even more powerful authority would be waiting to awaken.

The Saintess looked up at me with worried eyes.

"Then I'll leave it to your decision, Mr. Undertaker."

"..."

"We prepared as much as we could, but ultimately, the only person who has a perspective equal to that reincarnating being is you, Mr. Undertaker."

...There wasn't much time left.

In the first place, we'd jumped into this dream within a dream to overcome the ridiculous constraint of 'one minute time limit.'

Now that the opponent had also noticed this and begun counterattacking, the battle would come down to a clash of pure strength.

The current Saintess had joined up with Dok-seo early to level up intentionally, which was why she was managing to hold on, but at this rate—

'Wait.'

A flash of lightning suddenly struck through my mind.

'Divine realm. Intentional leveling?'

I opened my mouth.

"One more layer."

"Yes?"

"Let's descend one more layer down."

The Saintess's sweat-soaked hair tilted slightly.

"One more layer... underground? I'm sorry, Mr. Undertaker. Wasn't this the terminal station for the divine realm where Ms. Yuri resides?"

"For Yuri, yes."

I raised my finger.

My index finger pointed to my own chest.

"But wouldn't I be different?"

"...What?"

"Since there's no one else listening besides you right now, Ms. Saintess, I'll tell you this. I was originally someone with a high risk of corruption, and after living through all of Yuri's lives exactly as she did, I've truly stepped outside the bounds of an ordinary human."

"..."

"This place is where Yuri's memories have descended all the way to her unconscious and taken root. Even Yuri, whose memory is ambiguous, was able to unfold a divine realm of this magnitude. Then... what about my dream within a dream, where I remember all those lives?"

"..."

The Saintess's face became peculiar. An expression that was exactly half seriousness and half absurdity.

"Um, in the end, that's basically admitting that you yourself are currently corrupted..."

"That's why I tried to get sealed away and disappear quickly. Dok-seo is to blame for dragging things out with hundreds of retries from there."

"Ms. Dok-seo did that out of a single-minded desire to save you, Mr. Undertaker."

"Ms. Saintess. We don't have much time right now."

I spoke hurriedly.

"I'll fall asleep first, so connect all available personnel through Ha-yul's puppet threads. And talk to Yo-hwa in advance, so that the moment [Time Stop] is released, you need to bring the strike team members into my dream. Understood?"

"...Okay."

The Saintess stopped nagging. Her will to not ask further questions after having already entrusted me with operational command was evident.

For a moment, the sensation of the Saintess holding my hand disappeared—

"Ms. Ha-yul. I spoke with Ms. Yo-hwa."

Having switched time stop on and off, the Saintess appeared before me again.

She was holding me with her right hand and Yo-hwa with her left. Yo-hwa had also been released from the constraints of time stop and was looking at me with a serious expression.

"Teacher. I heard the outline of the operation!"

"Good. Ms. Saintess, what's the time limit?"

"I only released it for a brief moment but already ten seconds have passed by reality's standards. Mr. Undertaker. Now we have to resolve everything within ten seconds."

I nodded.

"I'll fall asleep first. Please follow properly with the children."

"Understood."

"Yo-hwa, I'm counting on you."

"Okay!"

As Yo-hwa, who was currently acting as the master of the dream demons, interlaced her fingers deeply, my head became hazy in an instant.

'If this was Yuri's divine realm, then from now on the battlefield will shift to my divine realm.'

Of course, that didn't mean Yuri's authority would weaken.

As I'd told the Saintess, I remembered all of her lives, and relying on those memories, the reincarnator could demonstrate her abilities at any time.

However…

'Unlike Yuri's divine realm, [allies] that don't exist there will exist in my divine realm.'

Before I knew it, I had closed my eyes without realizing.

"Aha."

The moment I opened them.

"Ahaha, ahat—"

An orange ponytail swayed before my eyes.

A face that looked exactly like Yo-hwa.

But instead of a white uniform, a girl wearing a black uniform was smiling.

"Ahahahahahaha! Ahahahat! Ahahahaha—!"

Wild laughter.

Her face was dyed with excited exhilaration. Her eyebrows trembled with a thrill, and ecstasy surged from beyond her throat.

"Ahaha, see!"

Cheon Yo-hwa (天寥化).

"I was right! I was right, wasn't I! Ooh— Sunbae! Sunbae won! Of course there were many variables I didn't expect either... What does it matter! Either way, I bet on the winning side! That's all that matters!"

A former Regression Alliance member who barely maintained her existence precariously, only through me.

As the other strike team members followed one after another into the new battlefield behind me, Yo-hwa paid them no attention at all and grabbed my hand tightly.

"Welcome, Sunbae! Master of my divine realm! You really, truly worked so hard to get here! Yeah!"

The final strike team member.

Along with her twin sister, one half of the Taeguk, a fragment of the Outer God.

"The final battle! Let's finish it together!"

It was the moment the first and final strike team was completed.

Footnotes:

Chapter 435

The Savior Ω IX

Sinnoa

"Mr. Undertaker. The number of people I could bring at once was limited, so a few were left behind."

Tap, the Saintess stepped forward lightly.

The ashen ground she stepped on was no ordinary place. A subspace unfolded solely based on my dream, my memories.

The divine realm of the false regressor.

"Still, I brought most of them—"

She paused.

Only now did the surrounding scenery finally register in the eyes of the Saintess, who had devoted herself to making this hastily revised operation a success.

"Good heavens. This place..."

"..."

She wasn't the only one who was at a loss for words.

The strike team members who had arrived in my divine realm simultaneously with the Saintess. Whether it was Seo-rin or Ha-yul, without exception, they all looked dumbfounded as they frantically looked around.

The first to open her lips was Ji-won.

"Hmm. There are a lot of corpses."

Next was Dok-seo.

"A-a lot? This isn't at that level! It's just... there's nothing but corpses?!"

Dok-seo's expression was accurate.

The bottom of the deepest unconscious.

And this place, which they'd descended to using me as a staircase, was simply the heart of a nightmare where corpses sprawled all the way to the horizon beyond.

A mountain of corpses in a sea of blood.

In this place where it seemed no words could seep through the crevices between the corpses, if we had to give it a name, only something like that would barely be permitted.

"Wow."

Ah-ryeon's eyes sparkled brightly.

She was already on her knees, rummaging through corpses. Even as blood seeped under her fingernails, she rejoiced like a child dyeing their nails with garden balsam.

"Th-this... looks exactly like me! It's my face! But there are leaves sprouting here and there on the face... It's the end of me after becoming a World Tree! Guild Leader!"

"Ugh."

Seo-rin made a disgusted expression.

"Why are you deliberately rummaging through something like that?"

"Huh? Th-this is Guild Leader's deepest heart, isn't it? And there are so many of my corpses here... Aren't you happy?"

"That's morbid. Really!"

That's right.

This divine realm, the 'Cemetery of the Mountain of Corpses in a Sea of Blood,' was practically no different from revealing the world as I saw it.

How could the corpses collapsed here be only Ah-ryeon's?

The Saintess was stepping on the Saintess's forearm, Seo-rin's heels stepping back crushed Seo-rin's cheek, and at the edge of Ji-won's gaze hung Ji-won's severed torso.

"Unni...?"

Amid all this, Yo-hwa looked with a blank face at the reinforcement newly arrived in this divine realm.

"Yep. Guten Tag. Meine Schwester?"

Grin.

Yo-hwa, receiving the gaze, waved her hand. With her other hand, she still had her fingers tightly interlaced with mine.

"A-are you really my unni? I mean, my twin?"

"Yo-hwa. What exactly is 'real'?"

"Huh?"

"For me, the only person who truly exists in this world is Sunbae here. Ah, of course you exist too! For convenience's sake, for convenience."

"...What?"

"In short, if they're someone remembered by Sunbae, who is a true human, then they too can be called a true human. You know trickle-down economics, right, my little sister? That's a concept that applies to humanity's humanness too."

"..."

"In that sense, having received the trickle-down, or rather, having opened my mouth wide directly under the faucet and gone chug-chug drinking the flowing water, this body is truly a human among humans. You could call me Adam's Eve. Final answer? Yes! Final answer!"

"...Ah, I see. So that's the kind of human she was."

Understanding, resignation, and a bit of contempt settled on Yo-hwa's expression. Sisterly affection had built up at super speed.

Not long after the separated family reunion, an earthquake occurred from beyond the horizon of corpses.

Kruuuuuung...!

The strike team members' gazes all turned simultaneously.

Kruuung, kruuuuuuung...!

Corpses swept up in the tremors scattered through the air.

Some corpses shot up to the sky, then fell bizarrely slowly.

Thud! There were also corpses that flew right up to our noses and added one more to the pile. Ah-ryeon, who happened to be nearby, flinched.

"Hii, hiiiik!"

The turbulence beyond the horizon was endless, and the corpses flying toward us didn't decrease either.

All those corpses had Yuri's face mounted on them.

"..."

Mounted meant, literally, mounted.

The corpses had different genders and different body types.

Only the faces. Where different expressions should have been, 'Yuri's facial skin' was mounted.

It was the most cruel prayer.

All the anonymous lives spent on reincarnation wriggled and chanted a single name like a Buddhist prayer.

"It's coming."

Someone's murmur.

Oooo oooo oooo...!

The horizon writhed and squirmed, then red flesh rose up from it.

Its size was immeasurable.

Even the sky that had seemed endlessly vast became nothing but a frustrating background screen once the red flesh appeared, and the earth groaned with cramped square footage.

'Hello?' 'What is life.' 'Nice to meet you.' 'Ahaha.' 'Mother.'

Flutter—.

Whenever the giant tentacles undulated, ripples spread across their surface. Yuri's face, arms, legs, gestures. A temple incarnated as a lump of meat was singing a hymn.

It was mumbling that no one could understand.

However, to me, the master of this divine realm and someone who had received a tenfold song implanted in my heart by Hecate, it was clearly audible.

'Huh?' 'How many days do I have left to look at the sky and feel it's beautiful.' 'What a coincidence.' 'Guild Leader.' 'Let's become one.' 'Mr. Undertaker?' 'Once upon a time,' 'it was said.' 'Likewise.' 'Something only I can do.'

There was no great meaning in those murmurs.

Simply, because the reincarnators of the past who had already died had accumulated far too much compared to the living reincarnator of the present life, there were only gestures where the subject had reversed.

"Uuugh...!"

"I-it's too noisy!"

"Everyone, cover your ears!"

Unlike me, the strike team members who couldn't understand the Outer God's screams groaned in pain.

"Mr. Undertaker."

The Saintess spoke urgently.

"We don't know when 'that thing' will use its authorities again. It seems to have gotten even stronger."

"It's not a misconception. Right now, Yuri and I are in an inseparable relationship. When she enters my divine realm, Yuri is strengthened as well."

"...We entered here following Mr. Undertaker's proposal, but do you have a countermeasure?"

"Of course I do."

I smiled.

"Don't you understand yet?"

"What?"

"Yuri isn't the only one who becomes stronger here. I know not only Yuri's life but all of your lives as well. For instance, the Saintess from a cycle where she fell and became a priestess of an Outer God."

"...!"

The Saintess's eyes widened.

"Then...? Wait a moment."

The Saintess raised her arm and spread her fingers.

"...This is impossible."

A moment later, a rare shadow of shock settled on her expression.

"It's true. Even if I stop time, I'm not tired at all. I feel like I could respond to the enemy's time acceleration as much as I want... that kind of feeling."

"Ah! So you finally understand how Sunbae's divine realm works!"

Yo-hwa giggled. She seemed excited, as if dopamine had been going crazy since earlier.

"That's right! As long as Sunbae permits it, in this divine realm everyone can demonstrate their abilities at their prime!"

"Prime..."

"Yes! Our Sunbae isn't a support genius for nothing! Tricks like this are possible too!"

Yo-hwa finally released her interlaced fingers. Instead of grabbing mine, she firmly grabbed her twin sister's hands.

Both of them.

"Huh?"

"Yo-hwa, don't worry. After this operation ends anyway, we'll all get one shot of Udumbara detox and return to being human."

"Wh-what are you... saying?"

"Mmm, my little sister. It means this is our first and last stage where we can run wild without worrying about the aftermath."

The corners of Yo-hwa's eyes curved like half-moons.

"O Taeguk."

At that moment.

"Father and mother and child of all things. Descend here and now."

The world twisted.

Among the corpses forming the mountain of corpses in a sea of blood, only the corpses of Yo-hwa and Yo-hwa, just the two of them, surrounded the sisters as if caught in a whirlpool.

The corpses made 'hands.' Hands grasped other corpses' hands, and corpses without hands had their toes twisted to act as hands instead.

The corpses bloomed endlessly like flowers. The outline or form of bodies had no meaning. Arms sprouted from stomachs, and chests vomited out faces.

"Ah."

Yo-hwa's eyes wavered.

If even the outline of herself was like this, what about other things?

An authority that toys with all boundaries. When the power that mocks all things entered her hands, Yo-hwa couldn't help but convulse.

"This is..."

"The role originally assigned to us sisters."

Yo-hwa grinned.

Originally, in the early cycles, Yo-hwa had gained fame as a Necromancer.

Necromancy that broke down the boundary between life and death was, in fact, merely the most basic feat for Taeguk.

"Because one person can't handle it. The ancient god of our household and shitty Outer God bastard can only receive a complete descent in the body of twins.”

"..."

"Our lives were ruined because of it, so if we get some benefit from it, who's going to say anything? Don't worry. This unni will escort you through everything step by step."

"...Yes. No, yeah. Please do. Unni."

"Alright. Shall we send a light jab as a greeting to our Sunbae who's been around much longer than us?"

One of the corpses drew a sword.

Even that sword had spontaneously generated from the corpse.

Pshhhk! Like an offering sacrificing itself, the corpse thrust the sword tip into where its heart should be.

The moment one offering sacrificed itself voluntarily.

Oooo oooo oooo...!

Blood spurted from a corner of the red flesh that had been approaching from the horizon.

Since one spurt of blood boasted a quantity comparable to a river, the mountain of corpses in a sea of blood literally formed rivers of blood.

"Hmm."

Yo-hwa's eyes narrowed.

"I tried to erase that ability first since [Teleportation] seemed like it would be the most annoying. But something else got erased?"

"Teleportation was probably possessed by the Yuri who remained in reality, not that lump of flesh."

I said.

"How did you erase the reincarnator's ability?"

"Well, um. It's intuitive, so it's hard to explain. I'm implementing a simulation of the reincarnation where teacher Yuri awakened teleportation, then overwriting it with a scenario where I stab her to death with a sword."

"...Is the principle the same as Do-hwa?"

"One more shot."

Pshk! This time, three of the corpses dancing in a circle around the Yo-hwa sisters simultaneously drew swords and sacrificed themselves.

Oooo oooo oooo...!

Three strands of the red flesh's tentacles melted like candle wax. The source of the blood flowing onto this earth was the tentacles that died like that.

"I just killed [Sound Seal], [Memory Reading], [Sensory Contamination]. How's that, Sunbae? Amazing, right?"

"Now I understand why Go Yuri tried so desperately to split Taeguk into Infinite Void and Mastermind."

"Right, right. Originally, the final boss wasn't that lump of meat but us sisters..."

Psssssssht!

The corpses that had been dancing in a circle perfectly fine suddenly had their chests split open. Soon their hearts burst and they collapsed with thuds.

At a glance, it reached six hundred corpses.

"...Mm."

Yo-hwa's confident smile became ambiguous.

"Teacher Y-Yuri is reacting a bit strongly? Running the simulation is tough."

"...Don't tell me that to kill three Go Yuris in the simulation, six hundred of you were killed in reverse?"

"A mistake, a mistake! This is just a small happening that occurred because I'm not yet familiar with handling Taeguk. Ah, the more powerful abilities are concentrated in the relatively later reincarnations, so it's not easy—"

Thud. Thud thud!

Even while speaking, the chests of the corpses in the circle kept splitting without rest. Yo-hwa was horrified at the alarming speed of the open-heart surgeries.

"Ah, damn! Are you planning to dump everything on us sisters and just play around?! What's the strike team doing! What's the healer doing! Hurry! Heal!"

"H-hwaa."

Ah-ryeon responded in her usual blank voice.

"It's not even alive, and h-healing something that's already dead is my first time too..."

What happened at her fingertips was completely unlike usual.

Srrrrk—

Flowers bloomed from the corpses of the twin sisters buried face-down in the mountain of corpses in a sea of blood. From split chests, from where hearts had burst.

Soon the spider lilies formed riverbanks.

The corpses stained red rose up wriggling again and, with hands clasped together, joined the procession of the eternal circle dance.

"Ooh!"

Yo-hwa let out an exclamation.

"As expected, Ah-ryeon! The best contaminated one and best healer in Sunbae's party! I believed in you!"

"Being told that by someone I'm meeting for the first time... doesn't give me any impression at all..."

"Anyway, with this the perpetual motion machine is complete! Now then, without dragging it out, let's quickly crush Yuri-sensei's authorities—."

Right then.

A tentacle extended from the red flesh that had definitely been straddling the horizon and struck the circle dance.

"Ack."

Divine speed.

The sisters didn't even have time to react.

The circle dance of corpses that seemed like it would continue forever had half of it evaporate.

Even this was only because I quickly stepped forward and deflected in one stroke the red flesh's tentacle that had been aimed at 'this side.'

If I hadn't stepped forward, the tentacle would have struck not the periphery of the circle dance but the center, meaning the Yo-hwa sisters.

"S-Sunbae."

"You drew too much aggro. The opponent is the most sublime and cruel Outer God. I understand that winning at a 0.1% gambling table makes dopamine secrete like crazy, but if you make one wrong move, you'll be gone in one hit."

Before my words even ended, tentacles began flying one after another. This time not one but tens of thousands.

[I'm.]

The majority of them were slaughtered midway.

[I'm sorry, the nullification-type abilities.]

Still tens of thousands of tentacles remained.

I gripped Do-hwa's handle tightly to fight against them, but I didn't need to take a step forward.

Kwaaarrrrrk!

The wave of tentacles that had been swung with momentum to sweep this side away exploded after being blocked by an 'invisible wall.'

The blood that burst as the tentacles shattered also didn't flow in the direction where our allies were.

The 'transparent barriers' became covered with liquids like a car window running through heavy rain.

"Phew."

Step.

A girl with hair as red as blood passed by my side and took one step forward.

Glancing back at this side, like someone convinced they existed at the coolest angle of their life.

"I."

She spoke with a nihilistic expression at a level that would slap Osamu Dazai's cheek and strike Edgar Allan Poe's chin.

"Heavenly Demon, descending."

"..."

LiteraryGirl's prime.

A.K.A. The author who beats up readers.

"Cool. Confirmed."

It was the second coming of the most wicked one.

Footnotes:

Chapter 436

The Savior Ω X

Sinnoa

"I’m not afraid of anything anymore."

Heavenly Demon Dok-seo declared.

"Because… I'm not alone anymore!"

Some strike team members seemed moved upon hearing that line.

They probably understood it at face value as 'not alone = having other comrades.'

"..."

On the other hand, some awakeners who knew the original source of that line, including myself (especially the Japanese archipelago strike team members who had expertise in magical girls), had subtle expressions.

Since they possessed sufficient knowledge and culture, they couldn't help but wonder, 'What? Does she want to get her head smashed in?'

However, surprisingly, limited to just that moment, Dok-seo's words weren't simply a joke but contained a sliver of truth.

Really, Dok-seo wasn't alone.

[You crazy priestess!]

Clang—

A voice degraded by speakers rang out.

It was a sound coming from the laptop Dok-seo was holding under her arm.

Soon, from the laptop screen, a tiny dot-mass dwarf girl jumped, and wouldn't you know it, her body rapidly grew to the size of a real person in the blink of an eye.

[Please, stop piling up clichés already, I'm begging you! Do you even know how hard I'm working on repair construction to clean up after you?!]

The identity of the white-haired girl raging with nearly fainting fury was... why hide it.

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame, who had once trampled the world and made anomalies tremble, was there.

"Wow."

Yo-hwa nodded as if pleased.

"Who do we have here? If it isn't the loser of the previous era."

It was an unavoidable greeting method since her interlaced fingers were still fixed to her twin sister, but even in a different situation, it didn't seem like the greeting would have been particularly polite.

The Admin frowned at the rudeness of those words and actions.

[Huh? The shame of an Outer God who wagged its tail to mere humans should shut up.]

"Gasp! Fact violence hurts so much. But it's kind of a shame... If only it hadn't come from someone who cast 'I'll give you all my authority and dignity, just spare me' to mere humans, it would have hurt more."

[...]

"This side joined early and got the authentic human certification mark attached nice and bright, right? That side kept throwing in every last penny until the very end and signed the surrender document, right? Now when the subjugation is over, at best you'll be a blue checkmark VTuber, right?"

[...]

"Kekekekeke!"

At the miraculous roast battle, the Admin's shoulders trembled violently.

At least it was fortunate that red flesh tentacles were rushing in from all directions.

The noise was so loud, and the strike team members were busy reorganizing their formation, relying on the barrier the Heavenly Demon had deployed.

Dok-seo shouted.

"Hey! Admin! The output's not enough!"

[Haa. Really, how did I end up with my fate mortgaged to such an un-priestess-like priestess…]

"Shut up and do something about the tentacles! They're all tough with special effects attached!"

[Yes yes, I understand.]

The relationship between the two had a different color from what I was used to seeing.

I could infer the reason.

'Well, yeah. Those two broke through new routes while sharing joys and sorrows for over thousands of cycles.'

From Dok-seo's perspective, who had to run around alone to prevent the tragedy of June 17th, the Outer God trapped in the laptop must have been her first companion.

Originally, the modifier 'companion' could never have applied... but the Admin had also undergone considerable humanization through me.

If they'd faced countless hardships and deaths together, they couldn't help but develop into a close relationship.

'There are also stories I don't know. Even in this place I can call my own divine realm.'

Of course.

There were also stories I did know.

"Samcheon World."

Seo-rin raised her broom.

"We won't finish if we only defend. We'll pave the way first. Everyone, follow me."

"Yes!"

The Samcheon World strike team members formed a formation in unison and kicked off into the sky.

Oooo oooo oooo...!

Countless tentacles sharply changed course. To intercept the witches of Samcheon World.

If they lost focus even slightly, they'd be buried under the tentacles' wave attacks and die, but the witches' flight didn't stop.

Dizzyingly, yet with movements trained through countless practices and actual combat, the witches of Samcheon drew geometric contrails.

Even if the opponent was a reincarnator who had repeated billions of lifetimes, the mission given to humanity's front line was fundamentally the same.

When fighting against Ten Legs, when shooting down Meteor Shower.

Pioneer the sky first.

"What are you all doing!"

Below the sky being scored with cracks by the witches, Yo-hwa, who had been directing the circle dance of corpses on the ground, shouted.

"Move together with Dok-seo and advance! Use the barrier as a shield to march forward! Aah, seriously. Unni! Don't do this here and move with me!"

"Ah. I'm a rear support type strategist..."

"Hurry!"

Baekwha Girls' High marched forward.

If each witch of Samcheon was a pilot embroidering the night sky with starlight, the warriors of Baekwha were legionnaires advancing with shields at the front like Roman soldiers.

Sky and ground.

Both sides split the red flesh in half to face it. Humanity's forces tightened more and more toward the horizon where the Outer God had taken position.

'They're fighting well.'

They weren't forces to be treated as mere extras in the first place. Hadn't they too temporarily regained memories of their past lives?

'Humanity's greatest veterans.'

My life as a regressor guaranteed it.

Throughout the countless regressions I'd experienced, not once had I insisted on a method of clearing 'alone', by 'solo running.'

'Perhaps for this very moment...'

I raised them.

'Was everything inevitable.'

When defending Busan. When occupying Sejong. When recapturing Seoul. When securing Pyongyang. When protecting Sinuiju.

"It's more doable than I thought! We can do this!"

"Whoa, what was that just now? There was nothing in the air but suddenly axes appeared."

"Time stop, you idiot! The Saintess said so!"

"If you're slower than the broom bastards, you'll die by my hands!"

These people had always been together on the front lines where I stood.

Therefore, they couldn't help but be the strongest army.

Ah—aa—a—

The conductor of the witches sang.

The cape flowing from Seo-rin's shoulders sparkled like the Milky Way.

The night sky burning by consuming lifespan.

—Ah—a—aaa—

That night sky's starlight would never fade.

Before anyone knew it, a few flower stems were wrapped around Seo-rin's body. Each time she created a chorus alone, black violets burst into bloom.

They were branches of the World Tree raised by Ah-ryeon.

A—aa—aa—

As much lifespan as was burned, the World Tree immediately returned that lifespan.

Literally a 'theoretically strongest' combination.

Though Seo-rin had once come to hate plants more than anyone, she was in fact an awakener who created the most exquisite harmony with the World Tree.

Aaaa—aaa—

Sky.

Her song didn't break off, and it was enough to turn the cosmos that had been covered in red flesh back into humanity's night sky.

The witches giggled with joy at the night sky their goddess had spread and raced even faster.

"Teacher!"

"Sunbae, we're roughly picking off and eliminating all the dangerous authorities!"

Ground.

On the surface, the corpses of humans who had met death countless times were dying again, dragging the red flesh's authorities as companions down to the underworld.

Just moments ago, the tentacles' numbers had rivaled the Sands of the Ganges, but they successively exploded, bursting blood everywhere.

The remaining offensive of the red flesh was half blocked by the Saintess, and the other half blocked by Dok-seo.

The gap created by half and half—between ground and sky, and therefore on the earth, humans advanced.

"Mr. Matiz."

Sea.

Ji-won vomited out a seven-colored sea.

"Please go ahead. I'll support you."

Once there was a girl who had wished for the world to simply sink without a word.

However, now at this moment, the sea spreading from her fingertips didn't submerge the humans advancing toward the horizon but instead raised them up.

Everywhere became thick with boundless aura.

The song pouring down from the night sky blessed them, and the aura spreading up from the sea permeated them.

"Embalmer! This is our chance!"

From the left, the Sword Star ran while shouting.

"Don't worry about the flank."

From the right, the Sword Marquess recited.

"No matter what happens, this master will see you to the front of that monster."

I nodded.

And ran.

Each time my steps met the aura spread to the horizon, ripples flowed.

The most joyful treading on duckweed to cross water.

Though I might not be the only one who had reached this state, the luxury of running across the Milky Way reflecting the night sky felt entirely mine alone.

'If I cut down that reincarnator, this miracle too will surely shatter like a midsummer night's dream.'

The scenery passed me by in an instant.

A certain magical girl who unfolded her umbrella and deployed her magic while crying out meow. A certain awakener roaring a lion's roar to encourage comrades nearby.

'Someday even these memories will all become hazy, and when we meet on a journey to some remote village, perhaps only a sense of déjà vu wondering who they were will remain.'

A certain younger one who built up muscles but was neither a dealer nor a tank but a supporter. A certain child creating puppet threads to slaughter the red flesh obstructing my path.

'Even if lonely, it's not a terribly lonely thing.'

It was the reason they were alive.

'If life is a single dream.'

When waking from the dream one day.

'I shall answer that it was not a nightmare.'

A long day's dream.

The long dream of a certain day of the week.

Oooo oooo oooo...!

Before I knew it, the red flesh had arrived right before my nose. Looking back, crossing one horizon had also been but a moment.

Crash!

Even driven to this point, did the reincarnator of countless eons truly have one final move?

A tentacle broke through even the assistance of the Saintess and Dok-seo and struck to pierce my heart.

'Yuri.'

I blocked that strike. Unable to withstand the pressure, the sword, Do-hwa, shattered in my grip.

But it didn't matter.

A certain blacksmith forged swords for me every time the world was reborn.

In valleys where all the craftsmen had died and disappeared, I always received swords as gifts.

Those gifts, linked to the number of times I'd met death, now formed a mountain of swords and forest of blades on this path.

I ran.

Discarding the broken sword, I newly pulled out one blade from among the swords embedded in my heart.

'Did you call me greedy?'

The red flesh's death throes didn't cease.

Swords broke. Broke again. The monstrous grip born from wounds that had completely destroyed certain lives surged like waves many times to crush me.

It was the reason a person needs a staff to cross a stream, and the reason the sword of Do-hwa transformed into a staff was placed in my hands.

'If greed is permitted to me.'

The red flesh that had lurked on the left, risen from the shadows aiming for a perfect opportunity, was blocked by Emit Schopenhauer.

'I only hope this world is not a nightmare for you either.'

The end of the tentacle that had tried to catch my death with its own suicide by bursting itself on the right was cut down by Hong Bi-cheong.

Oooo oooo oooo...!

I ran until the very end.

When sky, earth, and sea rippled.

I swung one blade.

————————...!

A scream.

The red flesh convulsed bizarrely. It struggled desperately to somehow scoop up the collapsing flesh, but the slash drawn there wouldn't heal.

The untimely death that became the void itself by looking into the void more deeply than anyone.

The old nightmare was crumbling.

I reached out my hand into the pouring blood. Firmly. There was a sensation wrapping around my fingertips.

"—Ah."

There, a girl with pink hair wore an expression like she was about to cry at any moment, her wrist caught by me.

One human surrounded by all these nightmares.

Now that the nightmares she could never escape from with just her own struggles were vomiting blood and washing away.

The hair that had been dyed pink was slowly, from the ends, returning to its original black color.

"Go Yuri."

Regression. Reincarnation.

There is a destiny by those names.

"You were the one who noisily woke me up every morning and whatnot."

Since a person's life is a journey leading to death, living each time inevitably means dying each time.

There was also someone who ultimately couldn't prevent destruction on that journey and finally let go of themselves.

"This time it's my turn to speak."

"Ah..."

"We slept in too late. You too. Me too."

Pulling her wrist.

I embraced the existence who had died with me and would eventually die with me.

"The night has ended now."

"..."

Go Yuri's expression crumbled.

And soon leaned that crumbling onto me.

"...Yes."

With a person's weight and a person's warmth, she let her voice flow from within my embrace.

"Yes… Yuir."

Anomaly: Reincarnator.

Aliases: Someone's family. Someone's younger sister. Someone's daughter. Salvation. Wound. Despair. Hope. Nightmare.

Threat Level: Lv.5 Outer God-class.

Subjugation complete.

"You were always the sun to me."

And then…

“My own, very own sun.”

Someone's epilogue had begun.

Footnotes:

Chapter 437
The One Who Was a Regressor I

Sinnoa

There is an epilogue.

White Night was prevented.

The Great Void that had scorched everything south of the Han River without missing a single cycle for thousands of times had disappeared without a trace.

Most people probably wouldn't even realize such an event was supposed to happen.

"Come on, come on. Everyone come here and get your Udumbara shot!"

Only 'most people,' mind you.

"You there, you're moving too slowly! Hurry up!"

Tweeeeet—!

Dok-seo blew her whistle. The awakeners grumbled but completed the quarantine measures under Dok-seo's leadership.

"Nya. If I get this shot, I'll no longer have cat ears, no more magical girl costume, and no more restriction of having to add meow at the end of my sentences..."

"So? You don't want it?"

"No, I fucking love it, meow."

For a long time, awakening had meant power.

It had been the exclusive domain of those who ruled with their wounds, having been wounded by the world.

Even for someone firmly united with the cause of protecting humanity, it was very difficult to voluntarily give up the power that had come into their own hands.

"Well, let me go first..."

Do-hwa does that difficult thing.

While several awakeners were hesitating, Do-hwa approached first before anyone else and held out her forearm.

"Oh."

Dok-seo smiled strangely.

"Are you sure, Director? Once you get this injection, Udumbara will bloom in your stomach for a bit, then turn into plum blossoms a few days later and get digested. That means you'll be saying goodbye forever to giving patients biological prosthetics."

"It doesn't matter..."

Do-hwa smirked.

"They'll manage on their own..."

"As expected of Director noona! Alright, then this will sting for a moment!"

The great National Road Management Corps Director set an example first.

Next, the northern Saintess smiled brightly and voluntarily took the injection herself, so there was no one who could be greedy alone.

'And the memories from the previous cycle still exist, albeit faintly.'

Those who had desired peace more than anyone.

They were people who recalled, even if dimly, the thousands of deaths they'd experienced.

Now, if the last remaining void poison in the world was none other than their own abilities, they were ready to willingly return to everyday life.

After all the awakeners had received their vaccination shots, the final turn came to me.

"..."

However, when giving me the injection, Dok-seo's expression was somehow shifty.

The moment I was about to ask why she was making that face, Dok-seo quickly pulled her head back and shouted to the awakeners around.

"Alright! I borrowed this abandoned school from Mayor Sang-guk for a whole week! Inside the school there's a buffet and tons of alcohol prepared for us victors, so enjoy to your hearts' content!"

"Oooooh!"

"As expected of Dok-seo! I believed in you!"

"Author-nim, I love you!"

The party began.

June's temperature was neither too hot nor too chilly. Even if hot, the wind would cool it enough, and even if cold, the alcohol would warm it enough.

The party continued even after night fell. They had that much to share with each other.

"Hey, let's record our conversations on video before the memories disappear!"

"Oh. That's a good idea?"

Here and there, awakeners busied themselves creating their own little time capsules of memories.

Even at this very moment, as alcohol and laughter flowed into the night sky's air, the memories of the dream within a dream that had briefly colored their minds were gradually fading.

Literally a midsummer night's dream.

If only they could step foot into the dream within a dream again, the memories would return vividly, but that abyss had already disappeared.

"Saintess Ah-ryeon! I, we really owe you so much, but to think we'll forget like this... sob, tears are..."

"Please just remember that our devotion was sincere! Lord Saintess!"

"Ah. Yes, yes..."

In one corner of the playground, those who had been holy knights of the Eastern Holy State were sobbing.

When they saw me approaching, they stopped crying with an 'oh.'

"Lord Undertaker! Welcome!"

"You must have a drink with us too!"

"Hehe. Guild Leader. These mister's hearts are too hot... P-please save me."

I smiled wryly while sharing drinks with them.

"I'm grateful you welcome me, but will you be alright, everyone?"

"Hm? Alright about what?"

"The Eastern Holy State, led by Mo Gwang-seo Christ, was ultimately a satellite state I manipulated from start to finish. Even if you're angry that I deceived you, I have nothing to say."

"Ah."

One of the holy knights nodded.

Once, when a monk named Seok-hwa had performed self-immolation, he was the holy knight who had guided him, and on SG Net he used the nickname like a kind one.

"Well, we were fanatics. But anyway, didn't the grace of the Saintess who healed and cared for us also originate from you, Lord Undertaker?"

"The north was a forsaken land of death until the Saintess came anyway."

Another holy knight spoke. He was from North Korea.

"Even though it's almost faded now, I remember. Winter was too cold. It was really the first time I'd been that hungry in winter..."

"It was hell. I don't know about others, but there's no way we'd be angry at the Miss Saintess or Lord Undertaker!"

I hesitated for a moment, then silently held out my glass. The holy knights laughed and clinked glasses.

"Cheers!"

"Hehehe... G-Guild Leader. Please save me. These people have been chugging alcohol nonstop since broad daylight... bweeeh."

"The Saintess is vomiting!"

"Get water! Water!"

People were horrified.

Since there was no way I had a fetish for the vomiting heroine trope that was long past its heyday, I quickly fled to another location.

"Ah. Undertaker."

"Oh? Isn't it Teacher."

However, there is no paradise in places you flee to.

The place I happened to encounter was where Seo-rin and Cheon

Yo-hwa, that is, the children of Samcheon World and Baekwha Girls' High, were sprawled out.

It was truly a tragic scene.

Not just one or two, but over a dozen people were swimming on the floor.

"Hey. What are you guys doing?"

"Us? Uh, competing."

Seo-rin replied nonchalantly. Hiccup. The lighting was dim so I hadn't noticed, but even while answering, Seo-rin's face was flushed red and the smell of alcohol wafted strongly.

"Competing... suddenly?"

"It's not sudden, Teacher. Hic. If the kids' memories disappear, the rivalry we've fought over for tens of thousands of years will disappear too... That's, that's—"

"A shame?"

"No! We have to land the final blow!"

Yo-hwa's eyes flashed.

"The capital of the Korean Peninsula is Sejong! This is just official, official! How dare, you know? Something like Busan! Hm? To match us! Can it even."

"Huh? If you combine all the cycles, the period when Busan was the capital, hiccup. Is the longest among all the capitals of all countries in the Korean Peninsula ever? Hiccup."

"..."

They were really having the most useless debate of their lives.

"Teacher, which of the two does Teacher think..."

"Oh my. Dok-seo told me to come but I completely forgot about our appointment. I can't be late from here, so I'll go ahead."

"Teacher?!"

If I stayed still, I'd definitely taste hell pushed by those two's nagging, so I hurried and ran.

From behind, the sound of my name being called along with crash-bang sounds could be heard, but I cleanly ignored it.

Obviously it must have been the noise of Samcheon World and Baekwha Girls' High fighting. Yeah. Of course.

"Hm?"

At least the part about having a late-night appointment with Dok-seo wasn't a lie.

However, on the stairs leading up to the school rooftop (truly an otaku-like location choice befitting Dok-seo), I encountered an unexpected person.

It was Yu Ji-won.

"Oh my. Mr. Matiz. I thought you'd be enjoying the wild party on the playground, where are you hurrying to?"

"Ji-won, what are you doing here? The National Road Management Corps members should be drinking over there."

"I'm enjoying time alone."

Swish.

Ji-won shook her paper cup.

"Of course, until just a moment ago it wasn't alone but two, though."

When I turned my head, on the windowsill she was leaning against, one ownerless paper cup sat forlornly.

I was puzzled.

"Were you drinking together? Just the two of you?"

"Yes."

"That's unusual. I barely remember you drinking with anyone other than me. Who was it?"

"It was Ji-soo."

"..."

"Yes. The child who was my adopted daughter."

Ji-won shook the wine bottle.

"How about it? Would you like a glass?"

"Sure."

She poured wine for me. We toasted without saying anything to each other.

Rather than clinking cups, it was closer to briefly touching them.

"Ji-soo also participated in the final subjugation battle, but didn't directly engage in combat. She observed only me throughout."

"...I see."

"Yes. And a little while ago, before the memories of past lives faded, she came to find me."

I closed my mouth.

The relationship between Yu Ji-won and Kim Ji-soo was a problem entirely for those two to take responsibility for.

My involvement had already ended long ago, and I was no longer in a position to give advice this way or that.

How the story concluded—the decision of whether to tell that ending also rested with them, not me.

So I waited.

For Ji-won's words. Or silence.

"..."

As if reading my thoughts, Ji-won faintly smiled.

That single layer of smile seemed to turn back the date of the air between us to a summer slightly older than June 17th.

"She told me she was grateful."

"Grateful..."

It was such an unexpected statement.

It wouldn't be an exaggeration to say Kim Ji-soo's life was ruined by Yu Ji-won. And yet, grateful?

"In cycles where I didn't operate the Misfortune Workshop, Kim Ji-soo died without a sound or rumor. By anomalies. Even those memories of death seem to have suddenly surfaced in the depths of that dream within a dream."

"..."

"However, the gratitude Ji-soo spoke contained half sincerity and half resolve. Can you guess what kind of resolve?"

I thought briefly, then said.

"...I think Ji-soo conveyed her gratitude first before demanding an apology from you. Someone who wants to receive sincerity from another person, unless they're a con artist, needs to show their own sincerity first."

"Exactly right."

Wind blew from the window. Ji-won swept her long hair with the back of her hand.

"So I also said I was sorry."

"..."

"Not because of feelings of regret. It wasn't a judgment that apologizing here would resolve the grudge and be advantageous to me... either."

A murmur flowed.

"Simply, I couldn't do for Ji-soo what Mr. Matiz had done for me in my childhood. I apologized regarding that."

"..."

"I thought it was perfect handling. As Ji-soo said, I operated the Misfortune Workshop by selecting only children who would meet tragic deaths if I didn't intervene."

Ji-won said.

"I built the justification that no matter what misfortune was given, as long as they could become awakeners, as long as they could avoid unjust deaths, that was enough."

Indeed, Ji-won's logic was solid.

She had even calculated the case of her own failure, showing the seasoned wisdom of guarding herself to avoid being caught as much as possible.

"But thinking about it, it wasn't much different from what the world did to me in my childhood."

"..."

"Regarding that point alone, I could sincerely apologize. I consider it a painful mistake. Thus, I apologized."

"I see."

"Yes."

"What did Ji-soo say?"

"After hearing my words, she answered that she understood. Then she bowed her head, said thank you again, and left."

"..."

"She's a strong and upright child. Even if her memories fade, she'll carry on with the strength of her character."

"Yes. She definitely will."

Wind blew again.

Until now, all stories had occurred in places where I was present.

No, I couldn't help but be present wherever stories occurred.

Because I was a regressor who repeatedly lived countless lives.

'Now stories I don't know will arise.'

If defining someone as 'you are this' in a story, are the power and authority of a regressor.

Finally, days were continuing where my authority itself had let go.

'However...'

There existed not just stories I alone told, but also stories shared with each other.

I patted Ji-won's shoulder.

Ji-won blinked. Then silently leaned her head on my shoulder.

"Mm."

"What are you thinking about?"

"Indeed, I think the ring of [Mr. Matiz] suits me."

Ji-won looked up at me.

"Thank you for always waiting until I make a mistake. Mr. Matiz."

"...I'm sorry for repeatedly assigning you the role of Leviathan's priestess."

"No."

A small nod.

"That was the second fortune given to my life."

"Second? What was the first?"

"Being born."

Ji-won smiled.

With a smile shown only to me.

"I'm happy to have been born into a world where you exist. Mr. Matiz."

After having various conversations with Ji-won and parting, I climbed the stairs.

Opening the door to the rooftop, the appointed place—

"Ooh. Mister, good night. Good night. Welcome."

Dok-seo was monopolizing the spacious rooftop.

No. This too, just like Ji-won's case earlier, had some flaws in calling it entirely a place for herself alone.

"...Why did you put a beer can in front of the laptop? The Admin can't even drink it anyway."

"Hm? No? She's drinking it though?"

"What."

Dok-seo showed me the laptop screen.

Really, within the screen, a white-haired girl made of dots was holding a beer can.

Why? What?

The cheap low-quality speaker stuttered.

Can't I drink or something?

"...No. That, no."

Your eyes are very displeasing.

"As long as you're happy."

If she could feel good calling cyber 2D dot beer alcohol.

"Upsy."

Dok-seo jumped from the rooftop flower bed. Not just jumping down normally, she flew into the air, did a double rotation, then landed stylishly like a gymnast.

I unconsciously clapped my hands.

"Wow. Our Dok-seo. It's clearly visible that you're on a different dimension from when I knew you."

"I'm pretty amazing. So... Can you guess why I called Mister out separately on this late night?"

"First, half the purpose would be wanting to have a secret conversation in the space called the school rooftop."

"Ah. A really important reason. Right."

Dok-seo giggled.

"And the other half?"

"...The Udumbara-plum blossom vaccine you developed together with Sword Marquess and Ah-ryeon. Since I got that shot, it's normal that I should also gradually lose my awakening ability and have my Complete Memory ability fade."

"Yeah."

"But my eyes still clearly see your dead forms. It's already past midnight. Even though other awakeners are gradually losing both abilities and memories."

"Right."

"..."

"What Mister is thinking right now is also right."

I closed my lips. Moonlight and clouds were playing tag with shadows on the rooftop.

I slowly opened my mouth.

"The injection you gave during the day. It was fake."

"Yeah."

Dok-seo nodded.

Endlessly lightly.

"More precisely, only the core members of the Regression Alliance, including Mister, received 'fake' injections."

"..."

"Do you understand what I'm saying? Mister."

Dok-seo smiled.

"Now the only awakeners left in this world are just us."

Footnotes:

Chapter 438

The One Who Was a Regressor II

Sinnoa

"..."

All the awakeners had disappeared.

All the anomalies and the Void had been subjugated.

—Except for us.

Dok-seo confessed this fact calmly, as if she had been preparing for this moment for a long time.

I asked her quietly.

"When you say 'us,' who exactly are you talking about?"

"Hmm, let me see."

Dok-seo counted on her fingers.

"Dang Seo-rin, Cheon Yo-hwa, Yu Ji-won, Sim Ah-ryeon, Jeong Ye-ji, Lee Ha-yul, me, and lastly, Mister. That makes eight people!"

"..."

"Ah, if possible, I didn't want to give Go Yuri unni the inoculation either, but that unni had a 200% chance of degenerating into an anomaly if we didn't give it to her, you know? It couldn't be helped."

For reference, Yuri was currently asleep in the infirmary bed set up in this school.

Right after we subjugated the red flesh in the Dream Casino, Yuri's phantom that had been parasitizing in my head disappeared. Instead, Yuri's body finally manifested in reality.

However, perhaps her mental state was still unstable for various reasons. The Yuri who had returned to reality still hadn't opened her eyes.

Though it was worrying, it didn't feel ominous. Ah-ryeon had asserted there was no problem. She would regain consciousness eventually.

"Why?"

"Huh?"

That's why I had no choice but to ask.

"Dok-seo. This is your..., yes, an achievement that we've accomplished together. You found collaborators before June 17th arrived and stopped all the Voids, and you even rescued Yuri from the Dream Casino when you didn't even need to save her."

"Well, yeah?"

"This is a perfect happy ending. No, it goes beyond a simple happy ending..., it's the one and only true ending that you've won for yourself."

"Ehehe, right, right?"

"Then why."

I said.

"Why are you trying to leave this smudge called 'us' on a canvas where the final period is about to be placed so perfectly?"

"Because that's my true ending, Mister."

Dok-seo's answer came quickly.

There was an answer made not of logic's ink but of flesh and blood. It seemed Dok-seo had constructed her own answer after overcoming countless deaths.

"We haven't reached the complete answer yet, Mister. The Void still exists."

"What?"

It was something I couldn't understand.

But Dok-seo's eyes were transforming that belief, that certainty of 'don't you have some idea too?' into starlight and releasing it into the night air.

"I don't understand what you mean. The Outer Gods have all been neutralized. Once even the anchor called the Miko disappears, they won't be able to interfere with this world ever again. Ah, are you talking about the Admin of the Infinite Metagame? She's an exception, but she's already weakened enough that there's no need to worry..."

"No."

Dok-seo shook her head.

"Why did the Outer Gods invade our world in the first place, and exactly how was the Void born?"

"..."

"We still haven't obtained an answer to that first and final question. Do you know what this means, Mister?"

I closed my mouth.

Since Dok-seo didn't rush me, I could take enough time before returning an answer.

"...It means this kind of situation could happen again at any time."

"Right. Exactly. If we can't know the cause of the problem, we can't prevent it from recurring either."

"I've already given my answer regarding that. Just as Yuri and I, you, all of us together overcame the tragedy, even if the same thing happens, other children of future generations will—"

"Be able to overcome it just like us? Is that what you're saying?"

"...Yes."

"Right. Perhaps."

Dok-seo nodded.

"But... what if they can't?"

I flinched.

Because of the expression Dok-seo wore.

Deep, deep anguish and worry were contained in her red eyes.

A gaze where none of her usual playfulness could be felt.

The kind of regret that could only be shown by a human who had to walk through hell from the very starting point, just like Go Yuri or me, was carried on her eyelids.

"I had a pretty hard time."

"..."

"Of course, it wasn't only hard. There was the strategy guide left by the Dok-seos who died before me, and the strategy collection Mister gave me too. It was fun feeling like I'd become the protagonist of the world... but still, it was hard."

Dok-seo took off her hat.

Rustle, her short hair that still hadn't lost its red color flowed down.

"You had a hard time too, Mister."

"..."

"What about Go Yuri? No need to even mention it. The fact that we've reached this finish line is a miracle, Mister. I want to believe in the children of future generations too, and I will believe in them, but even so—"

There's no guarantee they'll succeed like us, is there?

"..."

"..."

Dok-seo didn't finish her sentence, and I didn't add anything either.

The very act of completing that sentence felt ominous.

But even without anyone's addition, we had become so familiar with each other that we could decipher each other's manuscripts.

"We need watchmen."

Dok-seo said.

"Someone needs to know the fact that beings who insult the laws of physics and mock humanity can invade this world at any time, without any warning."

"And that's us, the eight of us, is that what you mean?"

"Yeah. It's neither too many nor too few. Most importantly, we have trust built up between us where we won't doubt each other even if given eternal time."

Dok-seo clenched her fist tight.

"It's something only we can do, Mister."

"..."

"Perhaps this entire journey was a process to filter out the eight watchmen. We literally won't fall. There's no worry of falling at all! Because."

Her red eyes looked up at me.

"We've proven it."

"..."

"Do we want the world's power or something? Are we crazy for money? Would we manipulate people while laughing sinisterly? No, right? We've proven it."

But it was strange.

This must have been a conclusion Dok-seo reached after agonizing over it countless times from her perspective.

"It's true that your corruption is a concern, Mister. But couldn't that also be solved if we research Udumbara a bit more? Instead of eliminating the Complete Memory ability entirely, if we just weaken it partially, then we could cure the illness where you see corpses like now!"

In Dok-seo's voice, I could faintly feel the scab of a wound that hadn't fully healed.

This too was probably a scent of blood only I could detect.

I briefly pondered why Dok-seo was eating away at her own heart while saying these words, and.

"You failed to persuade her."

I reached a conclusion.

"Huh?"

"You failed to persuade Corps Director Noh Do-hwa. You probably pulled in your comrades with the same words you just said to me, long before entering the Dream Casino. But Do-hwa refused."

"..."

"Is my reasoning wrong?"

Dok-seo's lips closed.

"The other comrades probably aren't completely persuaded either. They probably agreed conditionally, saying they'd agree if I agreed."

"...Yeah."

Dok-seo hesitated.

"...That's right."

"Let me point this out first. Why did you exclude Seo Gyu? He joined the Regression Alliance from the very beginning."

"Ah, Seo Gyu mister has too loose lips, so no. If we include him, he'll probably act as the Regression Alliance's weakest link forever, you know? I'd bet 50 billion won on it."

"..."

Seo Gyu!

That's what you get for always tattling every little detail to the Saintess every single day, Seo Gyu!

"B-but Director Do-hwa was always like that from the start, right? It's unfortunate, but still, if you make the decision, Mister..."

Dok-seo glanced at me and said carefully yet sincerely.

"Won't it work?"

"..."

"We could have fun together, us. It's such a waste to throw away this much power after we've obtained it! As watchmen. Yeah, we'll only use our strength to uphold our duties as watchmen! Getting along well, like decorating a hideout together! Still... still, won't it work?"

I see.

I could feel Dok-seo's true intention.

'For this child, the true ending isn't about happiness or unhappiness, it's simply a story that continues on and on.'

A never ending story.

An eternally continuing epilogue.

'She doesn't want it to end. Her own story. The story she loved.'

How could I dare dismiss that as a childish desire?

For Dok-seo, stories were more important than life itself.

If the desire for life to not end is fundamental to humanity, then Dok-seo had simply honestly expressed her own essence.

'And Dok-seo's proposal might truly be the best option.'

'The Outer Gods have been subjugated, but her point that we're still in the dark about why the Outer Gods came to exist in the first place is true.'

Was it just my imagination?

It felt exactly like choices were being displayed before my eyes.

[1. Remain as an awakener and protect humanity.]

[2. Abandon awakening and return to being human.]

The final choice.

Regardless of how much time remained in my life, I was certain this choice would decorate the end of the main story.

Perhaps Dok-seo's eyes were what gave me such certainty.

'Right. The same thing could repeat itself at any time.'

'Not Taeguk or Hecate, but a completely unknown alien god might be newly conceived...'

At that moment.

'...At any time? Again, the same way?'

Suddenly.

The laptop Dok-seo had left on the table caught my eye.

On the laptop screen placed at an angle, a being with snow-white hair was staring blankly in this direction.

As if.

"..."

As if she had endured all humiliation until now just to witness this very moment.

"Ah."

A groan flowed from my throat.

It was the sound of realization. It was awakening.

Not a realization that flowed out cleanly without any damage, but a realization that broke apart and leaked through the bumpy passages of my throat and the narrow gaps between my teeth.

"Why all of a sudden, Mister?"

Tilt.

Dok-seo's face showed she didn't understand.

I spoke to her with difficulty.

"...This isn't the first time."

"Huh? Not the first time? What isn't?"

"This moment. This moment when all the Voids have been subjugated, leaving only awakeners as allies, where only the final choice remains of whether to become watchmen or not."

"Huh?"

"Just as there will be children born after us, there were also those born before us. Dok-seo, what if they also fought against the Void, and faced the same question you threw at me, what would have happened?"

"...!"

Dok-seo's eyes widened.

"Huh? W-wait, huh? But no, still, there weren't any, right? Go Yuri was the first awakener. The reincarnator. If something similar happened in our previous generation, there should have been watchmen."

Ah, Dok-seo's mouth fell open.

She followed the direction my eyes were cast, read my silence, and reached the conclusion herself.

There.

"...Outer Gods?"

A cheap laptop sat.

"Outer Gods, you say?"

The groan that flowed from Dok-seo's mouth trembled with the same pitch as mine.

"The Admin of the Infinite Metagame too. Hecate too... Leviathan too. Infinite Void, the Mastermind, Taeguk too. All of them... originally, they were awakeners just like us?"

"..."

"Is that what you're saying, Mister?"

I didn't answer.

Then Dok-seo's gaze focused entirely on the laptop placed on the shabby plastic table.

A comrade who had overcome numerous difficulties together with her. To the one she might have believed she'd built a friendship with that transcended the relationship of god and Miko, Dok-seo asked.

"Is it true? Infinite Metagame?"

...

At that moment.

Cackle cackle cackle cackle cackle cackle cackle cackle

Dok-seo's shoulders jerked. An unpleasant laughter burst out, breaking the laptop speaker's sound quality.

A terrifyingly quiet silence descended on the rooftop.

[Ahh.]

The speaker stuttered.

[Truly, you cannot be underestimated. How regrettable. Sincerely. How truly regrettable. I thought we were just one step away.]

"I-Infinite Metagame?"

[I told you before, didn't I? Master.]

The pixel mass on the screen ignored Dok-seo and looked straight at me.

The white-haired girl had her right index finger severed. It was proof she had surrendered to me.

[Once upon a time, it was a memory both you and I had lost, but now that we've recovered it, you can recall it, can't you?]

Crackle.

A certain fallen god whispered.

[I told you that I didn't actually surrender to you solely for survival.]

"..."

[I confessed that I wanted to see something, that I endured this absurd humiliation because there was something I wanted to see.]

It came back to me.

[Your epilogue.]

That side story world where I was left alone with the Admin of the Infinite Metagame to save the Saintess trapped in frozen time.

It was definitely a conversation we had then.

[I'll acknowledge your efforts. Yes, I acknowledge my defeat. But what will you obtain at the very end? Humanity? Mankind? That world with billions of curses if there are billions of humans?]

The same lines as back then.

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame repeated the same voice.

[The moment you fall at the very last moment, I said I wanted to see that, even if it meant abandoning all my authority.]

"..."

At the time, I only understood the word 'fall' that the Admin of the Infinite Metagame mentioned in its conventional meaning.

But not anymore.

"You knew."

I opened my mouth.

"You already knew from back then that this moment would arrive someday."

[Yes.]

The speaker crackled and popped with noise.

[Of course. My hateful master.]

Flashback.

That exchange flashed through my mind.

'If there hadn't been longing and lamentation for a different world, not this current one, an Outer God like me wouldn't have been born either.'

In the past, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame had soliloquized like that.

What did I answer after hearing that soliloquy?

'Then, going in circles, you're saying you exist because of humanity's unavoidable nature.'

'Yes.'

Humanity's unavoidable nature.

If that truly was the reason Outer Gods came to exist.

'Either way, starting from whatever life, humans will inevitably shoulder their own natural punishment.'

When faced with this final choice.

The hero party that would arrive in our future, or the hero party that had arrived in our past.

If they chose 1, which seemed so obviously like the correct answer. If they had chosen it.

'How cursed.'

If [1] had been repeated for eternity.

"..."

I swallowed my silence.

And vomited it back out.

"Infinite Metagame."

[Yes.]

"Were you once, in the past, the twisted end of a human who saved this world?"

[Your words are correct.]

The trace of downfall answered.

[I, we, are your story of failure.]

Never Ending Story.

An eternally repeating curse.

That was the answer to the Void that shrouded this world.

Footnotes:

Chapter 439
The One Who Was a Regressor III

Sinnoa

"Th-then."

Gulp.

Dok-seo swallowed.

"Leviathan and Hecate and all those guys, they were originally your comrades too? They were all human in the old days but became like that..."

[Ah, I don't remember.]

"...Huh?"

Inside the laptop screen, the white girl raised the corners of her mouth with 16-bit resolution.

That was the extent of emotional amplitude that could be expressed with a single pixel.

[Literally, I have no memories regarding them. Faint feelings, hostility, even those emotions have been worn away.]

"...You lost your memories completely?"

[Who knows? In the first place, the fact that I was 'anthropomorphized' into this form was itself a coincidence.]

Crackle.

Audio quality imitating a human voice was being spat out from the speaker's surface.

[Perhaps, yes, we might have been comrades who raced through the world together. Perhaps they were from a generation even before mine, which was before yours. How would I know?]

"..."

[If I hadn't been given human form, it would have been impossible to even guess that I was once an awakener too. Well, even now there are many defects to call me the same kind of human as you. A trace of humanity, or should I call it an epilogue?]

"Infinite Metagame, you..."

[Oh Dok-seo.]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame's eyes blinked.

For me, it was difficult to grasp emotions from that expression and voice, but perhaps it was different for a partner who had shared countless journeys together, Dok-seo's shoulders flinched.

[I'm not trying to talk with you right now. Limited to this moment, you're the person who presented the choice, not the protagonist who chooses it.]

"..."

[What will you do? My master.]

Eyes lacking emotion turned this way.

[Perhaps the master and the master's party might succeed differently from us. Yes, indeed, even if fate repeats, wouldn't the epic of a triangular formation consisting of the trio of reincarnator, regressor, and possessor be rare?]

"..."

[If it's you all.]

You might be different. No.

You're confident you can make it different.

If not us, then who will cut through this evil karma?

[Who knows? Whether you can avoid falling for eternity.]

"..."

I calmed my excited heart with a deep breath.

"It's useless to try to tempt me. If it were before I realized this fact, perhaps, but now that I've realized it, there's no way I'd make the same choice as you."

[Oh my? Did you only half-listen to my words? The master and I are different. The master is far superior to me. Don't tell me you think you'll meet the same end as an inferior seed like me?]

"Right."

The screen crackled.

The laptop screen's resolution was still excessively low, but even so, the fact that she was flustered was being conveyed.

[Yes?]

"Looking back, there were too many foreshadowings. Even Yuri, who was more magnificent than me, ultimately couldn't prevent her own fall."

[...]

"It's not just Yuri. The Saintess... Ms. Ye-ji too is someone more magnificent than me, yet she declined earlier than anyone."

[Wasn't that an ending from before you all had built up enough connections?]

The sound the Admin of the Infinite Metagame spat out was covered in noise, but its core didn't waver.

Like a music file where you could still detect the melody no matter how degraded it became.

[You've constructed an incomparably solid pyramid of connections and relationships. If one person fell alone, perhaps not, but if the seven people your Miko selected come together, there won't be another collapse.]

Laughter leaked out without me realizing it.

Whether she interpreted it as mockery, the other party's expression twisted slightly.

"Infinite Metagame, you're always such a fool."

[What do you mean?]

"Corps Director Noh Do-hwa isn't here."

[...]

"Right, now I understand why Corps Director Do-hwa rejected the proposal to become humanity's watchmen with a single word. She's truly a wise and cruel person."

I could go on for six or eight hours about her highly twisted psychological structure, but since it was a topic I'd already devoted quite a bit of space to, I skipped it.

"We might be able to endure longer than you all. We might endure longer than anyone. Enduring is ingrained in us like a habit, more than excess fat."

But, I said.

"Eventually it will repeat someday."

[Ha, then you're really saying all of you will abandon the authority of awakening?]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame burst into laughter.

[Dare I say it? I'm in complete agreement with my Miko. You've already broken through an impregnable miracle. You're going to entrust the recreation of such a miracle to future generations? Do you believe the same miracle can repeat twice, three times, four times, eternally? Groundless romanticism. Neglect of responsibility wrapped in the word faith.]

Though it was unfortunate for the other party.

In truth, I wasn't listening intently to the Admin of the Infinite Metagame's passionate speech. Since its logic was already sufficiently foreseen and previewed in my head, there was no reason to focus on it.

Right, at this time I was recalling the words of a completely different anomaly, not the Admin of the Infinite Metagame.

'Enter through the narrow gate.'

Mo Gwang-seo.

'The gate that leads to destruction is large and its path is wide, so many pass through it.'

'The gate that leads to life is small and its path is narrow, so few find it.'

'Scribe.'

'Enter through the narrow gate.'

Until now, that testament that wasn't quite a testament left by Gwang-seo had been one mystery to me.

What kind of situation had he prophesied to bring up the metaphor of the [large gate] and the [narrow gate]?

My interpretation changed each time.

'No, did he deliberately give a broadly applicable prophecy so it could be interpreted differently depending on the situation from the start?'

The mysterious anomaly that borrowed Gwang-seo's body.

'If he too was someone who failed in a previous generation, like the Admin of the Infinite Metagame before my eyes.'

If that's why he left a final testament toward future generations even as his own humanity was being erased.

'The final destination of what he called the [narrow gate], perhaps.'

Could it be this very moment?

I once again recalled the choice that had flashed through my mind like a mirage, leaving the Admin of the Infinite Metagame and Dok-seo aside.

[1. Remain as an awakener and protect humanity.]

[2. Abandon awakening and return to being human.]

Choices.

One of these was a main gate leading to destruction.

The other was a back gate leading to life.

"Aha."

And I laughed.

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame hesitated.

[...What was the meaning of that laugh just now?]

"I think that until now, the hero parties that came before us never once chose [2]. Everytime, they chose [1] and repeated salvation and destruction from the very beginning."

Then the problem became simple.

"We'll be the first to choose [2]."

[...]

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame bit her lip.

[So after decades, hundreds of years pass and the Void arrives again just the same? If tragedy repeats regardless of your choice? At that time, humanity won't have you all. In a defenseless state, in a situation where not even reincarnators or regressors exist, they'll have to fight the anomalies. Why? My master, because you shirked your responsibility!]

The speaker trembled.

[By that time, you all might already be comfortably sleeping beneath graves, wrapped in paltry self-satisfaction, but future people will be living. In a crisis where you can't even prove what the right answer is, you'll have simply fled into death!]

"Well, I can clearly see a way to prove whether the final choice was wrong or right."

[Prove...? How?]

This too was an extremely simple answer.

"Didn't we exchange a promise with you too?"

[A promise?]

"The surrender document. Even though I made you forfeit all authority as an Outer God, there were also a few things permitted to you."

[...?]

The promise written in that surrender was as follows.

---

† The Regressor Undertaker will allow the Admin of the Infinite Metagame to avoid entanglement in the flow of regression and to retain her own sense of self and memory.

† The laptop provided by the Admin of the Infinite Metagame, and any works written on that laptop by Miko Oh Dok-seo, will remain safe from the ravages of time, recognized as an Ark that retains its own unique identity.

———————————

"Do you remember?"

To my question, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame answered awkwardly.

[Of course, I remember.]

A treaty that could not be forgotten.

An oath engraved on the classroom blackboard tinged with sunset.

Of course, if I abandoned the authorities of awakening like this, someday those words would become blurred in my head.

Cheon-hwa, the older of the twin sisters, as even the cemetery where her time was sealed disappeared together, even the place where the oath was made would weather away and vanish.

Even so.

[For me, that covenant isn't just a mass of letters. Metaphorically speaking, a curse, chains. If my soul is blank paper, the covenant with you is the only writing inscribed on this soul.]

There were memories that wouldn't be erased.

The authority humans truly invented to seal time wasn't something like my Crystal Tomb, it was manuscripts sculpted in black and white language.

A prayer offered to the world.

An ark that goes against the rapid current of time.

"Infinite Metagame."

I stroked the laptop's frame.

"You leave this story behind."

[Yes?]

"That when I, when Dok-seo, when we finally reached the final choice, we ultimately walked through the narrow gate and not the large gate, you show that to the multitudes."

[...]

"To those who might have become awakeners if we had chosen the large gate and then fallen someday, to people of this world and the next world, tell them what choice we made."

[...]

"I don't know in what kind of world those people will read this story then. Will it be a world utterly ruined, stained with the poison of the Void like before?"

Then our choice was wrong.

Faith was frustrated. We were hasty.

In the end, the person who seized the miracle should have become humanity's watchman, reborn as an eternal and immortal guardian so tragedy would never be recreated again.

Please.

May you all be more competent than us.

"But if, truly if."

[...]

"..."

The Admin of the Infinite Metagame and Dok-seo were watching this way, holding their breath.

The moonlight, the streetlights, and the night birds who had forgotten how to photosynthesize yet still looked up at the starlight and cried out.

"If when someone reads the story you convey, the Void doesn't exist in this world, if the laws of physics are still laws, if the universe is still the universe."

[...]

If when they look up at the night sky, that night sky isn't cursing humanity.

If when crossing the intersection beneath the streetlights, the red of the traffic light simply indicates stop, and they don't have to substitute their footsteps with bright red blood.

If songs are still songs.

If the sound of falling rain is truly the sound of summer rain and not the crying of some transparent insect.

If when they happen to eat delicious food at a restaurant, it's not human flesh or anything else but truly, just, delicious food.

If when loving someone, they don't have to distinguish whether that person is an anomaly or not.

If some knock that just brushed past my door is yours.

"If this world is no longer a world that hates humanity."

If they can still call the world beautiful.

"Then that will be proof that our choice was right."

[...]

Whenever someone reads this story.

Whenever they simply turn over the pure white and pure black manuscript without the curse of the night sky or the lament of water drops.

Every time, every time, the [narrow gate] chosen on this closed school's rooftop will be proven.

"You said you wanted to see my ending."

[...]

"Right, I want to entrust that role to you. Can you watch over it forever?"

The laptop screen crackled.

"Our right answers and wrong answers, the epilogue of the choice decided at this very moment, I'd be grateful if you could keep watching over it."

Silence descended.

[...Authors.]

Degraded and weathered hair.

Gestures barely expressed with a few handfuls of color.

A voice that couldn't fully contain emotions.

Simply existing within the screen.

[Authors should be people of few words.]

An Outer God.

A certain small and lonely god said.

[Undertaker, you talked too much. Oh Dok-seo, you too, no matter how you changed your appearance as an editor or whatever, you can't deny you talked too much.]

[In the space asking who the author of this story is, we can't write 'Undertaker' or 'Oh Dok-seo'.]

The being who willingly accepted the fate of always losing to the protagonist was speaking.

[So, yes, my master.]

She is the one who watches to the end.

[I will gladly inscribe my own name on the ark containing your story.]

"..."

[But writing my real name, the Admin of the Infinite Metagame, would be inappropriate. That should be a reward permitted only to those who reach 'proof' at the very end, on this closed school's rooftop.]

She is the one who leads the ark.

[Borrowing from the mythological name that wove the very first ark, Noah.]

She is the god who is always baser than humans and weaker than you.

[If we take just the sound of Noah, making it Noa it would be too easy to see through the identity of the alias, so covering my original meaning with camouflage, before Noah is Sin, or God.]

She is one who exists only as an alias.

[Sinnoa.]

[On the ark containing your story, always, every time the front page is turned, I, the pen name Sinnoa, will be inscribed as a watchman.]

Inside the screen.

White hair melted away. The melted colors became manuscripts.

The form that had been precariously maintaining human shape also crumbled. The collapsed outline became letters.

[I promise.]

[I will watch over you all.]

[From now, from here, until the day I disappear.]

And…

My, our, and also her…

Longest journey began.

Footnotes:

Translator’s Afterword

ZERO_SUGAR

There's this weird feeling sitting in my chest right now, and I'm not entirely sure what to do with it.

I started translating this novel on day 1 in April of 2024. Just another web novel to translate, right?

But somewhere between the first regression and the final choice on that rooftop, between all those deaths and resurrections and the slow, painful crawl toward something that might actually be called hope, this story became something different. Something that mattered.

It's been months of sitting in that small room, carrying something between two worlds. Some days the words came easily. Other days I stared at a single paragraph for hours, trying to figure out how to make you feel what I felt when I first read it. Trying to make sure that when Undertaker finally chose the narrow gate, when Sinnoa promised to watch over their story forever, you'd understand why that moment made my hands shake a little.

The main story is done now. Undertaker and all the others made their choice. They chose to trust, to believe that maybe, just maybe, the cycle could break. That's kind of the point, isn't it? That's what makes it beautiful and terrifying in equal measure.

But I do know this: you've been here. Through 439 chapters of pain and hope and impossible choices, you've been here. And that means something. To me, definitely. Maybe to you too.

There's still the side stories ahead, still a few more chapters to tell before we really close this book. But the main journey, the one that started with a regressor who'd seen too much death and a reader who refused to let the story end badly, that journey is complete.

Thank you for walking this road with me. Thank you for waiting when updates were slow, for commenting, for telling me that sometimes these translations made your day a little better. You're why I kept going when the work got hard. You're why I'm sitting here now, finally typing these words I've been thinking about for months.

A huge thank you to LiteraryGirl who helped edit majority of the story and gave it that extra charm.

Let's see this through to the very end together, yeah?

— ZERO_SUGAR